THE GREAT PICTORIAL HISTORY OF

WORLD CRIME

Jay Robert Nash

Edgar Award-Winning Author and Dean of American True-Crime Writers

AUTHOR OF BLOODLETTERS AND BADMEN

THE GREAT PICTORIAL HISTORY OF

WORLD CRIME

VOLUME I
VOLUME II

THE GREAT PICTORIAL HISTORY OF

WORLD CRIME

Jay Robert Nash

Published By HISTORY, INC.

Distributed By Scarecrow Press Inc.

Published by History, Inc., Wilmette, IL

Distributed By Scarecrow Press, Inc., 4501 Forbes Blvd., Suite 200, Lanham, MD 20706

Copyright © 2004 by Jay Robert Nash

All rights reserved; no part of this book or other volumes of the ENCYCLOPEDIA OF WORLD CRIME may be reproduced or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, or any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the Author. Inquiries should be sent to the above address.

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 2004100992

THE GREAT PICTORIAL HISTORY OF WORLD CRIME: a narrative, illustrated history of worldwide crimes and criminals from ancient times to the present. Includes bibliographic references and index.

ISBN: 1-928831-20-6 (hardbound; 2 vols. $249.50
ISBN (Volume I): 1-928831-21-4
ISBN (Volume II): 1-928831-22-2
1. Crime—Criminals—World—History—Bibliography

Design by Cathy Anetsberger-Edens

Manufactured in the United States of America

9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

This book is dedicated to my wife, Judy, to my son, Jay Robert Nash IV, and to the memory of dear, lifelong friends, Joan Amidei, Michaela Tuohy, Jim McCormick, Stanley Ralph Ross and George de Kay.

BOOKS BY JAY ROBERT NASH

FICTION

On All Fronts
A Crime Story
The Dark Fountain
The Mafia Diaries

NON-FICTION

Dillinger: Dead or Alive?
Citizen Hoover
Bloodletters and Badmen
Hustlers and Conmen
Darkest Hours
Among the Missing
Murder, America
Almanac of World Crime
Look for the Woman
People to See
The True Crime Quiz Book
The Innovators
Zanies, The World's Greatest Eccentrics
The Crime Movie Quiz Book
Murder Among the Mighty
Open Files
The Toughest Movie Quiz Book Ever
The Dillinger Dossier
Jay Robert Nash's Crime Chronology
Encyclopedia of Organized Crime
Encyclopedia of 20th Century Murder
Encyclopedia of Western Lawmen and Outlaws Crime Dictionary
Spies
Terrorism in the 20th Century

POETRY

Lost Natives & Expatriates

THEATER

The Way Back
Outside the Gates
1947 (Last Rites for the Boys)

MULTI-VOLUME REFERENCE WORKS

The Motion Picture Guide (17 Volumes)
Encyclopedia of World Crime (8 Volumes)

INTRODUCTION

The Great Pictorial History of World Crime was designed to offer the most comprehensive work ever assembled on the most infamous criminals throughout recorded time. The most extensively illustrated work of its kind, this work provides readers with more than 2,500 crime graphics, forty percent of which are published for the first time. Undoubtedly the largest number of graphics ever assembled and published in a single source on this engrossing subject, the illustrations have been carefully selected from the author's own repository, the largest such privately-held collection. Through these eye-catching—oft-times horrific—graphics, the sinister and startling face of crime in all of its blatant and deceptive poses is revealingly shown.

It was the ambitious aim of the author to compile and illustrate in one source the most important crimes in history. The expansive coverage offers many entries running more than 10,000 words in a two-million-word narrative depicting criminal acts, modus operandi, and backgrounds of the world's most notorious criminals. Within the thousands of profiles to be found in this work, the reader will learn the subtle and flagrant motives behind their criminal feats. In many instances, the author expresses a definite opinion about questionable or puzzling cases, pointing to the conspiratorial cabal behind the murder of Abraham Lincoln; the identity of John F. Kennedy's assassin; the true natures of robbers Jesse James and Bonnie and Clyde; how Scotland Yard can solve the 115-year-old Jack the Ripper case; the illustrated evidence long-researched by the author that shows how bandit John Dillinger was not killed, as claimed by the FBI, at a Chicago theater in 1934; the culpability of O. J. Simpson; the most probable killer of film director William Desmond Taylor, to name only a few of the thousands of cases receiving in-depth definition.

Every major crime category is presented as a separate, comprehensive case-by-case history. Volume I: Assassination; Bigamy; Burglary; Cannibalism; Drugs; Fraud; Gangs, Gangsters and Organized Crime; Volume II: Kidnapping; Murder (including Celebrity Slayings, Mass Murder, Serial Killers and Unsolved Homicides); Piracy; Robbery; Secret Criminal Societies and Terrorism. Many chapters are followed by extensive chronologies depicting further notable cases (there are more than 350 such entries in the chronology following the chapter on kidnapping).

All of the world's most significant and history-altering assassinations, as well as attempted political murders, are presented in scores of entries that extensively profile and illustrate both victims and perpetrators. (This chapter alone offers more than 150,000 words and more than 400 illustrations.) Here the reader will find substantial text and graphic profiles from the killing of Julius Caesar to the murders of American presidents Abraham Lincoln (this entry alone offers more then fifteen thousand words and forty-seven illustrations), James A. Garfield, William McKinley, and John F. Kennedy. The kings and heads of state throughout the world, who fell before the assassin's blade or bullet will be found in these pages, such as Alexander II of Russia, Austria's Francis Ferdinand, and Nicholas II of Russia, as well as Anwar Sadat and Yitzhak Rabin.

The world's most infamous bigamists, from England's Elizabeth Chudleigh of the 18th Century to America's outrageous Sigmund Engel of the 20th Century (who illegally married and bilked more than 200 women) will be found in the illustrated pages of this work. The most daring and often lethal burglars, from Scotland's William Brodie (upon whose dark exploits Robert Louis Stevenson based his novel, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde) to American millionaire burglar Bernard Charles Welch, Jr., are given in-depth treatments. So, too, are the world's bloodthirsty cannibals: Sawney Bean of 15th Century Scotland, the German monster Fritz Haarmann, Russia's Andrei Chikatilo and American flesh-eaters Alferd Packer, Albert Fish, Ed Gein and Jeffrey Dahmer.

From the ancient kingdoms to the present day, the shocking history of drugs is profiled. Here the reader will find the use of hemp, coca and other exotic drugs among the Aztecs and the American tribes, which ironically contributed to the destruction of George Armstrong Custer's 7th Cavalry at the Little Big Horn in 1876; the introduction of opium (the "Mongolian Curse") into the U.S. through widespread Chinese immigration; the famous writers who used heroin and cocaine to stimulate their creations; the celebrated drug-addicted film stars who ruined their careers and lives; and the billionaire drug czars who operated the drug cartels of Central and South America.

All manner of fraud—impersonations in identities and art, bank and investment swindles, and all manner of confidence games—are to be discovered in this extensive chapter—the mulcting Mary Moders of 17th Century England; Italy's 18th Century magician-charlatan Cagliostro; the American robber barons, Daniel Drew, Big Jim Fisk, Jay Gould; the bold con artists William Elmer Mead, Victor "The Count" Lustig, and Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil, along with their female counterparts, Sophie Lyons, Cassie Chadwick and the volatile Poillon sisters; the Dutch painter Han van Meegeren of masterful fakes; the corporate swindlers Ivar Kreuger of Sweden, France's Serge Stavisky, and America's Billie Sol Estes and Robert Vesco; millionaire tax cheat Leona Helmsley; stock manipulator Michael Milken, bank swindler Charles Keating, and many more.

More than 100,000 words and 280 illustrations will be found for gangs, gangsters and organized crime, spanning more than a century and providing extensive profiles on early day crime bosses and their lethal minions, including Paul Kelly, Big Jim Colosimo, "Joe the Boss" Masseria, Al Capone, Dutch Schultz, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Lucky Luciano, Meyer Lansky, Bugsy Siegel, Vito Genovese, Albert "The Mad Hatter" Anastasia and latter-day syndicate/Mafia chiefs Anthony "Big Tuna" Accardo, Joe Colombo, the warring Gallo brothers and John Gotti, the "Teflon Don." Of equal length and with hundreds of illustrations, kidnapping, from ancient times to the present is captured in dozens of the world's most important cases—including the first ransom kidnapping in America, the abduction of Charley Ross in 1874; the faked kidnapping of American evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson in 1926; the sensational 1932 Lindbergh kidnapping by Bruno Richard Hauptmann (15,000 words, 32 illustrations); the abduction and murder of Bobbie Greenlease in 1953; the kidnappings of Barbara Mackle in Atlanta and Muriel McKay in England; China's most notorious kidnapper, Cheung Tze-keung, executed in 1998; the 1973 taking of Gene Paul Getty, the grandson of the world's richest man; the serial abduction-child killers Lawrence Bittaker, Arthur Bishop, Wayne Williams, Leonard Lake and Charles Ng; Belgium's Marc Dutroux, Charles Jaynes and Salvatore Sicari.

Murder of all manner and types is represented by more than 400,000 words and 800 illustrations in this all-encompassing work, including celebrity slayings that shocked nations—that of Sir Thomas Overbury in 1613; the mysterious 1791 death of composer Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart; France's infamous essayist-killer Pierre Francois Lacenaire; Harvard Professor John White Webster; Roland B. Molineux.; Pittsburgh millionaire Harry K. Thaw, who shot to death the celebrated architect, Stanford White in 1906; Princess Marie Fahmy, who killed her husband, Prince Ali Fahmy at London's Savoy Hotel; millionaire killers Nathan Leopold and Richard Loeb of Chicago; sun worshipper Harry Grew Crosby; the notorious 1931 Massie murder case in Hawaii; heiress Candy Mossler; the murder of silent screen star Ramon Novarro in Los Angeles in 1968; playboy Claus von Bulow; Christian Brando, son of famed actor Marlon Brando; football star and film personality, O. J. Simpson, who stood trial for two slashing murders in 1994; Brynn Hartman, who murdered her comedian husband, Phil Hartman, before committing suicide in 1998, and many others.

Those who committed mass murder, will also be found in these pages: Romanian rulers Vlad Dracul and Vlad Tepes (Bram Stoker used both father and son as the role models for his legendary vampire, Dracula); Albert Hicks, hanged in 1860; Jean-Baptiste Troppmann; plane bombers Albert Guay and John Gilbert Graham; Howard Unruh; Richard Hicks and Perry Smith; Richard Speck; the 1969 murder clan of Charles Manson; religious fanatics who brought about the mass homicides of their naïve followers—James Warren Jones of Guyana in 1978; David Koresh in Waco, Texas, in 1993; Marshall Applegate in San Diego, in 1997.

All of the world's worst serial killers are included: France's Gilles des Rais; Hungary's Elizabeth Bathory; the barbarous Bender family of Kansas; Chicago's Herman Webster Mudgett (H. H. Holmes), who may have killed as many as 200 women; Belle Gunness of Indiana; France's Henri Desire Landru and Marcel Petiot; Germany's Peter Kurten; England's Burke and Hare, John George Haigh, Reginald Halliday Christie and Peter William Sutcliffe (Yorkshire Ripper); Australia's Ivan Robert Marko Milat; and American modern-era slayers Charles Starkweather, Melvin David Rees, Albert De Salvo ("The Boston Strangler"), Walter Kelbach and Myron Lance, Douglas Gretzler and William Steelman, John Wayne Gacy, Angelo Buono and Kenneth Bianchi ("The Hillside Strangler"), Theodore "Ted" Bundy, Dean Corll and Elmer Wayne Henley, Herbert Mullin, Juan Vallejo Corona, Vernon Butts and William Bonin (Freeway Strangler), Patrick Wayne Kearney and David D. Hill, Henry Lee Lucas and Ottis Elwood Toole, Coral Eugene Watts, Christopher Bernard Wilder, Dorothy Puente, Joseph Paul Franklin, Dayton Leroy Rogers, Adolfo de Jesus Constanzo, Rory Enrique Conde, Andrew Phillip Cunanan, who killed fashion tycoon Gianni Versace, and many others.

All of the great unsolved murders are also profiled in this gigantic work, including the horrific 1888 murders in London's Whitechapel by the fiend known to history as Jack the Ripper (the author appending a note to Scotland Yard at the end of this entry, which details his suggestion on how to solve this baffling 115-year-old case); the sensational New York killings of millionaire bridge expert Joseph Browne Elwell and showgirls Dot King and Starr Faithfull (the role model for the novel and film, Butterfield 8); New Jersey's mystifying Hall-Mills case; the perplexing murder of film director William Desmond Taylor and the strange death of film actress Thelma Todd; the murders of multi-millionaires Zachary Smith Reynolds (heir to the Reynolds tobacco fortune) in 1932 and Sir Harry Oakes in 1943; the baffling and savage 1947 Black Dahlia (Elizabeth Short) murder in Los Angeles; the 1996 killing of child beauty contestant JonBenet Ramsay in Boulder, Colorado, and many others.

The comprehensive chapter on piracy profiles the wild and savage careers of Barbarossa I and II (both known as "Redbeard"), Sir Francis Drake, Sir Henry Morgan, Thomas Tew, Jean Bart, Captain William Kidd, Edward Teach ("Blackbeard"), Howell Davis, Charles Vane, John Rackam (Calico Jack), Philip Roche, Edward England, Edward Low, the lady pirates Anne Bonny and Mary Read, and the last of the great corsairs, Jean Lafitte.

The comprehensive history of robbery portrays the most notorious thieves and bandits of the old and modern eras: Moll Cutpurse, London's master pickpocket; the bold Colonel Thomas Blood, who stole the British crown jewels from the Tower of London in 1671; the early-day highwaymen of England—Dick Turpin, James Maclaine, and John Rann ("Sixteen String Jack")—and their American counterparts: Michael Martin ("Captain Lightfoot") and John A. Murrel ("The Great Western Land Pirate"), the legendary black bandit Bras Coupe ("Brigand of the Swamp"); Australia's Ned Kelly; England's train robber-killers Franz Muller and Percy Lefoy and the Great Gold Robbery of 1855; the legendary American train and bank robbers, Jesse and Frank James, the Younger Brothers, and The Wild Bunch (Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid). Robbers of the 20th Century include the celebrated Sacco-Vanzetti case, France's Jules Bonnet, and American bandits Gerald Chapman, John Dillinger, the Barker-Karpis gang, Bonnie Parker and Clyde Barrow, Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd, Willie "The Actor" Sutton; the Sicilian bandit Salvatore Giuliano; England's Great Train Robbery, the bloody North Hollywood robbery of 1997 and many others.

Secret criminal societies are extensively profiled, from India's ancient killer cult, Thugee to the organization and heyday of the Sicilian-born Mafia, from the murderous Order of the Assassins in Persia led by the Old Man of the Mountain (whose mantle Osama bin Laden assumed) to the dreaded Chinese Triads, from Japan's Yakuza (stemming from the old Black Dragon Society) to Kenya's genocidal Mau Mau and America's Ku Klux Klan.

A comprehensive chapter on terrorism chronicles from ancient times to the present many of the most infamous individuals and groups that have practiced political, economic or financial terrorism; union terrorist Harry Orchard; the anarchists of England, who battled police and troops in London in the 1911 "Siege of Sidney Street"; New York's "Mad Bomber," George Peter Metesky; Hungary's train bomber Sylvestre Matuschka; California's Symbionese Liberation Army (and the Patty Hearst case); "Carlos the Jackal" (Ilyich Ramirez Sanchez); Japan's Aum Shinri Kyo, the sect that launched the poison gas (sarin) attacks in Tokyo's subway system in 1995; American terrorists Theodore Kaczynski ("The Unabomber") and Timothy McVeigh, who killed 168 persons in a bombing attack in Oklahoma City in 1995; the U.S. embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998; the devastating terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001, by members of Al Qaeda and under the direction of terrorist leader Osama bin Laden; many more.

The Great Pictorial History of World Crime captures all of these cases and more, showing how clever criminals adapted to law enforcement procedures and measures from one decade to another, from one century to the next. This work is the result of three decades of research and writing on behalf of the author, a kaleidoscopic work intended to inform and enlighten the reader about the most infamous persons in the history of the human race. None are to be admired, but all should be studied, examined and understood, for many of these memorable miscreants have altered the course of human events for their own evil ends and to the widespread detriment of mankind.

Jay Robert Nash, 2004

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Grateful acknowledgement is given to the thousands of persons and agencies that, over the years, have assisted the author in obtaining valuable source information, research materials of all kinds, photos, illustrations, trial reports, and tracts. Without the splendid and wonderful cooperation of these persons and organizations, The Great Pictorial History of World Crime could not have come into existence. Organizations deserving special recognition include correctional facilities, criminal investigation agencies, government offices, historical societies, libraries, newspapers and other media, and police departments worldwide.

CORRECTIONAL FACILITIES: Alabama Dept. of Corrections (Montgomery, Alabama); Arizona Dept. of Corrections (Phoenix, Arizona; Jo Stephens); Baystate Correctional Center (Norfolk, Massachusetts; Deodato Arruda); Bureau of Prisons (Washington, D. C.; Helen Butler, Tina Cloyd); California Department of Corrections (Sacramento, California; Lisa Korb); Connecticut Department of Correction (Hartford, Connecticut.); Delaware Department of Correction (Smyrna, Delaware; Kathryn Pippin); District of Columbia Department of Corrections (Washington, D. C.; Pat Wheeler); Federal Bureau of Prisons - North Central Region (Kansas City, Missouri) Florida Department of Corrections (Tallahassee, Florida); Georgia Department of Corrections (Atlanta, Georgia); Illinois Department of Corrections (Springfield, Illinois); Indiana Department of Corrections (Indianapolis, Indiana); Kansas Department of Corrections (Topeka, Kansas; Thomas J. Sloan); Kentucky Corrections Cabinet, Department of Adult Correctional Institutions (Lexington, Kentucky); Lackawanna County Prison (Scranton, Pennsylvania); Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services (Baltimore, Maryland); Massachusetts Department of Probations and Records (Boston, Massachusetts); Minnesota Department of Corrections (St. Paul, Minnesota); Missouri Department of Corrections and Human Resources (Springfield, Missouri); Nevada Department of Prisons (Carson City, Nevada); New York State Department of Corrections (Albany, New York; Kelly Priess); New Jersey Department of Corrections (Trenton, New Jersey); North Carolina Department of Corrections (Raleigh, North Carolina; David Guth); Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction (Columbus, Ohio); Oklahoma Department of Corrections (Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; Michelle Matthews); Olmsted County (Minnesota), Department of Corrections; Pennsylvania Department of Corrections (Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; Kenneth G. Robinson); South Carolina Department of Corrections (Columbia, South Carolina; Judy Bode); Tennessee Department of Corrections (Nashville, Tennessee; William C. Haynes, Jr.); Texas Department of Corrections (Huntsville, Texas); U. S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners (Springfield, Illinois); Leavenworth (Kansas) Penitentiary; Marion (Illinois) Penitentiary; Utah Department of Corrections (Salt Lake City, Utah).

COURT OFFICIALS: Nell E. Anderson (Clerk of the District Court, Teller County, Cripple Creek, Colorado); Tom Bigbee (Record Planning Commission, Canton, Alabama); C. Edward Bourassa (Registrar of Probate, Hillsborough County Probate Court, Nashua, New Hampshire); Richard P. Brinker (Clerk, Probate Division of Circuit Court of Miami, Florida); Arlene D. Connors (Deputy Registrar in Probate, Milwaukee County, Milwaukee, Wisconsin); John J. Corcoran (Acting County Clerk, Los Angeles, California); Susan Cottrell (Deputy, San Diego, California); Virginia Crane (Deputy Court Clerk, Neptune, New Jersey); John T. Curry (Circuit Clerk, Probate Division, Macon County, Illinois) Director of Licensing, Public Service Level, Minneapolis, Minnesota; B. J. Dunavant (Clerk of the Probate Court, Shelby County, Memphis, Tennessee); Bremer Ehrler (Clerk, Jefferson County Court, Probate Division, Louisville, Kentucky); C. Fatni (Record Clerk, Surrogate's Court, Kings County, New York); Mildred Fulton (County Clerk, Cherokee County, Rusk, Texas); Mildred Gonder (Deputy Clerk, Probate Court, New Albany, Indiana); Harriet L. Gosnell (Trust Officer, Peoples Bank of Bloomington, Illinois); Jackie Griffin (Chief Deputy, Ellis County, Texas); Carole J. Hals (Deputy Clerk, County Court, Probate Division, Starbuck, Minnesota); James B. Kelley, Jr. (Register, Probate Court, Taunton, Massachusetts); Julia Kowrak (Register of Wills, City Hall, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania); Leland Harrison (Clerk, Probate Court, Terre Haute, Indiana); Madeline S. Marring (Deputy Clerk, Putnam County, New Jersey); Sarah Montjoy (Deputy Clerk, Jefferson County Court, Probate Division, Louisville, Kentucky); Olmsted County Court, Probate Division (Minnesota); Carl M. Olsen (Deputy Clerk, San Francisco, California); Mrs. Lana J. Olson (Registrar of Probate, Luce County, Newberry, Michigan); Loma Pierce (Secretary to Judge Donald Gunn, Probate Court of St. Louis, Missouri); Probate Court, Port Arthur, Texas; Probate Court, Providence, Rhode Island; William J. Regan (Judge of the Surrogates Court, Buffalo, New York); Elisabeth F. Sachse (Deputy Clerk of Court, Baton Rouge, Louisiana); St. Joseph County Health Department (South Bend, Indiana); San Mateo County Sheriffs Office (Hall of Justice, Redwood City, California); Joan R. Saunders (Deputy Registrar of Wills, Clerk of the Probate Division, Washington, D. C.); Jean Smith (Deputy Clerk of Court, Watonwan County, St. James, Minnesota); Nancy M. Spaulding (Chief Clerk, Schoharie, New York); Storey County (Nevada) Probate Clerk; Surrogates Court of Essex, New Jersey; Irene Thuringer (Deputy Clerk, Probate Department, Pima County, Tucson, Arizona); John M. Walker (Chief of Public Services, Los Angeles, California); David M. Warren (Assistant Chief Deputy, Probate Courts Department, Harris County, Houston, Texas); R. D. Zumwalt (County Clerk, San Diego, California).

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION AGENCIES: Atlanta, Georgia, U. S. Attorney's Office; Boston, Massachusetts, U. S. Attorney's Office; Boston, Massachusetts, District Attorney's Office; Brooklyn, New York, District Attorney's Office; Bryan, Texas, District Attorney's Office (Bill Turner); Chicago, Illinois, U. S. Attorney's Office; Columbus, Ohio, U. S. Attorney's Office; Cook County State's Attorney's Office (Chicago, Illinois; Merle Aguilar); Cook County State's Attorney-Criminal Records Department, (Chicago, Illinois); Danville, Illinois, U. S. Attorney's Office (Rick Cox); Denver, Colorado, District Attorney's Office (Dave Heckenbach, Assistant District Attorney); Fort Smith, Arkansas, District Attorney's Office (Steven Snyder, Assistant District Attorney); Franklin County Prosecutor's Office (Columbus, Ohio, Thomas Tornabene); Geneva, Illinois, State's Attorney's Office; Hamilton County (Ohio) Prosecutor's Office; Lee County State's Attorney's Office (Fort Myers, Florida); Livingston County, Illinois, District Attorney's Office; Los Angeles City Attorney's Office (Mike Qualls); Los Angeles, California, District Attorney's Office (Grace Denton); Manhattan District Attorney's Office (New York, New York); Montgomery County District Attorney's Office (Cheltenham, Pennsylvania); New Bedford, Massachusetts, District Attorney's Office; New Orleans, Louisiana, U.S. Attorney's Office; Reno, Nevada, District Attorney's Office; San Jose, California, District Attorney's Office; Shiawassee County, Michigan, District Attorney's Office; Suffolk County, New York, Assistant District Attorney's Office (Jermyn Ray); Westchester County District Attorney's Office (New York); Will County State's Attorney's Office (Joliet, Illinois).

GOVERNMENT OFFICES: Camden County (North Carolina) Clerk's Office; Crown Point, Indiana, Mayor's Office; Department of Treasury, Public Affairs Office (Washington, D. C.; Robert R. Snow); Federal Bureau of Investigation, Special Productions Branch (Washington, D. C.; Melanie McElhinney); Federal Bureau of Investigation (Washington, D. C.); Hamilton County Clerk's Office (Cincinnati, Ohio); Municipal References & Resource Center of New York City (New York, New York; Devra Zetlan); Shiawassee County (Michigan) Clerk's Office; Tallahassee, Florida, City Clerk's Office (Becky Pippin); U. S. Information Agency (Washington, D.C.; Scott Righetti); U. S. Department of the Treasury (Secret Service).

HISTORICAL SOCIETIES: Anoka (Minnesota) County Historical Society; Arizona State Historical Society (Tucson, Arizona) Blair County Historical Society (Altoona, Pennsylvania; Sylvia L. Emerson, Cur-ator); California Historical Society (Los Angeles, California; Peter Evans); Chicago Historical Society; Colorado State Historical Society (Denver, Colorado); Connecticut Historical Society (Hartford, Connecticut); Detroit Historical Society; Historical Society of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania); Historical Society of Pennsylvania (Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania); Illinois Historical Society (Chicago, Illinois); Illinois State Historical Society (Springfield, Illinois); Kansas State Historical Society (Topeka, Kansas); Kentucky Historical Society (Frankfort, Kentucky); La Porte Historical Society (La Porte, Indiana); Massachusetts Historical Society (Boston, Massachusetts); Milwaukee Historical Society (Milwaukee, Wisconsin); Minnesota Historical Society (St. Paul, Minnesota); Missouri State Historical Society (Columbia, Missouri); New Jersey Historical Society (Newark, New Jersey); New York Historical Society (New York, New York, Marian Touba); Oregon Historical Society (Portland, Oregon); Virginia Historical Society (Richmond, Virgina); Wyoming State Historical Society (Cheyenne, Wyoming).

LIBRARIES: Alachua County Library District (Gainesville, Florida; Phyllis Filer); Boston Public Library; Bridgeport Public Library (Bridgeport, Connecticut; Louise Minervino); Broward County Library (Fort Lauderdale, Florida; Juanita Alpuche, Allison M. Ellis); California State Library (Sacramento, California); Chicago Public Library (Chicago, Illinois; Lois Berger); Columbia University Law Library (New York, New York); Denver Public Library (Denver, Colorado; James H. Davis, Picture Librarian); Detroit Public Library; Drug Enforcement Administration Library (Washington, D. C.; Edith A. Crutchfield); Harvard Law School Library (Cambridge, Massachusetts); Illinois State Library (Springfield, Illinois); Indiana State Library (Indianapolis, Indiana); John Crerar Library (Chicago, Illinois); Library of Congress (Washington, D. C.; Dan Burney); Metropolitan Library System (Oklahoma City, Oklahoma); Monroe County Law Library (Monroe, Michigan; Judge Sullivan); New Orleans Public Library (New Orleans, Louisiana); New York City Public Library (New York, New York); New York State Law Library (Albany, New York); Newberry Library (Chicago, Illinois); North Carolina State Library (Raleigh, North Carolina); Northwestern University Law Library (Chicago, Illinois); Scotland Yard Library (London, England); Special Collections Library, Northwestern University (Evanston, Illinois; Russell Maylone); University of California Library (Berkeley, California; William F. Roberts, Reference Librarian); University of Chicago Library (Chicago, Illinois); University of Missouri Law Library (Columbia, Missouri); University of Missouri Library (Columbia, Missouri); University of Oklahoma (Norman, Oklahoma; Jack D. Haley, Assistant Curator, Western History Collections); University of Wisconsin Criminal Justice Reference and Information Center (Madison, Wisconsin; Sue L. Center, Director); Wisconsin Department of Justice, Law Library (Madison, Wisconsin; Michael F. Bemis); Yale University Law Library (New Haven, Connecticut; Robert E. Brooks, Reference; Jo Anne Giammattei, Acquisitions).

MISSING PERSONS BUREAUS: Chicago Police Dept. (Chicago, Illinois; Lts. Bill Bodner, John Doyle, Bill Frost); New York Police Department (New York, New York; Detective John Griffin).

NEWSPAPERS/MEDIA: Adam Smith's Money World (New York, New York, Anne Hansen); Albuquerque (New Mexico) Journal; Arizona Daily Star (Tucson, Arizona); Arizona Republic (Phoenix, Arizona; Tom Fitzpatrick); Arkansas Democrat (Booneville, Arkansas); Atlanta (Georgia) Constitution (Diane Hunter); Baltimore (Maryland) Sun; Bangor (Maine) Daily News; Boston (Massachusetts) Herald (Betsy Warrior); Boston (Massachusetts) Globe (William Boles); Capital News Service (Los Angeles, California; Jerry Goldberg); Charleston (West Virgina) Gazette (Ron Miller); Chicago Sun-Times (Chicago, Illinois); Chicago Tribune (Chicago, Illinois); Cincinnati (Ohio) Enquirer, Clarion-Ledger (Jackson, Mississippi); Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer (Eileen M. Lentz); Daily Northwestern (Oshkosh, Wisconsin); Daily Oklahoman (Oklahoma City, Oklahoma); Dallas (Texas) Morning News; Dayton (Ohio) Daily News; Detroit (Michigan) Free Press; Detroit (Michigan) News; Gallatin (Tennessee) Examiner (John Cannon); Greenville (South Carolina) News; Houston (Texas) Post; Houston (Texas) Chronicle (Sherry Abrams); Indianapolis (Indiana) Star (Nadine Moore); Japan Times (Tokyo, Japan; Shigeo Shimada); Las Vegas (Nevada) Sun (Jenny Scarantino); Los Angeles (California) Times (Renee Nembhard); Louisville (Kentucky) Courier-Journal (Patrick Chapman); Miami (Florida) Herald (Liz Donovan, Nora Paul); Morning Call (Allentown, Pennsylvania; Lynn M Dubbs); New York (New York) Daily News (Faigi Rosenthal); New York (New York) Times (Tom Wicker); Newsday (Garden City, New York; Elizabeth Whisnant); Omaha (Nebraska) World Herald; Philadelphia (Pennsylvania) Inquirer; Pittsburgh (Pennsylvania) Post Gazette; Portland (Oregon) Oregonian (Sandra Macomber); Press Telegram (Long Beach, California; George Choma); Providence (Rhode Island) Journal; Reno (Nevada) Gazette-Journal (Carole Keith, Nan Spina); Rocky Mountain News (Denver, Colorado); St. Louis (Missouri) Post-Dispatch; (Mike Mader); Salt Lake Tribune (Salt Lake City, Utah); San Antonio (Texas) Express-News (Judy Zipp); San Diego (California) Union; San Francisco (California) Chronicle (Nikki Bengal); San Francisco (California) Examiner; Seattle (Washington) Times; Seattle (Washington) Post-Intelligencer; Selma (Alabama) Times Journal (Macke Davis Maud); Spokesman-Review (Spokane, Washington); Tampa Tribune (Tampa Bay, Florida); The State (Columbia, South Carolina; Dargan Richards); Times News (Cumberland, Maryland; Linda Shuck); Topeka (Kansas) Capital-Journal; Trenton (New Jersey) Times; Tucson (Arizona) Daily Citizen; Tulsa (Oklahoma) Daily World; Wichita (Kansas) Eagle Beacon; Winnipeg Free Press (Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada); WTEN-TV (Albany, New York; David A. Lamb).

POLICE DEPARTMENTS (U.S.): Aurora (Illinois) Police Department; Baltimore (Maryland) Police Department (Dennis S. Hill, Director, Public Information Division); Boston (Massachusetts) Police Department (Allison Woodhouse, Research & Analysis) Brooklyn Organized Crime Strike Force (Brooklyn, New York); Chicago (Illinois) Police Department (Dennis Bingham, Public Information; Tina Vicini, Director, News Affair Division); Chicago (Illinois) Police Department Academy (Sgt. Anthony Consieldi); Dallas (Texas) Police Department (Capt J. E. Ferguson); Deerfield (Illinois) Police Department (Richard Brandt, Chief of Police, Thomas A. Creighton, Youth Director); Indianapolis (Indiana) Police Department (Maj. Robert L. Snow); Los Angeles (California) Police Department (Stephen F. Hatfield, Public Information Director) Metropolitan Police Department (St. Louis, Missouri); Miami (Florida) Police Dept. (Maj. Dean De Jong); Minneapolis (Minnesota) Police Dept (Ted Faul, Deputy Chief of Services; J. E. Bender, Officer); Oshkosh (Wisconsin) Police Department; Pennsylvania State Police Troop H; Philadelphia (Pennsylvania) Police Department (Mary Ann Edmunds); Portland (Oregon) Police Department (Candy Hill Turay); San Diego (California) Police Department (Pliny Castanien); Washington, D. C. Police Dept.; (Great Britain) New Scotland Yard (London, England; Annette Eastgate, Robin Goodfellow, Steve Wilmot).

NON-GOVERNMENT AGENCIES: Alcatraz Ferry (San Francisco, California); Chicago Crime Commission (Chicago, Illinois).

OTHER CONTRIBUTORS: American Red Cross (Washington, D. C., Margaret O'Connor); Amnesty International (New York, New York; Janice Christianson); Chinese Consulate's Office (New York, New York); Japanese Consulate's Office (Chicago, Illinois); Korean Consulate's Office (Chicago, Illinois); Yuri Morozov, Translator; Northwestern University Language Department (Evanston, Illinois; Rolf Erickson); Pinkerton's, Inc. (New York, New York; G. F. O'Neill); Salvation Army (Chicago, Illinois; Col. Lloyd Robb); Seaman's Institute of New York City (New York, New York; Barbara Clauson).

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENTS: Marcel A. Moreau (Paris, France); Lionel Blocker (London, England); James Canfield (Melbourne, Australia); Joseph P. Rikens (Tokyo, Japan); Raul Martinez (Buenos Aires, Argentina); Arthur Gold (Hong Kong); Franz Gunther (Rio de Janeiro, Brazil); Dieter Hesse (Frankfurt, Germany); Michael R. Murphy (Dublin, Ireland); Harold S. Jones (Toronto, Canada).

HISTORY, INC. STAFF MEMBERS AND SERVICE PROVIDERS: Walter Oleksy, Managing Editor; William Clogston, Chief Researcher; Cathy Edens, Art Director; William and Diann Leahy, Production (Edit/Pro); Joyce Bennett, Researcher; Brian Amidei, Researcher.

PHOTOS (IN ADDITION TO THE SOURCES CITED ABOVE): Jay Robert Nash Collection; U. S. Library of Congress/National Archives; U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation; Scotland Yard/New Scotland Yard (Black Museum); Surete Generale, Paris, France; Interpol, Paris, France; British Museum, London, England; police departments, museums and historical societies of (Argentina) Buenos Aires; (Australia) Brisbane, Melbourne, Sydney; (Austria) Vienna; (Belgium), Brussels; (Brazil) Rio de Janeiro, Sao Paulo; (Chile) Santiago; (Czechoslovakia) Prague; (Denmark) Copenhagen; (Dominican Republic) Santo Domingo; (Ecuador) Quito; (Egypt) Cairo; (Germany) Berlin, Bonn, Frankfurt, Munich, Stuttgart; (Hungary) Budapest; (India) Bombay, Calcutta, Delhi, Madras; (Israel), Tel-Aviv; (Italy), Rome, Naples, Palermo; (Jamaica) Kingston; (Japan) Tokyo; (Kenya) Nairobi; (Mexico) Mexico City; (Netherlands) Amsterdam, The Hague; (New Zealand) Wellington; (Norway) Oslo; (Peru) Lima; (Philippines) Manila; (Portugal) Lisbon; (Puerto Rico) San Juan; (Republic of Ireland) Dublin; (Rumania) Bucharest; (Russia) Moscow; (South Africa) Cape Town, Johannesburg, Pretoria; (South Korea) Seoul; (Spain) Barcelona, Madrid; (Sweden) Stockholm; (Switzerland) Bern, Zurich; (Turkey) Istanbul.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CHAPTER ONE: ASSASSINATION 1-216

CHAPTER TWO: BIGAMY 217-244

CHAPTER THREE: BURGLARY 245-290

CHAPTER FOUR: CANNIBALISM 291-318

CHAPTER FIVE: DRUGS 319-360

CHAPTER SIX: FRAUD 361-470

CHAPTER SEVEN: GANGS, GANGSTERS AND ORGANIZED CRIME 471-620

CHAPTER EIGHT: KIDNAPPING 621-786

CHAPTER NINE: MURDER/CELEBRITY SLAYINGS 787-936

CHAPTER TEN: MURDER/MASS MURDER 937-1018

CHAPTER ELEVEN: MURDER/SERIAL KILLERS 1019-1174

CHAPTER TWELVE: MURDER/UNSOVED HOMICIDES 1175-1268

CHAPTER THIRTEEN: PIRACY 1269-1310

CHAPTER FOURTEEN: ROBBERY 1311-1434

CHAPTER FIFTEEN: SECRET CRIMINAL SOCIETIES 1435-1494

CHAPTER SIXTEEN: TERRORISM 1495-1609

BIBLIOGRAPHY 1611-1703

INDEX 1705-1755

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CHAPTER ONE: ASSASSINATION 1-216
CHAPTER TWO: BIGAMY 213-244
CHAPTER THREE: BURGLARY 245-290
CHAPTER FOUR: CANNIBALISM 291-318
CHAPTER FIVE: DRUGS 319-360
CHAPTER SIX: FRAUD 361-470
CHAPTER SEVEN: GANGS, GANGSTERS AND ORGANIZED CRIME 471-620
CHAPTER EIGHT: KIDNAPPING 621-786
CHAPTER NINE: MURDER/CELEBRITY SLAYINGS 787-936
CHAPTER TEN: MURDER/MASS MURDER 937-1018
CHAPTER ELEVEN: MURDER/SERIAL KILLERS 1019-1174
CHAPTER TWELVE: MURDER/UNSOVED HOMICIDES 1175-1268
CHAPTER THIRTEEN: PIRACY 1269-1310
CHAPTER FOURTEEN: ROBBERY 1311-1434
CHAPTER FIFTEEN: SECRET CRIMINAL SOCIETIES 1435-1494
CHAPTER SIXTEEN: TERRORISM 1495-1609
BIBLIOGRAPHY 1611-1703
INDEX 1705-1755

CHAPTER ONE: ASSASSINATION

Throughout recorded history, the world has been plagued by assassinations, the wanton murders of prominent political or social leaders. From biblical times and through the long eras of Persia, Egypt, Greece and Rome the deadly assassin was present. In the modern era, these killers would claim the lives of countless presidents and premiers, gurus and kings. The word "assassin" derives from the Arabic word "hashshashin," or "hashish," a drug either smoked or chewed that was employed by members of an 11th Century Islamic sect that sought to murder Western leaders of the Crusades and came into prominence during the Third Crusade, led by English King Richard the Lionheart. Members of this sect believed that the murder of one's political enemy was a religious and sacred rite. (This mindset was later embraced by the followers of Islamic terrorist Osama bin Laden.)

Marco Polo related tales of the followers of this Near Eastern cult and their deadly acts after smoking hashish. The drug supposedly elevated them to a higher level of paradise, enabling them to fearlessly face "martyrdom." In the 11th Century Hasan e-Sabbah (known as the Old Man of the Mountain) commanded a vast network of professional killers who stalked their enemies throughout Persia and what is now Iraq. By the 12th Century, their influence extended into Syria. The reign of the assassins lasted until 1256, when the Mongol armies under the leadership of Hülegu seized their castles in Persia and Alamut. After this period, the sect became insignificant, but tales of its infamous acts were spread throughout Europe by the crusaders.

No culture or people has been immune to political assassination. Four U.S. presidents—Abraham Lincoln, James Garfield, William McKinley and John F. Kennedy—have been assassinated since 1865. Unsuccessful attempts were made on the lives of Andrew Jackson, Theodore Roosevelt, Gerald Ford and Ronald Reagan. In 1800, James Hadfield was acquitted of trying to murder King George III on the grounds of insanity. During the sixty-four-year reign of Queen Victoria of England, at least six attempts were made on her life. Spencer Perceval, the only British prime minister to succumb to an assassin's attack, was fatally shot by John Bellingham in 1812 in the House of Commons. In 1843, in a case of mistaken identity, Daniel M'Naghten attempted to assassinate the prime minister, but killed his secretary instead.

Following the murder of President John F. Kennedy, the U.S. National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence compiled a profile on the individual most likely to become an assassin. The study concluded that this person invariably was a classic loner, alienated from family and friends, unemployed, and desperately in need of a social identity. The commission's profile accurately described John Hinckley, the disturbed young man who shot and wounded President Ronald Reagan in 1981 to demonstrate his devotion to screen actress Jodie Foster.

THE GREEKS AND THE ROMANS

Ancient Greece, the oldest Western culture, its history spanning 3,000 years that dated from the Minoans, offered to the world great gifts of commerce, law and fine art. It was a land of philosophers and playwrights and created the spectacular sports of the Olympics. It advanced fragile republics and democracies, always to be undone and destroyed by city-state warriors. It was a nation built upon conquest and through its sun-filled centuries gave rise to many despotic rulers. The risk of their tyranny was the waiting hand of the assassin. Like its political prey, Greece itself would be, in 146 B.C., conquered by another predatory nation, Rome. That empire, too, would blindly follow the fate of Greece, its foundation crumbling through a thousand years (500 B.C. to the 5th Century) from its own vile oppressions, many of its leaders tirelessly usurped and destroyed by one assassination after another.

Assassins Harmodius and Aristogiton, who murdered Hipparchus in 514 B.C.

MURDEROUS LOVERS/514 B.C.

Two wealthy homosexuals, Harmodius and Aristogiton, plotted to assassinate Hippias, the tyrannical ruler of Greece, but their scheme was exposed. In retaliation, the lovers killed Hippias' brother, Hipparchus, during a festival. Harmodius had rebuffed the amorous advances of Hipparchus and blamed him for spoiling his plans to kill Hippias. Palace guards slew Harmodius as he still held a sword stained with his victim's blood, while Aristogiton escaped into the festival crowd. He was later captured and tortured into falsely implicating many as collaborators, innocent persons who were later put to death.

Then Hippias himself killed Aristogiton. In so doing, he brought ironic fame to the assassins. Though the assassinated Hipparchus was not responsible for the harsh rule of his despotic brother, his association with Hippias was sufficient to have him branded a tyrant. Thus, Harmodius and Aristogiton were immortalized in Greek history as courageous assailants who vanquished an oppressor.

THE GREAT GREEK REGICIDE/336 B.C.

More than ten centuries would pass before Greece was visited by another significant assassination, that of Philip II (Philip of Macedonia, 382-336 B.C.). A brilliant, relentless warrior, Philip had vanquished in prolonged wars all of the Greek city states. He then amassed an army poised to enter and defeat the colossus of Persia. His personal life, however, not only upset his scheme of conquest, but ended his 46-year-old life. Philip had divorced his clever-minded wife, Olympias, to marry another woman, Cleopatra, who later bore Philip a son. Olympias' son, the grown Alexander, was in jeopardy of losing his right to the throne.

The warrior-king, Philip of Macedonia, slain in 336 B.C.

There was no love between Philip and Alexander. Philip had once tried to run his sword through his offspring during an argument, but fell drunk in a stupor, causing Alexander to sneer: "See there the man who is making great preparations to invade Asia at the head of a powerful army, and who falls to the ground like a helpless child in going from one seat to another."

Philip's son, Alexander the Great.

A short time later, at a wedding feast in 336 B.C., when Philip was again in his cups, Pausanias, a young member of the court and a friend of Alexander's, rushed up to Philip and drove a sword through the king, killing him. He ran off, but the king's guard followed and stabbed him to death. Alexander and Olympias were present, kneeling together at Philip's prone body. It was Alexander who had ordered the guards to track down and slay Pausanias, but many rumored that he was merely covering the act of his mother, that Olympias had directed the assassin's hand to assure Alexander's inheritance to the throne.

Pausanias was prompted to murder Philip, it was said by Olympias and others, because the king had recently insulted him, but this was merely a weak reason to excuse the first great assassination in Western culture. That murder gave power to the ambitious Alexander, who, before prematurely dying at the age of thirty-three, conquered most of the known world and became known as Alexander the Great. He was a wise young man who had learned early from the great Aristotle the wily ways of the human mind. It was not known if Alexander was part of a plot to kill his own father, but it is known that as a youth he loved Philip and admired his military triumphs, despite the hatred of his enemies who called him "Philip the Barbarian."

A scene from the 1956 film Alexander the Great; Queen Olympias (Danielle Darrieux) kneels at left and Alexander (Richard Burton) at right, holding an assassin's dagger, next to the slain Philip (Fredric March, prone).

DEATH TO ROME'S REFORMERS/133-121 B.C.

Following Rome's conquest of Greece, this new, most powerful of nations enjoyed a long-enduring republic, but one that eventually crumbled through the arrogance and corruption of its leaders. A few attempted to alter that course and paid with their lives. Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus (163-133 B.C.) and his brother Gaius Gracchus (153-121 B.C.) were wealthy, liberal-minded young statesmen from an illustrious Roman family. They tried to institute land reforms that would restrict cheap purchases of rich lands from elitist and corrupt Roman senators.

A cabal of venal Roman senators opted for murder instead of reform. In 133 B.C., Tiberius Gracchus was waylaid in a staged riot by a crowd of thugs led by Nascia and other senators (who drew up their togas about their heads to hide their identities), beating Gracchus to death with clubs. His brother, Gaius Gracchus, attempted to continue the reforms, but in 121 B.C. he was falsely branded an outlaw for inciting riots actually staged by his enemies in the Senate. He was chased through the streets of Rome and was slain just as he crossed the Tiber.

Roman leader Tiberius Gracchus, slain in 133 B.C.

Roman scribe Plutarch estimated that more than 3,000 of the Gracchus followers were murdered in ruthless blood purges. The assassinations of the Gracchus brothers were the first such political murders in the history of the young Roman Republic. More than a century later, Rome saw an assassination that would be immortalized in song and literature, the murder of its greatest leader.

THE END OF CAESAR/March 15, 44 B.C.

The most famous military leader of his day and Rome's foremost politician, Julius Caesar (100-44 B.C.) had conquered most of Europe, the Middle East and Egypt through long and brilliant campaigns. He had outwitted and outfought his enemies, even the clever Pompey. When offered as an appeasement his enemy's decapitated head in Alexandria by Queen Cleopatra (Cleopatra VII, 69-30 B.C.), Caesar mourned the death of his noble adversary. He dallied with the young Egyptian queen, later bringing her to Rome with their small son, Caesarian, which caused criticism even from his closest supporters, including Marc Antony (Marcus Antonius, 82-30 B.C.). Deeper criticism, whispered in secret, came from Decimus Brutus, Marcus Brutus and Cassius, patricians who feared that Caesar would become king.

The great Julius Caesar, murdered in the Roman senate in 44 B.C.

To prevent that occurrence, Caesar was enticed on March 15, 44 B.C. to the portico of the Senate building where the conspirators, led by hired killer Casca, stabbed the great man to death. During the vicious and bloody attack, Caesar drew his toga about his head, but not before seeing his one-time friend Marcus Brutus approach with yet another dagger thrust, uttering: "You, too, Brutus?" Caesar's ripped and torn body was found ironically sprawled at the foot of Pompey's statue by his friend Marc Antony.

Much was later said in the many plays, books and movies about this remarkable man and his unforgettable assassination, as well as the strange warnings he received of his impending death. His wife Calpurnia had dreamed of his murder the night before the killing and begged Caesar not to attend the Senate. He dismissed her apprehensions. While on the way to the Senate, as in days before, a soothsayer, Spurrina, had called out to Caesar: "Beware the Ides of March," this being March 15, the day of his murder. Caesar saw Spurrina in the crowd before the Senate that day and mocked the augur, saying: "The Ides of March have come." Replied the ancient Spurrina: "Aye, they have come, but not yet gone."

Caesar (Louis Calhern) is about to be stabbed to death by the first of the assassins, Casca (Edmond O'Brien), in MGM's 1953 film, Julius Caesar.

Revenge for the killing was swift. The conspirators fled Rome, their homes and estates seized, their servants and friends killed. Marc Antony, Lepidus and Octavius (63 B.C.-14 A.D.), who was Caesar's nephew and heir, formed a triumvirate that led an army to Philippi and there, in 42 B.C., defeated the forces of the conspirators. Rather than be taken prisoner and dragged through the streets of Rome in degradation, Marcus Brutus and Cassius committed suicide. Decimus Brutus fled to Gaul where he was later killed. Instead of preserving the republic, the conspirators brought about its death, for through the foul dust of their murderous wake came Octavius, who eliminated Lepidus, then Marc Antony and his lover, Queen Cleopatra, becoming Augustus, the first Roman emperor.

The body of the slain Caesar lies (left, bottom) at the foot of Pompey's statue as his assassins flee.

LITTLE BOOTS, THE "DIVINITY"/ January 24, 41 A.D.

Emperor Caligula, a human monster, killed in 41 A.D.

The history of the Roman emperors relates to a litany of inhuman oppression, cruelty and insanity. Few among the lot were wise and compassionate leaders. Most were strutting despots, some, like the notorious Caligula, certifiable lunatics. Upon the death of Emperor Tiberius, his great-nephew and military commander Gaius Caesar Germanicus (Caligula, 12-41 A.D.) was named to the Roman throne, sharing his powers with his cousin, Tiberius Gemellus. Gaius Caesar had been born and raised in a Roman army barracks on the frontier and was nicknamed "Little Boots," after the half-boots he habitually wore and were known as caliga. Caligula initially instituted a few reforms, but his personality radically changed for no certain reason. He tired of his cousin's authority and had him assassinated.

Then came Caligula's reign of terror. Bloodthirsty and cruel, he committed countless, senseless crimes. He ordered wholesale murders, bloodbath shows of wild beasts and mass executions of criminals and Christians. He turned against his own caste, selecting the young, handsome sons of noble households and had them branded, flogged and thrown into the Tiber to drown. Others he sent to the arena where they were devoured by wild animals, while he forced parents to witness their horrible executions. Those who particularly irked Caligula had their tongues cut out by Naevius Sertorius Macro, the brutal Prefect of his Praetorian Guards, before they were thrown to the lions.

As Caligula's lunacy deepened, his atrocities increased. The aristocracy and the senate seemed helpless before his transgressions, since "Little Boots" was firmly backed by a powerful army and his large Praetorian Guard. All this changed when Macro, his Prefect of the Guard, suggested that he was earning a bloodthirsty reputation. Caligula had Macro executed and then demanded that he be addressed as "Divinity," insisting that he was a god. He berated anyone too slow in recognizing his "Divinity," including Cassius Chaerea, the most popular tribune of the Guard. On the night of January 24, 41 A.D., Chaerea suddenly appeared behind Caligula with some of his men. "Take this!" shouted the tribune and thrust the blade of his sword deep into the emperor's neck.

Caligula fell to the floor, but screamed defiantly: "I am still alive!" Chaerea and his men hacked him to pieces as he writhed in agony, cutting away his genitals, head and limbs until the corpse was unrecognizable. The Guards then murdered Caligula's wife, Caesonia, and his small daughter, Julia Drusilla. The bloody remains of the emperor were dragged to a courtyard and burned. Chaerea then appeared before the Senate, announcing that he had struck down the tyrant and that "the return of liberty" had come to Rome, demanding that the senators embrace the concepts of the old republic. Instead, Tiberius Claudius Drusus was named emperor. Claudius would rule for thirteen years and prove in many ways to be a worse tyrant than his demented nephew, Caligula.

"AM I STILL EMPEROR?"/October 13, 54 A.D.

Initially a timid and fearful emperor, Claudius (Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus, 10 B.C.-54 A.D.) was brought to power through the Praetorian Guard, some of its members having assassinated Caligula. His reign (41-54 A.D.) was marked by an efficient administration, but Claudius continued the barbaric practices of his lunatic predecessor. Obsessed with gladiatorial "sports," Claudius forced citizens and members of his court to fight to the death in the arena. His bloodlust was demonstrated each dawn when he arrived early at the arena to witness until noon all of the savage slaughter his managers could invent. He would then dismiss the audience and watch hundreds of gladiators kill each other for his private pleasure.

Emperor Claudius, poisoned to death in 54 A.D.

In constant fear that he would be dethroned or assassinated, Claudius had all visitors to his court thoroughly searched and in the early years of his reign he never moved about without a large body of spear-carrying guards surrounding him. His nagging question to court advisers was: "Am I still emperor?" He believed that assassins lurked everywhere, waiting to strike him down with swords or knives. His assassination was not to be so demonstrative, but came about slyly through the connivance of a woman.

Claudius had little luck with women, having married four times. In 39 A.D., the 60-year-old emperor married nineteen-year-old Valeria Messalina, a vicious profligate who reveled in torturing her enemies. She held orgies and Bacchanalian feasts in which she openly participated with scores of men, defying and insulting her husband with her flagrant indecencies.

The empress' debaucheries culminated with her bigamous and open marriage to Caius Silius, her favorite lover, a ceremony that shocked even Claudius. His chief adviser, Narcissus, cautioned that Messalina had plotted to have him murdered and seize the throne. Claudius sent a centurion to Messalina's quarters in 48 A.D., where, after failing to seduce her resolute assassin, she was promptly run through with a sword. The emperor married a fourth time in 49 A.D.

Claudius' fourth wife (and his niece), Agrippina, was no improvement. In marrying Agrippina, Claudius adopted her son Nero, and the scheming woman immediately plotted her husband's demise in order to install her son as emperor. She reportedly convinced the eunuch Halotus, who was Claudius' official taster, to poison the emperor. The most reliable information held that the empress paid the druggist Locusta to prepare a powerful poison, probably edible boletus, mixed in a sauce from the same substance, given to Claudius in a dish of mushrooms, his favorite delicacy. This food was reportedly served by Agrippina herself during a family banquet.

Within a few minutes, Claudius vomited the meal and lost his ability to speak, suffering agonizing stomach pains throughout the night. He died at dawn, October 13, 54 A.D. Another variation of this subtle assassination reported that Claudius survived the original poisoned meal, but was taken ill, and that the empress herself doctored him with a second poisoned dish, the lethal agent being colocynth, from a mild Palestinian gourd. Upon the emperor's death, Nero appeared at the palace, announcing himself as the new emperor. He instituted a barbaric reign that would equal and surpass the bloodletting of Caligula and Claudius, until he ended his own life before being torn to pieces by the Roman citizens he had so long tortured and oppressed.

BLOOD ON THE MOON/September 18, 96 A.D.

Three years before Claudius was murdered, Domitian came into the world. He would inherit the Roman throne and duplicate the atrocities of his predecessors and he would meet the same end that befell Caligula. Domitian (Titus Flavius Domitianus Augustus, 51-91 A.D.) succeeded his brother Titus to the throne in 81 A.D. He spent his early years with involved military campaigns and toward the end of his reign became drunk with power, persecuting Jews and freedmen. Like Caligula, he insisted that he was a god and those who did not so address him were summarily executed at his orders.

Domitian then began whimsically selecting noble victims to be executed. This prompted Cocceius Nerva, an esteemed jurist, to form a conspiracy that plotted Domitian's assassination, a plot enthusiastically embraced by Empress Domitia, the tyrant's long-abused wife. Domi-tian, who claimed to be clairvoyant and could see the future, had fearful visions the day before he was killed. He seemed to go into a trance, his eyes rolling in his head as he commented to nearby courtiers: "There will be blood on the moon as she enters Aquarius and a deed will be done for everyone to talk about."

Emperor Domitian, his image commemorated on a Roman coin, was slain in 96 A.D.

At dawn, September 18, 96 A.D., the emperor scratched a pimple and a trickle of blood ran down his cheek. "I hope this is all the blood required," he said cryptically. While soaking in his bath, he was told that a courtier had arrived with important news. Dripping from his bath, Domitian raced to see Stephanus, a freedman, who stood in the emperor's bedroom. He offered Domitian a list of names that represented a conspiracy to kill the emperor. Domitian eagerly read the list, mumbling that he would have every person on the list executed immediately. Stephanus stood silently, a woolen bandage on his arm, having feigned an injury some days earlier to excuse the presence of the bandage. Hidden inside the bandage was a dagger.

With his eyes ravenously scrolling the list and thus diverted, Domitian did not see Stephanus withdraw the hidden dagger from beneath the bandage. With a sudden thrust, Stephanus stabbed Domitian in the groin. He called out for help as he clawed at his assailant's eyes. Help arrived, but it was given to Stephanus, not Domitian. Clodianus, a subaltern, raced into the bedroom to stab the emperor. So, too, did Maximus, a freedman and Satur, a chamberlain. Even one of the imperial gladiators joined the assassins to thrust his sword into the dying Domitian. Stabbed seven times, Domitian collapsed, rolled over and died.

The political slayings of Caesar, Caligula, Claudius and Domitian were the dark hallmarks that heralded the long decline and fall of Rome. This most powerful of empires would see many more such killings, the lives of its emperors, sane and mad, claimed at the hands of assassins. Its doom was unfolded through these assassinations, for at the heart of the empire's corrosive core were the always lurking politics of murder.

ASSASSINATION IN THE NAME OF GOD

The murder of the innocent Christ, the messiah for millions, persecuted by his peers and crucified under a henchman of Emperor Tiberius, largely contributed to the fall of tyrannical Rome. In its place, close to the Tiber, rose the citadel of Jesus, the Vatican and its popes. As Christianity spread across Europe, its ethics and credos slowly embraced by new emperors and kings, its beliefs deeply embedded in the roots of nations, offshooting religions branched from its towering tree. The Catholic authority of the Vatican, the corporal and spiritual head of Western nations, was absolute, until a stubborn and profligate king, Henry VIII of England (1491-1547), challenged that supreme authority.

Desperately seeking a male heir to his throne, Henry alienated the Vatican by demanding that it grant a divorce from his first wife, the barren Catherine of Aragon. When the Vatican refused, Henry established a national religion, a form of Protestantism he entitled the Anglican Church, with himself as its spiritual leader. He secretly married Anne Boleyn, who produced his child, Elizabeth, later Elizabeth, Queen of England. Elizabeth would staunchly maintain this Protestant religion as strongly as her rival, Mary Queen of Scots, would impose the Catholic religion upon her Scottish subjects. These royal edicts led to assassinations by religious fanatics in Scotland, England and throughout Europe.

A POET'S DEATH IN SCOTLAND/ March 9, 1566

One of the first of these brought about the death of a gifted poet. Born in Italy, David Rizzio (or Riccio, 1533-1566) was the son of a minor musician who received a broad education, becoming a musician and writer of verse. As secretary to the Marquis of Moretto, he traveled to Edinburgh as part of a mission to the court of Mary, Queen of Scots (1542-1587). So impressed with Rizzio's musical and poetic talents was Mary that she made him her valet de chambre and later her secretary and chief minister. Mary came to completely depend upon the perceptive Rizzio, following his advice in almost all instances. He aggressively supported her dedication to establish Catholicism as the predominant religion in Scotland.

David Rizzio, secretary to Mary Queen of Scots, murdered in 1566.

It was Rizzio who strongly urged Mary to wed her cousin, Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley, a handsome but not overly bright young Scot from the House of Lennox, a match not favored by Mary's ambitious rival, Queen Elizabeth I (1533-1603) of England. Elizabeth wanted Mary to wed a British subject to discredit her with her many Catholic adherents in England. She nevertheless married Darnley on July 29, 1565. Mary soon lost interest in her dullard husband and spent most of her time with her confidante, Rizzio, which infuriated Darnley. He developed a raging jealousy against the mild-mannered secretary and was easily enlisted into a conspiracy of religious fanatics who wanted to overthrow Catholicism and to that end plotted Rizzio's assassination.

The youthful Lord Darnley, who married Queen Mary and conspired to have her secretary murdered.

On March 9, 1566, Patrick, Lord Ruthven, the leader of the plot, along with other Scottish knights, all dressed in armor and fortified with hours of heavy drinking, barged into the queen's chamber in Holyrood Palace, drawing swords. The outraged Mary ordered the interlopers to leave while the timid Rizzio cowered behind her. One of the conspirators rushed forward and stabbed Rizzio in the chest. The others then grabbed the secretary and dragged him about the chamber, stabbing and beating him until his body went limp.

Rizzio was quickly buried outside the palace chapel and Mary herself was held prisoner for two days until she agreed to ratify the actions of the assassins. Mary later had Rizzio's mutilated body exhumed and reburied in the royal sepulcher. She later bore a son—the future James I of England—on June 19, 1566. Hers was a hapless lot. The Scottish nobles who advocated the Protestant cause intrigued against her, and after several battles, she abdicated in favor of her son. She sought asylum in England where Elizabeth held her in comfortable captivity for eighteen years.

Mary, Queen of Scots, who was present when her secretary Rizzio was murdered; she would become a tragic victim of regicide.

Elizabeth grew to believe that Mary posed a threat to her own crown and might lead an uprising by her Catholic followers. She was easily convinced by her conniving advisers that documents they forged proved Mary guilty of treason, that she was planning to usurp Elizabeth in what later came to be known as the Queen Elizabeth I of England, who sent Mary to the headsman to preserve her crown.

Babington Plot of 1586. On shabby evidence, Elizabeth condemned Mary to death, sending her to her execution at Fotheringhay, where she was beheaded on February 8, 1587.

Many came to believe that Elizabeth I, Queen of England, had herself committed regicide in accepting evidence against Mary she knew to be false and that she had wrongfully ordered an "official" assassination. Through her, England would suppress the Catholics and remain a chiefly Protestant country, but in neighboring Netherlands and in France it was the Protestants who saw widespread persecution and their leaders murdered by fanatical assassins.

25,000 DUCATS FOR THE LIFE OF A MONARCH/July 10, 1584

William I of the Netherlands (Count of Nassau, William of Orange, William the Silent, 1533-1584) was among a rare breed of public men who subordinated self-interest to the rights of his people, a humanitarian compunction that cost him his life in his fifty-first year. Born in a German-Lutheran household, William, at age eleven, was ordered to be raised a Catholic by Hapsburg Emperor Charles V. The Protestant Reformation was sweeping Europe and though the emperor did not particularly endorse the aims of that movement, he guaranteed the right of religious freedom. His son and successor, Philip II, who became king of Spain, had different convictions. Upon his succession, Philip demanded unswerving loyalty to the Catholic Church.

When Philip gave William the title of Stateholder of Holland, Utrecht and Zeeland, the new governor argued with Philip for the religious rights of the Dutch. Philip told him to discard such foolish notions, stating: "I would rather die a thousand deaths and lose every square foot of my empire than permit the least change in our religion!" Philip put his heavy foot down in 1565, ordering William to enforce to the letter all existing ordinances against heretics. William reluctantly made a half-hearted attempt to comply, but this caused hordes of Calvinists to invade Catholic churches and destroy ecumenical symbols of the Roman Church.

In retaliation, Philip appointed the Duke of Alba as captain-general in charge of the Netherlands. Alba entered Brussels in May 1567, instituting a reign of terror. With the Huguenots and Calvinists at his side, William waged a long war with Philip's forces, one that dragged on until 1576, when William was recognized as the "Chief and Supreme Authority" of Holland and Zeeland. The Pacification of Ghent and the Union of Brussels, signed in 1577, brought to a satisfactory close the first phase of this prolonged war.

Philip II was a vengeful loser. He stubbornly refused to surrender his claims to the Lowlands and, on March 15, 1580, the king of Spain officially outlawed William. He wanted his adversary dead and offered 25,000 ducats to anyone willing to assassinate the upstart. The first to come forth to claim that bloody prize was a religious fanatic named Juan Jaureguy. In 1582, Jaureguy fired a bullet at William, which passed under the king's right ear and exited near his jaw-bone. William's life hung in the balance, but he slowly recovered. Jaureguy and several accomplices who had helped him gain access to the king were executed, their bodies nailed to the gates of Antwerp as a grim warning to other would-be assassins.

William I of the Netherlands, slain in 1584, because he opposed the religious restrictions of Philip II of Spain.

This did not deter the murderous ambitions of a Frenchman named Balthasar Gérard. He was a Catholic fanatic encouraged by the Jesuits of the College of Trèves to kill the king. On July 10, 1584, Gérard gained entrance to William's residence at Delft, Netherlands. At the noon hour, he waited in the dining hall and when William entered, he fired three shots at the king. William died instantly. Gérard was seized by guards and was forced to undergo a series of horrible tortures. His right hand, the hand that fired the weapon that killed the king, was cut off. His back was slowly broken on the wheel. His head was cut off and impaled on the gate of William's residence.

William's assassination cut short his dedicated task to establish complete religious freedom for his subjects, but he had begun the slow, deliberate path toward independence and for these reasons he came to be recognized as the rightful founder of the Dutch republic. His assassination had been ordered and paid for by another king, who thought to do God a service through murder. The killing of William I was not lost on the apprehensive monarch of France, Henry III, who had seen his country torn apart by the same murderous schisms and rightfully feared that, he, too, would meet William's bloody destiny.

"MAY GOD HAVE MERCY ON OUR SOULS"/ August 1, 1589

The last half of the 16th Century in France was soaked with religious bloodbaths between the Catholics and the Huguenots (Protestants). Huguenot fanatic Jean de Poltrot assassinated Catholic leader Francois de Lorraine, the second Duc de Guise, in February 1563. The powerful de Guise family persuaded Catherine de Medici to prompt her young son, Charles IX, King of France, to assassinate Huguenot leader Admiral Gaspard de Coligny, a close adviser to Charles.

An unsuccessful attempt against Coligny resulted in a disastrous decision by Charles, who then consented to a wholesale massacre of the Huguenot population known as the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre. Hundreds of Protestant leaders and sympathizers were purged in an attempt to consolidate the regency of young Charles, but matters only got worse. Now Charles was marked for assassination by the Huguenots and he knew it.

A scene depicting the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre of Huguenots in France; thousands were put to the sword by members of the Catholic League.

Never physically strong or psychologically stable, Charles suffered nervous breakdowns, grew ill, then died at age twenty-four in 1574. Henry III (1551-1589) succeeded to the throne and sought to bring about conciliation between the two bitterly divided religious groups. The Catholic leaders suspected his motives from the beginning, knowing he was a close friend of Henry of Navarre, a staunch Protestant leader. The king's arch enemy was Henry de Guise, leader of the Catholic League and the instigator of the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre.

The king knew that he was the only person who stood in the way of the powerful Henry de Guise and that if he faltered, de Guise would bring about a national bloodletting that would exterminate every Protestant in France. To protect himself and ensure that moderation prevailed, the king, in the event of his death, named Henry of Navarre as his successor. His own murder, thought the king, would only bring a strong Protestant leader to the throne and that repugnant prospect would dissuade any notions by Henry de Guise of assassinating him.

Henry III (right), dying from an assassin's knife thrust while his slayer (left, bottom) is killed by guards.

De Guise, however, continued to pressure Henry to action against the military forces marshaled by the Protestants. Henry reluctantly led his troops into battle and was promptly defeated at the battle of Coutras. He signed an armistice, then returned to Paris to pacify de Guise. At a private meeting, the Catholic leader adamantly rejected the king's plea for peace. Henry, in frustration and anger at the futility of his negotiations, ordered his guards to attack de Guise, who was killed immediately. While standing over the fallen de Guise, Henry moaned aloud: "May God have mercy on our souls—and France."

The Catholic League mounted its own army and besieged Paris. Henry of Navarre came to the aid of the king, providing him troops and supplies. On August 1, 1589, a Franciscan monk, Friar Jacques Clement, sought an audience with Henry. The king agreed to see him. The monk begged Henry to side with the Catholics, saying: "I beseech you to renounce the heretics and swear your allegiance to the League." Henry, rejected the plea, waving Clement away.

The monk suddenly brandished a long knife from beneath his robe and stabbed the king. In an instant, Henry's guards cut down the friar, but Henry was dead on the floor next to the body of his assassin. In less than three years from the execution of Catholic Queen Mary, a death that strengthened the position of Protestantism in England, the life of the king of France had been sacrificed to preserve the Roman Catholic Church. Henry's successor, Henry of Navarre, would meet the same fate.

TWENTY ATTEMPTS TO KILL A KING/ May 14, 1610

Henry IV of France—he was a man marked many times for death because of his tolerance for the Protestant religion.

Henry IV of France (Henry of Navarre, 1553-1610) was an outspoken leader of the Protestant cause. He had supported Henry III in his predecessor's attempt to protect the rights of the Huguenots and was present in the chamber where Henry was murdered by an assassin, witnessing his friend's painful death. He knew he was marked for murder and yet he fearlessly defended the oppressed Protestant minority. He worked for years to reconcile the vitriolic conflict between Catholic and Huguenot factions, but without success, constantly being embroiled in military campaigns. In 1594, the war of the Holy League came to an end when Henry agreed to the League's demand that he renounce Protestantism for its pledge to recognize the legitimacy of his rule.

Henry, however, made little effort to convert Prostestants to the Catholic faith and usually favored the Huguenots in all major political disputes. No king in history experienced as many attempts on his life by would-be assassins. During his twenty year reign, nineteen assassins tried to kill him, almost one for each year he remained in power. He miraculously survived until May 14, 1610, when Francois Ravaillac, a 31-year-old barrister from Angouleme, ended Henry's life.

Believing that Henry was planning a war against the pope, Ravaillac brushed through a line of guards walking alongside Henry's carriage as it slowly made its way through the Croix-du-Tiroir. He leaped forward to drive a sword into Henry, who was sitting unprotected in the open carriage. The king died instantly. Hundreds of onlookers on the crowded promenade witnessed the assassination. Ravaillac made no move to escape and was quickly seized and taken to the Hotel de Retz for questioning.

Unlike captured assassins of that era, authorities did not immediately put the killer to death, but carefully interviewed the learned lawyer, who seemed dumbfounded by his own act. He was thought to be part of a conspiracy led by the Jesuits or the warring Hapsburgs. In truth, Ravaillac had acted alone out of religious fanaticism. After two weeks of almost round-the-clock interrogation, the assassin was judged guilty of regicide and sentenced to a ghastly death. Placed on a rack, the screws were turned until his joints broke. He was then taken to a scaffold erected near the Notre Dame Cathedral, where the king's executioners tore away pieces of skin with red hot pincers. The arm used to commit the murder was plunged into a vat of burning sulfur. This torture went on for nearly an hour until a team of horses was brought forth and he was tied to them. They were driven in opposite directions until Ravaillac's body was torn apart.

The struggle between the Catholics and Protestants would continue throughout Europe, countless victims claimed on either side by assassins consumed by ideology, until these religious sects settled into pacified positions. To the East, in Russia, assassination had nothing do with religion. It was simply a matter of raw, autocratic power.

In the above 17th Century cut, assassin Francois Ravaillac (at left, climbing on the wheel of a carriage) is shown stabbing Henry IV in 1610.

MURDER AT THE THRONE OF THE CZARS

The vast, mysterious empire of Peter the Great sprawled over two thirds of Europe and stretched to the Pacific. It was a nation of tribes, city-states and provinces ruled unsteadily by Peter's tempestuous successors. One of these was the shrewd, tough-minded Elizabeth Petrovna (1709-1762), empress of Russia, daughter of Peter the Great. She had overthrown the regency of Ivan VI, abolished the cabinet council government and reinstated the senate, a titular body that allowed her to govern with an autocratic hand. To protect her power and extend her family line, Elizabeth, shortly after taking power in December 1741, declared her nephew, Peter (Karl Peter Ulrich, 1728-1762) to be her successor. In a lifetime of wise deliberations, this proved to be a disastrous decision.

THE SLAYING OF PETER THE MAD/ July 18, 1762

The indecisive, perhaps demented, Peter III of Russia, murdered in 1762 with the connivance of his wife, Catherine, an assassination of the czar's own making.

The future czar of Russia was wholly unfit for the lofty position his aunt envisioned. The short-lived Peter III was a weak, vacillating monarch who lost his kingdom and ultimately his life in defense of a foreign culture he tried to impose upon his subjects. The son of Charles Frederick, duke of Holstein-Gottorp, and Anna, the eldest of Peter the Great's daughters, Peter had been educated in Germany. He was being groomed to succeed to the throne of Denmark and Sweden when Elizabeth named him her successor. Peter was taken to St. Petersburg and was promptly baptized into the Russian Orthodox Church, but he stubbornly clung to his Prussian heritage and upbringing to the great displeasure of his aunt and tutors who attempted to prepare him for his future post as czar. Eventually frustrating Elizabeth was Peter's marriage (on August 21, 1745) to the strong-minded Sophie Frederike, a German princess of Anhalt-Zerbst, who took the Russian name of Catherine Yekaterina Alekseyevna (Catherine II, Catherine the Great, 1729-1796).

Catherine the Great of Russia, who conspired to assassinate her husband.

They were not particularly fond of each other and it was apparent from the beginning that theirs was a conveniently arranged marriage of state. Elizabeth had sought to pacify her nephew's penchant for all things German by providing him with a Prussian-born spouse, but the empress had taken on more than she bargained for in selecting Catherine, the daughter of a Prussian field marshal. Throughout their long marriage, Peter took pains to insult and degrade his wife, treating her as an unwanted partner. He flaunted his many mistresses in her presence and even compelled her to dine with these courtesans while he taunted and humiliated her. Catherine bided her time, plotting with Russian noblemen, especially the Russian general, Count Gregory Orlov (1734-1783), who, among many, was her most constant lover.

Upon Elizabeth's death, Peter became czar of the Russian people on January 5, 1762. In one of his first official acts, Peter withdrew from the Seven Years' War and forged a peace treaty with Prussia, his beloved homeland. Henceforth, the czar conducted all domestic and foreign policy on a pro-German basis, "enlightened despotism" as he called it, patterned after the reign of his hero, Frederick the Great of Prussia. He went so far as to force the Russian Orthodox Church to adopt Lutheran practices into the liturgy. He next seized government lands and forced the nobles in the provinces to accept lower salaries. Peter's desire to drag Russia into a war against Denmark in order to help Holstein regain political control of Schleswig further alienated Russian ministers—a situation Catherine was quick to exploit to her own favor.

By the summer of 1762, tensions between the czar and his resentful wife had reached a breaking point, particularly when Peter disavowed any connections to his son, Paul, through Catherine, whom he labeled a bastard. Suspecting that her husband was planning to overthrow her in order to marry his mistress, Countess Elizabeth Woronzow, Catherine conspired with Gregory Orlov and members of the Imperial Guard to stage a coup d'état on the night of June 28, 1762. Princess Catherina Dashkova aided and abetted the royal plotter by informing the soldiers that Peter, who was by then labeled a lunatic by the royal household, had died from a fit and that Empress Catherine was assuming the reins of the government. The royal regiment accepted this news and rejoiced, for to a man they shared Catherine's hatred for Peter, who had dismissed his Russian bodyguards and had replaced them with German troops.

Catherine (Elisabeth Bergner) with Peter III (Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.) in the 1934 United Artists film, Catherine the Great.

Peter was forcibly taken to the royal residence at Oranienbaum, where he was kept in close custody, along with his mistress. Catherine, after accepting the oaths of allegiance from the Imperial Guards, moved quickly to shore up support for her new role among the nobility, the clergy and the senate. The Archbishop of Novgorod, angered at Peter for imposing Lutheran doctrine upon the Russian Orthodox Church, happily crowned Catherine as the new Russian ruler on July 9, 1762. The few ministers still loyal to Peter advised the deposed czar to take strong, decisive military action to regain the throne. But at this critical moment, Peter hesitated. He was essentially an insecure if not demented monarch who was wholly incapable of mastering the game of political brinkmanship. His indecision cost him dearly; he abdicated on July 10, 1762 and was taken prisoner by Gregory Orlov and four others a week later.

Peter's captors were the Orlov brothers—Gregory, Aleksy and Fyodor. With their heavily armed guards, the Orlovs spirited the confused Peter to a royal retreat outside the village of Ropsha, where, on July 18, 1762, he was given a dinner and a bottle of Burgundy wine, which was heavily dosed with poison. While dining with Peter, Aleksy Orlov convinced the deposed czar that Catherine was going to permit him to return unmolested to Holstein, the place of his birth. (Catherine had no such intentions, believing that if Peter went to Germany he might raise an army against her and invade Russia.)

Peter took one swallow of the befouled wine and recoiled: "I am poisoned! I am poisoned! Give me milk, give me oil!" The poison was not strong enough to finish off the powerfully built Peter. He cursed at Orlov, while several other assassins, including Gregory and Fyodor Orlov entered the chamber. Several officers struggled with Peter, who fought like a crazed animal, overturning the furniture and shattering the crystal. Aleksy Orlov then noosed a napkin around Peter's throat and strangled him to death. The other Orlov brothers and their officers stood passively by on a veranda as they witnessed this assassination. They then returned to St. Petersburg to report Assassin Gregory Orlov (John Lodge) meeting the future empress and his lover, Catherine (Marlene Dietrich), with aide (C. Aubrey Smith) in the 1934 Paramount film, The Scarlet Empress.

Peter's death to Catherine, who promptly lavished rewards upon the assassins.

Catherine then released an ambiguous statement to cover up the crime, stating that her husband had suddenly died from hemorrhoidal colic, an affliction that had troubled Peter most of his adult life. The effects of this persistent ailment, Catherine said, had brought on a lethal stroke of apoplexy. Catherine's murder plot was later widely rumored throughout the country, but she proved to be a masterful ruler and most came to believe that she had rid Russia of a demented tyrant who would have made their country a vassal state to Germany. The empress, however, still did not feel secure on her throne. There was one other member of the royal family who troubled her. This was ex-emperor Ivan VI, who had been dethroned by Empress Elizabeth and imprisoned at the fortress of Schlüsselburg since he was six-years-old.

It was acknowledged by many that Ivan had lost his sanity while confined in prison, but Catherine would not rest easy until the deposed czar was eliminated. A lieutenant of the guard at Schlüsselburg was directed by Gregory Orlov to attend to the matter. His name was Basil Mirovitch and he carried out that cold-blooded directive without question, only to find that he had been betrayed by the empress, a woman he deeply loved. After he was arrested and condemned to death by Catherine for Ivan's assassination, Mirovitch was confident that the empress would come to his rescue and issue a royal pardon.

Like the Orlov brothers, and many other officers, Mirovitch had been one of Catherine's lovers and he depended upon that intimate relationship to save his life, as well as Gregory Orlov's promise that the empress would intervene on his behalf. When the expected messenger did not appear on the day of his execution, the lieutenant realized that he had been deceived. He uttered a gut-wrenching cry seconds before his head was chopped off. Catherine the Great stopped at nothing in clutching her throne and through her long reign no one dared to challenge her authority, even her son, Paul, who was not made of his mother's stern will. She inhibited and terrified him, instilling in him a lifelong fear of assassination.

"DON'T KILL ME—I WILL ABDICATE!"/ March 11, 1801

Paul I (1754-1801), was the czar of Russia for four troubled years. As a profligate prince, he wasted most of his life while living in the giant shadow of his dominating and ruthless mother, Catherine the Great. Through friends of his father, Peter the Mad, Paul learned that his mother had arranged for his father's assassination and he lived in constant fear that she would also make the same arrangements for himself if he gave the slightest indication that he thought to depose her.

Upon the death of his mother in 1796, the 42-year-old Paul became the czar of Russia. The dissolute new ruler was ill-prepared to be anything other than a despot. He tyrannized the aristocrats as well as the peasants and saw conspiracies at every turn. Four years of Paul's inconsistent, often drunken, rule, left Russia isolated from the rest of Europe. Paul often changed ministers and advisers, suspecting that all close to him were conspiring to take his throne.

Two of these advisers, Count Peter Ludwig von der Pahlen, Paul's confidante and the military governor of St. Petersburg, and Count Nikita Panin, the vice chancellor, did, indeed, plot against the czar. They persuaded Grand Duke Alexander, Paul's son and heir, that the czar was planning to arrest and imprison him and his brothers. Alexander knew his father was destroying Russia and agreed to cooperate with the conspirators, but he gave strict orders that Paul was to be forced to abdicate but kept from any harm. The ministers promised the czar's safety.

The paranoid Paul I of Russia, assassinated in 1801.

Sensing danger, Paul moved his residence to the heavily fortified St. Michael's Palace in St. Petersburg and had great numbers of guards posted in and about his chambers with orders to kill anyone who attempted to get near him. On March 11, 1801, Pahlen, however, bribed the guards to allow nine assassins to enter the czar's large bedroom chamber. Paul awoke to see these sword-wielding killers standing about him. "Don't kill me—I will abdicate!" he shouted.

"No, sire," one of the interlopers said. "You will never abdicate. If we let you free, you will have us all killed and remain in power and Russia will be destroyed."

One of the group looped a sash about Paul's throat and strangled the czar to death. A brief announcement told the Russian people that their ruler had died of apoplexy, the same malady that reportedly claimed the life of his father, Peter the Mad, but, Paul I was nevertheless the victim of an assassin, just as had been his father. When Alexander became the czar he forced those who had been part of the plot to kill Paul I out of office, praying that no more assassinations would befall the future czars of Russia. Some of his successors, however, would not be protected by such Heaven-directed pleas.

THE ASSASSINS OF FRANCE

The traumatic epoch of the French Revolution, signaled by the storming of the Bastille in Paris on July 14, 1789, brought social upheaval and near anarchy to France. With the overthrow of the monarchy and its arrogant aristocrats, the Reign of Terror ensued. The inept King Louis XVI and his beautiful queen, Marie Antoinette went to the guillotine in 1793, along with thousands of nobles. One of the chief architects of that revolution and a fanatical advocate of the Terror, Jean-Paul Marat, died violently in the same year he helped to send his monarchs to death. The instrument of his death was a pretty, young girl, full of patriotism and resolve.

"I SHALL SEND THEM ALL TO THE GUILLOTINE!"/July 13, 1793

Jean-Paul Marat (1743-1793) imagined himself to be a scientific genius, equal to Sir Isaac Newton. His peers in the academic community did not agree and his published works on scientific and philosophical matters were received with only mild acceptance. After completing his medical studies, Marat practiced as a physician in London, writing several essays, espousing liberal ideas inspired by the works of Voltaire, Rousseau and Montesquieu. In 1774, he published his pivotal work, The Chains of Slavery, which became the blueprint for the revolution of 1789 and indicted the French aristocracy as plotting against the French citizenry in a conspiracy to keep the masses impoverished and without rights.

Ironically, Marat, who had returned to France in 1777, took a position as the physician to the personal guards of the Comte d'Artois (later Charles X), conducting a lucrative practice on the side that mostly included patients of the Second Estate he would later denounce as enemies of the revolution, sending many of his one-time patients to gruesome executions. In 1780, Marat alienated officials by publishing his Plan for Criminal Legislation, thought to be subversive and thus suppressed by the government. He left his medical practice three years later to devote himself to scientific research and writing projects. His failure to be accepted into the prestigious Académie des Sciences by his peers contributed to Marat's sense of alienation and frustration.

With the coming of the revolution, Marat initially took a conservative position, advocating the preservation of the ancien régime, stating that the king should remain in power as long as he quickly implemented reforms. Within months, his views turned radical. In September 1789, he began his publication, L'Ami du Peuple (Friend of the People), calling for a social revolution in which broad-based and harsh measures be taken against the aristocracy. His beliefs alarmed the moderate Girondists, who, in the early stages of the revolution, directed the ebb and flow of events. They pressured him into exile in England in 1790. He was recalled within three months by the radical Montagnard faction to provide its editorial forum. This Marat did with relish, denouncing many French icons, including the Marquis de Lafayette, a champion of liberty, as counter-revolutionaries, calling for their imprisonment and execution.

French revolutionary leader Jean-Paul Marat, slain in 1793.

Marat saw royalist plots everywhere, especially in the provinces and warned that the aristocrats were planning to overthrow the revolution with the collusion of foreign kings. When the republic was founded in September 1792, Marat's position in the new government seemed assured. He was one of the most influential delegates to the National Convention. In April 1793, at the instigation of the Girondists, who felt that Marat and others had warped and manipulated the democratic principles of the revolution, he was charged with political crimes and brought before a revolutionary tribunal. He was acquitted on April 24, 1793. Marat vowed revenge against the Girondists and, in turn, backed by the radical Jacobins in Paris, denounced his adversaries, sending Girondists as well as aristocrats to the guillotine by the score in what came to be known as the Reign of Terror. Though the bourgeoisie of Paris held Marat and his ilk as heroes of the revolution, he was thought to be a murderous tyrant by the nobles and middleclass Girondists in the provinces.

A contemporary portrait of Charlotte Corday (left), just after assassinating Jean-Paul Marat in his bath, with revolutionaries calling for her blood.

Prison guards are shown cropping Charlotte Corday's long hair, preparing her for execution.

One such was Marie-Anne Charlotte Corday D'Armans (1768-1793), a well-read young, noblewoman who lived in Normandy. Convent-educated and well versed in the writings of Plutarch and Voltaire, she had, as had her family, embraced the revolution. She then witnessed many of her relatives and friends being wrongly accused of betraying the revolution and sent to their executions. She became enraged at the bloody purge of the Girondists on May 31, 1793, mostly at the instigation of Jean-Paul Marat. Charlotte Corday vowed revenge.

Corday thought long in selecting the right victim, believing that her opportunity at assassination was limited to only one of the many leading revolutionaries. She thought first to kill Georges-Jacques Danton, then Robespierre, then Marat. All had come to symbolize a new kind of infamy in the provinces. Her final choice of Marat was guided by a personal hatred she had harbored for the man ever since he had ordered the 1789 death of her sweetheart, a young army major named Belzunce.

Early in the morning of July 13, 1793, Corday purchased a six-inch dagger from a cutler's shop in the Palais Egalité. She had learned that the object of her venom was confined to his bathtub in his home at 20 Cordelières Street. Marat suffered from a debilitating skin disease that could only be relieved by his bathing in soothing hot water mixed with vinegar. While lounging in his tub, Marat penned his newspaper editorials and greeted colleagues as he saw fit. At about 9 a.m., Corday appeared at his door, but was turned away by Catherine Evrard, sister of Marat's long-time mistress, Simmone Evrard. The editor was too sick to see anyone, Corday was told. Returning to her hotel room, Corday wrote a short message to Marat, telling him that she had information about counter-revolutionaries in the provinces.

When Marat received this message, he immediately sent word for Corday to visit him. She arrived at about 7 p.m., but this time Simmone Evrard turned her away. Corday did not meekly oblige; she started a commotion. Hearing the disturbance, Marat asked that Corday be admitted to his bath. Corday found her adversary busy with paper and pen as he reclined in a copper tub. She introduced herself as a "friend of the people," and recited the names of several fictitious "traitors" from Caen. Greedily, Marat began to write down the names, saying: "I shall send them all to the guillotine in a few days!"

Corday pulled the dagger she had concealed in her skirt and drove it deep into Marat's chest. His cry for help was heard downstairs, but by the time his mistress arrived, Marat was near death. Corday was subdued by one of Marat's bodyguards, Laurent Bas, and was turned over to the revolutionary guard, which arrived only minutes later. Marat was by then dead. Corday bluntly admitted the assassination to Jean-Baptiste Drouet, who was the first official to arrive on the scene.

Corday is shown bound in a cart, en route to her public execution.

Taken to the Prison de Pabbaye, Corday was held there until she was brought before a People's Tribunal. She answered her accusers in a calm voice: "It is only in Paris that the people have been hypnotized by the man [Marat]. In the provinces he has always been regarded as a monster...I knew that he was perverting France. I killed one man in order to save a hundred thousand. I was a Republican long before the Revolution, and I have never lacked energy."

Antoine-Quentin Fouquier-Tinville, head of the Tribunal, condemned Corday to death. On July 15, 1793, she was transported by cart to the Place de Révolution. As a tumultuous crowd hooted and howled for her head, she bravely mounted the scaffold and approached the executioner, Sanson, asking to inspect the instrument of her impending death, the guillotine. "I've never seen one before," she explained. "In the circumstances, I am rather curious." Sanson allowed her to look at the levers that put the blade in motion. She gazed upward to see the waiting blade, then calmly allowed herself to be placed on the plank, her head encompassed by the wooden headrest.

Charlotte Corday was thought by many to be a heroine, but she was reviled by the leaders of the Terror, who continued their attempt to shore up support for the bloodthirsty Montagnards by randomly slaughtering thousands of their imagined enemies. One of her critics was a young and ambitious French officer who had sided with the Jacobins, Napoléon Bonaparte, and who was to become emperor of France. Napoléon I, was, like Marat, the target of many assassination attempts and, as scientific evidence later indicated, may have been slyly and slowly assassinated while being kept prisoner on a barren island in the Atlantic.

"THOSE RASCALS WANTED TO BLOW ME UP"/December 24, 1800

The great conqueror Napoléon I (Napoléon Bonaparte, 1769-1821), began his military career as a lowly lieutenant of artillery. The Corsican-born Napoléon sided with the Jacobins during the revolution of 1789, and soon proved his mettle with the revolutionary forces, rising to the rank of general at an early age and, through one European conquest after another, became emperor of France and the dominating figure of his era. Admired and respected by millions, there were equal millions who hated him. Some of his enemies plotted his assassination but with little or no preparation. Several assassination attempts were made against Napoléon, from the time he became first consul throughout the period of his rule as emperor.

Napoléon I, the target of several

The first attempt was made by a political malcontent named Chevalier, who worked in a Paris arms plant. He constructed a crude bomb, which was nothing more than a cask filled with powder and missiles to which a musket barrel with a trigger was affixed. Chevalier thought to roll this barrel beneath the carriage in which Napoléon was riding. He bungled his attempt, rolling the barrel too soon and it exploded prematurely, injuring a number of persons. Chevalier fled, but was later caught and imprisoned.

The first serious assassination attempt against Napoléon took place on December 24, 1800, when a cabal of royalists tried to blow up the emperor's carriage when he attended the opera in Paris. Following Chevalier's modus operandi, the assassins constructed a similar bomb and exploded it as his carriage was approaching the opera building. The bomb went off with a thunderous roar, killing twenty persons and wounding dozens more, but Napoléon, who was sleeping in the carriage and sitting next to Josephine, was uninjured. As soon as he heard the roar, Napoléon shouted to the driver to get to the opera at all speed. The carriage in which Napoléon was riding was rocked by the explosion, which occurred behind the moving vehicle, but it was intact. Napoléon's order to his driver was unnecessary in that the man was drunk, seized by panic, and was already whipping the horses furiously forward.

The carriage of Napoléon I being bombed in Paris in 1800; the emperor remained unharmed.

The unharmed Napoléon and Josephine took their box at the opera and it was not until that moment that the cool-minded emperor commented about the assassination attempt, saying casually: "Josephine, those rascals wanted to blow me up. Send for a copy of the music [the program for that night's opera]." All of the assassins, including the ringleader, a royalist named St. Regent, who was severely wounded by his own bomb, were rounded up, tried, and then executed.

The next serious attempt against Napoléon took place in October 1809, while the emperor was reviewing troops at Schoenbrunn, in Germany. An 18-year-old youth named Friedrich Staps, the son of a Tyrolese pastor, rushed forward with a long knife and tried to stab the emperor. Marshal Louis Berthier, standing close to Napoléon, saw Staps running forward and he grabbed the youth when the knife was only inches from the emperor's chest. Later that day, Napoléon had Staps brought before him, accusing him of being mad, but the youth insisted that he was sane and that he had acted alone, as a patriot, in attempting to rid Germany of an invader.

"What injury have I done to you?" the emperor asked Staps.

"To me personally, none," he replied, "but you are the oppressor of my country, the tyrant of the world, and to have put you to death would have been the highest glory of a man of honor."

Napoléon was loath to execute this handsome youth, especially after he looked at a small picture of Staps' pretty girlfriend the would-be assassin was carrying. "Would she approve of this attempt of yours," the emperor asked Staps.

"She will be sorry that it miscarried for she hates you as much as I do," Staps defiantly answered.

The death mask of Napoléon I from which forensic scientists later removed hairs to claim his slow murder by poison.

Napoléon had the youth examined by his doctors, who informed him that Staps was sane. Still, the emperor was reluctant to order the youth's death. He stared a long time at the girl's picture and then said to Staps: "If I pardon you, I suppose it will gladden the heart of this girl."

"Then I will be able to kill you after all!" the youth shouted.

Napoléon ordered Staps imprisoned, to be executed later. Staps consistently refused to ask for his own life. He was determined to be a martyr and the emperor finally ordered his execution three months later.

The last assassination attempt against Napoléon reportedly occurred while he was in his final exile on the barren island of St. Helena, where, surrounded by British captors and a small coterie of loyal followers, he died in 1821. Four months before his death, the emperor wrote his will. One sentence in that carefully penned document pointed an accusatory finger: "I die prematurely, murdered by the British oligarchy and its hired assassin."

Not until the 1950s, with forensic science at hand, was Napoléon's statement translated into murder. Certain scientists examining authentic hairs from Napoléon taken over the several months before his death allegedly tracked detectable administrations of poison, arsenic to be specific. It was claimed that Count Charles Montholon, who later wrote glowingly and extensively about Napoléon and who was in constant contact with the emperor during his exile and, especially, his waning days, was the emperor's wine steward and who provided Napoléon with this drink, which he slowly dosed with arsenic, eventually bringing about the emperor's death, according to one source.

It was never proven that Montholon was the "hired assassin." It was speculated that he, more than most living in exile with Napoléon, was most suspect in that he was not a loyal supporter of the emperor, mysteriously absent before and during the Waterloo campaign, which brought about the emperor's defeat and exile to St. Helena, and that he appeared only after that military disaster to offer to spend his life with the emperor at St. Helena.

It was further speculated that Montholon was in need of money. He had at one time stolen large sums of money intended as pay for the soldiers of his command, but was never imprisoned or punished for this offense. Was he in the pay of the British or even the Bourbons, who plotted to regain the throne of France? This is not known and probably never will be learned. But that Napoléon Bonaparte was murdered through systematic poisoning appears to be a scientific certainty and that the last assassination attempt against the emperor of France was successful.

NAPOLEON III AND ORSINI/ January 14, 1858

Dreams of glory and conquest danced inside the fertile brain of Napoléon III (Charles Louis Napoléon, 1808-1873) from the time he was seven and watched his celebrated uncle, Napoléon I, return from exile in Elba and go to defeat at Waterloo in 1815. Before Napoléon was sent into permanent exile on the desolate island of St. Helena, his little nephew saw him at Malmaison, an imposing, tragic figure strutting before him in high black boots, long coat, and a tri-corner hat perched low on his balding pate. The emperor turned to his sister-in-law, Queen Hortense, whose little son Charles stood at her side, saying to her: "Take your son, Hortense, and look well to him. Perhaps, after all, he is the hope of my race." Like his illustrious uncle, Napoléon III would be the target of many assassination attempts.

Napoléon III, emperor of France; like his celebrated uncle, he, too, was stalked by assassins.

Napoléon III lived in luxurious exile in Switzerland, the U.S., and finally, England. He was educated and raised with only one thought in mind, to one day reclaim the power his uncle had abdicated in 1815. On August 6, 1840, Napoléon III crossed the English Channel and landed in Boulogne, planting his uncle's old standards and announcing himself emperor of France. The legions of the Grand Army were by then long gone and few rallied to the banners of Napoléon III. A short time later the would-be emperor was arrested, tried and sent to prison for life, confined at the fortress at Ham in northern France. He escaped on May 23, 1846, returning to England. He then began to mount a campaign to have his title recognized. He slowly won support and, in 1849, following the revolution of 1848, he was elected as president of the Republic. In 1852, he proclaimed himself Emperor Napoléon III.

A contemporary illustration caricatured Napoléon III as a preying vulture.

In his early years, Napoléon III acted as a benevolent monarch, magnanimously granting freedoms of speech and press. He worked hard to bolster the French economy and maintain the prosperity it was enjoying. By the late 1850s, however, Napoléon began to exercise the kind of supreme authority his uncle had wielded for two decades. He suppressed political opposition and the press, establishing a police state where all of his adversaries were hounded or arrested on trumped-up charges. Further, Napoléon kept tight control of Italy, which was in political turmoil with various sections of that country under direct French domination.

The emperor talked much about unifying Italy, but he vacillated and stalled this decision , which infuriated one of Italy's leading patriots and political fanatics, Felice Orsini. Born in Medola (the Papal States), Italy, in 1819, Orsini was the son of a political firebrand and his life was dedicated to the unification of Italy at all costs, including the assassination of Napoléon III. A member of Giuseppe Mazzini's Young Italy movement, Orsini believed that by beginning a revolution in France, he could spark another revolution in Italy. To that end, he was convinced, he had to murder Napoléon III, the dictator that controlled both countries.

Orsini had had a long history of organizing revolt and spreading terrorism. In 1845, he was condemned to death for trying to start a rebellion in Austria. His sentence was commuted to life imprisonment and he was held in a fortress from which he escaped. Fleeing to Rome, Orsini took part in a revolution, becoming a member of the constituent government. By 1853, Orsini was a dedicated revolutionary, attempting to dismantle any and all monarchistic governments. He traveled back to Austria where he attempted to incite Austrian troops to revolt. Again he was imprisoned for life and again he escaped from the fortress in Mantua.

At this time, Orsini eyed France and Napoléon III as his next target. The emperor had already been subjected to an assassination attempt on April 28, 1855, when an Italian terrorist, Giovanni Pianori, who had been a member of Garibaldi's Roman army in 1849, fired two pistol shots at Napoléon as the emperor rode in a carriage down the Champs-Elysées. The assassin missed his mark and was beheaded a few weeks later.

Orsini reasoned that any future attack on Napoléon III would have to be carefully planned to be successful, not merely the result of an impulse as had been the case with Pianori. To that end, Orsini recruited four aides. The first of these was leftist teacher Giuseppe-Andrea Pieri, a vain academic. Then Orsini brought Dr. Simon Bernard, a French naval surgeon, into the plot. Italians Anthony Gomez and Carlo di Rudio were also enlisted. Gomez was a hulking, mindless character, who blindly obeyed Orsini's every command. Di Rudio, who claimed to be of noble birth, was a common criminal, who told Orsini that he had been driven to steal because of poverty. Di Rudio had nevertheless been active in Italian politics and had taken part in many political uprisings and revolutions.

The five conspirators were aided by Thomas Allsop, a friend of Bernard's, who lived in England. Allsop secured weapons for the conspirators and put them in contact with John Taylor, an arms manufacturer who provided the group with fragmentation bombs. Taylor later claimed that he had been misled by the conspirators into believing that he was supplying sample bombs for the British army. He gave the conspirators five bombs, delivering these to Orsini, who traveled between France and England, using a passport belonging to Allsop, who freely allowed the terrorist to use it. The bombs were then smuggled through Belgium into France.

On December 15, 1857, Orsini took a room in Paris, and, using Allsop's name, posed as a British tourist, riding on horseback along the routes he thought the emperor might take. His conspirators joined him in Paris, except for Pieri, who remained briefly in Brussels where he bragged to a woman that he was about to take part in a momentous event, suggesting, if not detailing, the impending assassination of the emperor. The information was passed along to the French ambassador in Brussels, who then wired the minister of the interior in France, describing Pieri and the possible assassination against Napoléon III.

Felice Orsini, leader of the assassins.

The conspirators knew that the emperor regularly attended the opera. They attended performances there several times while Orsini organized the course of their action. Orsini decided to strike on the night of January 14, 1858, knowing that Napoléon would be attending the performance that evening. He met that night at 6 p.m. with Pieri, di Rudio and Gomez, giving them each a bomb, and keeping two for himself. Gomez was to throw his bomb first, Orsini ordered, then di Rudio, then Pieri, then himself. Between them, the leader said, they should be able to blow up the emperor's carriage into pieces and with it the despot.

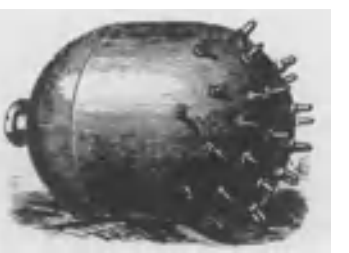
The four assassins met near the old Opera building, mixing with the gathering crowds. Police at that moment had been searching the streets of Paris for Pieri. Some officers spotted him at the gated entrance of the opera building, where he was seized. As he was being dragged away, Pieri frantically tried to signal to Orsini, but he failed to do so. When he was searched, Pieri was found to have a bomb, a revolver and a knife. Police felt that the main threat to the emperor was over with the arrest of Pieri and no search for additional assassins was made in the crowds around the opera building. The police, however, lined the street leading to the opera. Thirty mounted officers of the Garde de Paris preceded the three closed carriages carrying the royal party to the opera square. The carriages stopped at the entranceway to allow the occupants of the first carriage to alight. At this moment, Gomez, di Rudio and Orsini threw three bombs.

The fragmentary bombs did their awful work with horrifying results, mowing down 158 persons in the dense crowd, mortally wounded eight, including several of the mounted guards and their horses. As the bombs exploded, a fragment struck Orsini and he fled the scene bleeding. As he ran, he dropped his second bomb and a revolver , which police officers later picked up. The royal coach in which Napoléon and Empress Eugenie had been riding was dented with bomb fragments, more than fifty of them, but none had penetrated, thanks to the walls of the carriage , which had been lined with lead for just such an event. Fragments had, however, soared through the carriage windows, one passing through the emperor's cocked hat and a piece of glass slightly cutting his nose. The empress was grazed on the cheek by a fragment, but was otherwise unhurt.

The royal couple stepped from the carriage, but to the frustration of the police trying to protect them, refused to be escorted into the opera building until they were assured that the scores of dying and wounded persons lying about them were receiving proper medical attention. Instead of returning to the palace, as urged by his advisers, Napoléon showed great aplomb, escorting the equally brave Eugenie into the opera building where they took their places in the royal box. Their clothes were covered with the blood from the victims outside. The bombs had been heard inside the opera and when the royal couple made their appearance, the audience arose to cheer the emperor and empress.

Pierre-Marie Piétre, chief of the Paris police, hearing of the bombings, rushed to the opera and appeared in the royal box. "Well, Monsieur Piétre," the emperor said sarcastically, "of what use are the police?"

Replied Piétre with annoyance: "Sire, they serve by getting themselves killed for your majesty." There were no fatalities among the police ranks outside the opera building. Piétre went to police headquarters where Pieri was being interrogated. He then returned to the royal box at the opera to report to Napoléon that considerable progress had been made in the investigation. Pieri had informed police of his address on Rue Montmartre, telling them that he shared this lodging with a fellow conspirator. Officers found di Rudio there, in bed, fully clothed, dripping wet with sweat. He was dragged away screaming his innocence.



The type of bomb Orsini used in the attempt on Napoléon III.

The hulking idiot Gomez was found in the Broggi Restaurant, only a short distance from the opera. He had attracted attention by running into the place and squatting at a table where he nervously ordered one dish after another, ferociously gobbling down the food and creating such a disturbance that the police were called. He told officers that he was the servant of an Englishman named Allsop, who lived at 10 Rue Mothabor. At this address police found the wounded Orsini and arrested him.

Napoléon and Eugenie left the opera that night in a carriage that rolled through pools of blood. There was blood everywhere in the courtyard and street in front of the opera building. It had splattered the walls and the posters advertising the opera being performed. It was a hideous sight that would thereafter cause the emperor nightmares. When he reached the palace, he went to the bedroom of his two-year-old son, the heir to the throne, kneeling beside the sleeping boy. He wept, realizing that his reign and that of his son's was in perpetual jeopardy.

Orsini's trial and that of his conspirators was a celebrated affair. The revolutionary gained a great deal of sympathy through the eloquence and poise he exhibited. He stated that he had acted in the name of liberty and in his moving oratory he found numerous supporters in the government who subtly pleaded for his life. All of the other conspirators claimed innocence, shifting responsibility for the bombings onto Orsini, who was so disgusted with his fellow assassins that he admitted his guilt, although he denied having thrown a bomb. He was nevertheless found guilty and condemned to death, as were Pieri and di Rudio. Gomez, judged a halfwit, was to be exiled for life.

While awaiting execution, Orsini wrote several articles, as well as his brief memoirs, which were published and widely read, earning him the empathy of many high-born persons, including the empress. She was so swayed by the "nobility of his language and the heroism of his attitude" that she informed her husband that she intended to visit the condemned Orsini in his cell at La Roquette. The emperor, however, ordered her to remain in the palace.

Empress Eugénie, who begged for the lives of the plotters and may have arranged for the escape of one of them.

Napoléon was pressured by many liberals to pardon Orsini, but the number of deaths brought about by the bomb throwers decreed that the death sentence be upheld. Di Rudio escaped this punishment, his sentence commuted to life imprisonment. (It was later speculated that he was spared the guillotine because of his unsubstantiated claims that he was of noble birth, the distant relative of a long extinct aristocratic family in Italy that traced its bloodlines to Napoléon I and that Napoléon III could not take the life of "one of his own.")

On March 13, 1858, Orsini and Pieri were sent to the guillotine. At 10 a.m. that day, both were taken from their cells and marched into the prison courtyard. Pieri was nervous, talking incessantly as he and Orsini walked toward the waiting scaffold.

"Orsini!" he cried out to the man walking beside him. "How are you getting on?"

"Be calm, my friend, be calm," Orsini replied in a low voice.

"Oh, I am not afraid, I am not afraid," Pieri blurted. "We are going to Calvary! We are going to Calvary!" He was handed some hot coffee and Pieri gulped down the scalding liquid so that steam was pouring from his mouth as the black hood was placed over his head. His shirt was cut away around the neck and he was taken up to the guillotine. In seconds the blade fell and Pieri was decapitated. Orsini, without losing his cool composure, was next. He went to his death wordlessly.

Bernard, the naval surgeon, escaped punishment, although he was later indicted and tried at the Old Bailey as an accessory to the conspiracy. He was acquitted and released. The outcome of this trial caused a great uproar in France where anti-British sentiment over the bombing reached fever pitch when it was learned that the bombs used by Orsini had been constructed in England. Thomas Allsop, the helpful British conspirator, was never tried. The surviving convicted conspirator, di Rudio, escaped prison and fled to America. He arrived in the U.S. just as the Civil War broke out. He enlisted in the Union army (altering his name to De Rudio) and fought through the entire war, being wounded many times and rising to the rank of captain. After the war, di Rudio remained in the army and was sent to the western frontier as a lieutenant, being assigned to the famous 7th Cavalry under the command of George Armstrong Custer.

Grim irony awaited for di Rudio, who had survived a half dozen revolutions, a death sentence in the Orsini plot, a shipwreck at sea while immigrating to America, and countless hazards of the Civil War. On June 25, 1876, he found himself in the valley of the Rosebud on the Little Big Horn River. He sat on horseback next to Custer when the glory-seeker gave the order to charge into Indian hordes waiting in the valley. Di Rudio was one of the first officers to lead his troopers into the howling mass of Sioux awaiting Custer. He was quickly shot off his horse, falling into some heavy brush. Custer and his 220 men rode past him pell-mell to legendary massacre.

The wounded di Rudio clambered up the slopes with Indians running after him. As he staggered upward, he turned repeatedly to fire several pistols he carried, shooting down a half dozen braves lunging at him. He finally reached a ridge where the remnants of the 7th Cavalry had taken a defensive position under the command of Major Marcus Reno. Joining the survivors of Custer's decimated command, he and the others were later rescued by arriving troops under General Terry. This last horrific experience was too much for the adventurous di Rudio. "I'm tired of looking for death," he told a fellow officer before resigning his commission. "Let it seek me out—if it can find me." He reportedly went back East and then traveled to California where he wisely imported grapes from Italy and became a prosperous vineyard owner.

ENGLAND'S TURN

Assassination in England had been a rare occurrence. That changed in 1812. While Napoléon I was preparing his massive invasion of Russia that year, John Bellingham, a British businessman, who had met with a disaster in Russia because of the English ambassador, sought vengeance in his homeland through assassination. His act was the first that led to many such abortive and successful attempts throughout the course of the 19th Century in Great Britain.

THE DEBTOR AND THE PRIME MINISTER/ May 11, 1812

Spencer Perceval, assassinated in 1812.

In the early 1800s, John Bellingham, an English businessman, traded heavily in Russia. In a conflict with another company there, he was found responsible for a large debt, which he refused to pay. In the following years, he went bankrupt twice. He accused a Russian shipowner of sinking his own vessel for insurance on goods he was transporting for Bellingham, goods for which the Englishman could not make payment. The Russian firm sued him on criminal charges of fraud and he attempted to leave the country before he came to trial.

Lord Granville Leveson-Gower, the British ambassador to Russia, refused to help Bellingham when the Russians jailed him. Finally, the Russians, hoping Bellingham might come up with the payment for the original debt, sent him back to England. After arriving in Liverpool, Bellingham, obsessed with taking revenge on Leveson-Gower, bombarded every department in the British government with correspondence in which he demanded redress for wrongs done to him in Russia.

After getting no response, Bellingham, on May 11, 1812, went to London's House of Commons, seeking Leveson-Gower, whom he believed was present. Instead of locating Leveson-Gower, he encountered Spencer Perceval, the British prime minister. Perceval had been one of the many government officials who had repeatedly denied Bellingham assistance. In the middle of a crowded lobby, Bellingham drew a pistol and shot Perceval to death.

Taken directly to Newgate Prison, Bellingham saw the whole affair as a private matter between him and Perceval. His trial began four days later in the Old Bailey. Refusing to enter a plea of insanity, Bellingham instead ran through a tedious catalog of complaints. A jury took only fourteen minutes to find him guilty. Bellingham, the only person to ever assassinate a British prime minister in England, was hanged on May 18, 1812, only a week after the murder. Bellingham's irrational act was the precursor to many attempts on the life of England's beloved Queen Victoria, all at the hands of demented attackers.

THE LUNATIC AND THE QUEEN/ June 10, 1840

The long and successful reign of Queen Victoria (Alexandrina Victoria, 1819-1901), the last of the Hanoverians, became synonymous with an age remembered for its elegance and style. Victoria's peaceful epoch was disrupted by six failed assassination attempts. The first and most serious of these occurred on June 10, 1840, when the queen, then four months pregnant, and her husband, Albert, the prince consort, exited Buckingham Palace for their customary drive through Constitution Hill. Their phaeton had traveled only a few hundred feet when a man crept from the shadows of the Green Park fence to take aim at the monarch. He fired two shots in quick succession, neither of which struck the queen or her husband.

John Bellingham (below) fatally shooting Prime Minister Perceval in the House of Commons.

Victoria, who was looking in the other direction, was unaware of the first shot fired. By the time the assailant fired his second shot, the prince had pushed the queen down in the carriage and had ordered the phaeton to proceed quickly. When arriving at Hyde Park, the couple decided to take a second drive through the area to let the public know that the queen was unharmed. Crowds of spectators who had heard about the attempt on her life gathered to cheer the royal couple.

The assailant did not escape. He was seized by a crowd outside the palace and dragged away to the Gardner's Lane Police Station. There he was identified as Edward Oxford, an 18-year-old drifter who had most recently worked as a barman at the Hog in the Pond pub on Molton Street. Oxford was charged with high treason and committed to trial on July 9, 1840 at the Central Criminal Court. It was shown that Oxford had purchased two pistols on May 4, 1840, the weapons he employed in his attempt to murder the queen, and had spent much time since then in target practice.

A collection of papers and secret codes were found in Oxford's residence, suggesting that he had organized a society bent on anarchy. There was no evidence, however, to suggest that his "Young England" movement was anything more than the paranoid delusions of a lunatic. He was found not guilty on grounds of insanity, but a year later the law was amended and the verdict in his case was revised to read: guilty but insane. (This terminology, unlike the misleading and inappropriate terminology of U.S. law today in such cases, is correct in that it applies to a person who is actually guilty of committing the crime but is adjudged insane in the process of that crime.)

Oxford was confined to the Bethlehem Royal Hospital, known as Bedlam (notorious for its long history of mistreating inmates). He was released in September 1867 and allowed to immigrate from England. No doubt inspired by the demented Oxford, John Francis, another would-be assassin, positioned himself alongside the palace wall to await the arrival of the queen's carriage on May 30, 1842. As the driver guided the phaeton toward the gates of Buckingham Palace, Francis stepped into the middle of the road and fired a shot on behalf of the unemployed British masses, or so he later claimed. The bullet missed its mark and a quick-witted constable wrestled the gun away from Francis before he could fire a second shot.

England's beloved Queen Victoria (shown with her infant son, Prince Arthur).

According to custom, Francis was taken before the Privy Council, where he was examined. He was condemned to death, but the queen intervened. "The feeling that he [Francis] is to be executed is very painful to me," she wrote. Further, government officials feared that Francis might become a martyr to the impoverished underclass if he were to be executed. His sentence was therefore commuted to "transportation" for life on July 1, 1842, and he was sent into exile.

A third attempt on the queen's life was made only two days after that of Francis' abortive action. A hunchbacked boy named John William Bean pointed a pistol at the queen as she was riding to Chapel Royal in St. James. The gun exploded, but there was no bullet in its single chamber. Bean had loaded the chamber with a wad of paper and tobacco. He was arrested a few days later, after London constables rounded up all hunchbacked males in the city for questioning. Bean was imprisoned and later released.

To protect the queen, Sir Robert Peel, following the attempt against Victoria's life by John Francis, proposed to the home secretary that a special detective department within Scotland Yard be established with the purpose of providing security for the sovereign. On June 20, 1842, the permission to establish such an agency was granted. Peel hired two detective inspectors, paying each of them £200 a year, and eight police sergeants who worked directly under them.

The deranged Edward Oxford fires at Queen Victoria, missing his mark.

William Hamilton, a muddled Irishman from Adare, thought to "scare" the queen in a protest against British oppression in Ireland. He could not afford a gun, so he attempted to whittle a wooden pistol, but when this crude item proved unconvincing, Hamilton borrowed his landlady's pistol and brandished this weapon at the queen while she was riding through Constitution Hill on May 19, 1849. He fled to his room, but was quickly apprehended and transported from England.

The fifth attempt against Victoria took place on July 27, 1850, when Robert Pate, a retired army lieutenant from the 10th Hussars, assaulted the queen in the garden of Cambridge House, advancing on her carriage as it entered the grounds of the estate. He struck the queen violently above the eye, causing her to momentarily pass out. Pate was immediately surrounded by a throng of the queen's well-wishers and beaten to a bloody pulp. Pate's motives were unclear, but his actions deliberate. He was sentenced to transportation.

By this time, Victoria had lost all her patience and sympathy for the type of men who would plot such fiendish attempts against a woman. She wrote in her journal: "Certainly it is very hard and very horrid that I, a woman—a defenseless young woman and surrounded by my children, should be exposed to insults of this kind and be unable to go out quietly for a drive."

In the fall of 1867, Scotland Yard began to track down rumors of an Irish-Fenian plot against the queen's life. Authorities took added steps to secure Victoria's security, placing more constables about her when she moved in public. Three Fenians were later convicted of plotting to attack government officials and possibly murder the queen and were hanged on November 23, 1867. The Irish, Victoria noted, "had never become reconciled to the English rule, which they hate! So different from the Scotch, who are so loyal."

The last attempt on the life of the queen occurred on March 2, 1882, when a mentally unbalanced Englishman fired at the royal carriage, this time outside Windsor station. The gunman was Roderick McLean, who was subdued by two young students from Eton, who pummeled him with their umbrellas, knocking him senseless. He was later sentenced to transportation. At the time, the queen did not fully comprehend the gravity of the situation. She did not imagine that the bullet was meant for her. In every occasion where a would-be assassin sought to take her life, Victoria showed uncommon courage. She refused to vary her daily routines because of the possibility of being struck by a madman's bullet, ruling the English empire for nearly sixty-four years as an enlightened and kind-hearted monarch, until her death on January 22, 1901.

In reviewing the many attempts against Queen Victoria, William Ewart Gladstone, the British prime minister, commented with a touch of wry wit that foreign assassins carried out their treacherous deeds in the name of politics, but in England, all such malefactors were simply imbeciles.

MURDER AND THE "M'NAGHTEN RULES"/ January 20, 1843

Daniel M'Naghten, who tried to murder Prime Minister Peel, but killed his secretary instead.

Queen Victoria would write toward the end of her reign that she distrusted the Irish of her kingdom, but emphasized that the Scots were "so loyal," and yet one of those Scots sought to kill British prime minister Robert Peel, shooting and fatally wounding his secretary instead. This attack took place in 1843, less than a year after Queen Victoria herself had been fired at by a would-be assassin.

On January 20, 1843, Peel's 50-year-old secretary, Edward Drummond, left Peel's residence in the company of the Earl of Haddington. The two men headed toward Charing Cross, separating near the Admiralty. Drummond continued to his brother's bank. After a few minutes of business, Drummond left the bank and began walking to Downing Street. He was apparently unaware of a man in a dark overcoat following him at a distance of about three yards. At one point, the man closed the distance and pulled a pistol from beneath his coat, shooting Drummond in the back. Constable James Silver, who was nearby and had witnessed the shooting, struggled with the man, who produced a second pistol from under his coat with which to shoot Drummond a second time. He was thwarted by Silver and a passerby, Benjamin Weston.

Drummond, though injured, did not appear to be critically wounded. He was taken to his home where surgeons removed the ball near his stomach. By then the attacker was taken to a police station where he identified himself as Daniel M'Naghten. Refusing to tell police anything further, M'Naghten was returned to his cell to await a hearing the following morning. In his possession was found a bank deposit slip in the amount of £750, a large enough sum to make M'Naghten appear to be a fairly affluent person. At the hearing the following day, M'Naghten remained close-lipped, providing only terse information, giving his age as twenty-seven and his occupation as a lathe operator. He said he lived in Newington and then refused to make any further statements. After being returned to his cell, M'Naghten asked to see the judge who had been presiding over his hearing.

M'Naghten was returned to court and told the judge in a low, measured voice that he was compelled to attempt the murder of the Tories, who followed and persecuted him wherever he went. Officials believed the attacked to be unbalanced and began an intensive investigation into his background, learning that M'Naghten, born in Glasgow, was a skilled tradesman and a good businessman. Although his Scottish neighbors reported evidences of strange behavior in the man, they believed him to be sane. His London landlady agreed, saying that M'Naghten was quiet, meticulous and frugal to the penny.

Deeper investigation revealed that two years earlier, in 1841, M'Naghten had begun to display irrational behavior when he spoke openly of his perceived persecution by Tories, even seeking aid from Sir James Campbell, the Glasgow superintendent of police, and from Alexander Johnstone, a member of Parliament. As his paranoia worsened, M'Naghten felt it necessary to sell his business and flee to the Continent to avoid imagined Tories who were following and tormenting him. When he found no peace on the Continent, he resolved to return to England and fight his oppressors.

Apparently, his target became Sir Robert Peel, the most prominent Tory in England at that time. His assault on Drummond was clearly understood to be a case of mistaken identity. He thought Drummond, whom he followed from Peel's residence, was Peel himself.

Drummond's condition, meanwhile, worsened and he died on January 24, 1843. British newspapers, which had been campaigning against an insanity finding, now openly demanded Daniel M'Naghten's death in return for taking Drummond's life.

M'Naghten's trial, which began on March 3, 1843, was attended by a number of ranking politicians and diplomats—even Prince Albert, the royal consort, was at hand. Solicitor-General Waddington led the prosecution and Henry Thomas Cockburn, later Lord Cockburn, headed up M'Naghten's defense. On M'Naghten's behalf, Cockburn entered a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity.

M'Naghten stands in the dock during his lengthy trial, one which established the "M'Naghten [Insanity] Rules."

The prosecution argued that the defendant had not displayed the signs of classical mental illness and enumerated cases tried in British courts in which defendants displaying behavior similar to M'Naghten's had been found guilty of murder. Cockburn argued that new developments in the science of defining and treating mental illness required an appropriate adjustment in the law's treatment of it. He introduced Dr. Munro, then director of Bethlehem Royal Hospital (Bedlam), and Dr. McMurdo, the surgeon of Newgate Prison, as expert witnesses. Both testified that after having examined M'Naghten they concluded that the defendant was decidedly insane at the time of the murder.

The unequivocal nature of this testimony had a profound effect on everyone in the courtroom, including the prosecutor, who, in his concluding statement to the jury, said that he could not think of asking for a verdict against the prisoner. The jury declined to have the Lord Justice sum up the evidence and reached its decision without leaving the courtroom. After conferring for two minutes without leaving their seats, the jury members found M'Naghten not guilty by reason of insanity.

This decision provoked a public outcry and resulted in the writing of the "M'Naghten Rules," judicial guidelines still used in legal cases where insanity pleas are made. The House of Lords argued the matter on March 13, 1843, and although this body announced that hanging an insane man was tantamount to murder, it disapproved of the court's verdict. On March 18, 1843, M'Naghten was removed from Newgate Prison to Bedlam, where he died in 1865. M'Naghten's mindless act stemmed from a nagging grievance over business, but in Ireland, England's most troublesome province, the concept of assassination was political and those plotting such murders were dedicated and lethal.

ASSASSINATION BY COINCIDENCE/ May 6, 1882

For decades if not centuries, Ireland had been England's chief political problem. In parliament, the Irish members were led by the formidable Charles Stewart Parnell, president of the Irish Land League, who had been jailed for agrarian sabotage in Ireland, acts over which he had no control—the burning of stored grain, the slaughter of livestock, all acts committed by Fenian extremists belonging to a militant group calling itself The Invincibles. To mollify the Irish leaders lobbying for Home Rule, Prime Minister William Ewart Gladstone appointed Lord Frederick Charles Cavendish as chief secretary of state for Ireland, replacing W. E. Forster, an extremist who had been battling Home Rule and who resigned in anger when Parnell was released from prison on May 2, 1882.

Cavendish was considered to be a moderate in Ireland and was not a subject of hatred on the part of the Irish extremists. His aide and counselor, Thomas Henry Burke, however, was another matter. Burke, under secretary of the Irish parliament, was considered a British stooge, called a "castle rat," a derisive term reserved for those Irish Catholics loyal to the British and also meaning one who operated from the seat of government , which was located in Dublin Castle.

Lord Frederick Cavendish, Chief Secretary for Ireland, assassinated by mistake in Dublin in 1882.

By early 1882, leaders of The Invincibles planned on assassinating Burke. The Invincibles were led by extremist Fenians James Carey, a Dublin businessman, Daniel Curley, a carpenter who was also the chairman of The Invincibles, shopkeeper Thomas Caffrey, and merchant James Mullet. The group, aided by a dozen or more Invincibles, thought to murder Burke while he took his daily stroll in Dublin's Phoenix Park. They failed twice to get close enough to their prey, but on May 6, 1882, they put their plan into bloody action. Carey and five other Invincibles were sitting on park benches when Burke appeared, taking his daily walk at dusk, a little after 7 p.m. He was accompanied by another man the assassins could not identify.

One of the assassins, Joseph Brady, a giant 24-year-old laborer, caught Burke by the hand, swung him around, and drove a long surgical knife into his stomach. As the victim struggled with Brady, his companion sprang to Burke's defense, swinging his umbrella down hard on Brady's head. Another killer, Patrick Delaney, shouted at Burke's companion: "Ah, you villain!" He slashed at him with a knife. Brady, however, freeing himself of Burke's clasp, then drove a knife into Burke's friend. Tim Kelly, a 19-year-old laborer, then leaned down and slit the throats of the victims. Both men were left dying on the green as the assassins fled.

The following day, Ireland, as well as the assassins were shocked to learn that, in addition to Burke, Lord Cavendish had been assassinated. He had been murdered by coincidence in that Cavendish, not identified by the killers, simply tried to interfere with the murderers and was killed for his valiant effort to rescue his friend. On that day, a Dublin newspaper received a note stating that: "The deed was done by The Invincibles." (The writing was later identified as that of Daniel Curley.)

Parnell denounced the murders as criminal acts and even offered to resign his post in parliament, but Gladstone refused the offer. Ireland's most prominent leaders also condemned the assassinations, as did the Land League. A £10,000 reward was offered for the apprehension of the assassins. That apprehension was not long in coming through the clever efforts of Dublin Police Superintendent John Mallon. Through his well-organized informant system, Mallon quickly took into custody Carey, Curley, Mullet and others. Playing one against another, Mallon pretended to have information that pinpointed the killers. Thinking their companions had informed on each other, the suspects, after many months of grilling, began to talk. Carey became the chief witness for the prosecution.

Thomas Henry Burke, murdered by intention in Dublin, 1882.

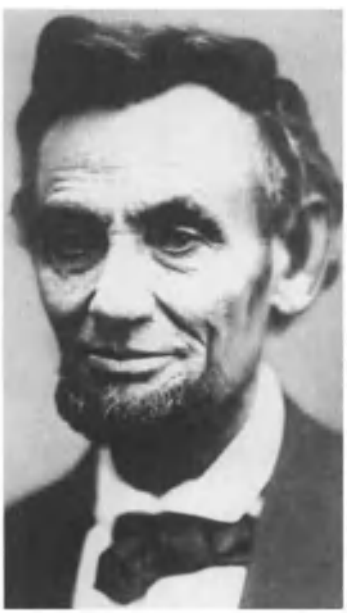
Twenty-six Invincibles were brought to court on April 9, 1883. Brady, Kelly, Caffrey, Delaney and Michael Fagan were sentenced to death. Delaney's sentence was commuted at the last minute to life imprisonment, but the other four condemned men went bravely and silently to a hangman named Marwood, executed between May 4 and June 8, 1883, at Kilmainham. Other defendants were imprisoned or shipped to penal colonies in Australia. Carey, the informant, was a hunted man. He was smuggled on board the Melrose, a ship sailing for Cape Town. He was shot to death by fellow passenger Patrick O'Donnell, who was claimed by The Invincibles to be one of their emissaries, assigned to wreak vengeance for Carey's betrayal. This was not the case. O'Donnell shot Carey while he was cheating at cards. The informant's killer went to prison for life.

The bodies of Lord Cavendish and Burke (bottom left) were found in Phoenix Park.

ASSASSINATION COMES TO AMERICA

Assassination was long absent from American politics. The killing of heads of state was a tradition nurtured and practiced in foreign lands and such notions were generally estranged from the American mind. Almost fifty years from the birth of the American presidency elapsed before someone thought to murder an American president. That attempt occurred on January 30, 1835, when Richard Lawrence, a lunatic house painter fired two pistols at 68-year-old President Andrew Jackson (1767-1845), while he was leaving a funeral ceremony at the Capitol rotunda. Incredibly, both pistols misfired. Lawrence, like M'Naghten in England, was sent to a lunatic asylum for life. Jackson had been fortunate. Thirty years later, President Abraham Lincoln would enjoy no such luck. He, too, would be attacked by a man possessed, but one more clever and sinister than the impulsive and inept Lawrence.

"NOW HE BELONGS TO THE AGES"/ April 14, 1865



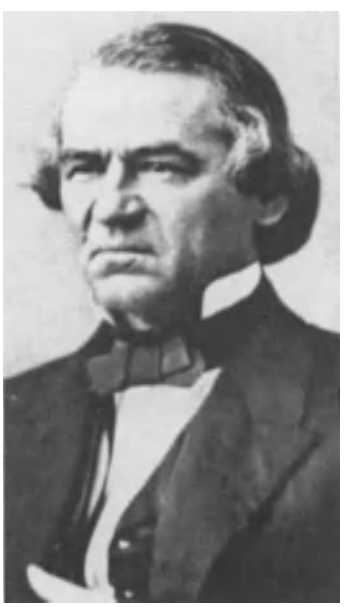
President Abraham Lincoln, a photo taken four days before his assassination.

In the decades since the death of Abraham Lincoln (1809-1865), this tall, ungainly chief executive has rightly attained the shining image of America's greatest martyr to the cause of freedom. The sixteenth president of the United States was a plain-speaking man who possessed uncommon common sense. His most intense hatred was for Slavery and to the abolishment of that evil institution, Lincoln led the North in a bloody four-year civil war, emancipating the slaves in 1863. Less than two years later, at the moment of peace, Lincoln paid the price for his dedication to freedom. He was slain by an egotistical actor, John Wilkes Booth, who operated from a small circle of conspirators, at the end of the Civil War. The extent of Booth's conspiracy and the many unknown persons who may have been party to that conspiracy is hotly debated to this day.

Born in a crude log cabin near Hodgenville, Kentucky, on February 12, 1809, Lincoln took menial jobs in early life, while studying the law. He had no ambitions for fame or wealth. He moved to New Salem, Illinois, in 1830, where he endured a hardscrabble life, reportedly marked by tragedy when sweetheart Ann Rutledge prematurely died in 1835. (Most reliable Lincoln historians insist that no such romance ever existed.) He practiced law in Springfield, Illinois, married Mary Todd in 1842, and sired four sons—Robert, Todd, Edward Baker and William Wallace—with only Robert living to maturity. On an anti-Slavery platform, Lincoln, a Republican, won the presidential election of 1860, an election bitterly opposed by the slave states of the South and one that led to the Civil War.

Assassin John Wilkes Booth, a photo taken shortly before he murdered Lincoln.

Lincoln was a marked man. Even before his 1861 inauguration, he was warned by private detective Allan Pinkerton (who was later to become Lincoln's chief of the Secret Service) that assassins were plotting to kill him in Baltimore, as he traveled to Washington to take his oath of office. At Pinkerton's advice, Lincoln secreted himself aboard an unmarked train and, in disguise, arrived safely in Washington, his would-be killers thwarted in Baltimore. He arrived in Washington, D.C., "like a thief in the night," according to one report. A lampooning press cartooned him in outlandish disguises and he was held up to ridicule. Most believed Pinkerton had inflated if not fabricated the 1861 plot against Lincoln. The president, for the most part, also dismissed the idea, taking his dramatic precautions at the insistence of aides. He did not believe that anyone would seriously plan to murder him.



Vice President Andrew Johnson was also slated for death.

That very plan, however, boiled and bubbled in the troubled mind of the Maryland-born John Wilkes Booth. He was a member of the celebrated Booth family. His father, Junius Brutus Booth, was a famed actor (if not a demented thespian), as was his brother Edwin, who would become the greatest actor of his day, despite the mad act of his sibling. John Wilkes Booth was a dedicated Confederate and ardently believed in Slavery. He had witnessed the hanging of abolitionist John Brown in 1859, and he thought Lincoln to be nothing more than another fanatical abolitionist. Consumed by hatred for Lincoln, Booth, early on in the war, began formulating a plan to murder the chief executive.

Secretary of State William Henry Seward, attacked by assassin Lewis Paine.

As the tide of war turned drastically against the South, Booth developed another plan, one where he and some associates would kidnap the president and turn him over to Confederate authorities in Richmond. The actor thought that once Lincoln was in Southern hands, a massive exchange of prisoners could take place, which would swell the ranks of the depleted Confederate army and enhance the South's ability to negotiate an equitable peace. In September 1864, Booth traveled to Baltimore, Maryland, where he met with two friends, 28-year-old Samuel B. Arnold and 27-year-old Michael O'Laughlin, both former Confederate soldiers.

Booth had closely monitored Lincoln's movements and believed that the president could easily be abducted. He outlined his plans to Arnold and O'Laughlin, who agreed to take part in the kidnaping. At that time, Booth left open the option of murdering the president. As he widened his conspiracy, the actor began to add more conspirators, including the brilliant John H. Surratt, a 20-year-old Confederate spy whose mother, Mary Surratt, owned a large boarding house in Washington, D.C. Surratt, a born leader and one still considered to be the co-founder of the plot against Lincoln, was mysterious in his comings and goings and even Booth had no knowledge of Surratt's important contacts within the federal government.

Surratt enlisted two more men in Booth's plot, George Atzerodt, a 33-year-old coachmaker, and 23-year-old David Herold a drugstore clerk with limited mental faculties. (Following Lincoln's assassination, Herold was examined by doctors who determined that he had the intelligence of a 10-year-old.) Herold was slavishly obedient to Booth, whose fiery personality captivated him. Atzerodt was pivotal to Booth's abduction plot in that he knew well the waterways of the Potomac and planned the route by which the plotters would take with the kidnaped Lincoln. Another recruit to the plot was 20-year-old Lewis Paine (born Lewis Thornton Powell), a towering, mentally disturbed thug. He stood six feet three inches and was extremely powerful.

Paine was designated as the man who would wrest Lincoln from his coach and place him in a carriage, holding him as the plotters fled toward Richmond with their captive. Rebelling early against his Baptist minister father, Paine had an intense hatred for the Union and blacks. He had fought in the Confederate army, been wounded several times and captured at Gettysburg, but he made a daring escape from a Federal prison camp, fleeing to Baltimore where he held odd jobs. He became as willing a follower to Booth as was Herold and he, too, after medical examinations following Lincoln's murder, was, like Herold, termed a "halfwit."

It is uncertain when all of the conspirators first met. Some historians claim that Booth assembled the conspirators on March 1, 1865 and that many of the conspirators were present Lincoln's second inaugural ceremonies in Washington, D.C. It is certain that the group met on March 17, 1865, in a Washington saloon. Booth lavishly paid for food and drink while the conspirators enthusiastically embraced the actor's scheme to abduct Lincoln—all except the wily, tight-lipped Surratt. The Confederate spy told Booth that the plot was too risky, pointing out that the president was usually surrounded by military guards.

John Wilkes Booth (left) in costume, on stage in Julius Caesar, with his brothers Edwin (center) and Junius Booth, Jr.

Ford's Theatre (at left) in Washington, D.C., where Booth had played with success a month before the assassination.

Playbill for Our American Cousin, performed on the night of Lincoln's murder.

Booth argued that this would not be the case when Lincoln visited the Soldier's Home three days later on March 20, 1865. He would have no military escort, the actor had learned through his Washington contacts, and that the kidnaping would be an easy matter. Surratt was convinced. Three days later the plotters positioned themselves along a lonely road leading to the Soldier's Home outside of Washington. Lincoln, however, did not appear. He or his wife Mary had had a "premonition" of some sort, and the president decided to change his schedule that day. He sent instead Salmon P. Chase, newly-appointed chief justice of the Supreme Court.

The conspirators stopped Chase's carriage, but seeing Lincoln was not present, excused themselves and rode away. Booth and his plotters bided their time, awaiting another opportunity to kidnap Lincoln. Then General Robert E. Lee surrendered his decimated army at Appomattox and the war ended. The news of Lee's surrender devastated Booth. He became incensed at the defeat of the South. The actor was convinced that Lincoln had personally brought about this ruination and vowed revenge by murdering the president. The assassination would not only avenge the South, but throw the Union into chaos. He again summoned the conspirators, stating that three Union leaders were to be killed. Atzerodt, he said, would kill Vice President Andrew Johnson, Paine would slay Secretary of State William Seward and he would shoot Lincoln to death.

Lincoln, Booth knew, would be attending Ford's Theatre on April 14, 1865, to see Our American Cousin, a light comedy. Ten days before this date, Lincoln had a nightmare in which he envisioned himself killed. The president told his wife about the dream, saying: "What does anyone want to assassinate me for? If anyone wants to do so, he can do it day or night, if he is ready to give his life for mine. It is nonsense."

Actress Laura Keene, star of Our American Cousin.

A few days before the assassination, Booth wrote in his diary of his intention to murder Lincoln: "Our country owed all her troubles to him, and God simply made me the instrument of His punishment." On the afternoon of the murder, Booth entered the darkened Ford's Theatre, making his way along the mezzanine to the door that led to a little hallway. He dug a small hole into the wall so that this door could be barred from the inside with a plank , which he placed behind it. He then bored a small hole in the door from the closed-off hallway that led to the presidential box. He practiced looking through the hole, angling it so that his vision came to rest on the rocking chair in which Lincoln would sit.

Next Booth went to Pumphrey's stable where he rented a fast little bay with a white star on its forehead. He said he would call for the horse in a few hours when he intended to take a pleasure ride. He then went to the National Hotel where he lived. He wrote a letter in the hotel office and some minutes later rode along Pennsylvania Avenue. He met fellow actor John Matthews and gave him the letter, asking his friend to deliver the missive to the editor of the National Intelligencer the next day.

Mary Todd Lincoln, the president's wife, who attended Ford's Theatre that fateful night with her husband.

Major Henry Reed Rathbone, who struggled with Booth and was severely slashed.

At that moment a carriage rumbled past Booth. Inside of it were General Ulysses S. Grant, Union commander-in-chief, and his wife. They were on their way to the train station, planning to travel to New Jersey, where they intended to visit Grant's daughter. This troubled Booth, who had read that Grant would be attending the theater that night with Lincoln. He wheeled his horse about, racing after Grant's carriage. He rode alongside of it, peering into the carriage, making Grant and his wife uncomfortable.

Booth then rode on to the Kirkwood House, where he asked a clerk to place a card he had written into the mailbox of Vice President Andrew Johnson. On the card, Booth had written: "Don't wish to disturb you? Are you at home? J. Wilkes Booth." The purpose of this message remains a mystery. By 6:30 p.m., Booth was at his residence, dining alone in the National Hotel restaurant. At 8 p.m., he arrived at the Herndon House, where he met with Surratt, Paine, Herold and Atzerodt. There may have been others, but their exact identities were never confirmed.

Surratt's role was never made clear and he would later deny having met that night with the conspirators. Atzerodt drank heavily. His hands trembled and his lips quivered when he spoke. He hung his head and said in a low voice: "I cannot kill Johnson. I cannot perform such a deed. I cannot become a murderer."

"You're a fool!" Booth lashed out at Atzerodt. "You'll be hanged anyway."

Booth and Paine then left, both dedicated to their murder tasks, Paine to go to the home of Secretary of State Seward, Booth to Ford's Theatre. At 9:30 p.m., Booth rode the mare slowly up an alley, stopping behind Ford's Theatre. Here he was greeted by John "Peanuts" Burrough, a boy who did odd jobs at the theater and admired Booth. The actor gave him some coins and asked him to hold the reins of his horse. He then went through the back door of the theater and asked the stage manager if he could cross the stage. The manager told him no, that a scene was already in progress. Booth, who had acted at Ford's many times and knew its passageways, went beneath the stage through a narrow passageway and emerged at another alley that led to the front of Ford's Theatre.

When the actor appeared in the theater lobby, ticket-taker John Buckingham looked at Booth to see him ashen-faced and acting as if he were dazed. The actor went in and out of the theater five times, seeming to be looking for someone. A witness later stated that Booth saw a rider on horseback in the street and he walked to the rider and briefly exchanged words with him. The actor went back to Buckingham, asking for the time, his second request for such information. Buckingham reminded Booth that there was a large clock in the theater lobby. The actor, now visibly nervous and agitated, nodded and went once more into the theater.

Clara Harris, daughter of Senator Ira T. Harris, was sitting in the presidential box.

At 10 p.m., Buckingham went into the saloon next to the theater and saw Booth, who was drinking brandy. At 10:15 p.m., Booth reentered the theater, looking at the audience. He appeared to be looking for someone in the packed house. He was also seen to look up at the presidential box where Lincoln, his wife Mary, Clara Harris and Major Henry Rathbone sat. They could not be seen by the audience since the box obliquely faced the stage and the occupants sat in chairs deep inside the box.

Booth was later depicted outside the presidential box with derringer and knife, Satan urging him to commit murder.

Booth is shown with a derringer, about to fire into the president's head.

Booth, wearing a soft slouch hat and riding boots, slowly walked up the stairs to the dress circle (mezzanine). He was softly humming a tune. The lone guard who had been assigned to protect Lincoln, Washington policeman John F. Parker, was not present. He normally sat outside the door leading to the hall that opened on the presidential box, but now he was absent. Parker later lamely explained that the play bored him and that he went to the next-door saloon for a drink. This incredible breach of security led directly to the murder of the president. Parker was never prosecuted for this desertion, nor was he dismissed from the police force or even reprimanded. One account has it that Parker was one of the mystery men Booth had been looking for as he prowled the lobby of the theater that night and that he may have even met the guard in the saloon next door to make sure that Parker did not return to his post.

With free access to the hallway door, Booth entered the hallway and barred the door from inside, sliding the small plank into the hole in the wall he had earlier gouged. The actor then went to the door leading to the presidential box and peered through the hole he had drilled earlier that day. He could clearly see Lincoln sitting in his rocking chair. Withdrawing a one-shot derringer pistol from his coat pocket, Booth opened the door and entered the box noiselessly. He closed the door and then withdrew a large knife. Standing directly behind Lincoln, Booth held the pistol behind the president's head and fired. Lincoln was leaning forward slightly to see the action of the play below. The bullet entered the president's head behind the left ear, flattened out as it passed through the brain, and stopped behind the right eye.

A cloud of smoke from the pistol's discharge enveloped Lincoln. Mary Lincoln and Clara Harris looked at the president, baffled. Then from the smoke stepped Booth, all in black, his wide eyes like black coals, looking like some devilish apparition. Lincoln slumped forward in his chair and his wife reached out to hold him upright. Booth moved toward the rail, dropping the derringer to the floor. Realizing what had happened, Major Rathbone leaped from his seat and grabbed Booth by the arm. Booth raised the knife and tried to plunge it into Rathbone's chest. Knocking the dagger upright with his arm, Rathbone was slashed two inches above the elbow and he began to bleed profusely as he struggled with the actor.

Booth leaps from the presidential box, his left spur caught in the American flag, which caused him to break his ankle upon impact.

Booth broke free and took several quick steps to the railing, placing one foot on it, but Rathbone dove after him, holding him for a few seconds, and felt part of the actor's jacket tear. Again, Booth jerked his arm free, then vaulted over the railing and dropped twelve feet to the stage. As he did so, a spur from one of his riding boots was snagged in the American flag draped over the railing. This caused Booth to pitch forward as he landed with a crash on the stage. He tried to stand, then fell and then stood again on one good leg since the small bone of his left ankle was broken. Rathbone leaned over the railing of the presidential box and shouted: "Stop that man!" Clara Harris was also at the railing screaming: "Stop that man! Won't somebody stop that man?" Then Mrs. Lincoln's shrieking voice could be heard as she joined the imploring chorus in the presidential box. She leaned over the railing of the box and screamed: "Help! Help! Help!" Her further words were indiscernible, the gibberish of a woman unhinged for the moment by the mad act of John Wilkes Booth.

The derringer that Booth used to shoot Lincoln—it was found in the presidential box only minutes after the stricken Lincoln was carried from the theater.

Instead of immediately fleeing, the actor could not resist one last melodramatic flourish to cap his awful deed. The stunned audience, not fully realizing that Lincoln had been shot, gasped as Booth held up his dagger and shouted to the spectators: "Sic Semper Tyrannis!" ("Thus shall it ever be for tyrants!") Actor Harry Hawks was on the stage at the moment Booth had fired the fatal shot into Lincoln and he stood there, petrified, as Booth, still brandishing the dagger, staggered across the stage, shouting: "The South is avenged!" He went past actress Laura Keene and William J. Ferguson, who were waiting to go on. Orchestra leader William Withers, Jr. stood directly in Booth's escape path and he made an attempt to stop the actor. Booth swiped at him with the knife, slashing Withers' coat but not cutting the flesh.

Booth escaped the theater through a back door where a boy held his horse; he is shown dashing away as one of the actors chases him; in truth, no one pursued him.

Suddenly, Booth burst through the rear door of the theater and hobbled to his horse, which "Peanuts" Burrough was faithfully holding. Burrough helped the injured actor into the saddle. He then dashed down the alley, heading for the Navy Yard Bridge and freedom. No one pursued him. From the moment Booth fired the fatal bullet into Lincoln to the time he mounted his fast horse in the alley behind the theater, no more than a few minutes had passed. He had made his escape long before the theater audience realized what he had done. Those in the audience were by then hysterical with screams and shouts of "Hang him! Hang Him!"

Several persons attempted to get into the hallway leading to the presidential box but Booth had barred the way. The wounded Rathbone staggered out of the presidential box, and, with one arm limp and gushing blood from a severed artery, managed to pull away Booth's crude barrier. One of the first Several doctors carrying Lincoln from Ford's Theater did not know where to take the unconscious President.

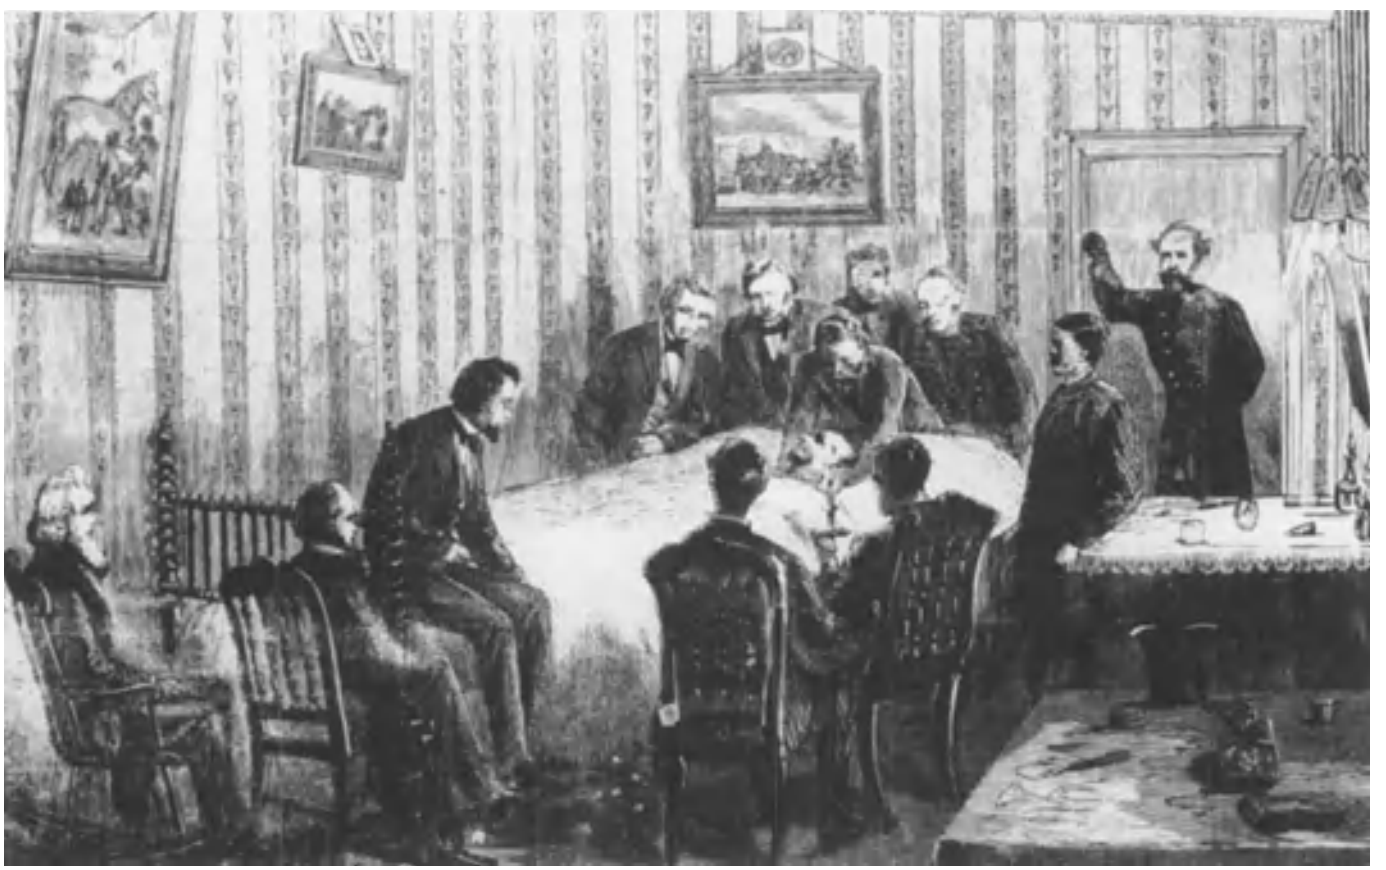
The Petersen House (center), opposite Ford's Theatre, where Lincoln was taken to the room of boarder William T. Clark.

through the door was Dr. Charles Augustus Leale, who had been sitting in the dress circle, only forty feet from the president's box. He had heard the shot and saw the athletic Booth jump to the stage, watching transfixed, as had everyone else as the actor raised his long knife, gleaming in the flickering jets of gaslight ringing the stage, to make his terrible proclamations.

Once in the hallway, Dr. Leale was stopped by Major Rathbone. He seemed to be half unconscious. Leale told Rathbone that he was a physician and the major held up his arm, saying: "Good. Can you help me? I have been wounded." (Rathbone would be wrongly profiled as unselfishly directing Leale to the presidential box to aid Lincoln first.) Leale could see through the open door to the box that it was Abraham Lincoln who needed the help. He brushed Rathbone aside and went to the president, telling Mary Lincoln that he was a doctor. She was supporting the unconscious Lincoln in the rocking chair and cried out to Leale: "Oh, doctor, do what you can for my dear husband. Is he dead? Can he recover?"

Dr. Leale, though only twenty-three, was a brilliant army surgeon, an expert at gunshot wounds. He saw that Lincoln was drawing breaths at long intervals. He had no pulse at the wrists and was paralyzed. Leale placed Lincoln on the floor and used a penknife to cut away his coat and collar. He then began searching for the wound, running his fingers through Lincoln's hair until he discovered a clot of blood behind the left ear. He removed the clot and inserted his little finger into the tunnel created by the bullet as far as it would go. He then removed his finger, allowing blood to ooze forth. Lincoln began to breathe more evenly and his pulse returned.

By now, another doctor, Charles Sabin Taft, also twenty-three, appeared in the box. He had been sitting in the orchestra and, hearing the cries from the box, leaped to the stage and was lifted upward toward the presidential box, climbing and scrambling over the railing to join Leale in a futile effort to save Lincoln's life. Leale massaged the president's chest and even breathed into his mouth and nostrils to fill the lungs,



With his cabinet chiefs surrounding him, Abraham Lincoln dies at the Petersen House at 7:22 a.m., April 15, 1865.

Co-conspirator Lewis Paine is shown knocking down family members while repeatedly attacking the ailing Secretary of State Seward in his sickbed.

ordering Dr. Taft to move Lincoln's arms up and down as he did so.

In these awful moments, the theater was consumed by pandemonium. Cries of "Kill him! Hang him! Get water! Get a doctor!" were everywhere. Dr. Leale worked frantically over Lincoln. Finally, he stood up, exhausted. "I can't save him," he half-sobbed to Dr. Taft. "His wound is mortal. It is impossible for him to recover." Some brandy was brought and a spoonful of this was passed over Lincoln's lips. He swallowed it. Twice more during the night he would be given brandy, ironic, in that Abraham Lincoln was a teetotaler. He hated liquor and had said throughout his life that it made him feel "flabby and undone." It would be the last thing he would ever taste.

Two more physicians entered the box and the four physicians carried Lincoln down the stairs through the dress circle and into the foyer where shocked crowds were held back by a line of soldiers. When reaching the street, one of the physicians said: "Where shall we take him?" A young man holding a candle stood across the street on the front porch of a three-story brick building, a boarding house owned by William Petersen, a German tailor. The young man, William Safford, who had been aroused from his sleep by the commotion in the street and had gone outside, moved the candle back and forth as a signal and shouted to the doctors: "Bring him in here!"

The wanted poster issued by Secretary of War Stanton.

Safford led the doctors and their bleeding burden to the cleanest room in the house, one meticulously kept by a young soldier, William T. Clark. Lincoln's six-foot-four-inch frame was placed upon a bed too short for him. Dr. Leale ordered that the end of the bed be broken off so that Lincoln could be stretched out. The president's boots were removed and a coverlet placed over him, but his feet protruded. Still too long for the bed, he was placed diagonally across it, two pillows placed under his head. For several hours, Lincoln would bleed into these two pillows.

The hunters (left to right)—Luther B. Baker, Colonel Lafayette Baker and Colonel E. J. Conger; how they located Booth (at the Garrett farm in Virginia) remains a mystery and later raised suspicions of collusion with Booth.

Mary Lincoln arrived, hysterical. She was told by the doctors that they were examining the president, reluctant to tell her that there was no hope. Dr. Leale knew it. He had carried Lincoln at the head when he was moved into Petersen's boarding house. He now looked down to see his hands coated with the president's blood and brain tissue. He slowly washed his hands and told the other physicians to make Lincoln as comfortable as possible.

As Mary Lincoln was ushered down a hall to a sitting room, she had to step over Major Rathbone, who had arrived with her and collapsed from loss of blood. He was car-

Booth leans on a crutch and holds a carbine, trapped in a burning barn before being fatally shot.

The mortally wounded Booth is dragged by Union soldiers from the burning barn on the Garrett farm.

Cradling Booth's head, Colonel Conger offers the dying assassin water; he then rifled Booth's pockets, returning to Washington to deliver the assassin's diary to Lafayette Baker.

Sergeant Boston Corbett (left), who shot Booth (against orders), and Lieutenant Edward P. Doherty; both received reward money.

ried to another room where his arm was bound. Rathbone would survive, marry his stepsister, Clara Harris, and later become a foreign consul, posted to Hanover, Germany. He would live there with his wife and their three children, growing unbalanced. In 1894, jealous over the attentions his wife gave to their children, he murdered Clara and was confined in an asylum for the criminally insane, dying in 1911. One account held that on his deathbed, Rathbone called out: "The man with the knife! I can't stop him! I can't stop him!"

There were others who had tried to stop John Wilkes Booth on that terrible night in Washington. Several actors tried to run after Booth, but were themselves stopped by Edward Spangler, the theater carpenter and Booth's close friend. It was said that Spangler had hated Lincoln and that on the very afternoon of the assassination he had said to John "Peanut"

Booth's weighted body is shown being dumped at night into the Potomac, a report that turned out to be a lie spread by Secretary Stanton.

Burrough that Lincoln "ought to be shot for getting all those men killed in the war." Spangler, investigators quickly learned, had helped the Booths build Tudor Hall, the family retreat.

It was later claimed that Spangler had been part of the conspiracy, and, as carpenter, it was he, not Booth, who had made the barrier inside the hall leading to the presidential box. Further, it was said, Spangler had drilled the peephole through which Booth could see his prey. Within minutes of Booth's escape, several officers went backstage and arrested Spangler, taking him to prison. He protested, saying he had no idea that Booth had killed Lincoln, that he had merely tried to keep the actors from injuring Booth because he had interrupted the play. His story seemed implausible.

At the same time that Booth was climbing the stairs to the mezzanine of Ford's Theatre to kill Lincoln, Lewis Paine made his way to the home of Secretary of State William Henry Seward, guided to that home by David Herold, who had delivered medicine to Seward from the drugstore where he worked. Paine told Herold to hide in the bushes near the house while he went inside and murdered Seward. The giant Paine then boldly walked through the unlocked front door of the house. His prey, Seward, was upstairs recuperating from a carriage accident that had occurred only a week earlier, one causing him a broken arm and shattered jaw. He now lay with a heavy cast on his arm and one around his head, the latter cast made with metal wire, a painful contraption designed by his homeopathic doctor, Tullio Suzzaro Verdi, but one that would save his life.

As Paine entered the Seward home, he held onto a package, ponderously climbing up the staircase, his giant frame making a heavy thudding sound as he went upward. At the top of the staircase, he was greeted by Frederick Seward, the secretary's oldest son, who emerged from his father's bedroom, closing the door behind him. Paine explained that he had brought the ailing Seward medicine and that he had been instructed to personally deliver it to the secretary by Dr. Verdi. Frederick Seward told the hulking giant that his father was sleeping and he was much too sick to accept medicine at that time.

Paine insisted that he see the secretary. Frederick Seward then ordered him from the house. Paine turned to leave, then wheeled about with a pistol in his hand. He placed this next to the head of the startled Seward and pulled the trigger, but it misfired. Paine then used the butt of the gun as a hammer, bringing his huge arm down many times as he slammed the pistol butt onto Seward's head, cracking the skull and knocking Seward to the floor unconscious where he lay, blood streaming over his face.

Paine then withdrew a large knife from the package and entered the secretary's bedroom. He found it dark inside, the Booth's remains being buried beneath paving stones in the Old Arsenal Building; the body was later released to Booth's relatives.

The conspirators (Mrs. Surratt at right), were shrouded with hoods and taken to the gunboat, Saugus, then moved to the Old Capitol Prison and held in solitary confinement.

The courtroom where a military tribunal denied defendant attorneys rights and procedures in an eight-week trial.

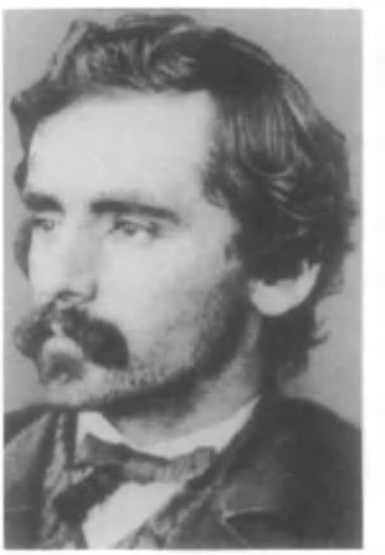
Mary Surratt, 48, sentenced to death.

Lewis Paine, 20, sentenced to death.

George Atzerodt, 33, sentenced to death.

David E. Herold, 23, sentenced to death.

Samuel B. Arnold, 28, sent to prison.



Michael O'Laughin, 27, sent to prison.

Edman Spangler, sent to prison.

Dr. Samuel A. Mudd, 31, sent to prison.

John H. Surratt, 20, escaped.

John H. Surratt as a Papal Zouave, 1866; he was later found in Egypt and returned for trial.

gas jet having been turned down. Inside the room was Seward's young daughter, Fanny, and a male military nurse, George T. Robinson. When Robinson saw Paine enter and brandishing the knife, he leaped to his feet and rushed the giant. Paine slashed him across the forehead and knocked him to the floor. Fanny Seward ran forward and Paine punched her so hard that she fell backward unconscious. Paine then threw himself on Seward's bed, bringing the knife down again and again on the injured and helpless secretary. He held his left hand on Seward's chest and slashed with the right, cutting Seward many times in the neck and head above the protective metal cast. He slashed open Seward's cheek so that a hole was made and Seward's bloody tongue could be seen.

Seward rolled off the bed, dragging the sheets with him and around him. Just then Robinson, who had regained his senses, jumped on the bed and attacked Paine, slamming his fists against the giant who laughed madly at him before driving the knife into Robinson's shoulder, striking the bone. But Robinson would not quit and he wrestled Paine to the floor. The two men fought, rolling backward and out of the door to the landing. The commotion awoke another son of the secretary, Major Augustus Seward, who ran from his bedroom to see Robinson struggling with Paine and his brother Frederick bleeding and still unconscious on the floor nearby. Augustus Seward rushed forward and tried to pull Robinson off Paine, thinking Robinson had gone mad and was attacking an innocent stranger. Robinson shouted: "For God's sake, Major! Let go of me and take the knife out of his hand and cut his throat!"

Paine stood up and glanced back into the secretary's bedroom and then gave up the idea of returning to his prey. Augustus Seward, realizing his mistake, lunged at the giant, grabbing him. Paine slashed at Augustus Seward, striking his forehead and hand and drawing blood. Paine then jumped backward and bounded down the stairs. As the assassin reached the bottom of the stairs he was met by a messenger from the State Department, who had just entered through the front door. Paine slashed at the man's face, knocked him down and shouted before fleeing: "I am mad! I am mad!"

Robinson and Augustus Seward then rushed into the secretary's bedroom and gently lifted him back onto his bed, removing his bloody clothes and bandaging his wounds. Robinson listened for a heartbeat. Suddenly, the secretary opened his eyes and said: "I am not dead. Send for a surgeon. Send for the police. Close the house." He and everyone in the Seward household would survive. What immediately vexed the Sewards was how the assassin knew that Dr. Verdi was treating the secretary and that he knew enough to use the physician's name when entering the Seward home. Verdi, who later arrived to attend Seward, could offer no explanation. It was later assumed that the conspirator, Herold, the clerk in the drugstore was familiar with Dr. Verdi because he had delivered medicine to the Seward home on previous occasions.

David Herold was the weakest link in the plot to kill Lincoln and others in his administration. Paine had often complained to Booth that the dim-witted youth could not be trusted. "He's a blab," Paine told Booth, "and he will give us away without even knowing it." When Paine rushed from the Seward home, he cursed Herold. Instead of waiting for Paine, as instructed, he bolted at the first sounds of a fight coming from the house. Herold mounted his horse and wildly rode after Booth, knowing the escape route the actor intended to take over the Navy Yard Bridge that led to Maryland.

Finding Herold gone, Paine mounted his own horse and galloped into the darkness, but he had no particular destination in mind. Only Herold knew where to meet Booth. Paine could only guess where Booth and Herold had gone. He somehow slipped past the sentries posted at the outskirts of the city, moving about aimlessly for three days. He returned to Washington, D.C., and went straight to the boarding house operated by Mrs. Mary Surratt, mother of John Surratt, co-conspirator in the plot to murder Abraham Lincoln. When Paine arrived at the Surratt house, a squad of soldiers arrested him and threw him in jail. They were tipped by Booth's friend, John Matthews. Mrs. Surratt was also arrested as a conspirator simply because Paine had come to her house.

(Left to right) Mary Surratt, Lewis Paine, David Herold and George Atzerodt are hooded and tied while on the gallows.

Booth, meanwhile, rode wildly from Washington that night. As he approached the Navy Yard Bridge, he was stopped by a lone guard, Sergeant Silas T. Cobb, who later described the actor as looking "restive and uneasy." Cobb asked his name and the actor replied: "My name is Booth." He then told Cobb that he was en route to his home in Charles County, Maryland.

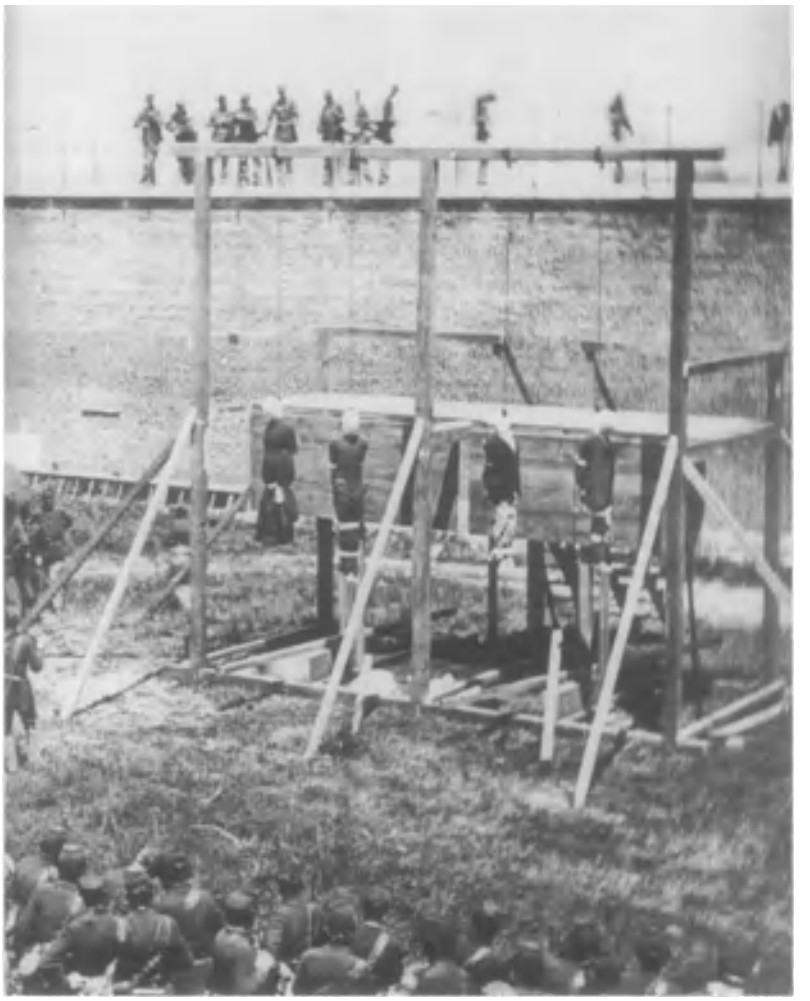
"Don't you know the rule that persons are not allowed to pass [out of the city] after nine o'clock?" said Cobb.

"That's new to me," replied Booth. "I had somewhere to go in the city and I thought that I'd have the moon to ride home by, but the night is dark."

This cryptic remark went unchallenged. Cobb then lifted the police barrier at the bridge and waved Booth through. "I thought him a proper person to pass, so I passed him," Cobb later stated.

A few minutes later another horseman galloped up to the bridge. Cobb stopped this young man who gave his name as "Smith." He told Cobb that he was going home and that he had been "in bad company," one of the great understatements in the annals of crime. He was David Herold and he had been in the company of assassins. Cobb let Herold pass, too. The youth rode over the bridge to Anacostia. Some minutes after Herold departed a third rider galloped to the bridge. He told Cobb that his name was John Fletcher and he was chasing a young man who had hired a horse from him earlier that day, promising to return it in a few hours. He had not returned the animal and when Fletcher had seen Herold wildly ride toward the bridge, he gave pursuit. He wanted his horse back, he told Sergeant Cobb.

Where Cobb quickly allowed Booth and Herold to pass, he refused to let Fletcher cross the bridge. Said Cobb later: "He did not seem to have any business on the other side of the bridge of sufficient importance to pass him, so I turned him back." All the while, Cobb was to insist that he was ignorant of the terrible events in Washington that night and that he had no idea that President Lincoln had been fatally shot and that Secretary of State Seward had been attacked.



The trap is pulled and the four condemned prisoners are hanged; their bodies were left dangling for some time; Mary Surratt (body at left) was most probably innocent.

When Booth reached Anacostia he waited at a prearranged rendezvous for Herold and Paine. In a plan made earlier, the trio would ride south through Maryland, then cross over into Virginia and take refuge in the broken Confederacy, where, Booth was confident, they would surely be hailed as heroes. Herold arrived in Anacostia, giving no explanation of Paine's fate. He admitted that he had lost his nerve and fled when hearing Seward's maid scream: "Murder! Murder!"

Booth and Herold then rode to the tiny hamlet of Surrattsville, Maryland, where Mrs. Surratt owned a small hotel. While Booth remained on his horse, complaining that his injured leg was too painful to allow him to dismount, Herold ran into the hotel, which was operated by John M. Lloyd. Herold asked Lloyd to fetch the items left for Mr. Booth. Earlier that day, according to some reports, Mrs. Surratt had driven a carriage to the hotel and had left a pair of binoculars for Booth. She had not taken a trip to Surrattsville to simply deliver the glasses. Mrs. Surratt had business at her hotel and had mentioned her intended trip to Booth, who asked her to deliver the binoculars as long as she was making the trip. More items intended for Booth had been left at the hotel, including two carbines with ammunition, a monkey wrench, a coil of rope, and a bottle of whiskey. These items had been left there two weeks earlier by John H. Surratt.

Lloyd retrieved these items, handing over only one carbine to Herold. Booth said he could not carry the other carbine on his horse because it would have too much weight and its scabbard would annoy his left ankle. He and Herold sat silently on their horses for about five minutes, drinking from the bottle of whiskey. Booth knew that Lloyd was a southern sympathizer and he could no longer contain himself. He was anxious to announce to anyone who would appreciate the news, that he had assassinated Abraham Lincoln.

"I'll tell you some news, if you want to hear it," Booth said to Lloyd. "I am pretty certain that we have sacrificed the president and secretary Seward." He apparently could not bring himself to use the distasteful word "assassinated."

Lloyd later stated that he knew nothing of the plot to murder Lincoln. He merely handed over items that had been stored for Booth and he vaguely remembered the actor's boastful remarks about "sacrificing" the president and the secretary of state. He claimed that he was drunk when Booth and Herold arrived: "I was right smart in liquor that afternoon and after night I got more so."

Booth and Herold, fortified by the whiskey, then rode through the night, going south. At about 5 a.m., Booth told Herold that he was suffering great pain and intended to get medical attention for his broken ankle by visiting a physician he knew, Dr. Samuel Mudd, who lived about three miles from Beantown. A short time later, Booth and Herold awoke Dr. Mudd, who cut away Booth's left boot and set the ankle bone. He affixed small splints and bandaged the foot and leg. He then fashioned a crudely-made set of crutches for Booth. Before leaving the Mudd farm, Booth borrowed a razor from the doctor and cut off his mustache. He paid Mudd $25 and left hurriedly with Herold.

That visit would later cause Dr. Mudd to be sent to prison for life, and to this day, controversy still rages over his guilt or innocence. Mudd later claimed that he did not know Booth, who arrived wearing a red wig, and that he never did get a clear look at him, Herold having brought Booth to a bedroom where he lay with his face to a wall while Mudd set and bandaged his leg. Yet, it is certain that Mudd did meet and know Booth and, in fact, had introduced John H. Surratt, the Confederate spy, to Booth some time in late 1864.

Major Thomas T. Eckert; Stanton would not allow this strongman to accompany Lincoln to Ford's Theatre, saying Eckert was too busy that night, but Eckert was at home shaving.

About the time Booth left Mudd's farm, Abraham Lincoln, who never regained consciousness, was lying in the Petersen house in Washington. At 7:22 a.m, April 15, 1865, he died. Seated patiently about his deathbed were members of his cabinet. When a physician pronounced the Great Emancipator dead, Secretary of War Edwin McMasters Stanton reportedly intoned: "Now he belongs to the ages."

The hunt for Booth was by then intensive and widespread as the fugitives rode south to Cox's Station where Samuel Cox, a southern sympathizer, hid Booth and Herold for some time. Booth's leg worsened each day, infection setting in and causing the leg to swell. Booth drank a good deal of whiskey to subdue the pain and then continued his journey southward, Herold at his side. He finally reached Port Royal, forded the Rhappahannock River and crossed into Virginia. He was by then aided in his escape by several ex-Confederate soldiers, reaching the farm of Richard Garrett, another southern sympathizer. En route to his destination, Booth sent at least two messages by wire either to New York or Washington, ostensibly to friends in high places, letting them know his general whereabouts. What information those messages contained was never made known, but it was believed that Booth thought that he had been betrayed by certain conspirators who had helped finance the assassination, and that he threatened to reveal information unless he was guaranteed help and safe passage out of the country.

Thousands of troops and scores of detectives were hunting for Booth and as much as $100,000 had been offered for his capture, preferably dead, according to Stanton. Lincoln's volatile, unpredictable and ruthless secretary of war had taken the reins of government, establishing what amounted to martial law. His men had rounded up the conspirators quickly, all except Booth, Herold and the mysterious John H. Surratt. Leading the chase was Colonel Lafayette Baker, head of the U.S. Secret Service and Stanton's personal bloodhound. Baker pinpointed Booth's escape route by picking up those who had aided him and from information by certain witnesses, especially ex-slaves, who had seen him along the route to Port Royal, or, at least, this is the story Baker later released.

Though thousands of men were hunting for Booth, Baker selected a small contingent of twenty-five troopers and placed Lieutenant Edward P. Doherty at their head. Doherty was told by Baker that his cousin, Luther B. Baker, a detective, and Colonel Edverton J. Conger would be in actual command and that Doherty would take strict orders from them. Baker pointed Doherty and his men in the direction of Port Royal. This group took a boat down the Potomac and then rode straight for Garrett's farm, following Colonel Baker's directions. He seemed to know exactly where Booth was hiding. Doherty's contingent reached the Garrett farm on the evening of April 16, 1865. At their approach, Booth and Herold had fled to a small tobacco barn. The Union troops quickly surrounded the small building.

Luther Baker shouted to both men that if they did not immediately come out of the barn, the building would be burned to the ground.

"Let us have a little time to consider it!" shouted Booth from inside the barn.

"I'll give you five minutes," said Baker.

Booth did not wait that long before shouting: "Captain, I know you to be a brave man, and I believe you to be honorable. I am a cripple. I have got but one leg. If you will withdraw your men in one line one hundred yards from the door [of the barn], I will come out and fight you!"

"We will do no such thing!" Baker shouted back.

"Well, my boys," replied Booth, "prepare a stretcher for me...one more stain on the old banner!"

Inside the barn, the timid Herold trembled with fear. He pleaded with Booth to surrender, telling him that he did not want to die. The soldiers outside then heard Booth shout at Herold: "You damned coward! Will you leave me now? Go, go, I would not have you stay with me!" Then Booth shouted to the troopers: "There's a man in here who wants to come out!"

The barn door opened slightly. Herold, his body trembling, slipped outside and put his hands into the air, surrendering. He was quickly dragged away. As Booth remained silent, Baker ordered the soldiers to pile dry brush around the barn and set fire to it. The brush blazed up in a few minutes and some of the contents in the barn quickly caught fire, illuminating the inside. Colonel Conger peered through a crack and saw Booth hobbling about inside the barn, resting on one crutch and holding a carbine in the other hand. He approached the barn door and appeared to use the carbine. At that moment a shot rang out and Booth fell, a bullet in his head.

Soldiers rushed into the barn and dragged the assassin outside. He was taken to the porch of the Garrett home and there he lingered for two and a half hours. Before dying, Booth stated: "Tell my mother I died for my country." Then he whispered: "I did what I thought best." Ironically, the bullet that had been sent into Booth's head followed the same path as that which had struck Lincoln. Booth asked Conger to hold up his arms so that he could look at his delicate hands. He blinked at them and then said: "Useless...useless." He then died as dawn broke over the Garrett farm.

Conger and Baker were visibly upset by Booth's death. They had been ordered by Colonel Baker to return the culprit to Washington alive, or so they later claimed. Conger then ordered the troopers to form a line, asking which one of them had shot Booth. Sergeant Boston Corbett stepped forward and said calmly: "Colonel, Providence directed me." Corbett was a religious fanatic, Conger knew, and he also knew that Corbett had been hand-picked by Lafayette Baker, who had, in turn, taken his orders from Stanton. Conger stared at Corbett for some time and finally said: "I will leave the matter in the hands of Providence—and the secretary of war."

Colonel Lafayette Baker, head of an abusive secret police, who proved to be a liar, a cheat, and an extortionist; he later tried to blackmail President Johnson on Stanton's behalf.

Conger himself had more important orders to carry out. He immediately rifled the coat and pants pockets of the dead Booth. He found a compass, a stub of a candle, several photos of actresses, and, most important, Booth's diary. It was the diary that Conger sought. As soon as he glanced through the diary, he mounted his horse and galloped to Belle Plain where he took a steamer to Washington. He locked himself in a cabin and one report had it that Colonel Conger, knowing the dangerous information contained in that diary, copied it page for page.

When arriving in Washington, Conger immediately reported to Lafayette Baker, turning over all the contents found in Booth's pockets to the Secret Service chief. Baker, in Conger's presence, carefully examined the items, paying particular attention to Booth's diary, counting the number of pages in that small book, before he took this and the other personal effects of the assassin to Edwin McMasters Stanton.

Stanton was then the busiest man in Washington. He had ordered a military trial for the conspirators—Atzerodt, Paine, Herold, Mrs. Surratt, Arnold, O'Laughlin, Spangler and Mudd. All eight suspects were held under inhuman conditions. They were forced to wear specially made head bags with only a hole for the mouth. Stanton's reason for this was to prevent them from talking with anyone before their trial, or so he said. The military tribunal quickly found all guilty. Paine, Atzerodt, Herold and Mrs. Surratt were sentenced to death. Arnold, O'Laughlin and Mudd were sentenced to life terms and Spangler received a sentence of six years. Dr. Mudd was instrumental in saving many lives during a prison epidemic and was pardoned by President Andrew Johnson in 1868. Arnold was paroled in 1869. O'Laughlin died in prison.

The military tribunal that judged the prisoners was later harshly criticized for not allowing the defense proper preparation. Moreover, the evidence against Mrs. Surratt was flimsy at best. That she had delivered a pair of binoculars to her small hotel in Surrattsville and Paine was arrested while entering her boarding house were the most significant factors in convicting her. That, and, of course, she was the mother of John H. Surratt, who had yet to be found. Paine repeatedly insisted that Mrs. Surratt was innocent (even while on the gallwos), but his word was that of a convicted assassin.

Colonel Lafayette Baker later stated that he had visited Mrs. Surratt in her prison cell and there she admitted her complicity to him. Baker's statement, however, was never supported by anyone else. Secretary Stanton had, however, decreed Mrs. Surratt's guilt, along with the others. On July 7, 1865, Mrs. Surratt, Atzerodt, Paine and Herold were taken to the courtyard of the Old Arsenal Building with its high brick wall. There a long, high scaffold had been built. The four were escorted up the steep stairs. While ministers gave them last counsel, Mrs. Surratt, overcome by the heat, sat beneath an umbrella. Atzerodt and Herold quaked and cried. Paine silently accepted his fate, saying in the last moment that Mrs. Surratt was innocent and did not deserve her miserable fate. The four were then hooded and bound and a long trap door was released, sending all four downward to jerking eternity. That left only one conspirator at large—John H. Surratt.

This mysterious young man had evaded detection by fleeing to Canada immediately after Lincoln's murder. He then went to England and then to Italy where he joined the Papal Zouaves, elite guards of the Pope, using the alias of John Watson at the time. A fellow guard learned of his true identity and informed U.S. authorities, who arrested him on November 8, 1866, but he managed to escape and flee to Egypt. He was located in Alexandria, Egypt, and returned to the U.S., where on June 10, 1867, he stood trial for murdering Lincoln. New evidence was revealed at the trial and more evidence was apparently suppressed. Surratt admitted that he had been part of Booth's plot to abduct Lincoln, but he had nothing to do with the murder and he produced four witnesses who swore that Surratt was in Elmira, New York., on the night of the assassination.

Secretary of War Edwin McMasters Stanton, who ran the country like a dictator following Lincoln's death; he falsified and hid evidence, later refusing to leave office when fired by President Johnson.

Surratt was surprisingly acquitted and released. Ironically, his defense attorneys were friends of Secretary Stanton. Perhaps, there was no irony in the relationship. Stanton had himself acted suspiciously from the first moment Booth had fired his fatal shot. In fact, Stanton had acted strangely before the assassination. Lincoln had asked Stanton to attend the theater with him that night, but Stanton said he would be busy. Lincoln walked to the Telegraph Office on the afternoon of his death and there asked Stanton if he would "loan" him the services of Major Thomas Eckert, a towering man who routinely broke pokers over his arm to prove his incredible strength. Stanton refused to allow Eckert to attend the theater with Lincoln, telling the president that his chief of the Telegraph Office was "too busy" to go to the theater. This proved to be an outright lie. Eckert was at home that night, shaving, when he heard Lincoln had been shot, or so he later said.

General Ulysses S. Grant had also been asked to accompany Lincoln to the theater that night, but on the advice of Stanton, had politely refused, and had gone to visit his daughter in New Jersey. Stanton later explained that he had advised Grant not to attend the theater with Lincoln since he had heard of serious assassination plots and that he, Stanton, did not wish to risk the loss of both Lincoln and Grant in the event that the rumors might be true. No one ever dared challenge Stanton's reasoning in asking why, if such rumors were taken seriously enough by Stanton to cause him to ask Grant to leave town that the secretary did not also prevent Lincoln from attending the theater, or, at least, provide sufficient protection for the president at the theater.

Stanton did take other precautions, but these were strange orders. He decreed that all the entrances and exits to and from Washington be closed on the day of the assassination, yet Booth and Herold were allowed to flee the city that night across the Navy Yard Bridge that night. Stranger still, all of the telegraph lines leading from the city were shut down for no apparent reason on the very hour of Lincoln's assassination, telegraph lines that were under the direct control of Major Eckert. Was this the reason why Booth kept going in and out of Ford's Theater that night, to meet someone who would inform him that the lines had been shut down? One report described the man on horseback who met briefly with Booth on Tenth Street only minutes before Booth shot Lincoln. This man was tall, burly and wearing civilian clothes, but from the description, he could very well have been Major Thomas Eckert, later General Eckert and assistant secretary of war. Eckert rose even higher, becoming president of Western Union.

Stanton had told Lincoln that he could not attend the theater that night because he had work to do, but this was another lie. He went home early to have dinner. He then paid a visit to Secretary Seward to politely inquire as to his condition, departing only a few minutes before Paine burst through Seward's door. This was an odd visit in that Stanton had little or no regard for Seward. It was Stanton who picked Lafayette Baker to track down Booth, somehow knowing that Baker would be able to find Booth where thousands of others had failed. No one other than Booth and Herold knew the assassin's escape route, or so it was reported, but Baker was easily able to find the needle in the haystack. Booth himself, perhaps, told Baker (or Stanton) where he was located when he sent those two wires to New York and Washington, if it can be believed that Stanton was, indeed, behind the assassination, as some have claimed.

Once Baker and Colonel Conger delivered Booth's diary to Stanton, the diary remained with the secretary for almost two years, and he refused to turn it over for inspection until ordered to do so by the U.S. attorney general on the occasion of Surratt's trial. At that time, eighteen pages were found missing from the diary. Stanton denied having removed these pages, but Lafayette Baker insisted, as did Colonel Conger, that the diary was intact when they turned it over to Stanton in 1865. This left only one conclusion in the minds of many. Stanton had removed pages that would somehow incriminate him in the plot to kill Abraham Lincoln.

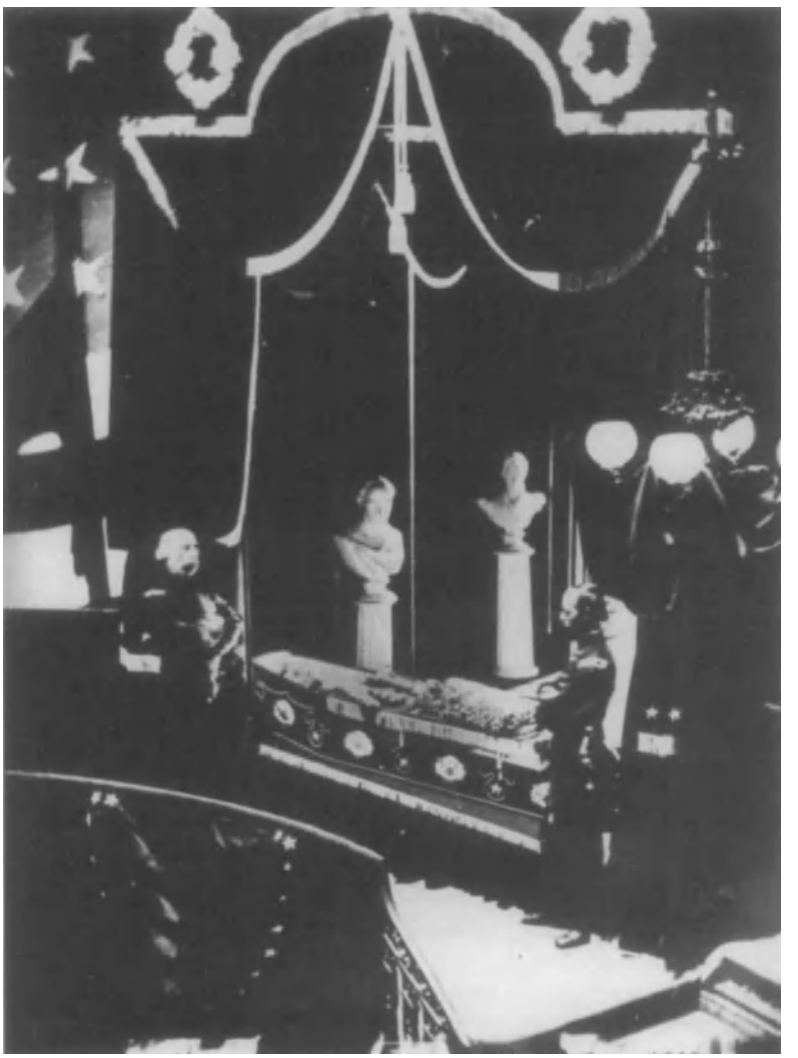
It was later claimed that Stanton removed pages from Booth's diary that clearly indicated Mrs. Surratt's innocence, that she had had nothing to do with the plot, thus compromising his railroading case against Mary Surratt, who became the first woman ever officially hanged in the U.S. One report claimed that Stanton actually framed evidence against Mrs. Surratt and refused to allow her daughter Annie to petition President Andrew Johnson for clemency until it was too late to save the woman.

The removing of pages from Booth's diary was only one inexplicable action taken by the secretary of war. His conduct in almost all matters involving Lincoln's assassination was strange, if not suspicious. He ordered the rocking chair in which Lincoln had been sitting when shot brought from Ford's Theatre. He kept the chair in his office, next to his desk, for several years to come, and would stare endlessly at it. When he learned that several photos of Lincoln had been taken in his casket, Stanton ordered all these photos destroyed. One, a glass plate photo, was found in Stanton's estate long after the secretary had died.



The only known photo of Abraham Lincoln in his casket, a photo (like all such others) Stanton either confiscated or destroyed.

All of those surrounding Stanton in these affairs benefitted greatly. Colonel Baker of the Secret Service was rewarded for his efforts in tracking down Booth. He was not only given a large portion of the reward, but he was promoted to the rank of general. Conger, who delivered Booth's diary to Stanton via Baker, received the largest share of the reward ($15,000) and a promotion. He was later named a federal judge through Stanton's efforts. Colonel James O'Beirne also received a reward, $3,000, and he, too, was promoted to the rank of general. This was a strange reward and promotion, indeed, since O'Beirne was nowhere near the Garrett farm at the time of Booth's capture and death. He was at that time leading a cavalry troop in Maryland. Baker, Conger and O'Beirne were not really military men. They were all detectives working for Stanton and all of them operated under secret orders from the secretary of state and all of these men had very shady backgrounds.

Lafayette Baker later tried to blackmail President Andrew Johnson on Stanton's behalf and, though he was initially protected by Stanton, was finally forced to resign his post. He later insisted that a secret cabal was trying to kill him. He either committed suicide or was poisoned to death a few years later, but not before leaving cryptic messages that pointed to a conspiracy in Lincoln's death that went far beyond that involving Booth. Stanton, himself, for all his feigned allegiance to Lincoln, had little affection for the president. He feared that following Lee's surrender, Lincoln's reconstruction program would be too lenient toward the South.

Stanton, an avowed abolitionist, wanted revenge. He wanted the South prostrated, impoverished and kept in ruins. And in that helpless state, without economic and political strength, it would be easy pickings for Northern predatory land grabbers, many of whom were Stanton's closest friends. Many came to believe that it was Stanton to whom Robert Lincoln referred to years later when he was found burning some of his father's correspondence. A family friend tried to prevent Lincoln's only surviving son from destroying these historic documents. Robert Lincoln was quoted as saying to the friend: "I must—some of these letters prove that there was a traitor in my father's cabinet."

There was also terrible vengeance (if not self-protection) evident in Stanton's handling of Booth's body. He took meticulous pains to have the body brought from Garrett's farm and placed aboard an ironclad warship riding at anchor in the Potomac. Here, the corpse was identified. It was reportedly weighted and then dumped into the river. This was an outright lie planted by Stanton, who had the body buried under huge stones in the Old Arsenal Building, the site where the four conspirators were later hanged. It was several years later when the body was finally released to Booth family members for reburial in their family plot.

A mummified body reported to be that of John Wilkes Booth, toured in sideshows by its owner, who insisted Booth had escaped.

In the graying decades following the assassination, spectacular claims were made about Booth. One held that he had not been killed at the Garrett farm and that someone else had been shot by the fanatical Boston Corbett. Booth had supposedly escaped, perhaps with the connivance of Stanton or others, to Europe and then to South America, before returning to the U.S., where he died peacefully in the southwest decades later. A mummified corpse was later displayed in a traveling carnival, its promotion-minded owner insisting that the grim remains were that of the notorious Booth.

The true events surrounding Lincoln's assassination may never emerge. They are hopelessly muddled now by time and the machinations of powerful persons, who apparently preferred to martyr one of America's greatest leaders rather than see him fulfill his noble goals. A century later, another American president, John Fitzgerald Kennedy, would meet an almost identical fate, a death that would also be attributed to an evil cabal and create an endless search for the identities of those shadowy creatures whose dark ambitions demanded his life.

"I AM GOING TO THE LORDY"/July 2, 1881

James Abram Garfield (1831-1881), the twentieth president of the United States, was, like Lincoln, best remembered for his service during the Civil War. Unlike Lincoln, his assassination was not brought about by an insidious conspiracy. He was the victim of a lone political crackpot, a mentally deranged malcontent whose obvious insanity did not prevent him from meeting the hangman. Born near Orange, Ohio, Garfield became a teacher and was later master of Hiram College. He left this position at the outbreak of the war, organizing a contingent of volunteers to fight for the Union cause in 1861. He became a major general in 1863, having distinguished himself in the western battles of Shiloh and Chickamauga.

President James Abram Garfield, assassinated in 1881, while he was unguarded.

During the war, Garfield ran for Congress and was elected to the House of Representatives (1863-1880). In 1876, he became Republican leader of the House and was in opposition to President Ulysses S. Grant. In 1880, Garfield was a compromise candidate for the presidency, selected by the powerful political bosses, James G. Blaine and John Sherman to replace Grant, who was then running for a third term.

Garfield took office amidst loud claims that he was nothing more than a machine politician dedicated to massive patronage systems wherein political cronies and hacks of the Republican Party were rewarded with cushy administration positions. One of those insisting on just such a job was a weird, vainglorious man named Charles Julius Guiteau. Born in Illinois in 1844, Guiteau was a self-taught lawyer who, as a young man, married a 16-year-old girl. He quickly abandoned her when she failed to provide income for the lofty lifestyle Guiteau insisted he deserved. He practiced in the small claims courts of Illinois and New York, keeping most of the settlements as fees. Degrees in law were arbitrary accouterments in Guiteau's day. Any charlatan could put up a shingle and claim to be a lawyer. Guiteau was one of these.

Charles Guiteau, who murdered Garfield when failing to receive an ambassadorship.

All who encountered this strange man realized that his mental faculties were seriously in question. He used the small claims courts to shriek out his views about American politics and life in general. Judges dreaded his appearances and his outlandish tirades routinely caused him to be held in contempt of court. On one occasion, he had to be dragged away by court officials because he refused to stop his screaming invectives. He was himself constantly being sued in small claims courts for failing to pay his rent and other bills. Further, he was constantly being sued by creditors he claimed were persecuting him for his political views.

A man without purpose, Guiteau drifted in and out of professional pursuits. At one time he was an evangelist, joining the Oneida Community, remaining a member of the sect from 1861 through 1865, espousing a sort of religious communism. In the 1870s, Guiteau embraced Moody-Sankey revivalism and took to lecturing on the Second Coming, but, as with the Oneida movement, he soon became bored and disinterested with this religious group. He then became an insurance salesman and flopped. He tried his hand at publishing and failed at this, too. Moving to Washington, D.C., Guiteau patronized street prostitutes and contracted syphilis. This may have developed into paresis of the brain—a common side effect of the illness—and caused his already confused mind to become even more addled.

In 1880, Guiteau went to work as a political errand boy for Roscoe Conkling, who was attempting to nominate Grant once more for the presidency. Halfway through the campaign, Guiteau switched his allegiance to Garfield. He followed the candidate from city to city, living hand-to-mouth. He wrote an erratic, almost incomprehensible speech, titled Garfield Against Hancock, and personally delivered this to Garfield at a Republican gathering at the Fifth Avenue Hotel in New York City. Guiteau at the time insisted that Garfield employ his speech in an upcoming debate with General Winfield Scott Hancock, the Democratic candidate. Garfield never used the speech and may never have read it. To Garfield, Guiteau was just another leaflet-passer among thousands. Guiteau, however, came to believe that he alone was swaying the American public in Garfield's favor.

Guiteau (left) is shown shooting President Garfield in the Washington, D.C. train station, July 2, 1881.

Guiteau made impromptu speeches on Garfield's behalf on street corners of New York and Washington. He shrieked, screamed and ranted out his political beliefs and was ignored as a raving crackpot. When Garfield was elected, Guiteau took credit for his victory, telling everyone who would listen: "The general is in the White House because of me." He boldly went to the White House, delivering a message to the president, one which asked that he be named ambassador to Austria. He then changed his mind and demanded that he be named head of the U.S. consulate in Paris.

The wounded Garfield is assisted by Secretary Blaine, while Guiteau is taken into custody.

By this time, Guiteau was consumed by his ambition to become ambassador to France and he badgered Garfield and Blaine, insisting that he receive the appointment. He barged into the offices of both the president and Blaine, then secretary of state, making these demands, but he was politely rebuffed. Access to the president in that era was an easy thing. Even though President Lincoln had been assassinated sixteen years earlier because of lax security, there were no guards in and about the White House during Garfield's day. Security was maintained by a few unarmed clerks. Anyone wanting to harm the president could freely enter the White House and attack the chief executive.

Guiteau was not taken seriously as a real threat to the president's safety. He was thought to be just another political

Mrs. White gives comfort to Garfield as he waits for an ambulance.

hack who served as an annoyance, a pest who was finally put in his place by Secretary of State Blaine. When Guiteau confronted Blaine in his office in May 1881, again demanding the appointment to France, Blaine shoved the little, dark-bearded man away, saying: "Never speak to me about the Paris Embassy as long as you live!"

The offended Guiteau returned to his small room at the Riggs Hotel in Washington and there brooded about what he might do. He first thought to murder Garfield. "An impression came over my mind like a flash," he later recalled, "that if the president was out of the way, this whole thing would be solved and everything would go well." Then he reconsidered his impulse and, instead, on May 22, 1881, sent Garfield a letter, asking that Blaine be ousted from his post.

Guiteau under arrest and being escorted to jail, telling guards he had friends in high places.

When he received no response from Garfield, Guiteau resolved to murder the president, coming to believe that God had instructed him to kill the chief executive. He later recalled: "At the end of two weeks, my mind was thoroughly fixed as to the necessity of the president's removal and the divinity of that inspiration." Borrowing $15 from a cousin who lived in Washington, Guiteau purchased a California Bulldozer .44-caliber revolver, along with a box of cartridges. He practiced his marksmanship by shooting at trees lined along the Potomac River during the evening when no one was about.

Guiteau then began to stalk the president, who walked about Washington unescorted by guards. He was easily able to track Garfield since the local press naively printed the president's daily schedule, specifying the locations he would visit. Newspapers stated that the president would be going on an extended tour, leaving by train from the Baltimore and Potomac Depot on July 2, 1881. Early that morning, Guiteau had breakfast, dressed leisurely, and pocketed his revolver. He went to the train station by cab and told the driver to wait for him, that he would be returning shortly to go to the local jail. Guiteau thought to shoot the president, jump into the carriage to escape the vengeance of the mob, and have himself delivered in style to the jail unharmed.

Inside the depot, Guiteau went to the ladies' waiting room through which, he knew, the president would walk to enter the main station before boarding his train. The assassin watched as members of the presidential entourage entered the station and went to the train, taking their seats and waiting for Garfield to arrive. At 9:20 a.m., Garfield arrived in a carriage with Blaine. Both men strolled slowly into the station.

Two persons in the station, Policeman Patrick Kearney, and Mrs. L. White, the ladies's attendant, had been suspicious of Guiteau, watching the nervous little man with the dark pointed beard and beady little eyes as he paced the station. Their attention was diverted when Garfield appeared. The president, more than six feet tall, broad-shouldered, a silk top hat perched on his massive head, entered the station and all eyes were glued to his handsome, bearded face.

Garfield and Blaine walked past Guiteau, taking no notice of the little man. The president stopped before Policeman Kearney and asked him what time the train would be leaving. Kearney saluted and said within ten minutes. Garfield and Blaine began to walk across the ladies' waiting room, Alexander Graham Bell (right) tries to find the bullet in Garfield with one of his newly developed gadgets.

Blaine in front. Guiteau, about ten feet away from his prey, walked after them. He withdrew his revolver, carefully aiming at the president and fired. The bullet struck Garfield in the back. The president turned to look at the diminutive assassin, a surprised look on his face. He appeared as if he had not been shot. Four seconds later, Guiteau took a few steps and fired another shot, one that went wild. Garfield, then feeling the pain of the wound, threw up his hands with a cry, and fell to the floor, falling upon and crushing his silk top hat.

The unbalanced Guiteau raving in the witness stand; he made a shambles out of his own trial, constantly firing and rehiring his attorneys.

Secretary of State Blaine wheeled about, shouting: "My God, he's been murdered! What's the meaning of this?"

Policeman Kearney had had his back turned to Guiteau when the assassin fired the first shot. His first thought at hearing the noise was that small boys were outside the depot setting off firecrackers in honor of the president. He saw Guiteau fire his second shot. Guiteau then dashed in front of Kearney, heading for the Sixth Street exit and the waiting cab that would take him to jail. Kearney lunged at him, grabbing the squirming little man, yelling: "In God's name, what did you shoot the president for?"

Guiteau slipped through Kearney's grasp and dashed out the exit, but a station employee grabbed him and held him until Kearney caught up with the assassin and took a firm hold of his arms. Guiteau fought wildly to free himself from the burly policeman's hold, but he could not escape. He held up a letter, saying to Kearney: "Here! Take this letter to General [William T.] Sherman. It explains everything!" Two more men helped to subdue Guiteau, who suddenly became calm. "It's all right," Guiteau told them. "Keep quiet. I wish to go to jail. Arthur [Chester A. Arthur, the vice president] is now president of the United States. I am a Stalwart of the Stalwarts." Kearney led him away toward the jail as the little man continued to babble his imagined authority: "You stick to me, officer. Have me put in a third story front at the jail. General Sherman is coming down to take charge. Arthur and all of these men are my friends. I'll have you made chief of police!"

"What does he mean?" asked one of the men accompanying Kearney.

"The man's a lunatic," grunted Kearney as he dragged Guiteau along. "That's what he means."

Inside the train station, Garfield lay conscious but in great pain. Blaine knelt beside him, saying: "My poor president." Mrs. White, the station attendant, sat on the floor, holding Garfield's head in her lap. Dr. Smith Townsend, the district health officer, appeared on the run, dashing into the station only four minutes after hearing about the shooting. He ordered policemen to remove the crowd surrounding the fallen president. He then gave Garfield spirits of ammonia and some brandy. The president appeared to revive somewhat. There was very little blood in evidence from his wound. A mattress was brought and Garfield was placed on this.

The presidential entourage, when hearing the news, poured back into the station, making the place even more crowded. Police struggled to push away spectators, friends and cabinet members so that Garfield could breathe. Mrs. Garfield was not present. She was in New York, planning to meet her husband later. Garfield then complained of a "prickly feeling" in his right leg. The president's son, Harry, age sixteen, ran from the train when he heard the news, weeping as he knelt at his father's side, wringing his hands. "Did you see who shot my father?" he asked Mrs. White.

Guiteau hid beneath his blanket from nightmares.

"Yes," she replied, "and he has been caught."

"Somebody will pay for this!" the boy cried out.

The president was then removed to a private office in the station where Dr. Townsend examined his wound, probing the bullet hole in the president's back with his finger, this in an age when sterilization was unknown. Noting little blood coming from the wound, Townsend concluded that the president might be hemorrhaging internally, but he said reassuringly to Garfield: "I don't believe the wound is serious."

Garfield, weak and pale, unable to lift his arms, smiled weakly and said: "Thank you, doctor, but I am a dead man."

A swarm of physicians arrived and carried Garfield to the White House where he was put to bed. He was given a shot of morphine and little else. Mrs. Garfield arrived by special train that day and remained at her husband's bedside. He seemed to rally when she appeared. Thinking that other assassins might be lurking near the White House, the place was surrounded by hundreds of troops. But there was but one attacker, Guiteau, who was by then cowering in his jail cell. Crowds assembled outside the jail, threatening to lynch the assassin. Officials, meanwhile, examined Guiteau's rambling letters and were baffled by their contents, particularly references he had made to General William T. Sherman. The general denied ever having heard of Guiteau.

Guiteau trimming his beard in his cell on the day of his execution.

It was not until July 3, 1881, a full day after the president had been shot, that physicians made a careful examination of Garfield. The bullet fired by Guiteau had entered between the tenth and eleventh ribs, passing on the right of his spinal column, puncturing the lower right lobe of the liver and lodged in the front of the abdomen where an aneurism or sac had been created. The aneurism had allowed blood to continue circulating and had prolonged Garfield's life. Any attempt to remove the bullet, physicians concluded, would prove fatal. No operation was planned.

Guiteau, meanwhile was interrogated. When asked if he had had any accomplices, he replied: "Not a living soul!" He smiled, as if proud of the fact that he had carried out his deed alone. "I have contemplated this thing for the past two weeks." His brother, John Guiteau, was located and he coldly informed authorities that Charles was insane and that he expected that his brother would wind up in an insane asylum. This was echoed by Guiteau's brother-in-law, who claimed that Guiteau had once tried to kill his own sister and that he had been examined by a number of physicians over the years and had been declared insane.

Garfield's condition worsened a little each day, but he clung to life until September 19, 1881, when, after complaining of pain in his heart, he died at 10:35 p.m. In Washington, the hatred for Guiteau had mounted as each day's newspapers reported Garfield's gradual decline. Every day abuse was heaped upon the madman in print until thousands of citizens and soldiers openly demanded that he be executed without trial. Soldiers guarding Guiteau decided to shoot him out-of-hand. They drew lots for the chore, a soldier named Mason firing a shot at Guiteau, but the bullet missed its mark when he fired at a window where the assassin was standing.

Guiteau shouted for the warders, screaming: "What do these men mean? Do they want to murder me?" He was moved into another cell where he was not exposed to outside spectators or soldiers. He was brought to trial on November 14, 1881. He pleaded not guilty on grounds of insanity that had been brought about by "divine power." Prosecutors prepared a solid case of premeditated murder. Jail warders testified that Guiteau had appeared at the jail weeks before the shooting to inspect the premises and pronounced it as "an excellent jail." Physicians for the prosecution insisted that Guiteau was sane and was feigning insanity. Guiteau himself claimed that he had been insane for a month but regained his sanity after shooting Garfield.

Guiteau made a shambles of his trial and his conduct was anything but sane. He ranted and raved about politics and life in general, suddenly erupting with invective and vituperation. He jumped from his chair repeatedly to label prosecution witnesses as "dirty liars!" Several times he ran to the front of the prosecutor's table to call him a "low-livered whelp," and an "old hog." His defense attorneys underwent constant abuse from their client, interrupting their pleadings, summarily firing them almost every day and then rehiring them minutes later. After the lengthy trial, Guiteau insisted that he deliver his own summation to the jury. He frothed at the mouth in his ranting delivery, then stated: "God told me to kill!" He then blamed the president's physicians for murdering Garfield. He then shrieked: "Let your verdict be that it was the Deity's act, not mine!"

The jury not unexpectedly returned a verdict of guilty and recommended the death penalty. Guiteau responded by jumping from his chair and shouting to the jury members: "You are all low, consummate jackasses!" He was then removed to his cell where he hid beneath his blanket for days, terrified of nightmares. He then penned his memoirs , which officials termed "gibberish." On the morning of June 30, 1882, the day he was to be hanged, Guiteau regained his composure. He relished the idea of being the center of attention on the last day of his life. He polished his shoes, trimmed his beard and ate a large meal. While forking great mouthfuls of food, Guiteau carried on a one-sided argument with God, rebuking and correcting the Deity. He was then led to the scaffold in the courtyard of Washington Prison.

On the scaffold Guiteau cried and whimpered. He then held up his hand as the hangman approached, asking for some time to read something he had written for the occasion. The indulgent officials allowed him to withdraw a large sheaf of papers from his coat. Guiteau announced that he was about to read his masterpiece, a long poem he had entitled "I am Going to the Lordy." He read the poem and the rope was placed about his neck and he was sent through the trap door to his death. Thousands had gathered outside the jail at the hour of Guiteau's execution and when these spectators heard that he was dead, a great cheer rang out.

Guiteau hanged, June 30, 1882; he shouted "Glory! Glory!" before he fell through the trapdoor.

NIHILISTS AND ANARCHISTS

Almost four months to the day before President Garfield was mortally wounded, Alexander II, czar of Russia, was struck by bomb fragments that resulted in his death. Unlike the lone, mad act of Garfield's assassin, Charles Julius Guiteau, Alexander's assassination had been carefully planned by a dedicated secret group of political fanatics belonging to the People's Will. In Russia and elsewhere they were called nihilists.

The word "nihilism" first appears in a Turgenev novel, Fathers and Sons, and means literally "nothing," the political aim of the nihilists being to bring down all authority and leave nothing standing in its place. To the nihilists of Russia, Czar Alexander was the symbol of total authority and, as such, he was marked for murder. The many spectacular attempts on his life signaled the certain doom awaiting the Romanov dynasty.

"CARRY ME TO THE PALACE TO DIE"/ March 13, 1881

Alexander II (Alexander Nicholas Romanov, 1818-1881), the son of Nicholas I, assumed the throne of Russia in 1855. Unlike his forebears, he was a cultured, refined ruler who had received an excellent education and shared Western views and policies, although he still insisted upon his supreme rule. Alexander would come to be known as the Great Reformer, establishing a working court system in Russia and improving its laws. In 1861, through a special edict, he freed the serfs, which won for him the name the Great Emancipator (two years before Lincoln freed the slaves in America).

Alexander founded schools and ordered the building of a comprehensive railroad system across the vast Russian landscape. He established effective governmental administrations and encouraged the expansion of the university system, which, ironically, became the hotbed of opposition to his reign. The more education and liberal policies Alexander granted to his people, the more unrest his policies sowed. It was in the university environment that the students of the radical left formed nihilist parties.

Alexander II of Russia, murdered by nihilists in 1881.

Nihilist students were behind the first of many assassination attempts made against Alexander during his 26-year reign. The first of these occurred in 1861, when an unknown assailant fired a single bullet into his passing coach, narrowly missing the czar. The next serious attempt was made by nihilist student Dimitri Karakozov, a sickly young man described as "mentally unbalanced" by his friends. He purchased an old pistol and began traveling between Moscow and St. Petersburg, tracking the czar's movements. Alexander, a ruler of fixed habits, was next to impossible to properly guard. During the early years of his rule, he insisted upon walking in the open streets without escort, believing that no one really wanted to kill him. He knew that the peasants, the vast majority of the Russian people, looked upon him in reverence.

Alexander II, while riding in a carriage with Napoléon III in Paris, June 6, 1867 (shown top left) was fired upon by Polish assassin Berezovski (shown under arrest at right) and prompted Napoléon to take bows for surviving the attack.

Alexander often stopped on his daily walks to greet and talk to peasants he met. This Karakozov witnessed as he watched his prey take walks through the summer garden outside the Winter Palace in St. Petersburg or when the czar strolled by the Neva quays, in front of the Marble Palace and the equally imposing British Embassy. Disguised as a peasant—wearing a bright red workman's shirt—Karakozov, on April 14, 1866, saw Alexander step from the gates of the Winter Palace to begin his morning constitutional. When perhaps no more than twenty paces from the czar, Karakozov drew his ancient pistol and aimed at Alexander, who had his back to the assassin. Just at that moment, a peasant named Komisarov, a cap maker by trade, raced up to Karakozov and smashed his arm upward at the very second he fired. The bullet missed its mark. Guards rushed forward to subdue the assassin. When realizing what had been done, and typical of his behavior, Alexander walked calmly up to Karakozov and asked why he would want to kill him. The student sneered, spitting out his reply: "Because you refused to give the land to the people!"

Karakozov was condemned to death. Thirty other students who had been associated with the would-be assassin were sent to prison for life. Karakozov mounted the scaffold in September, but just as the rope was placed about his neck, a reprieve arrived from the czar. The nihilist student was sent to life at hard labor. Alexander, however, as more and more plots to kill him emerged, hardened his views, ordering repressive measures and almost canceling the many reforms he had instituted.

Count Alexander Suroroz, the even-tempered governor-general of St. Petersburg, who had been known for his kindly attitude toward dissidents, was dismissed and replaced by the severe General Dimitri Trepov (who would himself be the target of several assassins). Trepov, a martinet, immediately sent his police and Cossacks to disband all political organizations, student gatherings and intellectual meetings of any kind, arresting thousands, who were beaten and imprisoned without trial. A. V. Golovnin, the liberal minister of education, was ousted and replaced by the stern Dimitri Tolstoy, who had opposed all of Alexander's earlier reform measures, including the emancipation of the serfs.

Tolstoy proved to be an insufferable intellectual dictator. He eliminated any courses dealing with contemporary thought and problems, ordering teachers to concentrate on the classic languages. All Russian students attending foreign universities were ordered to return immediately to their country. Tolstoy would not have Russian youth influenced by Western thought. He would not tolerate any criticism of the regime, any notion of questioning the Romanov dynasty and its "divine right" to rule.

Tolstoy's draconian edicts and actions destroyed his own agenda. The returning students brought with them the ideals of Western educators and political thinking that would eventually change the course of Russian history and eradicate the Romanovs. They formed thousands of secret political groups, establishing secret "cells" of forbidden intellectual discussion and planted the seeds of Marxism and communism. All of the attempts on the life of Alexander came from members of these groups.

Following the explosion of the first bomb, Alexander II (center) is shown leaving his carriage to inspect a wounded guard.

As threats and plots and failed assassination attempts mounted, the normally reserved Alexander, who had come to be known as the Doomed Emperor, finally blurted to a minister: "Am I a wild beast that they should hound me to death?" He believed, however, that God would somehow intervene in the event of any attempt made upon his life. This proved to be the case on June 7, 1867, when Alexander, on an official state visit to Napoléon III of France, was riding with his two young sons and the French emperor in an open coach going through the Bois de Boulogne in Paris.

Enormous crowds gathered along the route to view the two monarchs. Military escorts on horseback and on foot had difficulty holding back the lines of pressing spectators so that the road narrowed to a wavering human lane and compelled the coach to travel at walking speed. Suddenly, a Pole named Berezovski jumped into the road, holding a pistol and firing at Alexander. (The Poles, then under Russian dominance, had been much repressed by Alexander's regime.) It seemed, given the short distance between the assassin and his target, that the shot could not miss the mark, but the bullet passed through the nostrils of a horse ridden by one of the French guards and went sailing between Alexander and Napoléon, harming neither monarch.

Berezovski fired once more, but his pistol blew up and shattered his arm. The wounded horse snorted in the direction of the coach and splattered both autocrats and the czar's sons with blood. Alexander remained almost motionless, his face without expression, his gaze fixed upon the would-be assassin, who was being dragged away by guards. The demonstrative Napoléon, on the other hand, seized the moment to prove his bravery. He stood up in the coach to display his blood-coated uniform, waving to the crowds, broadly smiling, as if he had just returned from a triumphant battlefield victory. He reveled in his survival, although Berezovski had no intent of killing the French monarch. Napoléon's face flushed red, his eyes danced and adrenaline laced his words as he turned grinning to Alexander and roared: "Sire! We have been under fire together!"

Alexander left Paris in disgust, privately condemning Napoléon for his grandstanding and apparent unconcern for his, the czar's, safety. The czar reasoned that attempts on his life would increase, but it was not until the mid-1870s that student groups in Russia began to embrace assassination as a political way of thought. By then many of Alexander's governors and ministers were being attacked. Many students plotted to murder the czar, but their failure finally prompted a schoolteacher and nihilist cell leader, Alexander Solevev, to attempt the murder himself.

Seen from the opposite side of the road, Alexander II (center, arms in air) is fatally wounded by a second bomb.

On April 14, 1879, Solevev, disguised in the uniform of an army officer, approached Alexander's coach and fired four shots at the czar before he was grabbed by a peasant and then clubbed to the ground. He swallowed poison capsules, but an antidote was given so that he could stand trial. Convicted, Solevev was taken to a public gallows on May 28, 1879, and hanged before a large, silent throng. One of Solevev's young followers, Andre Zhelyabov, then organized an effective secret party, the People's Will, dedicated to the murder of the czar. They decided to use explosives to achieve their end.

The assassinated Alexander II, lying in state at the Winter Palace; his death did not alter the oppressive policies of the czars.

Members of the group mined the harbor at Odessa, thinking to blow up the czar's yacht when it arrived on a visit, but this failed. Learning of Alexander's visit to Moscow, they dug a 150-foot tunnel beneath some railroad tracks outside of the city and, on November 18, 1879, set off a massive charge, but it blew up the wrong train. A large cache of dynamite was then secretly smuggled in small increments into the Winter Palace by Stepan Khalturin, a palace carpenter and a member of the People's Will. On February 17, 1880, at Zhelyabov's order, a timing device set off the massive explosion at 6:32 p.m., the time the family would be assembled in the Yellow Hall to have dinner. The explosion erupted beneath the Yellow Hall, shattering the French windows, flames belching outward. The floor of the dining room collapsed and the ceiling, walls and trappings were shredded.

The nihilists angrily discovered that Alexander and his entire family had escaped the explosion. Their religiously kept schedule had been interrupted by a late-arriving guest, Prince Alexander Hesse-Darmstadt, and the dinner had been delayed. Alexander and his family members were going toward the wing housing the Yellow Room when the explosion occurred, the corridor down which they strolled soon filling with smoke and fumes. Chandeliers collapsed and walls sagged. The lights of the great Winter Palace flickered and then went out. Two servants who had been setting the dinner table were blown to pieces and nineteen Finnish guards billeted in underground corridors were killed.

The explosion sapped the czar's resolve and drained his strength. He appeared to be on the verge of a nervous collapse. Everywhere in the Winter Palace, the czar discovered death threats, small notes left in his bathroom, in his clothes, on the desk of his study. He told ministers that he was resigned to a violent fate. Alexander then decided to recall his repressive measures, appointing as a chief minister the liberal-minded Count Michael Loris-Melikov. The Armenian-born Loris-Melikov re-established a free press, opened the schools, returned independence to local government and slackened censorship. Most important, he prepared legislation for Alexander that would give Russia a constitution that included representation in a parliamentary form where all classes could have an effective political voice.

In late February 1881, the czar's secret police finally tracked down three members of the People's Will, arresting them. One of those imprisoned was Zhelyabov and when the czar learned that his nemesis was in captivity, he was greatly relieved. He nevertheless planned to sign into law Loris-Melikov's constitution. Learning of this, Sophia Perovsky, Zhelyabov's lover, resolved to kill the czar with a small group of associates, believing that if the constitution was signed, all the reasons for Alexander's murder would be nullified. She and a few others would throw bombs at the czar's sleigh-borne coaches (the streets were then thick with snow) while the czar was en route to sign the constitution, on March 13, 1881.

The execution of the nihilists who murdered Alexander II on April 3, 1881, a mass hanging witnessed by 200,000 people; the condemned radicals wore placards (shown hanging from their necks) that labeled them "assassins."

Perovsky and others positioned themselves on the street that ran along the Catherine Canal. At 1 p.m., when Alexander's coach approached the Kojushni Bridge, one of the assassins hurled a bomb that exploded behind the czar's coach. The explosion sent two Cossacks crashing with their horses to the ground, killing one. A boy carrying a bread basket was blown into a wall, mortally wounded. The czar's coach had been damaged, but Alexander stepped forth with only a slight cut on his hand. As he walked about to inspect those injured, another assassin threw a second bomb that landed at Alexander's feet. A terrific explosion crumpled the czar to the ground, shattering his legs, one almost severed at the thigh, and caused great jets of blood to spurt onto the snow.

Grand Duke Michael, the czar's brother, rushed to the scene, holding the czar and asked: "Alexander, can you hear me?" The czar, barely alive, weakly replied: "Yes, I hear you ... to the palace ... carry me to the palace ... to die there." There was little to be done for the dying czar. His family gathered about him. The mourners included Alexander's grandson, Nicholas, who would become Nicholas II, also marked for assassination as the last reigning Romanov. The czar died that day. Alexander III, the heir to the throne, gathered a small army of Cossacks and dashed into the streets of St. Petersburg, determined to hunt down the nihilists, but the four assassins responsible for the bombing were already in custody.

Alexander Ulyanov, a nihilist hanged in 1887, whose execution was witnessed by his younger brother, a youth later known as Lenin and who vowed to take revenge on the Romanovs.

Perovsky and three others, as well as Zhelyabov, were hanged on April 3, 1881, in Semenovsky Square before an estimated 200,000 people. Their execution all but destroyed the People's Will. A small splinter group was arrested in 1887 before they could murder Alexander III. Among this group, executed by the authorities, was Alexander Ulyanov, who shouted from the scaffold: "Long live the People's Will!" Watching him die was his 17-year-old brother Vladimir, who vowed retaliation against the Romanovs: "I swear I will avenge myself on them!" This boy would later be known as Vladimir Lenin.

DEATH FROM AN ANARCHIST'S HAND/ June 23, 1894

Like Russia, France experienced a wave of nihilist violence, but the bomb-throwers and assassins were called anarchists and came to prominence in the early 1890s. Anarchy was twin to nihilism in that its political goal was to eliminate all authority. It had no real programs except the utter destruction of governments and its leaders. It was the unfortunate fate of Marie Francois Sadi Carnot (1837-1894) to have been elected the fourth president of the Third French Republic (1887-1894) at a time when anarchy was at a high tide that would engulf his life.

President Carnot of France, slain in 1894 by a left-wing zealot.

A member of a distinguished Burgundian family from Limoges, Carnot began his career as an engineer. He became a member of the National Assembly (1871-1876), and was then elected a member of the Chamber of Deputies (1876-1880). As a moderate, President Carnot successfully weathered political storms, including the 1892 Panama Canal scandal. His tenure in office, however, was plagued by incessant violence, bombings and attempted assassinations on the part of anarchists, part of a wave of socialism and anarchism that swept through France in the early 1890s, bringing with it widespread death and destruction. Joining the anarchists were thousands of workers disgruntled with meager pay. On May Day 1891, every city in France saw massive protest marches that resulted in bloody clashes between police and workers.

The homes of prosecutors and judges who had sent anarchists to prison were bombed. Government officials were then targeted. A 31-year-old vagrant named Auguste Vaillant built a homemade bomb that he carried into the Chamber of Deputies in Paris on December 9, 1893. He stood in the upper public gallery and hurled his infernal machine, but a woman's arm misdirected his aim and the bomb exploded against a pillar, injuring several persons, but killing no one. Vaillant was later sent to the guillotine. Not all anarchists were unemployed working men. Emile Henry, a 22-year-old pacifist, who was well educated and came from a good family, worked for a clockmaker and through his apprenticeship learned how to make bombs (without the aid of his unwitting employer). Embracing anarchy, he went to the sprawling Terminus Hotel, visited by scores of political and business leaders, with the intent to kill as many of these foremost citizens as possible.

On February 20, 1894, Henry walked into the hotel's cafe and hurled a bomb that exploded in the crowd, killing one person and wounding twenty more. He then ran from the scene, pulling a revolver and firing at gendarmes pursuing him. He stumbled, fell and was caught. Henry was sent to the guillotine on May 21, 1894. Reading of the young anarchist's execution was 20-year-old Santo Geronimo Caserio, Lombardy-born and a dedicated anarchist for two years. He vowed to take revenge for Henry's death by assassinating President Carnot.

Carnot had not been a target for the anarchists until a deranged youth named Perrin shot at him as he was traveling to a festival in Versailles. Perrin was judged insane and sent to an asylum, but news of his act, coupled with Henry's execution, further inspired Caserio to murder the president. He learned through newspapers that Carnot would officially open the Colonial Exposition in Lyon on June 24, 1894, and he traveled to Lyon a day ahead of the ceremony to stalk the president, who arrived late on June 23.

Anarchist Santo Caserio, who murdered President Carnot; he is shown in custody shortly after the murder wearing a restraining neck and waist yoke.

Caserio carried with him a six-inch knife he had purchased with wages he earned as a laborer. Hearing that Carnot would be riding in an open carriage near the Rue de République near the Palais de la Bourse, Caserio patiently mixed with the crowds waiting to greet the president. He soon saw Carnot sitting in a slow-moving landau, an open carriage that also transported several other dignitaries. Mounted Cuirassiers rode alongside the carriage as guards.

As Carnot's carriage came abreast of him, Caserio brushed aside several spectators and dashed into the street, carrying his knife wrapped in a newspaper. As he reached the carriage, he unsheathed the knife and threw the newspaper and sheath away. Gripping the side of the carriage with his left hand while leaning into the carriage and lunging forward, Caserio viciously thrust the blade of the knife deep into Carnot's stomach, just under the ribs. The other passengers were not fully aware of what had happened, first believing that Caserio was someone who was simply handing Carnot a petition. Only when Carnot pulled his hand away from his stomach to display fingers coated with blood did one of his aides ask: "What is wrong, Mr. President?"

"I'm wounded," Carnot gasped. He fell backward, his head resting on a cushion, his eyes closed. He was unconscious. Spectators swarmed about the stationary carriage. Dr. Antonin Poncet, professor of clinical surgery in Lyon, who had attended a banquet for Carnot only hours earlier, raced from the crowd and leaped into the landau as its driver wheeled it about and lashed the horses to a gallop, heading toward the Prefecture. En route, Dr. Poncet grabbed Carnot's icy hand and felt no pulse. He looked down to see that the knife Caserio had plunged into Carnot with such force, was still buried to the hilt in his stomach. Few in the festive throngs realized what had happened and were still cheering Carnot as his carriage swiftly passed them. Above, in the clear June sky, fireworks lit up the night to commemorate the opening of the exposition, making the scene all the more bizarre.

President Carnot (below, shown in back seat of carriage), while his killer grasps his hand, is mortally stabbed by assassin Santo Caserio, June 23, 1894, in Lyon, France.

Meanwhile, the assassin almost made a perfect escape. After stabbing Carnot, Caserio had leaped from the landau and raced ahead of the slowing horses. He cut in front of the carriage, running across the street diagonally. The driver of the carriage heard the murderer shout: "Vive l'Anarchie!" Caserio then attempted to break through the heavy crowd on the other side of the street. Only a few suspected the young man in the grey suit as having committed a crime. A young girl tried to stop him by grabbing the sleeve of his coat. Caserio smashed his fist against her head, knocking her downward.

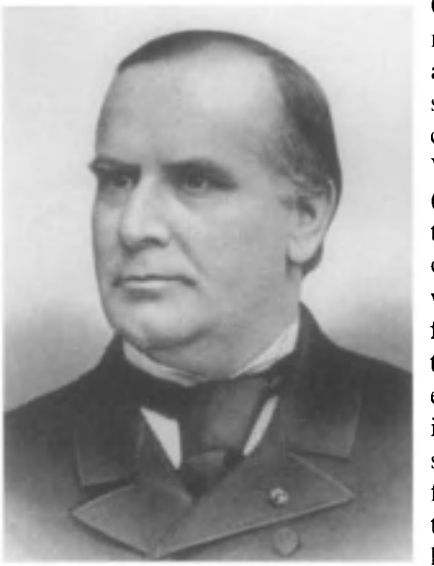
Albert Vizetelly, an English author, was shocked into action. He caught the reeling girl and in the next movement, swung his own fist on Caserio's jaw, stunning the killer. Others began to attack Caserio, thinking him to be a pickpocket, trying to escape police officers, who came running toward him. A police captain arrived and shouted to spectators: "Hold him! He's just assassinated the president!" When the crowd heard this, spectators rushed forward to avenge the popular leader, clubbing Caserio with their fists, kicking him, tearing at his clothes. He was a bloody mess when police officers finally wrested him from the throng, which now began to chant: "Death to the assassin! Death to the assassin!"

Carnot by then had been taken to the Prefecture where a half dozen physicians labored to save his life. The knife wound, however, proved to be fatal. The blade had perforated the liver and severed a main artery. The president momentarily revived to tell the doctors: "I thank you for what you have done for me." He died several hours later and the nation went into mourning. There was no thought of regret on the part of the assassin. From his prison cell, the unrepentant Caserio announced: "I am an anarchist and I have struck the head of state. I've done it as I would have killed any king or emperor, of no matter what nationality."

Caserio was tried at the Assize Court of the Rhone Department on August 2, 1894. His attorneys claimed that their client suffered from hereditary insanity and that he had been the unwitting instrument of manipulating anarchists. When hearing these pleas from his own lawyers, Caserio leaped to his feet in the courtroom and shouted: "That's not true!" In less than a half hour's deliberation, the jury returned a verdict of guilty without extenuating circumstances (insanity). Caserio was condemned to death. On August 16, 1894, the assassin, who had strutted and boasted before his prison guards, was found cowering in his cell when summoned to his execution. He trembled and quaked and went limp so that the guards had to drag him to a public square in Lyon. Thousands watched as he was placed beneath the blade of the waiting guillotine. He was then decapitated.

THE KILLING OF AN AFFABLE MAN/ September 6, 1901

The fanaticism for anarchy that gripped the mind of Santo Caserio and drove him to murder the president of France also obsessed an obscure young man in America named Leon Czolgosz (pronounced Cholgosh). He would duplicate Caserio's senseless murder and bring about the third assassination of an American president, that of William McKinley (1843-1901). The twenty-fifth president of the United States was an outgoing, affable man who loved to meet his constituents and liked nothing better than to shake hands with his followers, a friendly trait that was to invite his untimely death.



William McKinley, a personable and popular U.S. president.

Born in Niles, Ohio, on January 29, 1843, McKinley served with the Union during the Civil War. He practiced law in Canton, Ohio, from 1867 to 1877, then successfully ran for the House of Representatives (1877-1883, 1885-1891). He served as governor of Ohio (1892-1896) and was twice elected president of the U.S. (1896 and 1900). McKinley strengthened the U.S. as a world power by combating an oppressive Cuban regime in the 1898 Spanish-American War, which brought about the annexation of Hawaii, Wake Island and Samoa, as well as acquiring the territories of Cuba, Puerto Rico, Guam and the Philippines.

Leon Czolgosz, McKinley's assassin.

In early September 1901, McKinley was scheduled to appear at the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo, New York, an appearance that was widely advertised. On September 6, 1901, the president went to the exposition's Temple of Music and stood in the large auditorium, waiting to shake hands with the thousands who lined up in front of the temple that day. He was guarded by only three Secret Service agents commanded by George Foster. A squad of exposition police stood at the doorway to the Temple of Music and several Buffalo detectives mixed among the lines of spectators eager to shake the president's hand. One of these was Leon Czolgosz, a pale-faced youth who had only days before left the Midwest, traveling to Buffalo for one purpose only—to murder McKinley.

Crowds outside the Temple of Music, waiting to see McKinley arrive at the Pan-American Exposition, September 6, 1901.

The 29-year-old Czolgosz (born in Detroit, Michigan, in 1873), was the fourth child of a laborer who moved his family through many Michigan towns in search of work. The Czolgosz family lived slightly above the poverty level. At twelve, Czolgosz's mother died while giving birth to her eighth child. He received little formal education and went to work as a teenager, laboring at a Cleveland, Ohio, wire mill. He was considered a hard-working employee, who lived quietly in a small boarding house. During his off hours, he avidly read books, magazines and newspapers having to do with anarchy. Through these vitriolic publications, Czolgosz developed an abiding hatred for the American system of government and came to believe that it was right to murder anyone branded an enemy of the people by anarchist leaders.

In 1898, Czolgosz had a nervous breakdown and had to quit his job at the mill. By that time, his father had acquired a small farm and had remarried. He went to live with his father, doing odd jobs at the farm. Much of his time was spent hunting or locking himself in his room to read anarchist publications. He became withdrawn and surly, often arguing with his stepmother. He learned that an anarchist, Gaetano Bresci, an immigrant Italian laborer working in New Jersey, had sailed to Italy and shot and killed King Humbert I on July 29, 1900. The report so excited Czolgosz that he could not sleep. When he did try to sleep, he dozed off clutching the thumb-worn stories of the Humbert assassination.

President McKinley arriving at Buffalo's Pan-American Exposition; this photo was taken an hour before his murder.

When he learned that McKinley would be attending the Buffalo exposition, Czolgosz decided that he would duplicate Bresci's violent act and kill the president. First, he traveled to Chicago, where he briefly visited with Emma Goldman, one of the leading anarchists of the day, but she found him "dim-witted" and so argumentative that she ordered him to leave her cluttered offices and never return. Czolgosz then traveled to Buffalo in July 1901, inspecting the exposition grounds. He returned to Cleveland briefly, then went back to Buffalo on August 31, 1901, where he rented a room above John Nowak's Saloon for $2 a week.

Czolgosz then bought a short-barreled .32-caliber Iver-Johnson revolver. This was a small weapon and Czolgosz could easily hide it in the palm of his large hand. He scouted the exposition and watched as McKinley arrived, hating the president's popularity with the people. The fact that McKinley was well-liked rankled the assassin. He later stated: "I didn't believe that one man should have so much service [attention] and another man should have none." Czolgosz had a plan. He would cover the hand holding the revolver with a handkerchief and fire the weapon through this, knowing that previous assassins had employed the same ruse. (The anarchist Caserio had murdered French President Carnot by hiding a knife under a newspaper.) He practiced this concealment as he sat in his room holding the weapon and covering his hand with the handkerchief, which he tied about his wrist. He knew he would have to draw the revolver and the handkerchief from his pocket while he waited in a receiving line to see McKinley and he made sure that he could perform this act without the gun being seen.

McKinley (center) is shown inside the Temple of Music, shortly before crowds were admitted.

Assassin Czolgosz, a handkerchief hiding his pistol, slaps away McKinley's right hand, firing two shots.

On the morning of September 6, 1901, Czolgosz arrived early at the exposition so that he could be near the head of the line. He stood passively with the loaded revolver in his pocket and began to shuffle forward with the rest of the crowd. He heard a band begin to play the national anthem. Cheers suddenly erupted around the Temple of Music when McKinley entered the building. The president walked into the large auditorium to a corner where a dais stood, and, with Secret Service agent Foster standing nearby, and two aides on either side, smiled and nodded, saying: "Let them come."

The crowds filed into the temple and McKinley eagerly began shaking hands. In the line walking forward—his face expressionless, his eyes holding a dull gaze—was Czolgosz. As he neared the president, he drew the revolver and the handkerchief without exposing the weapon and raised his covered hand repeatedly to his forehead, pretending to wipe away sweat on this hot day. Foster and other guards who were scanning the crowds saw Czolgosz come forward and thought that his hand was injured, dismissing the presence of the handkerchief as nothing more than a makeshift bandage.

Czolgosz is shown behind bars an hour after he shot McKinley, his head bandaged from wounds received from irate spectators; he never expressed remorse for his crime.

Czolgosz reached the president precisely at 4:07 p.m., at which time an organ was playing a Bach sonata. McKinley, believing that the tall, dark-haired young man before him had injured his right hand, reached for Czolgosz's left hand. In a startling second, Czolgosz slapped McKinley's hand away, aimed the revolver at the president's midsection, and fired two shots only inches away from his victim. A small cloud of smoke drifted about the two men and smoke steamed from the two holes in the handkerchief made by the bullets. One of the bullets had tunneled through McKinley's abdomen, a fatal wound.

The expression on the face of the wounded president was one of astonishment. As McKinley clutched his abdomen, a half dozen police agents and Secret Service men pounced on Czolgosz and knocked him to the floor. He was dragged to the center of the auditorium, men kicking and punching him. McKinley, who was by then being helped to a nearby chair as the crowds were cleared from the auditorium, kept his eyes on the assassin and said weakly to an aide: "Don't let them hurt him. Be easy with him, boys." He looked down to see blood coating his hand. George Cortelyou, his secretary, stood over him, fanning him. The president looked up at Cortelyou and whispered: "My wife, be careful, Cortelyou, how you tell her—oh, be careful!"

A motorized ambulance arrived with clanging bells before the temple. A half dozen white-jacketed men ran inside with a litter and reappeared shortly, bearing McKinley to the ambulance. The president's face was ashen and he held his abdomen, showing little sign of life. The immense crowd groaned as one when spectators realized that McKinley had been shot. McKinley was taken to a small clinic on the exposition grounds where Dr. Matthew D. Mann, a prominent Buffalo surgeon, inspected the president. He discovered that one bullet had simply grazed McKinley's ribs, but a second bullet had ploughed through his stomach, lacerating both front and back walls.

The clinic had no electricity and when the sunlight began to fail a small light bulb was rigged and held above Dr. Mann and other physicians while they worked on the president. Dr. Mann cleaned the peritoneal cavity and sutured the holes in the stomach left by the bullet. The wound was then closed and covered with an antiseptic bandage. McKinley was then taken to the Buffalo home of John G. Milburn, a friend, to recuperate. At first, it seemed as if the president would recover, but physicians neglected the development of gangrene and were indecisive about conducting another surgery. Many argued that McKinley was too weak to undergo a second operation.

On September 13, 1901, McKinley lapsed into a coma. He revived briefly to say to his wife, aides and doctors: "It is useless, gentlemen. I think we ought to have a prayer." The Lord's Prayer was recited with McKinley moving his lips silently to the words. He then said: "Goodbye, goodbye, all. It's God's way. His will, not ours, be done." He then drew his wife close and whispered the words of his favorite hymn, "Nearer My God to Thee." He held his wife's hand for some time and when she was led away weeping, McKinley reached out for her, his eyesight now dimmed, as if he were a child groping in darkness. A physician took the president's limp hand, holding it until he died at 2:15 a.m., September 14, 1901.

Meanwhile, McKinley's killer waited in jail. He had no regrets, coldly telling reporters: "I killed President McKinley

The dying McKinley is consoled by his wife, telling her that his death was "God's will"; physicians neglected to treat gangrene in his wound, which brought about his demise.

because I believed it to be my duty." He was tried in Buffalo on September 23, 1901, before Judge Truman C. White. He appeared dazed throughout his trial, but he never failed to mention that he was an advocate of anarchy and that he followed the teachings of Emma Goldman. The anarchist leader was interviewed in Chicago. She labeled Czolgosz a fool, but in her remarks she showed no remorse for McKinley's murder, stating: "Suppose the president is dead. Thousands die daily and are unwept. Why should any fuss be made about this man?"

Goldman herself was first suspected of orchestrating the assassination. She was arrested on September 10, 1901, along with hundreds of other anarchists. From her prison cell, Goldman issued a statement that disavowed her association with the killer: "Anarchism did not teach men to do the act for which Czolgosz is under arrest. We work against the system and education is our watchword." She and others were later released, but Goldman's reputation was badly damaged by Czolgosz when she attempted to mount support for the murderer. Finding none, she left Chicago, moving to New York, where she later worked as a nurse in tenement hospitals under the alias of Miss E. G. Smith.

October 29, 1901: Czolgosz's execution by electric chair two months after he killed McKinley; the first U.S. electrocution occurred in 1890 at the same prison.

During his trial, Czolgosz took the witness stand to say that he was a follower of Emma Goldman, but that she had nothing to do with his act. "There was no one else but me," he emphasized. "No one told me to do it." Found guilty and sentenced to death, Czolgosz was taken to Auburn Prison in New York. He sat down in the electric chair at 7 a.m., on October 29, 1901. He wore a neatly pressed suit, soft collar and black tie. He had spent some time polishing his shoes to a high gloss (as had been the case with Charles Guiteau before his execution for murdering President Garfield). As the straps to his forehead, arms and legs were applied, Czolgosz was asked in front of many witnesses if he had anything to say. "I am not sorry for my crime." He then added, speaking with difficulty under the chin strap: "I am awfully sorry that I could not see my father." The current was thrown and the assassin was pronounced dead at 7:17 a.m.

THE NATIONALIST ASSASSINS

Czolgosz's irrational murder of the beloved McKinley not only embarrassed anarchist leader Emma Goldman and her ardent followers, but anarchism itself, because of this senseless crime, fell from favor among the most left-leaning political dissidents. By the turn of the 20th century, anarchy gave way to fierce nationalism, particularly in Europe and specifically in the Balkans, where, in Serbia, a group of right-wing militarists (known as the Black Hand Society—no relationship to the Italian extortionist groups) would sow the seeds of war.

A BALKAN INTRIGUE/June 10-11, 1903

The murder of the last Obrenovic ruler of Serbia by officers of his own army was marked by merciless barbarity and heralded a series of European regicides that ultimately led to World War I. When Alexander I (1876-1903) and his morganatic wife, Queen Draga, were hunted down and slaughtered like wild animals in their own Belgrade palace, the assassinations sent shock waves through every throne room on the continent. The killings were fat with Balkan intrigue, bizarre characters and the kind of swashbuckling adventures usually found in the novels of Anthony Hope and P. C. Wren. Hot political passion mixed with no little alcohol flowed in the veins of the assassins on the night of June 10-11, 1903. Even though their bloody act appeared to be wildly impetuous, these murders had been planned years earlier.

Alexander I, the last Obrenovic king of Serbia, shown shortly after assuming the throne; his obsession with all things Russian caused his murder.

The Obrenovic dynasty was a fragile one from the beginning when founded in 1815 by Prince Milos and pronounced by a succession of dissolute rulers whose reigns were interrupted by usurping kings from the rival Karageorgevic dynasty. The Obrenovic monarchs were typified by King Milan, who cared little about Serbia or his people and lived only for pleasure. He married a ravishing, odalisque Russian woman, Nathalie Keshko, who hated him and went to the altar in marriage with King Milan only because her father had ordered her to do so. They had a son, Alexander, who, like his father, was raised in foreign capitals. His mother used any excuse to distance herself from her husband, a monarch who kept many mistresses.

Milan slowly bankrupted Serbia through his own costly pleasures and in military misadventures. He led an army into Bulgaria and was soundly thrashed, returning in disgrace in 1886. He was forced to abdicate in favor of his small son, Alexander, who ruled through three regents, while his mother lived in luxurious exile in Biarritz. Milan also lived in exile and the two ousted monarchs drained the Serbian treasury with their extravagant lifestyles.

Alexander was greatly influenced by his military bodyguards and spouted their nationalist credos as he came to maturity. He derided the liberal government his father had installed before leaving the country and, on his seventeenth birthday, he assembled all of his ministers and regents and promptly fired them, telling them that they were his prisoners in the palace and would be released only if they agreed to recognize his total authority. When they protested, the palace hall was suddenly filled with soldiers leveling bayonets at them. Alexander departed, riding on horseback to one army regiment after another around Belgrade, getting his troops to swear loyalty only to him as the new king.

The next day, Alexander replaced all members of the parliament with radical nationalists. He stated that Serbia would reestablish itself as a strong and independent nation. No such thing occurred. Alexander, like his forebears, soon ignored his country's welfare, spent lavishly, and imposed a dictatorial regime upon his nation. He angered his own military supporters by emulating everything Russian, influenced greatly by his Russian mother. To the rage of the Serbian officer class, he married a Russian, Draga Mashin, one of his mother's ladies-in-waiting. "I am king and I can marry anyone I please," Alexander announced to his critics.

The Serbian people came to dislike their monarch and hate Queen Draga, who represented all that was Russian. She was a morganatic monarch in that she was queen in name only and had no blood ties to the Obrenovic dynasty. Many came to believe the Obrenovics were finished in that Alexander was rumored to be impotent and Draga barren. There would be no heirs, the scandal mongers insisted. Through Alexander's spendthrift ways the economy of Serbia was soon on the brink of collapse. Alexander then told his ministers that he would be naming his wife's brother Nikodiye heir to his throne. When they protested, the king exploded, shouting: "I am king and I can do as I please!" Queen Draga added: "The king's will is supreme."

At this news, riots broke out and the government almost came to a standstill. It was widely believed by a cadre of young Serbian army officers that Alexander intended to place his country under the authority of Nicholas II, czar of Russia. Many of these officers had come to hate the man they had put on the throne. Alexander had neglected the army financially and politically since marrying Draga. In response to Alexander's growing indifference to his only base of support, a group of officers, headed by Captain Dragutin Dimitrijevic, formed a secret nationalistic organization called Ukendinjenje ili Smrt (later to be known as Narodna Odbrana and the Black Hand Society). They planned to rid Serbia of the wastrel Obrenovics and reinstate the Karageorgevic monarchy. To this end, several members of the society contacted Peter Karageorgevic in Switzerland, where he was living in exile, and asked him if he would accept the throne "should events occur" to make such a succession possible. Peter agreed, but he had no idea—at least he and others later claimed—what the Serbian officers meant by "should events occur."

Alexander I and his newly married consort, the Russian-born Queen Draga, a union violently opposed by the Serbian military.

The military clique numbered about 150 young officers led by Dimitrijevic, a giant of a man with grotesque, dark features. Their opportunity came when Alexander rigged the general elections in May 1903. On the balmy, Wednesday evening of June 10, 1903, Alexander and Draga sat on the royal balcony in their Belgrade palace, listening to a band serenade them from the gardens below. At that same time, Dimitrijevic gathered the officers of his secret society, getting these men fairly drunk in pubs located near the palace. Within a few hours, the half-drunken officers resolved to invade the palace and execute the Obrenovics.

An officer of the king's guard turned over the keys to the palace gates to Captain Dimitrijevic. The group of usurping officers rushed inside the Konac Palace, pistols drawn. Captain Panayotovic, in charge of the king's personal guard, was sprawled unconscious on a sofa, his wine having been drugged. He regained consciousness just as the intruders barged into the main hall. He drew his pistol and charged at the insurgents, firing. He was shot down, along with several soldiers still loyal to Alexander. The iron doors leading to the inner palace were, however, bolted from within. Dimitrijevic had anticipated this barrier and had brought along a large amount of dynamite. The doors were blown down, the explosion knocking out the electricity in the palace.

Alexander and Draga by then realized that a coup was in process. They frantically called for their servants and guards, but got no response. Terrified, they secreted themselves in a hidden dressing room leading from the queen's bedroom suite. Meanwhile, Dimitrijevic and forty other officers rushed into the inner palace, groping in the dark, unsure of their footing. They encountered Captain Milkovic, who drew his pistol and fired at him. He was shot down. Finding the grand staircase to the monarchs' suites, the interlopers began to run up the large marble stairs. At the head of the stairs stood a lone guardsman, Lieutenant Lavar Petrovic, one of the king's most loyal aides.

Petrovic held a pistol in one hand and a saber in another. Dimitrijevic and his men came to a halt, staring upward at the man, who, when ordered to step aside, refused. The usurpers hesitated to kill Petrovic, knowing him to be brave and honorable. "Step aside, lieutenant," Dimitrijevic called out to him, "so that justice can be done and Serbia saved!" Petrovic shouted: "You're all traitors! Get back! Back!" He then valiantly advanced alone down the stairs toward them, firing his pistol and lashing out with his sword. A dozen pistols barked in the hands of the conspirators and Petrovic collapsed dead, rolling down the stairs.

Outside the palace all was pandemonium. Police arrived to disperse the mobs of frenzied people who, when hearing the explosion that blew down the inner doors of the palace, believed that anarchists had blown up the royal residence. Policemen fired into the dense crowds. Members in the crowds fired back and several policemen were shot down. Chaos was quelled with the arrival of the Seventh Regiment. Its commander ordered his troops to keep the peace and told police authorities that he and his men had arrived to put down a coup and that they would secure the palace and save the monarchs. This was a lie. The troops were loyal to the conspirators and they quickly surrounded the palace in order to allow the insurgents to perform their bloody work.

Queen Draga of Serbia, shown in her royal regalia (patterned after the empress of Russia), who persuaded Alexander I to embrace Russian policies, causing Serbian officers to plan their murders.

Inside the palace, Dimitrijevic and his men were beginning to panic. Without light, it seemed impossible to locate their victims. They ran throughout the palace in their desperate search for Alexander and Draga, combing the cavernous cellars, racing through the ornate halls and crashing through locked doors of bedrooms they found empty. Someone went to look for candles as the exhausted officers sat down in the throne room, waiting for light. The entire plot had turned into a lurid melodrama, a bizarre Balkan opera. At last, candles were located and the officers, flickering tapers held high, went slowly through the labyrinthine chambers of the upper floor, seeking the queen's suite.

Queen Draga's suite in the Belgrade Palace, where enraged Black Hand Society officers wrecked the furniture in their desperate search for the royal couple.

When the officers did discover Draga's chamber, they found nothing. For ninety minutes they tapped on walls and stomped on floors, looking for secret panels or trapdoors. An elderly servant was brought into the suite and told that if he did not reveal the place where Alexander and Draga were hiding he would be killed. He pointed a quaking finger to the wall where the queen's secret dressing closet was located. The closet had no handle and could only be opened from behind a seam of wallpaper to slip the latch. Several officers with axes began to chop at the wall. Trapped inside the closet and now frightened at being discovered, Alexander and Draga, who up till then had remained silent, opened a small window of the closet that faced Milan Street and began to shout for help. Captain Kostic, an officer in the street heard them, but he was one of the conspirators. He drew a pistol and fired at them, his bullet almost striking the king.

Having failed to find the secret chamber, the officers waited. Dimitrijevic slumped to the floor of the queen's suite, mumbling "utter failure." He placed the muzzle of his pistol in his mouth. The coup was about to collapse, or so Dimitrijevic suspected and he did not intend to face a firing squad. Just before he pulled the trigger, Dimitrijevic saw Captain Kostic arrive. He pointed out the area where the closet was located. Before the closet door was split wide by the ax-wielding officers, it slowly opened and Alexander and Draga appeared. The officers, holding their candles high, lowered their pistols and shrank back into the darkness.

Alexander stood before them in plain trousers and a red silk shirt. Draga, who had been naked when the couple took flight, wore only a petticoat, white silk stays and one yellow stocking. What happened next was much debated later. An officer reportedly stepped forth and told Alexander to abdicate immediately because he had "dishonored the throne by wedding a public prostitute [Draga]." Alexander then produced a pistol and shot the officer dead. Another story held that Alexander and Draga simply pleaded for their lives, promising to leave the country if spared.

Dimitrijevic did not negotiate. He stepped forward and fired point blank at the two monarchs. His men then hacked the bodies to pieces with their swords. The bodies were then thrown from the main balcony to the gardens below while Dimitrijevic and his men shouted: "Long live Peter Karageorgevic, king of Serbia!" Before leaving the palace, the usurpers wrecked the queen's chamber, slashing the imported Arabian carpet, smashing the ornate bookcases and tables and chairs, then looting Draga's jewelry before stumbling back to the pubs to celebrate their "victory." More than fifty persons, mostly palace guards, had been murdered during the assassinations, including two of Draga's brothers.

At dawn, with a light rain falling, passersby on King Milan Street viewed the gruesome remains of the monarchs, whose bodies had been purposely left in the open as a symbol of the successful coup. The Russian ambassador, who had spotted the bodies (which had been stripped naked) from his nearby residence, convinced guards to remove the corpses. They were hosed down, wrapped in sheets and then carried into the palace. A physician conducting a post mortem on the corpses, noted that Alexander had received more than thirty wounds and Draga twice that number. Currying favor with the new regime, the doctor removed and examined Alexander's brain. Without any real evidence from his gruesome findings, he reported that the monarch had been "completely mad." The bodies were then placed in plain boxes reserved for murderers, suicides and smallpox victims and taken to St. Mark's Cemetery for burial in common graves.

Queen Draga's secret dressing room, where Alexander I and Queen Draga hid from their assassins; their naked bodies were thrown from a window in this room.

The officers involved in the assassinations awarded themselves handsome payments for having killed their sovereigns, and most were elevated to higher rank when Peter Karageorgevic returned from exile in Geneva to be sworn in as Peter I. Dragutin Dimitrijevic, who had planned the regicides, was named chief of intelligence of the Serbian general staff and would later rise to the rank of general. He would go on to become known in the inner circles of the nationalist movements as Europe's master assassin (using the code name "Colonel Apis"). He was responsible for dozens of assassination attempts, including the killing of Archduke Francis Ferdinand at Sarajevo at the hands of a Serbian zealot into whose hands Dimitrijevic had placed a pistol and a bomb.

FLOWERS AND BLOOD/February 1, 1908

King Carlos I, the profligate monarch of Portugal, murdered in 1908.

Like Serbia, Portugal had long endured a profligate king, Carlos I (1863-1908), an expansive fun-loving monarch who indulged himself in almost every extravagance and in the process ignored the real needs of his country. He allowed a venal, utterly corrupt government to flagrantly loot the national treasury, increase impossible taxes and mock the very laws it was supposed to enforce. Financial speculation, bribery and outright theft marked Carlos' administration. Carlos was oblivious to such corruption, spending millions on his palaces, expensive global tours and lavish fetes. By 1907, open revolution was in the offing and the king momentarily came to his senses, realizing that the Cortes (parliament) was out of control.

To appease the great unrest and to pacify the veiled threats of those in the military, especially retired soldiers, Carlos appointed 52-year-old Joao Franco as prime minister. He was to root out corruption and set the government in order. He did just the opposite. As leader of the Regenerator Party, Franco became (like his namesake in Spain thirty years later) a virtual dictator. He gave himself an astronomical salary while canceling an enormous debt owed by the king to his own country.

Franco incensed nationalists by suppressing all political groups, arresting so many dissidents that the state prisons and the Caxias Fortress were bursting with prisoners. A popular Republican uprising was mercilessly crushed by Franco's troops in Oporto, but this only increased opposition to Carlos' reign. There was talk of revolution and assassination everywhere. Carlos nevertheless signed into law all of Franco's repressive measures and continued to ride about Lisbon in his open carriage, where he was met by stony silence from angry inhabitants.

Crown Prince Luis, who was also killed in the 1908 attack in Lisbon.

Indifferent to the massive hostility his policies had created, Franco heard often that he himself was marked for assassination. "Attempts at murder prove nothing," he snorted. "Suppose I am assassinated. What does that prove against my ideas?" To a group of Republican extremists, who were members of the Carbonari (a secret nationalist society not unlike the Black Hand Society of Serbia) assassination would release Portugal from the grip of a tyrannical prime minister and an unwanted king.

This group was led by 30-year-old Manuel Buica, a schoolteacher and an ex-sergeant of the 7th Cavalry. Buica, a widower with a seven-year-old daughter, was an expert rifleman who had won prizes for his marksmanship from the hands of the king. His motives for forming the assassination plot were never made clear, except that he was a dedicated nationalist wanting Portugal to regain its power and prestige of old. He was joined in his plot by several craftsmen, the most notable being Alfredo Costa, an ironmonger and editor of a small nationalist newspaper.

The assassins made plans to shoot King Carlos on February 1, 1908, when his cortege returned from a country estate and his carriage entered the largest square in Lisbon, the Praca.

Crowds mill about in Lisbon's Praca do Commercio, where King Carlos and his son, Prince Luis, were shot to death.

Assassins kill King Carlos I and Prince Luis while Queen Marie Amélie pummels an attacker with a bouquet of flowers.

King Carlos and Queen Marie Amélie were riding that day in a large open carriage drawn by four horses. Accompanying them were their two grown sons, Prince Luis and Prince Manoel. The carriage moved slowly along a two-mile trip to the Necessidades Palace. Thousands of citizens lined the route, standing in strange silence. Only a few spectators waved or cheered.

The assassins, perhaps as many as ten (the number was never determined), waited beneath the huge arches at the Rue do Arsenal, which faced the Praca. When the king's carriage rolled into the square, Costa raced from beneath an arch, a revolver in his hand, slamming through the crowds and jumping onto the footrest of the carriage. As he did so, Carlos began to stand up inside the carriage. Costa shot him point blank in the neck.

The queen's shrieks of horror could be heard throughout the square. As Carlos collapsed onto the floor of the carriage, the queen began to beat the assassin with a large bouquet of camelias and violets she had been given upon her return to the city. The carriage began to race forward, Costa clinging to it, managing to fire a second shot that struck the king in the back. Police by then had grabbed the killer, who was thrown to the ground. Costa fired a third shot that went wild and the police shot him to death.

Inside the racing carriage, the hysterical queen screamed as she reached for Carlos, now slumped on the floor, blood gushing from his wounds, dying. His two sons had drawn their revolvers just as Buica then leaped forward, firing a rifle twice, the two bullets striking Crown Prince Luis in the head and chest, instantly killing him. Prince Manoel fired his revolver four times at Buica at almost the same moment, striking the assassin in the arm. Buica still managed to fire another shot from his rifle, wounding Prince Manoel. All of the males of the royal family were either dead or wounded, lying inside the fast-moving carriage, its frightened horses stampeding. The queen bravely stood in the carriage, shielding the bodies of her husband and sons.

Carriages behind the royal coach rushed forward and guard officers jumped from these, attempting to protect the monarchs by running alongside the royal carriage with drawn revolvers and sabers. A lady-in-waiting raced from one of the following carriages and jumped into the royal coach to help the queen. The queen shouted to the young woman: "Go away! Go away! I don't want you to be killed, too!" Other assassins had also fired at the fleeing carriage. It was struck by twelve more bullets as it left the Praca, racing down the Rue do Arsenal, its bloody passengers—the royal house of Braganza—covered with the petals of the flowers the queen had broken over Costa's head.

Buica, the mastermind of the assassination, attempted to flee through the crowd at the Praca, but he was grabbed by a soldier, Alvaro Siloa Valente, who held the assassin by the throat while one of the king's aides, Captain Carlos Figueiro, raced forward, drawing his sword and striking Buica with it. As he fell under these blows, Buica squeezed off two more shots from his rifle, wounding Figueiro in the leg and Valente in the thigh. A policeman ran forward and shot Buica twice, but the die-hard assassin struggled with the officer for his revolver, biting the policeman on the hand so hard that he drew blood. Figueiro then began hacking away at Buica with his sword until the assassin fell mortally wounded to the ground. He died a few hours later.

The driver of the royal coach had been wounded by one of the shots fired by the assassins in the crowd, but he managed to bring the carriage to the Medical Hall, where King Carlos and Prince Luis were taken inside. Both were placed on mattresses and within minutes were pronounced dead. The queen and her surviving son, Prince Manoel, were taken to the nearby Weighing House where they were heavily guarded. Queen Mother Maria Pia appeared to mourn the loss of her son and grandson, later lashing out at Franco for having created conditions that brought about the assassinations. Franco himself had escaped death by declining to accompany the royal family that day.

In returning to the palace along the very route where the assassinations earlier occurred that day, the dead king Carlos and his son, Prince Luis, presented a macabre picture. The bodies had been propped up in the open carriage, held in position by guards, as if to declare that the dead King Carlos was still in authority. The royal carriage and its morbid contents and several coaches following it traveled back through the Praca, a gruesome parade that was witnessed by thousands of startled citizens. Prince Manoel was named king, but his power and position would soon wane when nationalism swept a strong Republic into existence. The once powerful dictator Franco resigned his position four days after the assassinations and left Portugal in exile, living out his life in Italy.

DEATH OF AN ARCHDUKE/June 28, 1914

Fierce nationalism in Europe was unintentionally nurtured by the doddering Austro-Hungarian empire, which had for centuries been ruled by the Hapsburgs. At the turn of the 20th Century, Emperor Francis Joseph was still in power, his autocratic fist controlling a vast domain of many nations and peoples, of many tongues and cultures. In addition to Austria, the empire spread through Hungary and included all the southern Slavs. Among these mixed and contentious nationalities were the Serbs and Croats in Bosnia and Herzegovina, southern Slavic provinces under the domination of Austria.

By 1914, Bosnia was a hotbed of radicals and would-be assassins led mostly by a Serbian secret organization known as the Black Hand Society. This shadowy organization was headed by the dedicated Serbian nationalist, Dragutin Dimitrijevic, chief of intelligence of the Serbian general staff, who used the code name "Colonel Apis." He was behind the assassinations of many European monarchs and was personally responsible for leading the slaughterhouse assassination of King Alexander I (Obrenovic) and Queen Draga in 1903. He and his conspirators had long been planning to rid Serbia of Austrian control through the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand.

The autocratic Archduke Francis Ferdinand, whose assassination in 1914 prompted World War I.

Son of Archduke Charles Louis and nephew of the mighty

Emperor Francis Joseph, Francis Ferdinand (Francis Ferdinand von Osterreich-Este, 1863-1914) was the heir apparent to the Austro-Hungarian empire. He typified the unyielding autocrats of his era. This elegant, imperial Hapsburg prince came in line for the succession to the throne in 1896. His uncle, Francis Joseph, had ruled the empire since 1848. He had no son and his brother, Maximilian von Hapsburg, had attempted to rule Mexico and was executed by revolutionaries under Benito Juarez at Querétaro in 1867. Next in line for Francis Joseph's throne was Archduke Charles Louis, a Jesuit-trained religious zealot who traveled to Jerusalem and there, against the advice of aides, insisted upon drinking tainted water from the Jordan River. He promptly died of typhoid, and his son, Francis Ferdinand, became the heir apparent.

As a child, the archduke was trained by tutors in the concepts of ruling by divine right and he was highly influenced at an early age by military instructors. At the age of fourteen he was commissioned a lieutenant in the Austrian army. At the age of twenty-eight, Francis Ferdinand was a major-general. He toured the world and wrote a book about his travels. An avid hunter, he prided himself on shooting a thousand stags by the age of thirty-three, five thousand by the age of forty-six.

Archduke Francis Ferdinand (top right, in plumed hat) and his morganatic wife, Sophie, are shown arriving in Sarajevo, only a few hours before their assassinations while driving in the open touring car they are about to enter.

In 1900, the archduke fell in love with Countess Sophie Chotek von Chotkova, the daughter of an obscure Czech noble. She was a lady-in-waiting to Princess Isabella, cousin of Francis Ferdinand. She was not a suitable wife for the archduke, the emperor told his nephew, and he forbade the marriage. The headstrong Francis Ferdinand defied the emperor, insisting that he be allowed to marry the woman he loved. Francis Joseph finally relented, but only on the condition that the archduke would be the last of his line to inherit the Austrian monarchy. Francis Ferdinand agreed, renouncing the right of his children to inherit the throne. Three children produced by the marriage had no rank in the monarchy, nor did his wife. Sophie would be without status, a morganatic spouse.

As such, the noble house of Hapsburg shunned and mistreated this poor woman. She was snubbed and humiliated through royal court procedures. She could not sit in any royal carriage with her husband, nor could she sit in any royal theater box occupied by the archduke. At royal balls and other official court events, she could not accompany her husband in any procession, but was compelled to walk discreetly behind the lowest-ranked Hapsburg princess. This treatment of his wife embittered Francis Ferdinand. His disposition had already turned sour after he contracted pulmonary tuberculosis while in his twenties. At that time, his death was predicted. He nevertheless survived, but was thereafter subject to violent fits of temper. Some court officials whispered that the archduke had gone insane because of this crippling disease, but no such condition really existed.

In addition to being a pronounced religious bigot and a virulent anti-Semite, Francis Ferdinand disliked and denounced the Serbians, considering them to be part of a hostile Magyar race bent on the destruction of the Hapsburgs. Where the Serbian nationalists sought to unify all of the southern Slavic provinces in a large national Slavic state, Francis Ferdinand, as well as his iron-willed uncle, Emperor Francis Joseph, were determined to subdue these unruly provinces. Opposition to the empire chiefly stemmed from the defiant country of Serbia, the Hapsburgs knew, and they seriously considered invading this small nation to bring it into the obedient fold of their empire.

At first, Francis Ferdinand displayed an appeasing posture toward the Serbo-Croatian movement for Slavic unification. He spoke about these countries and the southern Slavic provinces having the kind of autonomous governments as did Hungary, separate from direct Austrian control, but nevertheless under Austria's domination. The Serbs defiantly rejected such ideas and spread their nationalistic views to Austrian Slavic states. In response, Francis Ferdinand grew more and more reactionary.

The Serbs grew in power in 1912-1913, when, after two bloody but brief Balkan wars, the Turks were driven from the area. Bosnia became the center of anti-Austrian movements. The chief revolutionary leader at that time was Luka Jucic. One of his proteges was Gavrilo Princip, a youth with ardent beliefs in Slavic nationalism. It was this idealistic youth, who, with three bullets, would bring an end to the Hapsburg dynasty and hurl Europe into a cataclysmic war.

Francis Ferdinand and wife Sophie sitting in the back seat of the touring car that would take them through Sarajevo, where they survived the first attack, a bombing.

In 1913, nationalists increased their demonstrations, published anti-Austrian newspapers and sabotaged Austrian military operations. Retaliation was swift. Austrian officials, police and military units suppressed all political gatherings in Croatia and Herzegovina. In Bosnia, nationalists were tracked down in the streets and thrown into cells without official charges. This incensed the most zealous in their ranks, who then began to plan the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand when he arrived in Sarajevo, Bosnia, on June 28, 1914, after overseeing maneuvers of the Austrian army.

Francis Ferdinand looked forward to appearing in Sarajevo, because it would give him the chance to have his wife appear as his equal, riding with him in an open car at his side. The imperial court restrictions against her did not hold in Bosnia. Once she appeared in Bosnia with the archduke, she would be recognized as a member of the royal household, at least on this visit. There were dangers in Sarajevo and Francis Ferdinand knew it. On June 3, 1911, when the ancient Emperor Francis Joseph arrived in Sarajevo on a state visit, Bogdan Zeradjic, the 23-year-old son of a Serbian peasant, was waiting to kill him.

Zeradjic had obtained a revolver provided by the insidious Colonel Apis (Dragutin Dimitrijevic), chief of the Black Hand Society. He was hiding behind a pillar when the emperor's car passed and aimed the revolver at Francis Joseph, but he could not bring himself to fire. Cursing himself for failing to murder the monarch, Zeradjic thought to redeem himself by barging into the offices of General Marijan Varesanin, the oppressive Hapsburg governor. He shot the general five times before shouting: "I leave my revenge to Serbdom!" He then sent the sixth bullet into his own head, killing himself. General Varesanin survived his wounds and his would-be assassin was dumped into an unmarked grave.

Gavrilo Princip vowed to take that revenge himself. The son of a peasant, he grew up as a shepherd, but his strong-willed mother insisted that he receive a proper education and he was sent to school at Grahovo. He later attended a merchant school to become a businessman and trader. He attempted to enlist in the Serbian army to fight the Turks, but was rejected as being too small and weak. He moved to Belgrade and lived hand-to-mouth, along with a number of other youthful nationalists, including the son of a cafe owner, who provided him with board. The son, 19-year-old Nedeliko Cabrinovic, along with Trifko Grabez, united with Princip in his ambition to kill Francis Ferdinand when he arrived in Sarajevo.

Gavrilo Princip, who killed Francis Ferdinand and his wife, Sophie.

The three youths then began to search for weapons. A friend introduced them to Colonel Dragutin Dimitrijevic, the notorious Colonel Apis, who headed the Black Hand Society. Dimitrijevic listened to the youths as they outlined their rash murder plan. At first, he dismissed the idea of using these young men as his implement of assassination, but Dimitrijevic was a realist. He had tried many times to arrange assassinations of the archduke and the Austrian emperor, but such plans had always met with failure.

Dimitrijevic provided the youths with Browning revolvers and ammunition. He also gave them six bombs and some cyanide capsules that they were to swallow after killing the archduke, in the event they faced capture. Dimitrijevic confided to a friend that he had no expectations that the youths would be successful. "Why then are you entrusting such an important mission to a group of untrained boys?" Replied Dimitrijevic: "They are novices, certainly, but there is an outright chance that they just might blunder into a success. We might as well give them a try at it as any other." No one was more surprised than Dimitrijevic to learn a short time later that Princip, a nonentity, had achieved what every assassin in Bosnia had waited a lifetime to do, murder the heir to the Hapsburg throne.

Three conspirators who plotted the murder of Francis Ferdinand: Nedeliko Cabrinovic, who threw the bomb at Sarajevo, Black Hand Society member Milan Ciganovic and Gavrilo Princip, who shot the royal couple.

Princip, Cabrinovic and Grabez spent the next week practicing with the Browning revolvers, target shooting at dusk in the Kosutujak Park in Belgrade when no one was about. They practiced shooting while standing still and then fired at their targets as they ran past them. Within days, they felt that they were reasonably good marksmen. They then received funds from Dimitrijevic and were escorted to Sarajevo by an agent of the Black Hand Society, Milan Ciganovic, who had fought in the Serbo-Turkish war.

Once in Sarajevo, the boys were given lodgings by friends and they busied themselves with marking the route along which the archduke and his entourage would travel when arriving in the city. Princip, joined by three more youths, posted his five friends along the route, assigning each a job. They were to throw bombs and grenades, then fire at the archduke from their positions. If each or all failed to kill the heir apparent, Princip, who would be waiting at the end of the route, would have the ultimate responsibility of murdering Francis Ferdinand.

Aiding the assassins was a decision made by the archduke himself. He had ordered his crack army divisions to stay out of Sarajevo that day to avoid intimidating the population. He was to be escorted only by a small elite guard. Francis Ferdinand's private train arrived in Sarajevo to the blare of a welcoming band. Six long touring cars awaited the archduke and his entourage. The Hapsburgs looked plump and elegant in their fine attire, the archduke wearing his general's uniform and a hat with green plumes. Sophie wore a white silk dress with a red sash, a huge picture hat and a cape with ermine tails. She carried a parasol to fend off the hot June sun.

The Hapsburgs sat in the rear of the second touring car as the caravan moved along the Appel Quay. The streets were festively decorated with the Austrian flag and the Bosnian colors of red and yellow. Small portraits of the archduke adorned lampposts, and the crowd seemed receptive to the royal guests, many waving, some cheering as the archduke passed them. Three of Princip's friends who were waiting with bombs and revolvers along the route, lost their nerve and took no action. Cabrinovic, however, threw a grenade as the entourage moved past the Cumuria Bridge. It bounced off the archduke's car and exploded in front of the third car, damaging it and sending splinters into the crowd. Several of those riding in the third car and several spectators were injured.

The car carrying the royal couple sped up, its driver seeking safety, while security police chased Cabrinovic to the River Miljacka. He dove in, but was quickly caught in shallow water. He tried to swallow the cyanide pill Dimitrijevic had given him, but it burned his mouth and he vomited. A security man holding onto him, asked: "Who are you?" Cabrinovic replied: "A Serbian hero!" He was hustled off to jail. Meanwhile, the archduke's caravan arrived at the town hall where a quick conference was held on what the royal couple should do next. Princip, the leader of the assassins, learned of Cabrinovic's failure and, disgusted, went to a small cafe and sat at an outside table, sipping coffee. Inside his pocket rested a Browning revolver. He pondered his next move.

At the town hall, Mayor Fehim Effendi Curcic began to make a welcoming speech. He was unaware of the bomb explosion; it had been muffled by the roars and cheers greeting the speeding caravan when it arrived at the town hall. The angry archduke grabbed him by the arm and said: "Mr. Mayor, what is the good of your speeches? One comes here for a visit and is received by bombs! Mr. Mayor, what do you say? It is outrageous! All right, now you may speak." Curcic was perplexed, thinking the archduke was joking. After making his speech brief, Curcic then learned to his horror of the assassination attempt. Francis Ferdinand then sent a wire to the emperor, informing him of the bombing and telling him that he and his wife were unharmed.

Opposite page: Assassin Princip races to the car carrying Archduke Francis Ferdinand, fatally shooting the Hapsburg heir and his wife, Sophie.

The archduke debated whether or not to continue his visit. He took General Potiorek aside, grimly joking about expecting "more bullets later" that day. Potiorek told him that a second attempt on his life was unlikely in that the bomb-thrower had been captured and there was no evidence that he had had any confederates. To that, Francis Ferdinand replied: "Hang him as quickly as possible or Vienna will give him a decoration," meaning that his political opponents in Vienna would applaud the attack.

Francis Ferdinand next told his wife that he was going to the military hospital to visit those who had been wounded in the bombing, but that she was not to accompany him. She adamantly refused to stay behind, saying: "No, I must go with you." The archduke reluctantly agreed. The route taken to the military hospital, according to the archduke's own instructions, was to follow the Appel Quay, which had now been cleared of spectators so that the royal car could move rapidly to its destination.

The couple returned to their car, sitting in the back seat. Next to the driver was the archduke's top aide, Count Ferdinand Harrach. He turned in his seat and said to General Potiorek, who sat in the back facing the royal couple: "Has not your excellency arranged for a military guard to protect his imperial highness?" Indignant at this question, General Potiorek swivelled about and snapped: "Do you think Sarajevo is full of assassins, Count Harrach?"

Count Harrach was not to be put off. He expressed genuine fears for the safety of the archduke and his wife. He said he would stand on the left running board of the car, which most exposed the couple to pedestrians, to shield them from any further attacks. He began to swing open the car door and take that position when the archduke motioned him back into his seat, saying: "Don't make a fool of yourself."

The motorcade drove off and just beyond the town hall, at the Imperial Bridge, it passed Grabez, who spotted the archduke's car. He thought of throwing his bomb, but he was afraid that he would injure innocent spectators, who were running after the entourage. Grabez raced home to his room to hide. At the corner of the Appel Quay and Francis Joseph Street, the chauffeur of the couple's car suddenly turned onto Francis Joseph Street, a route that had already been canceled. General Potiorek shouted: "What's this? We've taken the wrong way!" The driver hit the brakes, trying to turn around, but the swelling crowds behind the car prevented this. The car was idling for some moments directly in front of Moritz Schiller's cafe and delicatessen, where Gavrilo Princip sat sipping coffee. At that moment, Princip was only a few feet from his target.

"I recognized the heir apparent," Princip would say only an hour later to interrogators. "But as I saw that a lady [Sophie] was sitting next to him, I reflected for a moment whether I should shoot or not. At the same moment, I was filled with a peculiar feeling and I aimed at the heir apparent from the pavement—which was made easier because the car was proceeding slower at the moment. Where I aimed I do not know. But I know that I aimed at the heir apparent. I believe I fired twice, perhaps more, because I was so excited. [He fired three times.] Whether I hit the victims or not, I cannot tell, because instantly people started to hit me."

Another version that shows Princip (center, on foot near car) shooting Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his wife, Sophie.

At the moment the car came to a stop in front of the cafe, Princip stood up like an automaton and advanced on the unprotected couple, drawing the Browning revolver from his pocket. He aimed without obstruction at the archduke. Just as he was about to fire, a policeman saw Princip raise the weapon and rushed forward, but the officer was knocked down by an unemployed actor named Pusara, allowing Princip to fire his shots at close range. The policeman regained his feet and dove for Princip, who was turning to flee. At that moment, another man, Ferdinand Behr, stepped forward and punched the officer in the stomach, allowing Princip to escape momentarily. He did not run, however, but stood close to the car, seeming to be in a stupor. Princip raised the revolver again, perhaps to shoot himself—his motive and action was unclear. A man named Velic then knocked the weapon from Princip's hand and the assassin was pummeled and kicked by spectators swarming over him. Policemen and military officers wedged through the milling, scuffling crowd and, grabbing Princip, hustled him away to safety.

Under arrest, the assassin, Princip (right, held by two guards), is hustled into a police station, where he admitted killing Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his wife, Sophie.

Inside the royal car, General Potiorek was puzzled as he looked at the royal couple, who stared straight ahead. Both had been shot and were apparently trying to hide their wounds from each other. They said nothing for some moments as the car picked up speed. Princip's first shot had smashed through the car door and entered Sophie's abdomen. The second shot, fired at a higher level, ploughed through the high military collar worn by the archduke, cutting the jugular vein and lodging behind his spine. Suddenly, jets of blood shot from the archduke's mouth, splattering the uniform of General Potiorek, who sat thunderstruck by the gory scene.

"For God's sake," Sophie cried to her husband. "What has happened to you?" She then lost consciousness and slipped to her knees in the car, her head sliding along the archduke's chest and onto his lap. Francis Ferdinand cradled her head and cried out: "Sophie, dear, Sophie, dear, don't die! Stay alive for our children!" But by then she was dead in his arms. The archduke then began to sag forward, blood now pulsing from his neck wound. General Potiorek and Count Harrach, who had climbed into the back seat of the now speeding car, held on to him.

"Are you suffering?" asked Count Harrach.

"It is nothing, it is nothing," Francis Ferdinand replied. Then he died.

The royal couple arrived dead at the military hospital at 11 a.m. An hour later, Princip was taken before an examining magistrate, Dr. Leo Pfeffer. Wrote Pfeffer later: "It was difficult to imagine that so frail-looking an individual should have committed so serious a deed. Even his clear, blue eyes, burning and piercing but serene, had nothing cruel or criminal in their expression. They spoke of innate intelligence, of steady and harmonious energy."

Pfeffer informed Princip that he had killed Francis Ferdinand and Duchess Sophie and that he was officially charged with their murders. "I acknowledge it and do not complain," Princip replied in a steady voice, "but I am sorry that I have killed the Duchess of Hohenberg, for I had no intention of killing her." He then began to openly talk of the assassination, something Colonel Dimitrijevic had feared (he had given the cyanide capsules to the youthful assassins so that none involved would live to reveal who had been behind the murders). "I aimed specifically at the archduke," Princip went on, "because he is an enemy of the Slavs in general, but especially of the Serbs."

In that moment, Princip identified his loyalties and had given cause to open war between Austria and Serbia. At his trial a short time later, Princip became even more specific in detailing his motives, expressing a philosophy that could have been written in the Belgrade offices of Colonel Dimitrijevic. Said Princip: "I do not feel like a criminal, because I put away the one who was doing evil. Austria as it is represents evil for our people and therefore should not exist ... The political union of the Yugoslavs was always before my eyes, and that was my basic idea. Therefore it was necessary in the first place to free the Yugoslavs from Austria. This moved me to carry out the assassination of the heir apparent as I considered him very dangerous for Yugoslavia."

From October 12 to October 27, 1914, twenty-five Serbians were brought to trial. Some confessed everything, including their ties to Colonel Dimitrijevic and Serbia's government-backed Black Hand Society. The link between the assassination and Serbia was firmly established and the Austrian government soon moved to declare war on Serbia. Three of the conspirators were executed, but Princip, thought to be under the legal age for execution, was imprisoned, along with Cabrinovic, Grabez and others. Cabrinovic and Grabez died in prison in 1916 of malnutrition and tuberculosis. The latter also afflicted Princip and the disease, through purposeful medical negligence, rotted one of his arms so badly that it had to be amputated. He lingered, half-starved, in a windowless cell, until he died on April 28, 1918. Authorities entered his cell to find him curled into a tight ball on his hard bunk. On the wall, the assassin had scrawled: "Our ghosts will walk through Vienna/And roam through the palace/Frightening the lords."

The bloody tunic of Archduke Francis Ferdinand, put on display by irate Hapsburg officials to herald Austria's declaration of war on Serbia, a world war that spread across Europe and the Middle East.

Decades earlier, the German leader, Otto von Bismarck, had stated that a world war would erupt some day because of "some damn foolish thing in the Balkans." That "foolish thing" was the killing of Francis Ferdinand at Sarajevo. One month to the day after the assassination, Austria declared war on Serbia and Austrian planes bombed Belgrade the following day. Russia then declared war on Austria and Germany sided with Austria against Russia. England, France and other countries formed ranks, mobilized their armies and pitched headlong into the bloodiest conflict of the 20th century to that date. It would end in 1918, only months after the death of Gavrilo Princip. By then the Austro-Hungarian empire had ceased to exist. Princip's dream, that of a united Slavic state, came into existence with the formation of Yugoslavia. The assassin is considered a national hero of that country and a major boulevard in Belgrade is named after him.

Following the assassination, Archduke Francis Ferdinand was buried with full military honors in Vienna with his crest and military insignias, all the regalia and rank of royalty surrounding his ornate coffin. His wife, Sophie, remained a social pariah. Her coffin, plainer than her husband's, was placed at a lower level on the funeral bier to signify that she had no station of importance, even in death. On her coffin was placed a pair of white gloves and a black fan, symbols of a lady-in-waiting. The architect of these deaths, the ubiquitous Colonel Dimitrijevic (Colonel Apis), would meet the same kind of fate, executed by his own Serbian masters in 1917, after Serbia's fortune had soured and he was blamed for bringing ruination upon his country by arming a group of schoolboys to kill an archduke.

The slain Archduke Francis Ferdinand (right) and his wife, Sophie, lying in state in Vienna, only days after their lethal visit to Sarajevo—two deaths that would cause millions more to die.

THE END OF THE CZARS

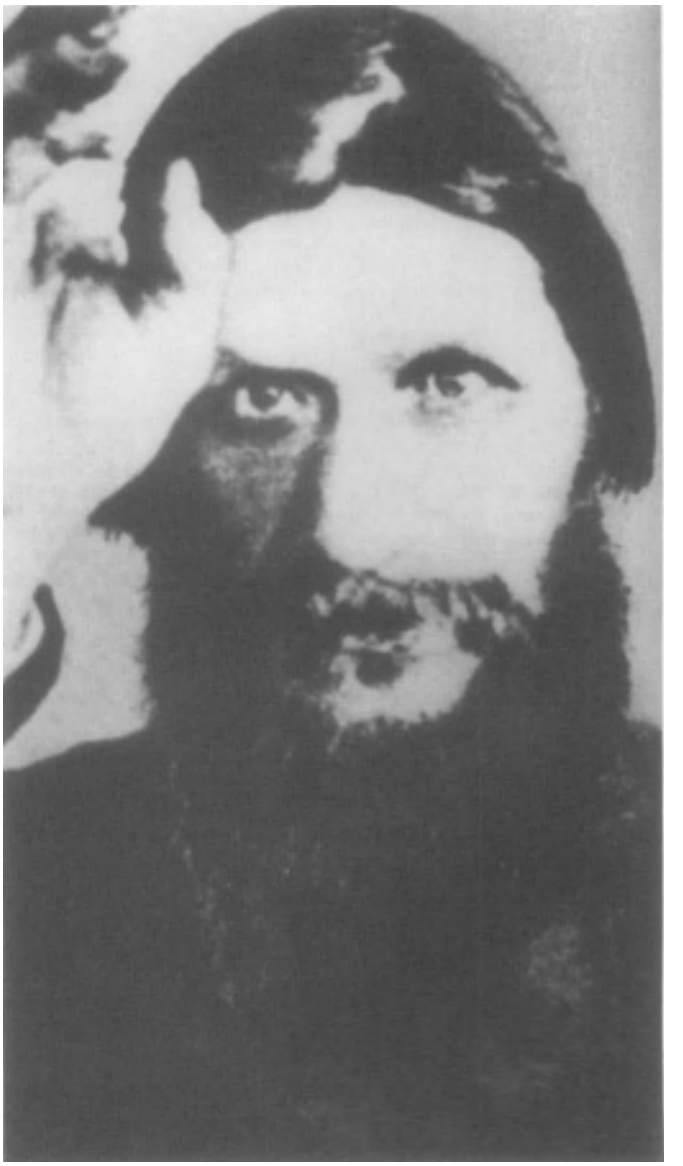
The shooting in Sarajevo was not only the catalyst for World War I, but in its wake came the destruction of European dynasties that had controlled for centuries the lives of millions. Gone were the Hapsburgs of Austria and the Hohenzollerns of Germany (with the abdication of Kaiser Wilhelm at the end of the war, November 28, 1918). Also swept into history's dustbin were the Romanovs of Russia, the greatest of eastern European monarchies. For decades, this creaking dynasty held autocratic control over enormous ill-fed and poorly treated populations. These impoverished, uneducated millions nevertheless, through authoritative fear and mystic religious beliefs, loyally clung to an abusive czar, Nicholas II, until that autocrat made it impossible for his own reign to continue.

Mysticism was at the root of the czar's deepest problems, embodied in a strange character known as Gregory Rasputin. The czar, through his son, Alexis, the last heir to the Romanov throne, came under control of this nomadic religious guru. The degenerate Rasputin dangerously meddled in all governmental matters, undermining and eventually destroying the czar's authority and image. Coupled with the endless scandals and political meddling of Rasputin was an attritional war that drained Russia of men, money and materials. The result was widespread unrest, leading to Rasputin's bizarre assassination and, subsequently, a chaotic revolution that destroyed the Romanov dynasty. It all began with thin blood coursing through the veins of a small boy.

MURDER OF A MAD MONK/ December 29, 1916

Gregory Rasputin (Gregori Efimovich Novyky, 1872-1916) was born a peasant in a small Siberian town. He grew to be a tall, powerful man, reportedly possessed of strange, hypnotic powers, which he had exercised since childhood. At an early age, he joined a heretical sect called the Khlysty, whose members were flagellants. Each night these cultists would whip themselves and each other bloody, then engage in sexual orgies that allowed them to punish themselves the next day—an endless circle of scheduled sin and repentance. Rasputin led the beatings and took more beatings than any other member. He also proved himself to have extraordinary sexual stamina, taking many partners each night.

The wild rites of the Khlysty came to the attention of local officials and soon the police began to investigate the leaders of the sect, focusing upon the towering Rasputin. Hearing this, he fled his home, deserting his wife and children. He later claimed that while plowing a field one day, he had a blinding vision of the Blessed Virgin Mary, who instructed him to go throughout Russia and preach the earthy religion of the Khlysty. He nomadically wandered through the vast stretches of Russia as a starets (holy man), claiming that he could heal the sick and cure the crippled. Arriving at a small village and, after determining that the local priests and officials were absent, Rasputin would announce to the naive, illiterate peasants that he had come to save souls by baptizing the entire community.



Gregory Rasputin, the hypnotic, lascivious Mad Monk, murdered in 1916.

Leading the inhabitants to a lake, Rasputin would baptize all the males and older women. The younger women, he announced, had to be baptized "by acts of the flesh." He would then commandeer a hut and have the young women brought to him one by one, sometimes in groups, while he ravished them throughout the night. He would be gone by morning, taking with him the coins and foodstuffs given to him by the gullible citizens for what they thought to be a religious kindness. This profitable swindle became Rasputin's lifestyle.

In 1903, officials, urged by leaders of the Russian Orthodox Church, conducted a widespread investigation of the Khlysty. From their findings, they decided to conduct an intensive country-wide purge of the sect. Its members were either arrested and put into prison or sent to Siberian wastelands to freeze to death. Sought most by police was the elusive Rasputin, but by then he had reached St. Petersburg, where high society matrons succumbed to his trances and manipulations and these wealthy women shielded the Mad Monk, as he came to be known, from prying officials. The sinister-looking Rasputin became the social rage of the city, receiving considerable funds from aristocratic females, who found him fascinating. They were attracted by his mesmeric personality, his piercing dark eyes, and his exotic and eccentric mannerisms.

Empress Alexandra and her hemophiliac son, Alexis, whose life was repeatedly saved by Rasputin through hypnotism.

In truth, there was absolutely nothing attractive about Rasputin. A contemporary profile described him as "ungainly ... coarse ... and ugly ... His big head was covered with unkempt brown hair, carelessly parted in the middle and flowing in long strands over his neck. On his high forehead a dark patch was visible, the scar of a wound. His broad, pock-marked nose stood out from his face, and his thin, pale lips were hidden by a limp, untidy mustache. His weather-beaten, sunburned skin was wrinkled and seamed in deep folds, his eyes were hidden under his projecting eyebrows, the right eye disfigured by a yellow blotch. The whole face was overgrown in a disheveled light brown beard."

Alexis, heir to the Russian throne.

Everything about Rasputin was crude. He displayed disgusting habits, eating with his hands, wiping his greasy fingers on his clothes or anything handy—drapes, tablecloths, carpets. Food clotted his beard and he seldom bathed, exuding an almost overwhelming stench. He defended his offensive body odor by stating that bathing was a ritual of the devil and that the truly religious person abstained from this habit so that the human body smelled like the free animals of the woodlands. "This is the natural odor of the flesh," he often intoned.

Oddly, Rasputin was invited to the best homes of St. Petersburg, the leisure class, the nobles of the city embracing this guru, for he had become the rage, the fashion. He preferred to attend social functions in these luxurious manor houses by taking all the females into a small room. There he would perform a wild dance. He would then gaze into the eyes of those females he thought most responsive to him and, apparently hypnotized (or pretending to be under his sway), these women would allow the starets to fondle them. As Rasputin's fame spread, his name was finally mentioned to the Empress Alexandra, who was told that his extraordinary hypnotic powers could bring about any cure.

Rasputin (seated) with czarist officers seeking political appointments, 1909; the manipulating monk used his influence with the czar to replace officials with his stooges.

The empress immediately seized upon the opportunity to employ those reported powers. Her son, Alexis, the heir to the Romanov throne, was afflicted with hemophilia and no doctors in the land were able to prevent the boy from hemorrhaging after only slightly bruising himself while playing. Desperately, Alexandra sought anyone who might help her son. She had consulted countless mystics and seers, but all had failed to aid her child. One mystic, Father Feofan, admitted his helplessness in aiding Alexis, but he told the empress that a man named Rasputin might be able to stop the boy's

A cartoon widely distributed by underground revolutionaries in Russia showing Rasputin bouncing Nicholas II and the empress on his knees as if they were children.

Prince Felix Yusupov, dressed in Cossack uniform, who plotted the assassination of the Mad Monk to rid Russia of the monk's control of the czar and the empress.

incessant bleeding. Rasputin was known to Countess Ignatiev, Father Feofan said. The countess, one of the empress' intimates, was summoned to the Winter Palace in St. Petersburg. There the countess told Alexandra that she herself had witnessed many of Rasputin's miraculous cures, but she failed to describe the sex orgies that had taken place in her palace and how she and her sister had participated in them with Rasputin.

Rasputin was summoned to the Winter Palace in November 1905. He arrived wearing a clean, pressed black robe and a caftan. He had bathed, trimmed his beard and combed his long hair. Without observing decorum, the monk strode into the czar's study. Instead of kneeling and kissing the hands of the monarchs, as was the custom, Rasputin startled the royal couple by kissing them on their foreheads, as if they were children. His patronizing, patriarchal manner completely disarmed the czar and czarina. Only moments later, servants informed the royal couple that their small son, Alexis, had had another accident and was bleeding. The frantic czarina immediately asked Rasputin if he could do anything for her son. "Certainly, certainly," he said and was taken to the nursery.

The beautiful Princess Irene Yusupov, who was used by her husband to lure the lust-loving Rasputin to his death.

Once inside Alexis' room, Rasputin went to a dark corner and fell to his knees, praying loudly, but incoherently. Then he stood up and blew out all the candles of the room except one. Holding the flickering candle in his hand, Rasputin went to the foot of the boy's bed. Alexis stared at this dark-bearded giant, who held the candle close to his eyes as he stared back at the boy. Slowly the monk made the sign of the cross and moved the candle back and forth slightly while gently talking to the boy, hypnotizing him. He then sat down on the bed and said softly: "I am your friend, the best friend you have in the world." He gently caressed the arms and legs of the boy, including the area that was bleeding. "Now, don't be afraid, Alesha," he soothed, "everything is all right again. Look, I have driven all your horrid pains away."

Continuing to massage the boy from head to foot, Rasputin kept talking in the same low voice. "Nothing will hurt you anymore and tomorrow you will be well again. Then you will see what jolly games we will have together." Alexis fell asleep. He was no longer in pain. When the czar and czarina looked closer, they were amazed to see that the bleeding had stopped. Rasputin, the monk, the mystic, had indeed done what no doctor or anyone else in Russia could do. He had performed a miracle in the eyes of the royal couple. In the following months, the family and the heir to the throne became utterly dependent upon Rasputin. He was called whenever the boy injured himself and began to bleed and on every occasion Rasputin talked to Alexis soothingly, stroking his body and mesmerizing him, while telling him wild tales of Siberia. The bleeding invariably stopped.

Because of the seeming power of life and death that Rasputin held over the heir to the Romanov throne, his influence upon Nicholas II was deep if not overwhelming. The monk had wholly captivated the empress, who was utterly convinced that her son's life depended wholly on Rasputin. Nicholas, a weak czar, always yielded to his wife's domination. When the czarina pronounced Rasputin as the family's savior, the czar nodded. Both grateful parents came to treat the monk as a father figure, kissing his hand whenever he came to save their son's life, which was often. He was given any amount of money he desired, a lavish apartment and his own royal carriages in which to travel. The royal couple made it known that Rasputin was the closest adviser and favorite to the throne.

The last photo taken of Rasputin at the time of his murder in 1916; he was drunk while making this sinister pose for the camera, pulling dried food from his clotted beard.

In shrewdly manipulating the czar and czarina through his control of their son, the monk proved to be brilliant and clever. Though he had no education, he was keenly aware of his position, and he was a consummate actor whose dramatic performances awed the monarchs. Rasputin had little regard for money or a sumptuous lifestyle. He lusted for power and he subtly began to make suggestions to the czarina that this person or that should be removed from high office and others substituted. In his apartment, scores of politicians, military men and nobles arrived with their wives and daughters. They offered their women and money to Rasputin, promising to act the stooge if he would secure important posts for them. He did, but on the written provisos that they would do his bidding once they were installed in office. As the years passed, the monk's influence became enormous and he practiced his sly blackmail on the royal couple whenever they dared to criticize his excesses. He once arrogantly and laughingly described one of these scenes in the Winter Palace to a bevy of women gathered in his apartment: "Well, I went straight in. I saw at once that Mama [the empress] was angry and defiant, while Papa [the emperor] was striding up and down the room whistling. But after I had bullied them both a little, they soon saw reason! I had only to threaten that I would go back to Siberia and abandon them and their child to disaster and they immediately gave into me in everything." Rasputin then leaped to his feet, holding up his hand, shouting: "Between these fingers I hold the Russian empire!"

Prince Yusupov and his wife, Irene; the princess was coveted by Rasputin, who expected to seduce her at a party, where Yusupov gathered accomplices to murder the monk.

As World War I raged and Russia endured one military failure after another, insurrection and revolution became a stark reality. Rasputin's excessive and scandalous lifestyle inflamed the revolutionaries, who drew cartoons of him making love to the empress or holding rag dolls of the royal couple in his hands. These illustrations were printed and widely distributed throughout all the major cities of Russia. Many Romanov family members and loyal monarchists, seeing these scandalous publications, came to loathe the monk, believing that Rasputin had become "the czar above the czar."

Some of them thought him so dangerous that they began to plot his assassination. When the czarina learned of these plots, the czar ordered squads of the Okhrana, the czar's secret police, to guard the monk night and day.

This did not deter one of those who hated Rasputin most—Prince Felix Yusupov, who formed one of the many conspiracies to murder the monk. The prince, close to the royal family in blood, visited Rasputin, feigning friendship to earn the monk's confidence. He found his first trip to the Rasputin's apartment disgusting. "His office smelled like that of a French whorehouse," Yusupov later wrote, "so thick it was with the scent of perfume. No wonder! He had made of our [aristocratic] women whores, low and disgusting creatures, tainted with his awful disease."

Yusupov referred to gonorrhea which the monk was known to have contracted through his many sexual relationships. Rasputin was also reportedly afflicted with a deadly form of syphilis, which had caused paresis that ate away at his brain and had caused him to become insane. Of course, the reason the monk's apartment smelled so thickly of perfume was that women could not bear his awful stench, and, before visiting him, took baths in strong perfume to overcome the monk's offensive body odor.

Rasputin's body (he had been poisoned, stabbed and shot), recovered from the frozen Neva River, two days after his assassination on December 29, 1916.

Princess Irene and Prince Yusupov, sailing into comfortable American exile on the Berengaria after Yusupov murdered Rasputin.

Long before Yusupov envisioned the murder of Rasputin, others had planned the monk's death. Iliodor, another religious leader who envied Rasputin's power and position, convinced a deranged prostitute, Kionia Guseva, who was dying of syphilis, to murder the mad monk. Iliodor told Guseva that her disease had originated with Rasputin, who was the reincarnation of the devil. On June 28, 1914, Guseva sent a messenger to Rasputin's apartment, asking that he step to the street to receive an important message from the empress. When Rasputin appeared in the street, Guseva rushed forward to plunge a long knife into the monk's abdomen, screaming: "I have killed the anti-Christ!" (She was detained in an asylum, where she soon succumbed to her terrible disease.)

Rasputin staggered back to his apartment, holding his hand firmly over the wound until a doctor arrived and, without an anesthetic, sewed up the wound. The monk survived and came to believe himself immortal. Yusupov, however, believed him to be human and vulnerable, but he would not attempt to kill Rasputin on his own grounds. He would take care to lure the Mad Monk to his own palace, where he could control events and murder Rasputin at ease. To that end, he invited Rasputin to his palace on the night of December 29, 1916, promising the monk that he would meet with Yusupov's beautiful young wife, Princess Irene, a woman the monk had long sought to seduce.

When Rasputin arrived, he was ushered into an empty banquet room, told that he had arrived too late and that the guests had already departed. Yusupov nevertheless offered the monk some cakes and his favorite wine, both laced with enough poison to kill a dozen normal persons. Rasputin, however, was not normal and never had been. He gobbled down the poisoned cakes and swilled several goblets of poisoned wine, growing impatient when Princess Irene did not appear. "Where is your wife?" he demanded of Yusupov. The prince replied that his lovely wife would join them in a short while. He offered the monk more wine and cakes which Rasputin drank and ate.

During this time, Yusupov kept moving from the banquet room to a small adjoining room where he periodically met with other conspirators. "I can't understand it," one of the conspirators told the prince. "That creature has swallowed enough cyanide to kill a regiment." Yusupov and his associates finally tired of waiting for Ras-putin to collapse. The prince returned to the banquet room and attacked the monk with a long knife, stabbing Rasputin a dozen times until he fell to the floor, apparently dead. Yusu-pov rushed to the back room to retrieve ropes and chains with which to tie up his victim. He returned with his friends and tightly bound the monk, but to the amazement of the conspirators, Rasputin abruptly revived, breaking his bonds, standing up and lurching toward Yusupov. His eyes blazed and his outstretched arms reached for the prince's throat.

The three great acting Barrymores, who appeared in only one film together, MGM's 1932 Rasputin and the Empress: (left to right) Lionel (as Rasputin), Ethel (as Empress Alexandra) and John (as the prince who murders the mad monk).

Horrified, Yusupov drew a pistol, and, as he stepped back from the lunging Rasputin, emptied his revolver into the giant. Rasputin fell to the floor, again apparently dead. He was tied up again and his body dragged outside to a sledge, which was driven to the River Neva. A small hole was chopped in the thick ice covering the frozen river and the body was dumped through this into the water. Two days later and several miles downstream, the mad monk's body was found on a riverbank. He had amazingly survived the poison, the knife attack and the six bullets fired into his hulking body. Once beneath the ice of the river, Rasputin had apparently revived and had drifted with the underwater current until he broke his bonds and swam to the surface, smashing his way through the thick ice, but his impossible effort still resulted in death. Doctors examining his corpse found his lungs full of water and his death was attributed to drowning.

Upon hearing of Rasputin's death, the royal couple went into shock, fearing that their son would again be left to the mercy of inept doctors. They then ordered their agents to identify the monk's killer, and when learning that it was Yusupov, exiled the prince for life. Yusupov and his wife, Princess Irene, sailed for America almost immediately, taking their great family fortune with them. Yusupov lived comfortably in New York City, until dying in 1967.

The empress mourned Rasputin's death for months. She ordered a large chapel built on the grounds of the Winter Palace where Rasputin's remains were put to rest. Two years later, the Romanovs were overthrown in the great and terrible Russian revolution of 1918. Revolutionaries destroyed Rasputin's Lionel Barrymore as Rasputin and John Barrymore as the prince who plots his assassination in Rasputin and the Empress; the film told the true facts of the mad monk's murder.

Janet Suzman portrays Alexandra and Tom Baker plays the mesmeric Rasputin in Columbia's 1972 Nicholas and Alexandra.

chapel and the body was dragged from its casket. It was then hauled by ropes through the streets so that thousands of revolutionaries could march over the badly decomposed body before it was soaked with kerosene and burned to ashes.

"WE MUST NOW SHOOT YOU"/ July 16-17, 1918

Czar Nicholas II of Russia, last of the Romanovs, murdered in 1918.

Empress Alexandra of Russia, killed with her entire family in 1918.

Nicholas II (Nicolai Aleksandrovich Romanov, 1868-1918), the last of the Russian czars, was a man who refused to see that his dynasty had no future. Like almost all the autocrats of Europe, his intractable policies and rigid mindset gave birth to an age of revolution that was certain to destroy the old monarchies. Born on May 18, 1868, Nicholas grew to be a shy and morbid child. As a teenager, he witnessed the bloody death of his grandfather, Alexander II, assassinated in 1881, and he was haunted throughout his life by the memory of that horrible event.

In his youth, Nicholas became proficient in French, German and English, but his tutors ignored the classics and the boy had little education in history and the humanities. Throughout his educational years he learned little or nothing of diplomacy and statesmanship and had no concept of a world that existed beyond his own palaces and kingdoms. He grew to be the epitome of the 19th Century monarch, aloof and ignorant of his own country and people. Unlike his father, Alexander III, a rugged giant with abrupt manners and decisive opinions, Nicholas was courteous and gentle, lacking the ability to act with prompt decision. He was hesitant and indecisive, a trait that would eventually cost him his life and the lives of his family and the last members of the Romanov dynasty.

In the spring of 1894, Nicholas met and fell in love with Princess Alix of Hesse-Darmstadt, a stunning but haughty aristocrat. He proposed marriage, but there were problems from the start. Alix balked at joining the Russian Orthodox Church and she was not well liked by Czar Alexander and his empress, Marie, who thought the princess too forward—she expressed her opinions too freely. She obviously dominated Nicholas from the beginning. Before the couple wed in November 1894, Czar Alexander III died and a wholly unprepared Nicholas II assumed the throne of Russia. Nicholas wed Alix, thereafter known as Alexandra, and the marriage produced five children, four girls—Marie, Olga, Tatiana and Anastasia—and one son, Alexis, heir to the throne.

It was learned early on that Alexis was afflicted with severe hemophilia, inherited from excessive intermarriage among members of the European royalty, particularly the branch that stemmed from Queen Victoria and affected various members of the royal houses of England, Germany and Russia. Alexis' blood did not coagulate and the slightest bruise might cause excessive internal or external bleeding, a constant problem that went largely unaddressed by inexperienced royal physicians and one that caused the royal couple endless anxiety and worry. Nevertheless, the royal couple exuded outward confidence and Nicholas II surprisingly displayed an assertive and authoritative image and appeared to be an effective head of state. This was the doing of Empress Alexandra, from whom he took his strength and many ideas.

Nicholas initiated the 1899 Hague Conference, a meeting attended by the world's leaders and one designed to preserve global peace. He addressed the members of the conference with clear and persuasive views that impressed the crown heads of Europe. Kaiser Wilhelm, who was Nicholas' cousin, was staggered at the czar's sudden assumption of leadership. Declared the Kaiser: "Who would have thought that of Nicky? I quite imagined that he would be just a figurehead." On the home front, following his father's policies, the czar instituted many reforms. He established the Employer's Liability Act, which made employers responsible for accidents occurring on their premises. He abolished the mutual tax responsibility, which made whole villages liable for the taxes of any resident who defaulted. He labored long in helping to design and construct the vast Trans-Siberian railroad.

On the other hand, Nicholas was a typical expansionist czar, one who refused to mediate problems with other countries. When the Boxer Rebellion in China extended into Manchuria, the czar sent his armies to occupy that country, incurring protests from the Japanese, who had long held interests there. He ignored these official warnings, listening instead to the persuasive arguments of his militant ministers Vyacheslav Plehve and General Bezobrazov. He took immediate action, aggressively driving the Boxers from Manchuria, his troops remaining there long after having a reason to continue their occupation.

The doomed Romanov family: (left to right) Olga, Marie, Czar Nicholas II, Empress Alexandra, Anastasia, Alexis, Tatiana.

Father George Gapon, pacifist priest turned radical.

Crowds assembling before the Czar's Winter Palace, site of "Bloody Sunday" in 1905, where hundreds were hacked to death by Cossacks.

Japan felt this was an overt threat and, in January 1904, attacked Russian-held Port Arthur, which set off the disastrous Russo-Japanese War. The war ended when the ancient, badly managed Russian fleet was destroyed by Japanese Admiral Heichachiro Togo at Tsushima Straits on May 27, 1905. The embarrassed czar sued for peace, one mediated by Theodore Roosevelt in Portsmouth, New Hampshire. Humiliated, Russia resisted the peace terms in that it had to recognize Japanese interests in Korea and southern Manchuria, but its representative, Count Sergius Witte, nevertheless signed the Treaty of Portsmouth on September 5, 1905.

During this period, great turmoil took place in Russia. There was widespread unrest among the working class and peasants, who were urged to revolution by agitating Bolsheviks and other revolutionary groups. Then, on January 22, 1905, Father George Gapon, an avowed socialist, led thousands of peaceful demonstrators to the gates of the Imperial Palace in St. Petersburg. They carried petitions to solve minor grievances and sang "God Save the Czar," the national anthem. Instead of being greeted by Nicholas II, they were met by dense lines of infantry and mounted Cossacks and Hussars. The czar's troops occupied all of the important bridges and streets in the city and when more than 100,000 demonstrators neared the Winter Palace waving icons and banners, the troops opened fire. Bullets slammed into scores of men, women and children as the crowds panicked and ran wildly through the streets, Cossacks on their heels, hacking them to death with sabers from galloping horses.

The slaughter was awesome and shocking. The vast courtyard before the Winter Palace was littered with bodies and blood flowed everywhere. The senseless massacre would be thereafter known as "Bloody Sunday," an event that forever stained the czar's image with his people. The ancient Russian belief that the czar and his people were one was shattered. Nicholas, from that point on, was considered a bloody despot, a tyrant who answered peaceful petitions with the sword.

Abroad, the image of Nicholas II was irreparably damaged. British labor leader Ramsey MacDonald denounced him, calling the czar a "common murderer." Nicholas grieved over such remarks as England was the czar's favorite foreign country in that he was very close to his cousins, the Duke of York and the Prince of Wales, later King George V. The official body count resulting from "Bloody Sunday" was ninety-two dead, with hundreds injured, but the real fatalities were most likely three or four times that number. Father Gapon, who survived the massacre, had formerly supported the czar, but now he and thousands like him turned against Nicholas, becoming ardent revolutionaries and calling for Nicholas' downfall. (Gapon was taken to Finland and hanged in a woodchopper's hut in April 1906, his executioners being revolutionaries who thought he was trying to infiltrate their ranks and was secretly working with the Okhrana, the czar's secret police.)

For his part, the czar stated that he had no idea the marches had even occurred and he expressed shock and anger at the wanton slaughter of his people. Adding to the czar's woes was the mesmeric monk Rasputin, who appeared to be the only salvation for Alexis, hypnotizing the boy often in order to stem his bleeding attacks. Rasputin, however, abused his station with the royal couple and seriously meddled in internal and foreign affairs. His personal life was a scandal that tainted the throne. He was finally assassinated in 1916 by one of the czar's own relatives, but his damage had already been done to the monarchs. At the onset of World War I, Russia floundered in one military disaster after another, losing millions of the czar's most loyal troops.

Nicholas desperately took command of his frontline troops, but they were by then eating one scanty meal a day and had little or no ammunition for their ancient rifles. His armies were beaten back on every front by the powerful German forces. Wholesale desertions began, hundreds of thousands of disillusioned Russian troops streaming back to the cities to join the revolutionaries, all calling for the abdication of Nicholas

Russian troops deserting by the thousands from the front lines in 1917, joining the revolutionaries to overthrow the czar.

II. Under pressure from the Russian Duma (parliament), the czar, in 1917, abdicated in favor of his son, Alexis. He and his family were held prisoner by the newly elected Democratic government under Alexander Kerensky.

Kerensky decided to continue the war against Germany, an unpopular move and the Bolsheviks under Lenin, Trotsky and Stalin seized upon the discontent of the people with the stagnant Kerensky government. Lenin, arriving in a sealed train the Germans allowed to cross into Russia, led the Bolsheviks in a bloody new revolution that toppled Kerensky, who fled the county dressed as a woman. Lenin quickly repaid the Germans by making peace with the Kaiser and releasing more than a million German prisoners, who were then thrown against the Allies on the Western Front. The Bolsheviks then turned their attentions to the royal family. Lenin had no intention of allowing any of the Romanovs to flee Russia and later revive the monarchy. The Romanovs and some of their servants were sent by guarded train to Ekaterinburg in the eastern Urals and held captive in a private house owned by a prosperous merchant, N. N. Ipatiev.

The czar was led to believe that he and his relatives would be brought to a public trial, then banished from Russia, perhaps living in England, France or Belgium, where many of their relatives were then residing, those fortunate enough to escape the Bolshevik death squads. No trial was ever held. Lenin had planned all along to eradicate the Romanovs. To that end, Lettish guards replaced Russian wardens guarding the Romanovs at the Ipatiev House on July 4, 1918. As three White Russian armies loyal to the czar approached Bolshevik-controlled Ekaterinburg, Lenin, far off in Moscow, decided to have the entire royal family massacred. Jacob Yurovsky, who was in charge of the guards at the Ipatiev House (which the guards called "the house of special purpose"), awakened the Romanov family on the night of July 16-17, 1918, telling the czar and czarina that the family was being moved that night to keep them from the reach of the White armies.

Czar Nicholas II (left) as an exiled prisoner at Ekaterinburg (he holds a shovel, having been compelled to work), with Alexis, Tatiana and a sailor who served as Alexis' bodyguard.

The family members quickly got dressed and were taken to a basement room, where they were told to wait for transportation. Yurovsky then appeared in this room with ten Letts, all armed with revolvers. All of them were professional assassins and members of the Soviet Secret Police. Yurovsky blurted to the czar without any trace of emotion: "Your relations have tried to save you. They have failed. We must now shoot you."

The czar, incredulous, began to stand up, still holding his son, one word escaping his mouth: "What?"

The murder squad then opened a deafening, withering fire, shooting down all the members of the family and three servants. Demidova, a maid who had been holding a pillow in front of her, survived the initial barrage and ran screaming about the room. More guards holding rifles with bayonets rushed into the room and stabbed and clubbed her to death. The czar had been killed immediately, shot in the head. Alexis, shielded by his father's body, was only wounded. Yurovsky placed his revolver against the boy's head and fired two bullets, killing him. Anastasia, the czar's youngest daughter, had fainted when the firing began and was alive and unharmed. Out of bullets, the death squad beat her to death with their gun butts. Only the cocker spaniel, the family pet, was left alive. The bestial Yurovsky ordered his men to crush the dog's head with their heavy boots.

The basement room in the Ipatiev house where the Romanovs were massacred by Bolshevik assassins; the killers tore away the wall to hide the bloodstains.

The bodies were then dragged by ropes from the basement and thrown on to the back of a truck, then driven to an earlier selected secret site, a mine shaft, where the remains would be hidden. Outside the shaft, the bodies were placed in a pile and more than 150 gallons of gas dumped on them and then set afire. The bodies burned for several hours before the savage guards, using axes, hatchets and saws, chopped and dismembered the remains, throwing these down the mine shaft. Then 40 pounds of sulfuric acid was dumped onto the remains to obliterate the identities of the victims and hide the horrid assassinations. A guard, Voikov, a member of the Ural Soviet, later commented: "The world will never know what we did with them."

The White Russian army under Admiral Kolchak recaptured Ekaterinburg in 1919. The royalists conducted a tedious investigation into the whereabouts of the royal family. Several of the Letts had been captured and gave details of the mass murder. White Russian officers were taken to the mine shaft and showed the grim remains of the Romanovs. The body of the pet spaniel was the only one to remain intact. Investigators found a long, slender finger and identified this as belonging to the empress. In the years that followed, many fantastic claims were made that some or even all of the Romanovs had survived and had escaped Russia to live out their lives in obscurity. The most persistent myth was that Anastasia, the youngest of the czar's daughters, had been rescued by some of the guards and later made her way to Germany, where she made claims of being the royal duchess, as did many other claimants. None proved to be a survivor of the 1918 assassinations.

The mass murder of the Romanovs horrified the world and stamped the Bolsehvik revolution as a ruthless and murderous movement. Lenin attempted to distance his dictatorial party from the assassinations by disavowing responsibility for the murders. He brought to trial twenty-eight persons, labeling them "social revolutionaries," who had killed the Romanovs to discredit the Bolsheviks. Five of these sacrificial persons were executed. Yurovsky was not in their number. Jacob Sverdlov, a Lenin lieutenant and the man who gave Yurovsky the direct order to murder the Romanovs was himself killed six months after the assassinations. He was reportedly murdered on orders from Lenin and Stalin—they believed him to be untrustworthy and suspected that he might reveal the fact that it was Lenin who had given him the order to kill the royal family.

ASSASSINATION IN MEXICO

Just as Russia underwent the traumatic upheaval of revolution, Mexico, which for years had suffered under the despotic President Porfirio Diaz, shuddered and quaked through one of the most violent and prolonged revolutions in the Western Hemisphere. This began in 1910, when a large landowner, Francisco Madero, challenged the tyrannical rule of Diaz. He was joined by a few landowners and a motley group of middleclass reformers and social outcasts, but he, like Juarez before him, had the support of millions of oppressed peons. Madero's struggle to free his people of impossible burdens and assure their rights as citizens brought about his own murder. Almost every revolutionary leader who sided with him met the same awful fate.

"ADIOS, MY GENERAL"/February 22, 1913

Francisco I. Madero (1873-1913) was born to great wealth. He inherited a vast empire of farms, ranches, mines and factories. His family owned much of the country's wine crops. When patriarch Evarista Madero died, he left more than two million acres to relatives, mostly to his grandson Francisco, who by then already owned twice that amount of land. His vast wealth held little interest for Madero. He and his younger brother, Gustavo, had received excellent educations in Europe. They studied American agricultural techniques in the United States and returned to Mexico to improve their own estates as well as the miserable lives of the peons who worked for them.

Mexico's long-time dictator Porfirio Diaz.

The liberal-minded Madero, unlike most others of his hacendado class, was a man of nervous energy who raised the pay of his workers, and established new housing, clinics, and most important in his mind, schools. Any child on his estates who showed intellectual promise or a desire to receive an education was enrolled in one of Madero's many modern schools, where Madero installed teachers imported from other lands. He spent millions to make these improvements and then, in 1904, attempted to enlist his fellow landowners in making the same reforms on their estates through his Club Democratico Benito Juarez.

Only a few landowners joined. To most, Madero, a man who stood only five feet two inches and whom they called "the dwarf," was a dangerous person. His reforms threatened to destroy the leisure lifestyle and class of the few hundred families that owned most of Mexico's real estate. Further, his radical policies undermined the thirty-year dictatorship of President Porfirio Diaz, the strongman who, with an iron fist, protected the landed gentry and in return received their wealthy support. Diaz, who had fought with Juarez in his revolution against Maximilian of Austria, was a permanent president. He was repeatedly elected to office as the only candidate for the post.

Francisco I. Madero, who led the revolution of 1910 that overthrew the despotic Diaz, an idealist who was killed when attempting to institute reforms.

In a remarkable interview appearing in the February 1908 issue of Pearson's Magazine, the arrogant Diaz told U.S. journalist James Creelman that his people needed a strong man to slowly develop democracy and protect them from foreign influence and control. The despot claimed that he was preserving the theory of democracy if not democracy itself. His people, Diaz pointed out, were too unsophisticated, too uneducated to manage a true democracy. Of course, Diaz and the landed class supporting him kept the uneducated masses illiterate and uninformed and autocratically controlled them through a powerful army and secret police. In the same year Diaz consented to the Creelman interview, Madero responded by publishing a book entitled The Presidential Succession of 1910, one that did not directly attack the dictator but did cite the oppressions and wrongs of his regime.

Madero called for honest elections and went to Mexico City to organize a national convention for that purpose. He was warmly welcomed by many enlightened and educated middleclass citizens, who had read his bombshell book and who looked upon him as the savior of Mexico. Diaz, too, read the book, but his reaction was not recorded. In his campaign, chiefly in northern Mexico, Madero's speeches were met with great support. Peons carried him about on their shoulders, cheering him. These demonstrations alarmed the utterly corrupt Ramon Corral, Diaz's vice president and chief enforcer, who feared that Madero might actually topple through a free election the 80-year-old dictator. He ordered his arrest, but shrewd, old Diaz, realizing that Madero had gained great support from the middleclass and respectful attention from the foreign press, countermanded that order and then made a great show of announcing a fair and free election.

Diaz called Madero to the presidential palace and there a brief, tense conference took place. Madero came to the point immediately. "The country is ready for democracy," he told Diaz, "and we must have unbiased elections. It is time for you to relinquish the power."

"Into whose hands do you counsel me to give it?" asked Diaz.

"Into the hands of an honest man," Madero boldly replied.

Diaz bristled at the suggestion that he, the father of Mexico, was not an honest man. "Senor," the dictator intoned, "a man must be more than honest to govern Mexico." The meeting abruptly ended and a short time later Diaz made sure that Madero and his candidates were prevented from making public speeches. Madero was arrested on a trumped-up charge and held prisoner in the remote town of San Luis Potosi, confined there until the elections were held on June 26, 1910, an election blatantly rigged by Diaz, who then declared himself the winner. His officials announced that the upstart Madero had received only 196 votes in the entire country.

Madero realized that peaceful means could not unseat the tyrant. He escaped his captors on October 6, 1910, and, disguised as a railway worker, fled to San Antonio, Texas. From there he published a widely distributed manifesto, The Plan of San Luis Potosi, a work in which he urged the Mexican people to rise against Diaz and overthrow his oppressive regime through revolution.

In response, outbreaks against the regime took place in small towns of northern Mexico, but the insurgents were quickly suppressed. Some leaders in Mexico who read Madero's manifesto began to organize and equip small armies to fight Diaz. The most colorful and daring of these was Doroteo Arango, a bandit known as Pancho Villa. Another was a determined mountain fighter, Pascual Orozco. Villa started with fifteen men and soon raised 500 out of the desert communities of the impoverished Chihuahua State. He attacked and took the town of San Andreas. With twice Villa's strength, Orozco overran the city of Guerrero. Other revolutionaries captured the town of Parral in northern Mexico. In the south, in the state of Morelos, the charismatic Emiliano Zapata, who was to become one of Mexico's greatest heroes, led thousands of peons in defeating Diaz's troops with a cry of "Land and Liberty!"

Zapata, a self-taught leader, was undoubtedly the most self-sacrificing of Madero's followers. He fought unflinchingly for nine years to have the land of the rich estate holders returned to the peons and he stirred the hearts of his followers when he called out to them with such phrases as: "It is better to die on your feet than live on your knees." (This motto lived long in the hearts of revolutionaries; La Passionaria [Dolores Ibarra], a communist leader in Spain's Civil War, would repeat the same words twenty-six years later when exhorting troops to march into battle against the mostly foreign legions of Francisco Franco.)

Pancho Villa (center, on horseback), bandit turned patriot; he is shown leading his "Division of the North" against Diaz's forces during Madero's revolution of 1910-1911.

Madero himself led several attacks against Diaz strongholds and was wounded at the battle of Casas Grandes in northern Chihuahua. More victories followed. Diaz desperately sent untrained recruits to the many fronts, his officers herding these unwilling troops onto trains where the officers stood on running boards with pistols drawn, shooting those who attempted to desert. The recruits, tearing off their hated uniforms, nevertheless deserted by the thousands. Major cities such as Ciudad Juarez in the north and Cuautla in the south, fell to the rebels.

In Mexico City, 75,000 demonstrators assembled before the National Palace on May 24, 1911, and shouted for Diaz's resignation. He answered by having his troops, positioned on the rooftop, machine gun hundreds to death. Pressured by advisers, the old dictator officially resigned the next day, then packed up his family and belongings. Guarded by General Victoriano Huerta and 300 crack police guards, Diaz fled to the port city of Vera Cruz, en route to a palace in Spain, where he would retire in lavish comfort. He took with him three trainloads of loot from the national treasury.

Madero entered the Mexican capital on June 7, 1911, escorted to the National Palace by Zapata and his mounted troops. The city's quarter of a million inhabitants were overjoyed at Madero's arrival. John Reed, the American journal-

The peon legions of Emiliano Zapata, who supported Madero, are shown marching against Diaz's troops in the South in 1911; these ill-equipped fighters repeatedly defeated heavily armed federal forces, driving them from the state of Morelos.

ist who would later become famous for chronicling the Russian Revolution in his Ten Days That Shook the World, was also on hand to see Madero triumphantly ride through the streets of Mexico City. Reed stopped a Mexican soldier wearing a Madero button and asked him why he wore it. The young soldier shrugged and said: "I don't know, senor. My captain told me he was a great saint."

Francisco Madero was no saint, but he was an honest man who tried to institute a strong reform policy in Mexico from the moment he became president of the republic. He was hamstrung and compromised all along the way by venal politicians and scheming generals left over from the Diaz regime. With his military leaders Villa, Orozco and Zapata returning to their provinces, Madero was left in the clutches of men like General Victoriano Huerta, a power-lusting militarist. Huerta quickly went to work undermining Madero's operations and image. He spread the ridiculous rumor that the president's brother, Gustavo Madero, had absconded with government funds, even though most knew that the Madero family was one of the wealthiest in Mexico. Henry Lane Wilson, U.S. ambassador to Mexico, blindly accepted this falsehood as truth and he began to criticize the little president at every opportunity (the right-wing Wilson had long been an admirer of Diaz).

U.S. Ambassador Henry Lane Wilson, who hated Madero's independence and gave Huerta nodding approval for his assassination.

Madero's shaky republic began to crumble. Orozco, embittered at not being named a cabinet member in Madero's administration, and at the meager spoils he gained in the revolution, rebelled with 6,000 troops known as Colorados, fierce cavalrymen who looted and raped at will when taking any town. In the south, Zapata, too, rebelled, fighting the forces of landowners who refused to institute Madero's reforms in returning land to the peons. Only Villa remained loyal to Madero, but his small forces pitted against Orozco were repeatedly defeated and the old bandit was chased into the hills. When Orozco's troops won several battles, Madero, against his better judgment, placed Huerta at the head of an army that eventually crushed Orozco and drove him into exile in the U.S.

Huerta was now in control of all government troops and he conspired with Felix Diaz, nephew of the deposed dictator, to eliminate Madero and seize the government. Huerta then ordered his troops to surround the National Palace, ostensibly to protect Madero against assassins sent by Felix Diaz. General Aureliano Blanquet, a Huerta henchman (who had also been a member of the firing squad that executed Emperor Maximilian in 1867) took Madero and his aides into "protected custody" on the night of February 18, 1913, keeping the president a prisoner in a small room of the National Palace. Huerta than proclaimed himself head of state, claiming that the Senate had appointed him, a lie.

He immediately received the public support of U.S. Ambassador Wilson.

Gustavo Madero, the president's brother, had also been taken prisoner and on the night of February 19, 1913, he was taken from a cell and driven to an open field. He was then told to run for his life and as he ran a dozen of Huerta's officers shot him to death. Francisco Madero was another matter. Huerta worried that killing the president would bring a torrent of foreign criticism, especially from the U.S. When Huerta obliquely proposed the murder of Madero to Ambassador Wilson, the American diplomat shrugged and told the despot to do "what is best for the peace of the country."

Wilson, in this statement, had told Huerta that whatever he did with Madero was fully acceptable to him. When Sara Madero went to Wilson to plead with him to intercede on her husband's behalf in saving his life, Wilson brutally rebuffed her. Said the arrogant Wilson: "I will be frank with you, madam. Your husband's downfall is due to the fact that he never wanted to consult with me."

Gustavo Madero; the president's brother was also murdered in 1913.

On the night of February 22, 1913 (three days after his brother had been executed without his knowledge), Madero and a trusted aide, Pino Suarez, were removed from their quarters. Madero knew what was coming. He passed General Felipe Angeles, who was his most loyal military supporter and was also being held prisoner (later executed by Huerta). Madero shook Angeles' hand and said: "Adios, my general, I shall never see you again." He and Suarez were then taken to separate cars, each man sitting in the back seat, surrounded by heavily armed guards commanded by Captain Francisco Cardenas.

Some American journalists waiting outside ran after the cars as they drove away. One of them caught up with the autos outside the walls of the city penitentiary, where he heard several shots fired. He found the bodies of Madero and Suarez against the wall. Captain Cardenas explained that the president and his aide had been killed by Madero's own supporters who had fired on the cars, while trying to free the prisoners. The story, of course, was a fabrication. No attempt had been made to free Madero. Huerta's assassins had simply shot him and Suarez and dumped the bodies from the cars.

Huerta promoted this absurd story in announcing Madero's death, calling the murdered president "an honest man, but a fool who could not run a government." He then promoted Cardenas to the rank of major. Cardenas, disguised as a mule driver, fled to Guatemala when the Huerta regime later collapsed. He lived there for six years, but, in 1920, when he was about to be extradited back to Mexico to face charges of murdering Madero, Cardenas put a revolver to his head and blew out his brains.

General Victoriano Huerta, who ordered Madero's death and seized power in Mexico in 1913.

After fifteen months of power, Madero was dead at the age of thirty-nine, a tragic figure whose compassion, love of the law, and human generosity helped to bring about the downfall of one tyrant, and his very assassination at the hands of another despot. There were two men, however, who would seek a terrible retribution for this assassination—Pancho Villa and Emiliano Zapata. The names of these two men were written in fire on the fortress walls manned by the troops of Victoriano Huerta, a vicious dictator who reaped two whirlwinds howling through the mountains and across the plains of Mexico.

DEATH OF A HERO/April 10, 1919

No Mexican revolutionary leader of the 20th century approached the status and legend of Emiliano Zapata (1879-1919). Poorly educated—he did not learn how to read until reaching his adult years—Zapata was born dirt poor in the village of Anenecuilco in the southern state of Morelos. Through his teens, Zapata worked in the fields of a great estate. Its owner, Ignacio de la Torre y Mier, impressed by the boy's industrious ways and expert horsemanship, made him a mediero. As such, he became a tenant farmer of sorts, who cultivated a section of land and shared in the profits from its crops. The estate owner was married to Amada Diaz, daughter of President Porfirio Diaz.

Emiliano Zapata, Mexico's greatest hero, shown in 1912.

Torre y Mier invited Zapata to inspect his vast stables in Mexico City. Zapata, who had never been outside the state of Morelos until that time, Emiliano Zapata (right center) sits next to ally Pancho Villa (left center in Diaz's old throne chair) in Mexico City's National Palace, December 6, 1914, where they shared power and attempted to make Madero's land reforms come true, until abandoning the capital and power six months later.

Alvaro Obregon, Zapata's foe, who arranged to have the great revolutionary hero killed in 1919.

Zapata (sitting at right) accepts $150,000 to evacuate his troops from Mexico City in July 1915; this decision put his enemies into power and brought about his death four years later.

was shocked to see that the landowner's horses lived in stalls that were more spacious and accommodating than the miserable huts in which his fellow peons dwelled. He became critical of the estate system and openly defied the authorities. A local politician, after a confrontation with Zapata, branded him a troublemaker and arranged to have Zapata conscripted into the army.

Zapata proved to be an excellent soldier, rising to the rank of sergeant. Fascinated by military tactics and strategy, Zapata had become an expert on how to organize and deploy troops by the time he was released from the service in 1910. The Diaz regime had inadvertently created a brilliant militarist, who would, in years to come, out-general and out-maneuver its armies with a ragged band of dedicated peons called "Zapatistas."

In 1910, when Madero openly defied the Diaz regime, Zapata was one of the first to embrace Madero's cause, leading his peons against Diaz's federal troops in Morelos. With the defeat of Diaz, Zapata himself escorted Madero to the National Palace in Mexico City, where the new president took office. When the Madero administration, much hampered by former Diaz politicians and militarists, was slow to bring about agrarian reform, particularly in Morelos, Zapata rebelled. He withdrew his support from Madero, battling Madero's forces.

When Madero was murdered on the orders of General Victoriano Huerta, Zapata joined a new revolution with Pancho Villa, Alvaro Obregon and Venustiano Carranza. After many battles, Huerta was finally overthrown and, like his master, Diaz, fled into exile. In an historic meeting, Zapata and Villa met in Mexico City to establish a new government on December 6, 1914. Zapata attempted to put his agrarian reforms into effect through his Plan of Ayala, but was undone when Carranza, backed by Obregon, seized power. Zapata and Villa continued the revolution on behalf of the peons. From 1914 to 1919, Zapata fought a losing war against overwhelming forces.

In early April 1919, a colonel in the army of Pablo Gonzalez, a Yaqui Indian named Jesus Guajardo, sent word to Zapata that he planned to defect from the Carranza forces, taking with him more than 600 battle-trained troops and a huge store of ammunition and guns, all to be placed under Zapata's command. On April 10, 1919, Zapata and ten men rode to the hacienda near Chinameca to meet with Guajardo. Zapata alone got off his horse and while his men waited outside the walls of the hacienda, he walked into the hacienda's large walled square where Guajardo waited for him. Colonel Guajardo welcomed Zapata with open arms, kissing him on the cheek in an extravagant display of affection which was really a signal to hundreds of his troops who lay in hiding on the walls of the hacienda.

A line of troops stood at attention in the square for review by Zapata, who walked past them as a bugler blew three long notes. Zapata had reached the main house and had one foot on the first step of the porch, when the troops he had reviewed held their rifles at present-arms. They suddenly shifted their weapons, aiming them at Zapata and fired a volley that ripped into the revolutionary leader, toppling him dead on the steps. Terrorized by Zapata's fierce reputation, the soldiers continued to pump volley after volley into the quivering corpse until it was rented like a sieve.

Zapata on film: In Elia Kazan's great 1952 biopic, Viva Zapata! (original screenplay by John Steinbeck), Marlon Brando (center, sitting) plays the great Mexican hero, conferring with Madero (Harold Gordon), while Anthony Quinn and Lou Gilbert suspiciously eye the weak-willed president.

Seven of Zapata's men waiting outside the hacienda were shot. Three escaped to spread the word that their great hero had been assassinated. For his insidious betrayal of Zapata, Guajardo, who had acted on orders from Carranza and Obregon, was promoted to the rank of brigadier general and given a $50,000 reward. Zapata's shredded body was dumped in the town square of Cuautla, his one-time headquarters. The body was taken to the local police station where it was identified, marked with a tag reading: "Emiliano Zapata, dead." To the poor peons he championed, however, Zapata's legend never died. He remains to this day the most charismatic hero of Mexico. His prophetic words, written long before his assassination, came to reality years later: "Though society defames us, history will justify our actions, when the new generations come to enjoy the fruits of our battles, fought with our bodies and the tears of our women. And this same society which attacks us today for our crimes will cover us with blessings."

THE MURDER OF A GREEDY MAN/ May 20, 1920

Venustiano Carranza (1859-1920) was born in Cuatro Cienegas, Coahuila, the son of a rich landowner. Educated in liberal views, he came into conflict with Mexico's dictator, Porfirio Diaz. In 1893, he took part in a brief revolt in Coahuila, winning a few reforms. He then became a liberal senator in the Diaz government, a post he held for twelve years, often protesting against Diaz's oppressive measures, but Diaz took no action against him, considering Carranza an insignificant political annoyance. This changed when Francisco Madero called for revolution against Diaz in 1910. At the time, Carranza was governor of Coahuila, one of Mexico's most influential northern states.

Believing in Madero's democratic principles, Carranza joined with Madero, becoming one of his most outspoken supporters. Carranza looked like anything but a revolutionary. He was every inch a patrician, tall with white hair, a white beard and a long mustache that extended outward, twisted and waxed like the whiskers of a cat. He wore blue-tinted spectacles behind which blinked weak eyes. He pontificated and fulminated, abhorring violence and preferring to back strong military men like Alvaro Obregon and Pancho Villa. He was no military leader, but he had the reputation of being an honest politician.

Carranza was also arrogant, egotistical and ignorant of his own country's history and social needs. Though he used to his own ends the considerable forces of the great peasant leader from Morelos, Emiliano Zapata, Carranza had little regard for Zapata as a politician and considered him beneath his own privileged class. Zapata, in turn, thought Carranza to be an aloof aristocrat, who did more posing as the champion of the peons than effecting any real reforms on their behalf.

Venustiano Carranza, the "Old Badger" of the Mexican Revolution, who made war on Diaz and Huerta and plotted against his allies.

Following Madero's assassination in 1913, Carranza became the chief opposition to the new dictatorship of General Victoriano Huerta. On March 26, 1913, Carranza published a vague document of reform entitled the Plan of Guadalupe, one which outlined a loosely organized revolution against Huerta. The author, Carranza, named himself the "First Chief" of the constitutionalists. The constitutionalists, with Carranza at their head, sought to establish the constitution as originally drafted by Madero and abandoned by the usurping Huerta. President Woodrow Wilson came to believe that Carranza and other Mexican revolutionaries meant to reestablish a democracy in Mexico, but the haughty Carranza proved to be unfriendly to the U.S.

Following Huerta's defeat and the dissolution of the revolutionary council that briefly ruled Mexico, Carranza became the provisional president of the country (October 1915-March 1917). Because he seemingly stalled land reforms, Pancho Villa and Emiliano Zapata, formerly his strong supporters, turned on him, sending their forces against him. General Alvaro Obregon, who commanded the regular Mexican army at that time, became Carranza's protector and backed him as president in the 1917 election. He served as president of Mexico (1917-1920), until Obregon, who had retired, left his pea-farming estates and announced that he was a candidate in the 1920 election. Obregon denounced the Carranza regime as corrupt. Carranza, in turn, put up a stooge candidate, Ignacio Bonillas, who had been Carran-za's ambassador to the U.S. "The Old Badger of the Revolution," as Carranza was then called, expected Bonillas to win the election and then take orders from him.

Venustiano Carranza, president of Mexico (1915-1917), assassinated in 1920.

When it appeared that Carranza was rigging the 1920 election, Obregon announced that he would oppose Carranza with force. He mobilized his considerable troops and several states rebelled against the Carranza regime. When General Pablo Gonzalez, who had also announced his candidacy for the presidency, quit the race and retired to the country, Carranza was left without any real support. Gonzalez, who had fought long under Carranza's banner, removed his troops from Carranza's control, undoubtedly under the threat of Obregon, who had become Mexico's new strong man. By then, all of Carranza's military supporters of old were gone. Pancho Villa had retired to his ranch near Parral. Emiliano Zapata was dead, assassinated in 1919 with the collusion of Carranza and Obregon.

Carranza, knowing that he was in peril if he stayed in Mexico City, decided to move his headquarters to the coastal city of Vera Cruz, where, if events turned against him, he could quickly sail into safe exile. For several days, Carranza's men looted the palace and all government buildings in Mexico City, loading three long trains with gold, tapestries, paintings and silverware. "Carranza might have escaped with his life," wrote one historian, "if he hadn't been so greedy. His last train stood waiting for two or three days, but there were always a few more things to be taken away. He even took the cardboard currency. He took the funds from the treasury and the light fixtures from the palace."

Victoriano Huerta; Carranza joined Zapata and Villa to overthrow him in 1913.

Pancho Villa (center), who hated Carranza and branded him a traitor to the revolution, is shown with two bodyguards in 1920, the year in which Carranza was assassinated.

Carranza stole more than sixty million pesos in gold and silver, packing this on his private train, which included a harem of forty women. As the train finally pulled out of Mexico City on May 7, 1920, these women slipped into revealing chemises, popped the corks from champagne bottles and began an orgy in Carranza's private cars, throwing gold and silver coins every which way as they spilled champagne down the throats of the fleeing president and his earthy followers. There was no organization to the evacuation. No medical supplies and little water was brought along for the trip. Upon Carranza's leisurely departure, General Gonzalez arrived in Mexico City at the head of his troops, announcing his support for Obregon, who arrived a few days later.

Alvaro Obregon, once an close ally, denounced Carranza and ordered him killed in 1920.

Meanwhile, two of Carranza's booty-packed trains were stopped, but the deposed president's train managed to get to Aljibes in Puebla. There Carranza found the tracks destroyed and his small military escort was attacked. Carranza and about seventy of his followers mounted horses and rode off toward the headquarters of General Francisco P. Mariel, who was thought to be still loyal to Carranza. He reached one of Mariel's outposts in northern Puebla, where he was met by Rudolfo Herrero, a bandit-turned-general. Herrero offered Carranza safe passage out of the country, quartering him in a small hut in the little village of San Antonio Tlaxcalantongo.

On the night of May 20, 1920, Herrero told Carranza: "This is my country. No one shall harm you. I myself will guide you through to the coast." Carranza, separated from his heavily armed entourage, went to sleep alone in the hut, bedding down with a saddle for a pillow and a horse blanket thrown over his body. About 10 p.m., Herrero entered Carranza's hut and lit a match which caused Carranza to sit up.

"What is wanted?" Carranza asked.

"I only wished to see that you have everything you ought to have," replied Herrero. Within seconds, Herrero was joined by a dozen men with guns drawn. They opened fire and a dozen bullets struck Carranza as he attempted to stand up. He died instantly. His body was stripped of his glasses, watch and his magnificent uniform, which Herrero later wore. Even the typewriter on which Carranza had written countless manifestos was stolen. A few of Carranza's aides escaped, but more than thirty of his followers were rounded up and ordered at gunpoint to sign a statement that Carranza had committed suicide. His body was later shipped back to Mexico City, where it was interred, according to his wishes, "in a third class grave where the poor people are buried." The assassin Herrero was promoted by Obregon. Carranza's fabulous gold shipments, reportedly hidden throughout Puebla by the fleeing ex-president, are sought by treasure hunters to this day.

"VIVA VILLA!"/July 20, 1923

The chaotic, bloody events that consumed Mexico during its long revolutionary period were best personified by an uneducated, brutal bandit called Francisco "Pancho" Villa (Doroteo Arango, 1878-1923). Colorful, canny and with an inborn brilliance for military tactics, Villa—who was known as "The Centaur" to his followers—came to be the most loved and hated man of his country. Born in a squalid hut in Durango's Rio Grande, Villa was a mestizo with some Negro blood. Like his counterpart in southern Mexico, Emiliano Zapata, he was raised without any education and sent to work at an early age in the fields of a large landowner, a hacendado. Villa had little hope for any other kind of life in an era when dictator Porfirio Diaz ruled Mexico. At the age of sixteen, he killed the hacendado's son, raped his daughter, and fled to the hills to join a bandit gang, later becoming its leader. He was savage, uncouth and unremorseful for any of his many crimes. He took the name of Francisco Villa, then demanded that one and all call him "Pancho," which he thought to be a manly name.

Heavyset, bowlegged and pigeon-toed, Villa was a master horseman and a crack shot. His mercurial temper was legendary. He had a killer's instinct and a butcher's habit of shooting his prisoners. Mercy was unknown to him, yet he was capable of maudlin displays of tenderness with the poor peons he championed. Long before his open defiance of Diaz, Villa was known as a sort of Mexican Robin Hood, raiding the estates of the rich landowners and sharing his booty and food with starving peons. Americans, as well as Mexicans, learned of Villa's exploits through dime novels written by those who had little or no idea of what Pancho Villa was really like.

Pancho Villa, hero and bandit of Mexico, who led many revolutions, shown in 1911, when supporting Francisco Madero against dictator Diaz; he seldom took prisoners, hanging captives by the scores.

In 1910, when Francisco Madero was denied a free election by the Diaz regime and proclaimed open revolution against the dictator, Villa was one of the first to join the insurgent leader. He gathered a force of 500 men in northern Mexico and began to take small towns from the control of Diaz commanders. In the south, Emiliano Zapata, his revolutionary counterpart, also scored victories. Diaz's regime was crushed by the revolutionaries and the dictator fled the country. Madero became president, but his most devoted follower, Villa, proved to be a serious problem. In fact, he was almost executed for disobeying orders. Victoriano Huerta, a former Diaz general who had gone over to Madero, gave orders to have the insubordinate Villa shot by a firing squad on June 4, 1912.

Villa, knowing Madero would never issue such orders, stalled for time while his representatives raced to Madero to obtain a reprieve. The bandit was literally placed before a firing squad where he cajoled, begged and pleaded for his life. Villa offered the money in his pockets, his watch and his horse to a Captain Hernandez, head of the firing squad, if he would postpone the execution. At the last minute, Villa was saved when a reprieve arrived from Madero. He was jailed pending an investigation, then released and sent back to his northern retreat.

Madero, always Villa's hero, proved to be an ineffective president. His every move was blocked by Huerta and others from the old Diaz regime. He insisted that his plan to return the land to the peons and dismantle the great estates be put into effect, but Madero's land reforms were never instituted. Instead, with the collusion of the landowners, who truly represented the great wealth and power of Mexico (and still do), Huerta ordered Madero's assassination in 1913 and then seized power.

Once again, Villa, Zapata and others gathered their ragged forces and confronted Huerta, soundly defeating his armies in a prolonged civil war that saw endless atrocities and slaughter on both sides. Both Villa and Zapata hanged all prisoners believing that "they are not worth bullets." After Huerta's regime collapsed and he fled the country, Villa met with Zapata in Mexico City to establish a new government. They drank cognac together to celebrate their great victory. Villa admitted to Zapata: "I accept this drink solely for the pleasure of joining you, for the truth is that I never drink liquor." Together, on December 6, 1914, Villa and Zapata assumed joint leadership of the country. Villa was briefly the nominal president of the new republic, a position he quickly abdicated, as did Zapata.

At the time, Mexico was split into many factions, with Villa and Zapata representing the Conventionists, those advocating the reforms of Madero. Venustiano Carranza and Alvaro Obregon headed the constitutionalists, who loosely followed Madero's reforms, but were more sympathetic to the landowners, a class to which they both belonged. Carranza became the president of Mexico, but he proved to be just another dictator representing the landed gentry. Villa and Zapata waged revolutionary war with him, until Zapata, after a decade of incessant fighting, was assassinated in 1919. After Carranza was assassinated on orders of Obregon, Villa saw further struggle useless and the old warrior retired to his ranch in Canutillo in 1920.

him large portraits of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln. He ordered that these portraits be placed on the walls of his new school.

The once-feared leader of the Division of the North (the title of Villa's revolutionary army), grew fat, indulging himself with rich food, stuffing himself with imported sardines and peanut brittle. He bought several American cars and had many mistresses, although he remained married to the only Pancho Villa, when he led his troops into Mexico City to herald Madero's triumph over Diaz in 1911.

In an amazing photo, Villa is shown standing in front of a firing squad in 1912, stalling long enough to be reprieved by President Madero; in his outstretched hand, he offers his treasured watch to the officer commanding the execution squad.

Villa was provided with considerable funds by the federal government, then in control of Obregon, on the proviso that he remain on his large estate (he had become a hacendado, joining the very class against which he had long waged war). Villa was content to work his estate, improving the land and making a model ranch out of what was once a broken-down farm. He bought American machinery and began to till his estate, producing abundant and lucrative crops. He used peon labor to construct a road from his ranch to the town of Parral. Yet, consistent with his contradictory nature, he paid to have a modern school constructed for the use of the peons and his bodyguards. He specified that the windows in the school be positioned high above the students to provide proper ventilation and to prevent them from being distracted in their studies by staring out of the windows.

Francisco Madero, Villa's idol, murdered in 1913, a killing the Centaur vowed to avenge.

By then a millionaire, Villa sent the sons of many peons across the border to business schools in El Paso, Texas, paying for their educations. He gave interviews to the American press, but grew short-tempered with abusive questions from reporters. Once, when a reporter dared to ask Villa to perform some cowboy tricks with his lasso, the Centaur drew his guns and almost shot the man. He later requested that an American salesman from whom Villa had purchased farm equipment send woman he ever wed. Though he had become careless, Villa knew that he still had many enemies, particularly in the town of Parral, where he owned a hotel. Whenever he visited the town, he was accompanied by two dozen heavily armed bodyguards. Machine guns were mounted on the cars that preceded and followed Villa's own long touring car.

One of Villa's most dedicated enemies was Jesus Salas Barraza, who organized a group of middleclass merchants and businessmen in a plot to murder the Centaur. Barraza, a member of the Durango state legislature, raised $50,000 from those who had suffered at Villa's hands during the revolutionary years. He bought guns and ammunition and hired eight professional killers to murder Villa.

Barraza positioned the killers in a large house that he rented in Parral, one that jutted into the street at a corner Villa routinely passed in his car. The assassins spent days timing the comings and goings of Villa. At 8 a.m., on July 20, 1923, a pumpkin seed vendor, hired by Barraza for the occasion, stood near a corner in Parral where Villa was expected. He was to remove his sombrero when Villa's car neared, shouting: "Viva Villa!" This would be the signal for the killers to open fire.

Villa punctually arrived that morning. He was at the wheel of his large 1919 Dodge, driving at high speed. Colonel Miguel Trillo, in charge of Villa's bodyguards, sat next to him and in the back seat were two bodyguards. The cars in front and in back of Villa's Dodge also contained bodyguards, all heavily armed with pistols and rifles. As Villa's car approached the rented house, the vendor removed his sombrero, waving it and shouting: "Viva Villa!"

Villa was flamboyantly portrayed by Wallace Beery (sitting left) in MGM's 1934 Villa Villa!; Henry B. Walthall (center) portrays Madero and Joseph Schildkraut, standing, essays a role modeled after Victoriano Huerta.

The leader of the assassins, Meliton Losoya, positioned at a window in the house, aimed his rifle and fired, sending a bullet through the windshield of Villa's car and into the broad chest of Pancho Villa. The Centaur slumped at the wheel as the Dodge crashed into a pole. Losoya's men let loose a tremendous fusillade that tore through Villa's car. Trillo stood up in the car, drawing his pistol, but a half dozen bullets ripped into him, killing him, sending his body backward over the door of the open car, his corpse grotesquely dangling. The rest of the bodyguards were cut down. Only Ramon Contreras, a huge man, managed to leap from one of the cars, firing his rifle at the assailants as he retreated down the street, wounded in the arm before escaping the bloodbath. He was the only survivor in Villa's party.

Parral, Mexico, July 20, 1923: Villa's car--his dead associate, Trillo, draped over a door, Villa dead next to him, after withering gunfire raked the auto.

Villa was slumped against Trillo's body, seven bullets in him. Trillo had been hit nine times. The big Dodge had been riddled with more than 100 bullets. The eight assassins slowly advanced on the car, cautious and apprehensive, ever mindful of Villa's fierce reputation. Ramon Guerra was the first assassin to reach the car. He looked down at Villa's bullet-torn body, then turned to Losoya and shouted: "The dirty pig! We taught him!" As he glanced back to the car, Guerra's face went white with fear. Though shot to pieces, the Centaur was still alive. His hand, clutching a big revolver, instinctively moved upward. He fired one shot that tore into Guerra's face and killed him on the spot.

The assassins began firing again, pumping bullets into Villa until they were sure that the dreaded Centaur was dead. His bleeding corpse was then dragged, along with the others, to Villa's hotel, where it was repeatedly photographed at Losoya's orders. Commented the assassin: "There will be no legends about him, as there are about Zapata, no tales that he is hiding in the mountains like Zapata, waiting to come back. The photographs prove that Pancho Villa is dead. This is important."

Pancho Villa (foreground), dead in a room of a hotel he owned in Parral; his corpse was photographed by his assassins to prove that the legendary "Centaur" was, indeed, deceased.

The body of the legendary bandit and revolutionary leader was not taken to the expensive, elegant mausoleum he had earlier purchased in Chihuahua City for his last resting place. His corpse was buried instead in a common grave at Parral. Ghouls dug up Villa's body in 1926 and severed his head, stealing this grisly trophy, which was never recovered. Barraza later admitted organizing the assassins and he was placed on trial. Found guilty, he was sentenced to twenty years in prison, but Obregon, Villa's old foe and then president of Mexico, reduced Barraza's sentence to six months, a brazen act that all but served as an admission that Obregon was behind the assassination of Pancho Villa. Moreover, Obregon made Barraza a colonel in his army. In 1951, on his deathbed, Barraza shouted to a priest: "I am not a murderer! I rid humanity of a monster!"

"MAKE ME LOOK GOOD, KID"/ July 17, 1928

Of all the Mexican leaders to emerge from that country's long revolutionary and civil wars, Alvaro Obregon (1880-1928) proved to be the most long-lasting. Like his mentor, Francisco Madero, Obregon was a product of the landed gentry, a hacendado. As one of the richest planters in Sonora, Obregon sided with Madero in his revolution (1910-1912) against dictator Porfirio Diaz and helped defeat revolutionary turncoat Pascual Orozco in 1912, driving him from the country. When Victoriano Huerta ordered Madero assassinated. Obregon joined with Venustiano Carranza, with the considerable help of Pancho Villa and Emiliano Zapata, to defeat Huerta and drive him from Mexico. He later brought about the assassinations of Zapata and Villa.

(left to right) General Alvaro Obregon, Pancho Villa and U.S. General John J. Pershing in 1914; Villa would raid Columbus, Texas, two years later and Pershing would pursue him in a futile expedition, while Obregon bided his time, gaining power in Mexico.

Obregon was instrumental in installing the vacillating Carranza as president of Mexico. He then retired to his pea-farming. However, in 1920, he denounced Carranza and his regime as wholly corrupt and claimed that Carranza had "sold out" the revolution. Obregon ran for the presidency and succeeded in ousting Carranza, after which he ordered Carranza's assassination.

While in his first term as president of Mexico (1920-1924), Obregon did not completely institute Madero's original land reform measures. He remained loyal to his own class of landowners, but nevertheless distributed about three million acres of land from vast estates to 624 villages. In late 1923, Obregon's hand-picked successor to the presidency, Plutarco Calles, was challenged by Adolfo de la Huerta, who, on December 4, 1923, led a revolt in Vera Cruz, denouncing Obregon as a tyrant and Calles as nothing more than Obregon's puppet. The revolution raged for a year, ending in the summer of 1924, when Obregon's forces scored stunning victories over de la Huerta's ragged and demoralized troops. De la Huerta fled to California where he became a music teacher. Calles was elected to the presidency.

In 1927, again hungry for power, Obregon announced his candidacy for the presidency in the elections of 1928. This move broke a canon rule of the revolution, that no man could serve as president twice, but Obregon's many supporters in the Mexican Congress passed a constitutional amendment that allowed for "non-consecutive re-election." Generals Arnulfo R. Gomez and Francisco R. Serrano denounced Obregon as a traitor to the revolution and led a violent but brief uprising, which Obregon ruthlessly crushed, capturing and shooting both Gomez and Serrano. Obregon handily won the election on July 1, 1928.

During his first administration as president, Obregon had suppressed the powerful Catholic Church in Mexico, its prelates widely denouncing his previous murderous methods during the long revolutionary years that had consumed Mexico. Obregon had outlawed priests and even jailed and executed clergymen who talked against his regime. (John Ford's 1947 film, The Fugitive, effectively profiles this devastating period in which Catholic priests were hunted down and shot in Mexico.) Believing that Obregon would again institute his harsh treatment of religious organizations, chiefly the Catholic Church, many religious fanatics resolved to assassinate him.

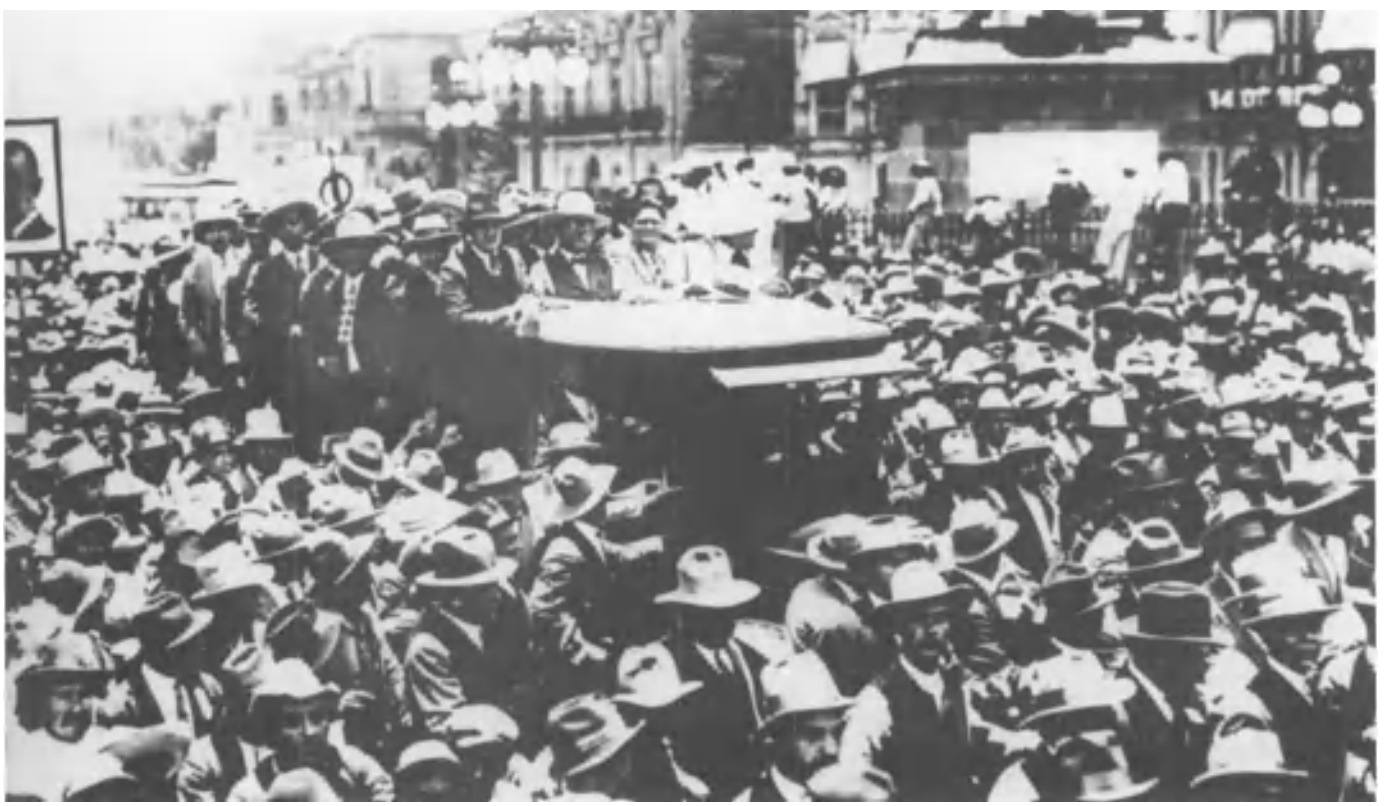
Obregon in 1920, when he became president of Mexico, having arranged for the assassinations of Zapata and Carranza.

One of the most flamboyant conspirators was an underground leader called Madre Conchita, who devised a macabre end for the new president. He would be invited to waltz with a woman sent by Madre Conchita and the woman, while being held close by Obregon, would withdraw a hypodermic needle from beneath her shawl and quickly inject a lethal dose of strychnine into the president's arm. This plot failed to materialize. Madre Conchita then met and recruited a religious zealot, Jose de Leon Toral, who told her that he would readily give his life in order to kill Obregon, whom he considered to be the anti-Christ.

Obregon's brutal suppression of the Catholic church in Mexico during his first term in office (1920-1924) was depicted in John Ford's 1947 film The Fugitive, in which Henry Fonda (shown behind bars) is a priest about to be shot.

With a borrowed pistol, Toral went to Obregon's residence in Mexico City, but the place was too heavily guarded for him to enter the grounds. He then learned from newspapers that the president would appear as a guest of honor at a political banquet in a small cafe in San Angel, just outside of Mexico City. Toral went to the cafe on July 17, 1928, posing as an artist and moving among the tables, pretending to sketch the customers. Obregon was expected momentarily to appear, even though his aides had advised him against attending the banquet, telling him that several plots against his life had been uncovered. Replied Obregon: "These plots come and go each day. I remain." He and his aides then laughed about the name of the cafe he was about to visit, La Bombita (the Little Bomb).

A short time after Obregon took his seat in the La Bombita, Toral approached his table. He was stopped by guards, but loudly explained that he was an artist and wanted to sketch the president-elect. The vain Obregon, always eager for flattery, waved Toral over to him, sending away his guards. Toral stood over Obregon and began to sketch him on a pad. The president-elect continued to chat with friends, then turned to Toral, abruptly saying: "I hope you make me look good, kid." Obregon was suddenly staring into the muzzle of a pistol. Without a word, Toral fired five shots at point blank range, obliterating Obregon's face and instantly killing the president-elect. Toral was thrown to the ground by guards, quickly tried and then executed. Alvaro Obregon, last of the most tempestuous leaders of the long Mexican revolution, was no more, his name added to the terrible list of those he had ordered assassinated—Zapata, Carranza and Villa.



President-elect Obregon (shown in white hat, vest and bow tie, riding in truck) after winning the rigged 1928 presidential election; a short time later he was assassinated while having his picture drawn in a cafe.

DEATH OF A STRANGE EXILE/ August 20, 1940

Just as the amateur artist Toral brought about the death of Alvaro Obregon in 1928, Mexico's greatest artist, Diego Rivera, unwittingly made it possible for the assassination of communist leader Leon Trotsky twelve years later. Had Trotsky (Lev Davidovich Bronstein, 1879-1940) won his power struggle with Joseph Stalin following the death of Vladimir Lenin in 1924, the history of the Soviet Union would most probably been quite different. Trotsky, the intellectual light of the Bolshevik (communist) Revolution of 1917, often disagreed with Lenin. He was an early advocate of the Menshevik position, the liberal democratic alternative to Bolshevism. His theory of a "permanent revolution" dependent upon the class revolt that would inevitably occur in all capitalist democracies, contradicted the views of Stalin (who simply employed communism as a front for his own dictatorship).

Leon Trotsky in 1920 at the zenith of his career in Soviet Russia.

Trotsky's bloodstained office in his villa outside Mexico City, where he was fatally attacked on August 20, 1940, by Jaime Mercader, on orders from Joseph Stalin.

Trotsky compromised the liberal idea in 1917, when he joined the Bolshevik faction, subordinating himself to Lenin. During the Civil War (1918-1920), Trotsky, as commander of the Soviet troops, effectively crushed the White (royalist) armies. In 1918, he finalized the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, which gave Germany considerable lands in exchange for Soviet withdrawal from World War I. Trotsky then resigned his post as foreign commissar in order to assume the task of building the Red Army from what remained of the czarist forces. By 1920, he was clearly established as the number two man in the Soviet hierarchy behind Lenin. Trotsky, one of the five members of the Politburo from its birth in 1919, antagonized many of his peers in the communist government with his intellectual arrogance and the preferred status he enjoyed in Lenin's inner circle.

All this changed in 1924 with Lenin's death. Stalin made a concerted effort to eliminate Trotsky and all others who stood in his way to power. Within a few years, Stalin, with considerable support from other communist leaders (whom he would later purge) succeeded in ousting Trotsky from the Politburo, then his position in the Central Committee. Trotsky was then driven into exile in January 1928, residing in Alma Ata in remote Central Asia. He then settled in Turkey, then France, then Norway, a nomadic fugitive from Stalin's increasing wrath, particularly after Trotsky published a noteworthy attack on Stalin in his 1935 book, The Revolution Betrayed.

In 1936, the Norwegian government yielded to Stalin's pressure and expelled Trotsky. He appealed to Mexican President Lazaro Cardenas for political asylum. Many communist leaders in Mexico welcomed Trotsky as a true hero of the revolution, including the famous painter, Diego

David Alfaro Siqueiros, who attacked Trotsky's compound outside of Mexico City in May 1940; machine gun fire failed to find the mark.

Leon Trotsky, dead, August 21, 1940; he had been marked for murder by Stalin ten years earlier, but had evaded assassination until befriending his own killer.

Rivera, who had championed the peasant class struggles through his own artwork. He personally invited Trotsky to live with him in Mexico, a request endorsed by the Mexican government.

Trotsky, by that time, was a much-wanted man. Stalin was in the process of purging all of his old political cronies in a series of notorious kangaroo treason trials and Trotsky was convicted in absentia as a Red "heretic." Stalin put a price on his head and sent agents from his dreaded secret police, the GPU, to track down and assassinate him and all exiled Russian political opponents and various Trotskyite leaders. This was the case of Rudolf Klement, murdered by GPU agents in Paris. Trotsky, by that time, had immigrated to Mexico and was living with Rivera and his family, but he was not safe from the agents who sought to kill him.

In 1939, a rift attributed to Trotsky and Rivera's wife, the artist, Frida Kahlo, developed. Trotsky and his wife, Natalya, moved out of Rivera's house and took up residence in Coyoacan, a suburb of Mexico City. Fearing for his safety, Trotsky moved into a heavily fortified compound with a watchtower and a barricaded gate. The estate was patrolled around the clock by ten Mexican policemen and several American Trotskyites. Trotsky took these precautions after hearing that Mexican Stalinists had condemned him to death as a "Judas."

On May 24, 1940, the painter, David Alfaro Siqueiros and a gang of Stalinist artists and soldiers, along with a group of mine workers, descended on Trotsky's compound. The Mexican policemen were lured from their posts by two women posing as prostitutes, leaving only a few guards. Siqueiros and twenty armed men gained entry to the courtyard of the compound, locking up the few guards. They positioned a machine gun outside of Trotsky's bedroom and opened fire. Trotsky and his wife hurled themselves to the floor and hid beneath a bed. Two incendiary bombs were thrown by the invaders, but little damage was done. Thinking the police were about to arrive, the attackers then fled. The house was left a shambles.

One fatality resulted. An American Trotskyite, Robert Sheldon Harte, who had been on guard that night, was abducted and murdered by the assassins, his body later found in a pit filled with quicklime near a deserted farmhouse. The police conducted a widespread manhunt for the killers and the assassins went into hiding. Siqueiros was permitted to leave Mexico in 1942. He eventually migrated to Chile, having suffered no Assassin Jaime Mercader, seriously wounded by Trotsky's bodyguards; he would go to prison for life.

General Jose Manuel Nunez, chief of police of Mexico City, holds the pickax Mercader used to kill Trotsky.

Trotsky's large funeral procession in Mexico City on August 24, 1940.

reprisals for his botched attempt on Trotsky's life. He was described by Mexican officials as "an uncontrolled element considered half mad."

Following the abortive Siqueiros attack, Trotsky had a new watchtower constructed at his compound and installed an elaborate alarm system throughout his house. In the summer of 1940, a Trotsky sympathizer who went by the name of Frank Jacson began cultivating Trotsky's friendship, visiting him regularly and expressing his admiration for Trotsky's work. Jacson had many aliases, including the name of Jacques Mornard (an alias he used when posing as a French journalist). His real name was Jaime Ramon Mercader del Rio Hernandez, the son of a Spanish businessman and a Cuban mother with communist sympathies. Mercader, an avowed Stalinist, had fought in the Republican army during the Spanish Civil War and was later recruited by Stalin's secret police, the GPU, and given the assignment of murdering Trotsky.

In August 1940, Mercader asked Trotsky if he would review a political paper he had written. His host agreed and invited Mercader to visit him on August 20, 1940. Mercader was not closely examined by guards when he arrived as he had gained Trotsky's confidence. He carried with him a thirteen-inch dagger, a pistol, and an Alpine ice ax, all concealed under a heavy topcoat which he draped over his arm. Trotsky took Mercader to his study and sat down to examine the paper. As he was looking over the document, Mercader walked behind him and plunged the ax into his mentor's skull. The blow was not strong enough to render Trotsky unconscious. He cried out in pain which brought American guards on the run. Joseph Hansen and Jake Cooper burst into the room, wrestling Mercader to the ground and beating him senseless. Trotsky prevented them from killing him, saying that: "He has a story to tell."

The blow to Trotsky's head proved fatal. He lapsed into a coma and died twenty-five hours later. Once in custody, Assassin Jaime Mercader shown in prison, 1954; a model prisoner, he was released six years later and went to Russia, where he was hailed as a hero for murdering Trotsky.

Mercader stated that he had killed Trotsky to redeem the honor of one of Trotsky's secretaries, whom Trotsky had violated. The woman was contacted and denied that any such sexual attack by Trotsky had ever occurred. Mercader, tried on April 17, 1943, under his alias of Jacques Mornard, was convicted of murder and sent to prison for life. He was a model prisoner at Juarez Penitentiary in Mexico City for seventeen years. Released on May 6, 1960, Mercader moved to Prague, Czechoslovakia, where he worked as a journalist for communist publications. He later moved to Moscow, where he received the "Order of the Soviet Union." Mercader then moved again, this time to Cuba, his mother's homeland, where he died in 1978, never admitting that he had been a hired killer for Joseph Stalin.

ASSASSINS OF THE RISING SUN

In the secretive, isolated Japan of the 1920s and 1930s, many murder cabals were organized to eliminate all those who opposed the concepts of conquest advanced by the royal princes and militarists who controlled the country. Since defeating the Russian fleet in 1905 and winning the Russo-Japanese War, Japan's militarists, with the tacit approval of the emperor, began to plan the conquest of Manchuria, China and most of the Pacific. This small but overpopulated nation was without real war material. It needed iron, steel, rubber and oil with which to build its military machine. It looked covetously to its neighbors for these assets, believing that its empire could only survive through ruthless aggression. There were in this land of bushido a few enlightened leaders who attempted to stall if not halt Japan's path toward war. Almost all of them lost their lives to government-sponsored assassins, including the liberal-minded Tsuyoshi Inukai, prime minister of the country.

DEATH OF A PACIFIST/May 15, 1932

Two men dramatically opposite in nature and attitude were born in Japan in 1855. One of them, Mitsuru Toyama (1855-1944), was vicious and brutal, cunning and crafty. He would become chief of all criminal activities in Japan and become almost as powerful as the emperor, orchestrating if not dictating the nation's military future. The other, Tsuyoshi Inukai (1855-1932), was gentle and caring. He possessed a brilliant mind and labored throughout his life to preserve peace. He rose to become Japan's prime minister in 1931, instituting reforms and measures that would prevent his country from rushing headlong into open war.

Japan's Emperor Hirohito, in military attire, shown in the late 1920s before reviewing troops; he secretly orchestrated staged military uprisings that ostensibly wrested control from him, but he nevertheless directed Japan's war of aggression.

Emperor Hirohito (below, center) is shown supervising Japanese army maneuvers in 1929, exercising the supreme military authority his worshipping minions later claimed he did not really possess.

Mitsuru Toyama, head of the dreaded Black Dragon Society, which specialized in assassination in advancing the goals of military conquest; next to the emperor, Toyama was the most powerful man in Japan.

Toyama, born to a family of obscure samurai rank, grew up as a street-brawling thug. He idolized the samurai tradition and joined, while in his twenties, several samurai uprisings for which he was sentenced to three years in jail. When released, he joined an ultra-nationalist group, Kyoshisha, and soon thereafter began to attract his own following. He organized a large disciplined army of strike breakers, who were financed by coal mine owners. In 1881, Toyama founded Genyosha, which came to be known as the Black Dragon Society, a federation of previously existing nationalist societies, one that came to dominate all underworld activities and control all government and military leaders, who became members in order to advance their careers.

In supporting expansionism and authoritarian rule at home—always with complete obedience to the emperor—Toyama's Black Dragon Society supported extreme right-wing causes and by the 1890s its assassins routinely murdered moderate or liberal political figures who thought to alter Japan's military aims. In the 1892 election, the bloodiest in Japan's history, the society mobilized tens of thousands of rightists and criminals to assure the elections of its candidates. Toyama, whose expansionist aims extended to Korea and China, was responsible for sending his agents to murder the queen of Korea in 1895, an event that marked the beginning of Japan's occupation of that country for a half century.

Japan's criminal class and the rightists endorsed the same policies and it became difficult to distinguish between the two elements. In 1919, Toyama organized Japan's first national federation of gangsters, Dai Nippon Kokusui-kai, or the Great National Essence Society, a force of more than 60,000 gangsters, laborers and ultra-nationalists. Eventually, this organization evolved into a paramilitary arm of the Seiyukai, one of Japan's two major political parties. Throughout the 1920s, Toyama's political power continued to grow, despite a trend in Japanese politics toward the left. He was indirectly supported by Emperor Hirohito (1901-1989), who had long earlier decided on a course of war. Upon his father's long illness, beginning in 1923, Hirohito was named regent of the country and as such, the 22-year-old emperor was in total control of Japan (he became emperor in 1926). Influenced by his war-seeking uncles, all princes holding high-ranking military positions, Hirohito sought a path to world conquest.

That path was mapped in detail for the emperor by the pleasure-seeking Baron Giichi Tanaka (1863-1929), a high-ranking member of Toyama's Black Dragon Society. His career had long been promoted by Toyama, after Tanaka distinguished himself in the Russo-Japanese War of 1904-1905. With Toyama's support, Tanaka became minister of war in 1918, a baron in 1920, a general in 1921, president of Seiyukai in 1925, and prime minister of Japan and chief of foreign affairs (1927-1929). His first act as prime minister was to prepare a top secret report for Emperor Hirohito, one that detailed Japan's plan for world conquest.

Below: Baron Giichi Tanaka, pleasure-seeking prime minister of Japan (pulling on his boots before a conference with Hirohito); he and the emperor developed the secret "Tanaka Plan," an insidious scheme for world conquest.

In the 1945 film Blood on the Sun, actor James Cagney (center) plays an American newsman searching for the secret "Tanaka Plan" in prewar Tokyo; he is shown with Sylvia Sidney (left) receiving the clandestine document from a pacifist Japanese official, Frank Puglia (in the role model of the assassinated Premier Inukai).

This became the notorious Tanaka Plan. Its discovery and exposure in 1927 was fraught with melodrama. One report had it that the ex-bandit chief of Manchuria, Chang Tso-lin, bought a rough translation of the secret report from a Japanese businessman. Another had it that an American journalist working in Tokyo obtained the report from a beautiful Eurasian woman who was Tanaka's favorite geisha. Tanaka was not present to deny the report, having committed suicide in the geisha's lavish Tokyo apartment, which he had maintained for her. (This tale was incisively profiled in all its sinister aspects in the 1945 film, Blood on the Sun, starring James Cagney.)

The Tanaka Plan was specific. Tanaka reportedly told the emperor that "Japan cannot remove the difficulties in Eastern Asia unless she adopts a policy of 'blood and iron'... In the future, if we want to control China, we must first crush the United States." He went on to detail the conquest of Manchuria, China, the Philippines, the whole of the Pacific, even Russia. When the report was publicized in the West, Japan emphatically denounced it as a fraud. Within a few years, a new political leader emerged who seemed to contradict the notions of Japan's secret plan of conquest. He was Tsuyoshi Inukai, a liberal-minded pacifist openly opposed to any expansionism by his country.

Opposite page: Japanese troops are shown invading Manchuria in July 1931, following the first steps of the "Tanaka Plan."

Inukai had begun his career as a journalist in the late 1870s, becoming the editor of the liberal newspaper, Hochi Shimbun. He gained many political supporters through his editorials, which condemned Japanese aggression. In 1890, he ran for election, becoming a member of the first House of Representatives of the Imperial Diet, Japan's parliamentary government (secretly deferring all major political decisions to the emperor). He became minister of education in 1898, continuing to be an ardent foe of military expansionism. By 1922, Inukai formed a reform political party, Kakushin Karabu, which advocated non-intervention and peace.

Japan's new pacifist prime minister, Tsuyoshi Inukai (extreme left), celebrates the organization of his cabinet in 1931, the very year Inukai attempted to stall Japanese aggression in Manchuria.

The clever Toyama watched Inukai's rise with interest and although the little politician proved to be annoying in his outspoken attacks against Japan's fulminating militarists, the Black Dragon chief thought to make him a useful tool. When the Tanaka Plan was exposed, Toyama and the Black Dragons, including Emperor Hirohito, thought to profile Japan to the world as a peace-loving nation. To that end, Inukai's party was absorbed into the Seiyukai party, which was controlled by the Black Dragons. Inukai was then promoted by his very opponents to the political forefront and, in 1931, was made prime minister.

Toyama quickly learned that Inukai would be no stooge for the Black Dragons. The diminutive, feisty Inukai opposed Japan's militarists at every turn, subverting their goals of conquest in Manchuria by drastically cutting budgets for the army, disapproving contracts for the manufacturing of tanks, planes and warships and attempting to advance into higher positions the few Japanese admirals and generals who were opposed to military aggression. Toyama could do nothing with Inukai. He and the militarists marked him for assassination.

That Hirohito knew of this intended murder there can be no doubt. No authority in Japan superceded the emperor, who, under the predominately Shinto religion at that time, was the undisputed spiritual and corporal leader of Japan. In fact, he was considered a deity, a living god, whose will could not be challenged, even by the likes of Mitsuru Toyama. No important military moves or the assassinations of any significant Japanese figures could be entertained, let alone enacted, without the permission of Hirohito. The world, however, was never to know that the emperor endorsed or directed such actions.

Hirohito was a cautious and calculating person, one who devised, with the aid of Toyama and others, his own plan to secure his image of innocence in the many crimes performed on his behalf, as well as an undetected method by which he could secretly conduct his country's naked aggression. He put in motion an insidious scheme wherein young and irresponsible militarists would assassinate the likes of Inukai and ostensibly stage a military coup that wrested control of the government from Hirohito. He would then appear to be no more than a helpless, titular monarch at the mercy of a ruthless military cabal.

Through slavish militarists willing to sacrifice their lives to their living god, the emperor successfully convinced the West that this myth was a reality, a "planted" concept embraced by Western experts on the Far East almost throughout World War II. Following the defeat of Japan in 1945, Hirohito's sinister machinations were unraveled, but not publicized widely in that the emperor was retained without power (instead of being executed as a war criminal as many proposed) to preserve the peace of the country he had brought to ruination.

The liberal-minded, peace-loving Inukai stood firmly in the way of Hirohito's ambitions. The prime minister had to be removed. To that end, nine air force and navy cadets who had been indoctrinated for months on the evil ways of Inukai's administration, were told a lie by Black Dragon leaders, that the prime minister had been secretly negotiating with Chang Kai-Shek of China, and was planning to return to China the territories gained through the blood of Japanese troops. Convinced that Inukai was a traitor, the cadets agreed to murder the prime minister. They called their cabal the Blood Brotherhood.

As a back-up to the Blood Brotherhood, another cabal of eleven military officers was formed by the Black Dragons. This group was led by Toyama's chief henchman and killer, Nisho Inoue, a burly, strapping friar who could have passed for a sumo wrestler. The purpose of this second group was to kill all of those who supported the prime minister before Inukai was himself murdered. Inoue's first move was to recruit a naive, 22-year-old carpenter's apprentice, Tadashi Konuma, giving him a Browning automatic pistol and a handful of bullets and telling Tadashi to kill former finance minister Junnosuke Inoue (no relation to the friar). The finance minister had been reluctant to fund the militarists when in office and he was still in support of Prime Minister Inukai. At Inoue's instructions, Konuma waited outside a Tokyo meeting place on February 9, Black Dragon assassin Nisho Inoue, organizer of the young cadets who committed the murder of Prime Minister Inukai.

American actor Charlie Chaplin, who was arriving in Tokyo to promote his film, City Lights, was slated for murder.

Below: Prime Minister Inukai is shown in his study at his Tokyo residence in almost the same spot where invading assassins fatally shot him in May 1932.

1932. When former finance minister Inoue stepped from a car to address a sidewalk crowd, Konuma shot him three times in the back, killing him. Konuma allowed himself to be arrested by friendly police (he later served a brief prison sentence).

Black Dragon assassin Inoue then planned his next murder, that of Baron Takuma Dan, a long-time supporter of the U.S. Again, Inoue provided another assassin, Goro Hisanuma, with a Browning automatic pistol and a handful of bullets, sending him to murder Baron Dan. On March 5, 1932, the killer stationed himself outside the Mitsui Bank Building. When the baron's car arrived, the assassin tried to open the door, but found it locked. Before the baron's chauffeur could drive to safety, Hisanuma fired several shots through the window, one bullet killing Baron Dan immediately. The killer, like Konuma, received a light prison sentence.

Several young Japanese army officers are shown in the staged military uprising of 1936 in Tokyo, one which cleverly convinced the West that Emperor Hirohito had been stripped of his power.

The emperor had a more direct hand in the next assassination, that of Inukai. He sent his representative, Lieutenant General Akitomo Segawa, a Black Dragon member, to meet with cadets at an inn outside of Tokyo to brief them on their task. He gave them directions to the prime minister's residence and told them how they must enter the building and where to locate Inukai. He then got them drunk while lecturing them on their patriotic duty. The cadets then held a murder council, electing the leaders of the assignment. One of them noted that Hollywood movie actor Charlie Chaplin was arriving in Tokyo on May 14, 1932, the day before the planned assassination. The cadet proposed that Chaplin be killed along with Inukai when the prime minister entertained the actor on the night of his arrival to increase international attention to their cause.

This plan was seriously considered until another cadet pointed out that police had already been alerted to a death threat to Chaplin, a fake threat the Blood Brotherhood had spread to slacken security for Inukai. The police, the cadet emphasized, would go all out to protect the comedian on Saturday night, at the time he was attending the reception hosted by Inukai. Therefore, most of the police force would be resting and off guard the following day, which had been set aside for the prime minister's murder. The plan to murder Charlie Chaplin was abandoned.

Before going to Inukai's residence on May 15, 1932, the cadets visited the Yasukuni Shrine, a Shinto temple in Tokyo, where they reaffirmed their loyalty to the emperor. They got into two cabs and drove to the prime minister's house, which was near the emperor's palace. Inukai's residence was a sprawling building of many rooms. Its foyer was almost as large as a hotel lobby and there the cadets encountered a uniformed policeman and a plainclothes detective. When the cadets demanded to know the whereabouts of Inukai, the detective ran forward, drawing his gun. He was shot down. The uniformed officer refused to disclose the whereabouts of the prime minister and the cadets then ran pell-mell through the many rooms of the residence, looking for their prey. They held household workers at gunpoint, grilling them as to Inukai's whereabouts, but the servants refused to speak to them.

The cadets then heard a noise behind a second-floor door, which they easily broke down, shooting to death a bodyguard, who was protecting Inukai's private quarters. The cadets found the little prime minister (he was only five feet tall) calmly sitting behind a table, smoking a cigarette and wearing a thin kimono. A navy cadet walked silently to Inukai and placed a revolver to his head, pulling the trigger several times. Nothing happened. The cadet had forgotten to load the weapon. The prime minister shook his head and stroked his white goateed chin. He then attempted to reason with the cadets, saying that he would explain his actions so that they could realize he was working on behalf of Japan's best interests.

Astonishingly, the cadets agreed, following the prime minister into his office, leaving behind Inukai's terrified daughter-in-law, who held an infant in her arms. Though the young officers politely listened for some minutes as the 76-year-old Inukai detailed his foreign strategy for peace, their leader, a cadet named Mikami, resolved to assassinate the old man. He would later state in court: "I didn't have any personal grudge against him, but I had a tragic feeling. I tried to convince myself that we were straws in the wind of revolution. And so nothing changed my will to kill."

Suddenly, Inukai stopped talking. He looked down at the boots the cadets were wearing and realized that they had violated a centuries-old custom by not removing them when they entered his home. "What about your shoes?" he inquired. "Why don't you take them off?" His demand that his would-be assassins strictly observe Japanese etiquette broke the spell of his oratory, prompting the cadets to once more focus upon their grim mission.

"Worry about that later!" shouted one of the cadets. "You know why we are here! Do you have anything to say before you die?"

Lieutenant Masayoshi Yamagishi then shouted: "No use talking! Fire!" The cadets began shooting. A cadet named Mikami fired almost point black at the prime minister's head, sending a bullet into Inukai's right temple. He collapsed onto a table and the cadets fled. Family members found the old prime minister still alive. Mikami's bullet had slashed his forehead and become embedded in his nose. Another bullet had pierced his left nostril, entering his mouth and exiting through his right cheek. Inukai was nevertheless lucid, saying to his doctor, who had been on the premises: "Call them back [the assassins]. I want to talk to them."

In spite of the brutal attack upon him, the peacemaking prime minister still thought to reason with his assassins. More doctors arrived and bandaged his wounds, which they believed were not critical. Meanwhile, the cadets and other military cabals in league with them made demonstrations all over Tokyo, firing weapons into the air in front of banks and police stations and throwing bombs that exploded in empty buildings, making it appear that there was a widespread uprising in process by rash, young officers. The assassins then turned themselves into the Japanese secret police and were housed in "detaining quarters" that offered as many comforts as their own barracks. (Fifty-four young Japanese officers involved in the 1932 and the subsequent 1936 staged insurrections were later charged with conspiracy. All were released except six of those involved in Inukai's assassination, who were sent to prison. These officers were released in 1939 and 1940 on secret orders from Hirohito, in time to resume their military careers and help invade the Philippines and the islands of the South Pacific.)

Meanwhile, prime minister Inukai held a cabinet meeting, which he dismissed when he began to bleed heavily from his wounds. More doctors arrived to give him a transfusion, mixing the blood of Inukai's son with a "solution." In a few minutes, he collapsed into a coma. When Emperor Hirohito was told that the prime minister was not yet dead, he sent his own physician to "attend" to the stricken Inukai. At 9:30 p.m., Inukai revived, saying: "I feel much better now." The Imperial physician gave him a pill and only minutes after swallowing it, the prime minister fell back into a coma. The emperor was told that Inukai was dead, but this proved untrue. More doctors were sent to examine the prime minister, and finally, after being injected with what was most probably a lethal substance, he died at 2:36 a.m., May 16, 1932. Not until he was convinced that his most stubborn political foe was dead did Emperor Hirohito go to sleep.

The real architect of war and the ruination of his country, Emperor Hirohito, shown in the post-WW II era; he abdicated his god-like power after the U.S. dropped two atomic bombs on Japanese cities in August 1945, but nevertheless continued to live in luxury on his palatial grounds in Tokyo until his death in 1989.

A few days later, the elderly Admiral Makoto Saito was appointed interim prime minister, chosen because he would do as he was told by the militarists acting on Hirohito's behalf. When Saito proved truculent, he was assassinated in the so-called military uprising of 1936, one that Hirohito himself orchestrated, to make it appear that the Japanese government was now in the total control of the militarists. This second military rebellion ostensibly ushered into power the warmongering likes of General Hideki Tojo and Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto. These men, under Hirohito's secret direction, diligently began to map out their attacks on China, Malaya, the Philippines and the U.S. naval base at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii.

AMERICAN MALCONTENTS

While Japanese militarists busied themselves with political murders in preparation for world conquest during the 1930s, this era endured two assassinations in America that personified the disillusionment and hopelessness that gripped the nation in its darkest economic Depression. The 1930s saw massive unemployment, stagnant business, lame industry and a deepening disbelief in the country's aloof leaders, who had, for the most part, led their constituents into poverty and despair. Following the disastrous do-nothing administration of President Herbert Hoover, the 1932 election of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt offered a dim light in a long, dark tunnel. Most Americans, however, were pessimistic and had little confidence in a federal government that had allowed the country to flounder. State governments were even less helpful, many of its governors indifferent to the plight of their citizens.

As banks and businesses failed, hundreds of thousands of hard-working citizens were evicted from their homes and farms, thrown into the road, becoming a generation of dispossessed nomads and wanderers. Among these displaced legions was an illiterate, unemployed immigrant, who, in 1933, thought to kill President Roosevelt simply because he occupied a position of authority, an authority that represented to this assassin all that was oppressive. Among the middle-class that had seen its savings and future obliterated through the malfeasance and mismanagement of business bosses and grafting politicians was a conscientious physician turned assassin who thought to rid the world of a dangerous demagogue. His target was Huey Long of Louisiana, who had blustered and bullied his way to power, abusing his office and the rights of those he pretended to represent.

A MURDER IN MIAMI/February 15, 1933

The attempt to assassinate president-elect Franklin Delano Roosevelt (1882-1945) by Joseph Zangara in 1933 in Miami, Florida, has often been misdirected or confused by crime journalists. It is their incorrect assumption that Zangara was really intent on murdering Chicago Mayor Anton Cermak. The mayor's death was accidental. The true and only target of the assassin was FDR. The liberal Democrat and father figure of a generation of Depression-era voters, who was to become the thirty-second president of the United States, held no specific image for his would-be killer. Joseph Zangara simply hated authority, a passion that raged throughout a brief life that was unspectacular, until he fired his fatal bullets.

Zangara was illiterate, an unemployed New Jersey mill hand, who had traveled to Florida seeking warmth and work. He found no employment and grew even more embittered at his dire financial state. He grubbed for food and lived in hobo hovels and in his miserable travels he was consumed by only one thought—to strike out at the most visible symbol of power. That symbol presented itself to him in Miami, on February 15, 1933. The dwarf-like Zangara (he stood barely five feet tall) was ill that day, his defense attorney later describing "stomach cramps" as a malady that drove him to his senseless act.

Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who was the target of an assassin in 1933.

He took some medicine he had purchased at a drug store and then loaded a revolver he had carried with him from New Jersey as he bummed his way south to Miami.

Zangara heard from Miami residents that FDR would be in Miami to attend a Democratic political rally. This word-of-mouth news was his only source of information. The little man could not read newspapers, let alone afford the purchase of such inexpensive publications. On the day of Roosevelt's arrival, Zangara joined the immense crowds jamming the streets along FDR's motorcade route. When the president-elect's car appeared, its speed was suddenly reduced to a crawl as dense crowds broke through police lines to cheer and salute him. Zangara was swept along toward FDR's open auto. He began knocking people down and shoving them aside in a frantic effort to get close to the car in which Roosevelt was riding.

The assassin at this moment had the appearance of a mad dog with rabies. His mouth drooped, spittle drooling from it. One man, who had been pushed aside by Zangara, later stated: "It was like he was going to explode. I was going to hit him, but something made me stop. He was like a nut." Zangara's coal black eyes blazed and from his throat rose a high-pitched scream: "There are too many people starving to death!"

Eight feet from Roosevelt's car, Zangara raised his revolver and aimed it at the president-elect. He fired wildly, rapidly squeezing off all his rounds and, at the same time, a woman swung her handbag at him, knocking the weapon upward. Bullets hit pedestrians Margaret Kruis, twenty-three, and

Russell Caldwell, twenty-two, striking both in the head. Two more bullets slammed into Chicago Mayor Anton Joseph Cermak (1873-1933), who had been riding in the back seat of the car next to Roosevelt, but had gotten out of the car and was standing next to it as it came to a stop while FDR greeted supporters. The president-elect was unharmed. Roosevelt glanced only once at Zangara and then he turned back to aid the mortally wounded Cermak, who had fallen to his knees and was holding onto the car. Raymond Moley, an FDR aide, later described Roosevelt's physical reaction: "There was not so much of the twitching of a muscle, the mopping of a brow, or even the hint of false gaiety."

Only moments after Zangara fired his last shot, spectators surrounding the assassin, instead of parting through fear to let him pass, as he expected, suddenly closed in on him like a giant wave, knocking the little man down, kicking and beating him. Police officers battled their way through the angry crowd to rescue the bleeding assassin and drag him to a police car, throwing him into the back seat, two tall officers leaping upon him before the car sped off to a police station. FDR's car also raced off while Cermak, who insisted he could walk, stumbled toward a waiting ambulance with aides holding onto him. The mayor of Chicago was taken to Jackson Memorial Hospital, where his wounds were thought to be serious but not fatal. He nevertheless died three weeks later. Zangara was then charged with murder and an attempted presidential assassination.

Defense attorneys for the assassin found little grounds to President-elect Roosevelt is shown in the back seat of an open car, while he greets spectators in Miami, Florida, on February 15, 1933.

Chicago Mayor Anton Cermak (center, coat slipping from right shoulder) is assisted by aides to a nearby ambulance after having been shot by Joseph Zangara.

Joseph Zangara (center), under heavy guard only hours after he shot Mayor Cermak in his attempt to assassinate FDR. He expressed no regrets for his actions before he was executed.

save Zangara's life. He offered none himself at his brief trial. Convicted and sentenced to death, Zangara seemed indifferent to his fate. While awaiting execution, a newsman sat outside his cell, grilling him. "Was anyone in on this with you?" Zangara was asked.

"No," replied the assassin. "I have no friends. It was my own idea."

"You killed Mayor Cermak. How do you feel about that?"

"I feel nothing about that. Nothing."

"One of your bullets hit a woman, you know."

"She should not have gotten in the way of the bullet."

"What made you do this? Why do you hate Mr. Roosevelt?"

For some time, Joseph Zangara said nothing. Then, still glaring at the reporter, replied in a monotone: "If I got out, I would kill him at once."

Decades later, a popular rumor held that Zangara had actually meant to kill Cermak, not FDR. This canard claimed that the assassin had been the tool of crime syndicate bosses in Miami, working in collusion with the Capone mob of Chicago, who wanted Cermak killed because he was bent on destroying the Chicago crime cartel. Another wild tale claimed that Cermak was utterly corrupt and that he had forced crime syndicate operations in Chicago to close down because he and his political cronies had not received portions of the spoils from such rackets. Neither of these theories (traditionally lavished by the American press upon a conspiracy-obsessed public) are supported by any evidence.

Zangara himself hardly knew who Anton Cermak was and from his own admissions Cermak was not the man he intended to kill. The assassin had never been in Chicago and had no ties whatsoever to the American criminal underworld. On March 21, 1933, Joseph Zangara sat down in Florida's electric chair at Raiford Prison. He was, as usual, noncommittal about his gruesome fate. When asked if he had any last words, he thought for a minute, then said: "Goodbye. Adios to the world." A few minutes later the electric current coursed through his small, quivering body, killing him.

THE "KINGFISH" GOES DOWN/ September 8, 1935

During the chaotic, economically depressed 1930s, America saw a bevy of bombastic demagogues emerge. All insisted they had the answer to the country's many financial and social woes and all claimed special wisdom that would lead the U.S. back to recovery and a secure way of life. None were more animated, more brazen, or more tyrannical than Huey Pierce Long (1893-1935), the celebrated "Kingfish" of Louisiana. For two decades he dominated the politics of his state and the lives of its citizens.

A hell-raising orator, Long came to be the most outspoken and outrageous politician in America, the raucous, ranting voice of the new South that preached national socialism. The power-craving Long had his eyes on the White House and, had he lived, this despotic, enormously popular politician might have changed America from a liberal democracy to the kind of fascist regime then found in Nazi Germany. The Germans had desperately supported Adolf Hitler to lead them to economic survival by any means. Many Americans looked to Huey Long for the same dark salvation.

Huey Pierce Long of Louisiana, a bombastic demagogue, who was assassinated in 1935.

Born in rural Louisiana, on August 30, 1893, Long was one of nine children, growing up on a farm in Winn Parish. He failed to graduate from Shreveport High School after he was involved in a 1912 shooting, accused of firing at another youth over the affections of a girl, Rose McConnell. She provided an alibi for Long, saying that both were at a movie when the shooting occurred. Long was released from jail and he married McConnell, their union producing two sons and a daughter.

Long first worked as a traveling salesman, peddling hardware in small hamlets, but his heart was always centered in the political arena, where he was to excel as a spellbinding orator, a style he learned as a child from black Baptist ministers, who exhorted thunderous salvation and threatened eternal damnation to their wayward parishioners. He decided that the only way he could achieve his political ends was to acquire a law degree. He studied for three months in the law department at the University of Oklahoma and then took a crash course at the law school of Tulane University. He passed a special examination for admission to the Louisiana bar and was admitted to practice in May 1915. He was only twenty-two.

Huey Long (center, sitting) campaigning in Louisiana, wearing worn overalls and backed by country singers to impress his backward supporters that he was one "of the little people." (The 2000 film O Brother, Where Art Thou? wildly spoofs Long's use of such hillbilly singers to promote his common man image.)

The nightclubbing Long is shown leaning over a bar to mix his own drink to prevent anyone from poisoning him.

During the early 1920s, Long stumped the back roads of Louisiana, haranguing his fellow farmers with "coon-shouting" lectures in which he indicted the idle rich, the powerful business and industrial tycoons and the politicians in the state capital and in Washington, D.C. He launched an attack on Standard Oil, a battle waged over lost revenues from his own stock holdings. Standard Oil and other large oil firms refused to allow independent oil companies in which Long had invested to use its pipelines in sending crude oil to refineries. Long, through the Louisiana government, supported by the Public Service Commission, later passed legislation that made the pipelines common carriers. Long's stock soared.

Senator Long, in a staged stunt, breaks a violin over the head of a bandleader, who neglected to play his song, "Every Man a King."

Long ran for the governorship of Louisiana in 1924, representing himself as "the one friend the poor has." He claimed that only he stood up for "the little people." He lost his bid and tried again in 1928. This time, he was successful. From that moment on, Long acted as if he had been given dictatorial powers, calling himself "The Kingfish" (the boss) and encouraging others to refer to him that way. The red-headed, puffy-faced tyrant grabbed graft with both hands. He overwhelmed his political opponents through smear campaigns, which he personally directed, until they were removed from office and replaced by his own stooges.

In 1929, Long's foes in the state legislature put together nineteen articles of impeachment against him, including charges that he tried to bribe legislators for their votes, that he attempted to persuade the state Supreme Court to make decisions favorable to his legislation, that he was often drunk when on the job, that he had participated in sex orgies and even ordered one of his many bodyguards to murder a political opponent. Long successfully bribed fifteen state senators to vote against the impeachment.

Huey Long announces his run for the presidency, telling newsmen that his opponents, Herbert Hoover and Franklin D. Roosevelt, are "bed mates of disaster," and that only he could save the country from economic ruination.

By 1930, Long was the virtual dictator of the state, bossing the legislature and the judiciary. He had a small army of bodyguards—he received dozens of death threats regularly—and a private police force. He ignored his family and had many mistresses. He took bribes, but only those involving astronomical sums and routinely took part in all-night gambling parties with his cronies. A heavy drinker, the Kingfish strutted from one nightclub to another, insisting on mixing his own drinks, taking no chances that a revenge-seeking bartender might poison his cocktails.

So powerful had Long become that he ran for the U.S. senate and won and then he ignored the law demanding that he vacate the post of governor, refusing to resign. He went to court and won an astounding victory in that the state judiciary announced that he was to occupy the posts of governor and senator until he decided at his leisure which post to resign. In 1932, he ran his own stooge candidate for the governorship, O. K. Allen, resigning in Allen's favor. Allen thereafter was Long's puppet.

Long's presence in the U.S. Senate was continuously disruptive. He ignored protocol and conducted long-winded tirades in which he advanced his "Share the Wealth" program, a sort of national socialism whereby all great fortunes (beginning with the Rockefellers of Standard Oil) would be redistributed equally to everyone in the U.S., each man, woman and child receiving $5,000 to start all over again. He did not specify how such appropriations could be properly achieved, knowing that under the U.S. Constitution, such measures were illegal. His homespun remedies and rhetoric, however, widely appealed to the unsophisticated constituents who blindly supported him in the then backward state of Louisiana.

When President Roosevelt turned a cold shoulder to Long, the Kingfish retaliated by turning on his fellow Democrat, denouncing him in the Senate as a "Scab" who followed the path of big business, a subject filling much of Long's agenda. He proposed that almost all large businesses and industries in America be nationalized, following the actions of Sweden and other small countries. Such actions were promptly blocked by Long's peers in the Senate.

Judge Benjamin Pavy, Long's dedicated political opponent in Louisiana, who organized a widespread movement to oust the dictatorial Kingfish.

Dr. Carl Austin Weiss, who reportedly shot Huey Long in 1935.

Meanwhile, the Kingfish spent lavishly in Louisiana, floating bonds to provide $68 million for the construction of super highways in his state, contracts for which went to his cronies. He did the same in providing $5 million to erect a 33-story Capitol Building, which came to resemble the Empire State Building in New York, Long's favorite structure. Millions more were spent on impressive steel bridges, expansive construction at the Louisiana State University and a new governor's mansion in Greek revival style.

The Kingfish appointed Dr. James Monroe Smith, one of his poker pals, as head of the state university. Smith, a one-time traveling salesman like Long, promptly bilked the university of hundreds of thousands of dollars, which he used in plunging stock investments. (Smith went to prison in 1939 to serve twenty-four years for embezzling $500,000 in state funds.) In meeting the state treasury crisis in this and other financial scandals committed by Long associates, the Kingfish resorted to his typical remedy. He raised taxes. The already heavily taxed citizens of Louisiana created an uproar.

Long's old enemies then banded together to form the Square Deal Association, which pressured the state legislature to convene a session designed to repudiate Long and call for his ouster. A now alarmed Long quickly returned to his state from Washington to find the capital city of Baton Rouge turned into an armed camp. The Square Dealers had armed themselves and fierce fighting had broken out between this faction and Long's private police force and supporters. The Kingfish resolved to settle matters by force, marching into the state legislature, accompanied by dozens of bodyguards carrying shotguns and submachine guns. While ringed by these gun-toting thugs, Long sat down in the speaker's chair, ranting that his enemies were out to kill him. He managed to avoid a recall, but he knew he was thereafter on shaky grounds.

Despite the crisis in his state, Long took time out to secretly meet with crime syndicate gangsters Frank Costello and Philip "Dandy Phil" Kastel, who had, at Long's connivance, imported more than 80,000 slot machines into the state. Long had legalized their use by establishing a charter wherein proceeds from the machines went to charity. After a year's operations, only $600 from the slot machines had been received by charities, while hundreds of thousands of dollars went into the pockets of Costello, Kastel and Long. Kastel, who resided in one of the posh hotels in New Orleans, oversaw all Louisiana gambling interests of the newly established national crime cartel. He, with Long's approval, instituted wide open casino gambling in New Orleans and in other parts of the state.

An artist's rendering shows how Dr. Weiss approached Long, before shooting him in a hallway of Louisiana's State Capitol Building.

Ignoring the widespread publicity that exposed Long's shady operations, the Kingfish continued to blindly believe that he was still a powerful national figure that commanded enough countrywide support to land him in the White House. He boldly announced his candidacy for the presidency. He would turn Roosevelt out of office, he promised, so that the "little people" could "share the wealth" of the nation. He even wrote a mawkish campaign song entitled "Every Man A King," and had this played by bands whenever he entered a nightclub or restaurant. In one nightclub, the orchestra leader played the wrong song and Long broke a violin over the man's head, but this was just another one of the Kingfish's publicity stunts, the kind of crude behavior he had effectively employed to impress his backwater constituents for so many years.

In putting down one political revolt after another, Long viciously turned on his enemies, particularly those he suspected of undoing him through the Square Deal Association. One who had long been a thorn in the Kingfish's side was Judge Benjamin Pavy. The judge had openly criticized Long over the years and was the head of a small, but determined political group intent on removing the Kingfish from office.

Another artist's drawing depicts the Kingfish clutching his side and fleeing down the hallway as his assassin, Dr. Weiss, is shot to pieces by Long's bodyguards.

Long struck back, attempting to have Pavy removed from the bench. It was later claimed that Long intended to spread the rumor that Pavy and his family members were "tainted by Negro blood," then an anathema in the South.

When hearing of this, Dr. Carl Austin Weiss, a brilliant, 29-year-old physician, who had married the judge's daughter, Yvonne Pavy, grew incensed. On the night of September 8, 1935, Weiss drove to the capitol and waited for the Kingfish in a long corridor that led from the legislature chamber to the governor's office. This corridor had many marble pillars lining its walls and a person could easily stand next to one of these pillars and remain unnoticed. This is where Weiss positioned himself.

There was considerable activity in the capitol building that night as the legislature was in session. When it recessed, Long stepped into the corridor, walking briskly ahead of his platoon of bodyguards. As usual, he was at his sartorial best, wearing an expensive cream-colored double-breasted suit and black-and white spectator shoes. He went into the governor's office, briefly chatting with O. K. Allen, then stepped back into the corridor, again walking far ahead of his bodyguards. This was unusual since two of the Kingfish's guards always preceded Long wherever he went, others taking up the rear, so that Long's front and back were protected.

At 9:21 p.m. Long reached the elevators. Weiss stepped from behind a pillar, slapping Long hard in the face, cutting a cheek with his wedding ring. He then produced, according to the official report, a .32-caliber automatic and fired one or two shots. A bullet struck Long in the abdomen. While groaning and clutching his side, Long ran down the corridor. At the moment Weiss reportedly opened fire, Long's bodyguards unleashed a wild barrage of bullets from automatics and submachine guns that ripped Weiss apart. He crumpled dead to the floor with sixty-one bullets in his riddled body and many more passing through it.

The Kingfish, still clutching his abdomen, staggered through the doors of the capitol and down the stairs, sagging against a railing. Blood jetted between his fingers. His bodyguards found him there and rushed him to a hospital, where he lingered for thirty-one hours before dying on September 9, 1935. While he lived out those last hours, a perplexed Long could give no reason for Weiss' attack. He pointed to his scratched face and said: "That's where he hit me." Then the Kingfish, who had long claimed that his enemies were dedicated to his murder (and had even linked President Roosevelt to such lethal schemes), expressed his shock at being shot. "Why did he do it?" he asked some aides. "Why would anyone want to shoot me?"

That question nagged everyone, especially the press. Reporters and later political writers and historians put forth many theories. One claimed that Weiss had assassinated Long to prevent the Kingfish from ruining his father-in-law or from preventing Long from spreading the rumor that his wife's family had black ancestors. However, Weiss' actions on that last day of his life do not suggest that he planned to assassinate Huey Long. He conducted normal business in his office and scheduled surgery for the next day. He had recently purchased new furniture for his home and had ordered a new heating unit for his house. Weiss told his mother on the last day of his life that he intended to live in his present home for the next ten years with his wife and young son.

Murphy Roden, one of Long's bodyguards, who may have shot the Kingfish by accident.

Other versions of Long's assassination surfaced and raised disturbing questions. One held that Weiss never pulled a gun from the pocket of his trousers, that he had no gun at all. He had simply slapped Long's face and for that insult was shot to death by berserk

Long's "little people" pass by his open casket to say a final farewell to the Kingfish at Memorial Hall of the State Capitol Building in Baton Rouge on September 12, 1935.

An aerial photo depicts Long's massive funeral service at Louisiana's State Capitol Building in Baton Rouge.

bodyguards, who sent their wild firing haphazardly up and down the corridor. It was a bullet from one of these bodyguards, the theory claimed, that had fatally struck the Kingfish. Yet another theory insisted that Weiss did, indeed, have a gun. He had been carrying an automatic in his instrument case in the event he was attacked, as many doctors had recently been, by those trying to steal drugs. In this version, Weiss pointed the gun at Long, but one of the bodyguards, Murphy Roden, grabbed the gun and caused it to go off, sending the fatal bullet into Long. Another theory held that a bodyguard who had been secretly paid to murder his boss, took the gun away from the young doctor and used it to shoot Long. None of these theories have any basis in known fact.

Several distinguished American novels nevertheless advance these theories. Robert Penn Warren, a latter-day teacher at Louisiana State University (the very institute from which Long's crony, Dr. James Monroe Smith, had bilked funds), would later write an incisive Pulitzer Prize-winning novel, All the King's Men, which thinly profiled (in the crude character of Willie Stark) the dictatorial Long and which was made into a telling film in 1949. Novelist Sinclair Lewis, a celebrated mimic known for his sardonic impersonations of Long, wrote a book entitled It Can't Happen Here, a novel clearly based on Long and one that was, ironically, published only a month after the Kingfish's assassination, an event that spurred sales of the Lewis book to more than 300,000 copies. Lewis insisted at that time—without too much conviction—that Long was not the role model for the savage character he had portrayed, a grotesque dwarf named Broderick Crawford (shown at bottom, dying from an assassin's bullet), plays political tyrant Willie Stark in Robert Rossen's classic 1949 film, All The King's Men, based on the Robert Penn Warren novel, which incisively profiled the career of the ruthless Huey Long. Crawford won an Academy Award for his riveting role; Mercedes McCambridge (shown above with John Ireland next to her), in her first film role, won an Oscar for supporting actress.

The inimitable James Cagney plays the role of a rabble-rousing Southern politician Hank Martin in Raoul Walsh's 1953 film A Lion is in the Streets, a role based upon Long's early political career.

Buzz Windrip, who becomes dictator of America. Adria Locke Langley concentrated on Long's early years, producing A Lion is in the Streets, a novel portraying an itinerant salesman in the Deep South named Hank Martin, who becomes a political demagogue clawing his way to power with the support of his swamp water constituents. This book, too, was made into a fascinating film in 1953.

The death of Huey Long was a momentous event in Louisiana. A huge funeral service was held in Baton Rouge, with more than 150,000 of Long's rural followers flocking to the capitol to pay their respects to the dynamic populist. For two days, the Kingfish lay in state in the main hallway of the capitol building, upon which he had lavished so much public money. He was visible in an open casket, his corpse dressed in a tuxedo, this formal attire alien to the oafish hillbilly image he had so long impersonated.

This was not the Huey Long his unsophisticated followers had routinely seen when he had stumped through their rural communities in campaigns of old. At such times, he was beheld in faded blue bib overalls, a frayed-collar shirt and worn-out boots. The corpse these weary and impoverished folks now looked upon as they shuffled past the bier was that of a dandy, a dude, a person of wealth and power, the kind of person that Huey himself had labeled an enemy of the "little people."

Long was laid to rest in a huge marble tomb on the resplendent grounds that Long himself had helped to design. In the decades to come, the Kingfish would be honored as one of Louisiana's famous sons. His legacy was a political dynasty that flourished in his controversial wake, with Long's relatives, notably his brother, Earl Long, and his son, Russell B. Long, remaining in state politics for decades.

Long's killer, Dr. Carl Austin Weiss, was buried in an unmarked grave and forgotten. He had rid the state and the country of a tyrant and a fascist, many said in whispers then. They said it out loud decades later. There is no doubt that Huey Pierce Long was one of the most dangerous politicians in the U.S. in the early 1930s, one who posed a great threat to the very constitutional government he had so artfully manipulated in his rapid climb to power.

FASCISTS AND NAZIS

The death of Huey Long ended a career that could have begun and blossomed in fascist Italy or Nazi Germany. The political tools employed by this American demagogue—intimidation and brute force—had been wielded for more than a decade with horrible effect by many factions of right-wing fanatics that eventually gathered beneath the black banners of Benito Mussolini and Adolf Hitler. Italy, the weakest of the major Allied nations, had borne the brunt of the war against Austria. At war's end, its portion of victory was economic ruin and widespread disillusionment with all things democratic. It looked hopefully to the right and found a strutting, bombastic fascist leader in Benito Mussolini, who seized power in the early 1920s. His armed Black Shirts beat opponents into submission and many who later resisted were abducted and murdered.

It was the same in Germany. The 1918 surrender of that country's military forces ended World War I and led to the collapse of the Hohenzollern dynasty in 1918, when Kaiser Wilhelm II abdicated his iron-gripped throne. A fragile democracy, the Weimar Republic, came into shaky existence through a contentious coalition of middle-ground Democrats and left-wing Bolsheviks. For the first time in their warring history, Germans were shocked with the sudden gift of freedom. They went on a political spree, like drunks staggering to open festivals, where no one charged for the liquor. The Weimar Republic poorly managed its new opportunities. Germany's industry and business, its finance and products, had come to a standstill. Inflation spiraled dizzily upward. Its currency soon had little value as the government printed more and more money that represented nothing but empty coffers. (So fast did the government issue new currency that, at one point, it ran out of watermarked paper, and, in desperation, resorted to printing currency on newspaper stock.)

Germany's inflation was met with a deepening depression that saw millions go jobless and within the rancorous ranks of the unemployed came right-wing leaders calling for the return of Teutonic order. These were mostly embittered veterans, who quickly spread the false claim that their politicians had sold out the country by signing with the Allies an inequitable treaty at Versailles, a "stab-in-the-back" betrayal. The only path to recovery, they said, was to eliminate the left-leaning liberals who were destroying the Fatherland. One by one, these leaders were assassinated as Germany moved to the right, welcoming into its national heart the evil dictatorship of Adolf Hitler.

KARL AND "RED ROSA"/January 15, 1919

Karl Liebknecht (1871-1919) and his close associate, Rosa Luxemburg (1870-1919)—called "Red Rosa" for her Communist activities—were thought so dangerous by their right-wing enemies that they were early on marked for murder. Liebknecht was the son of Wilhelm Liebknecht, close friend of Karl Marx and one of the founders of the Social Democratic Party. With financial assistance from the party, his son, Karl, studied political economy, devoting his career to the defense of Marxism. During World War I, Karl Liebknecht assumed the dominant role in developing political factions opposed to Germany's wartime government. So radical were his views that he was expelled from the Social Democratic Party in 1916 for opposing its leadership.

Liebknecht then came into contact with another outspoken revolutionary, Rosa Luxemburg. Polish-born, she was, like Liebknecht, a student of political economy, becoming involved in the international Socialist movement while in Zurich. She and some of her colleagues founded the Polish Social Democratic Party, which later became the core of the Polish Communist Party. She and Liebknecht shared the same philosophy in that they were violently opposed to nationalism and national independence and, in unison, denounced the Social Democratic Party in 1916 for its continued support of the government and the war. Together Liebknecht and Luxemburg formed the Spartakusbund (Spartacus League) named after Spartacus, the gladiator who led a slave army that repeatedly defeated Roman forces, until the rebellion was crushed by Crassus and Spartacus was killed in 71 B.C.

German soldiers, sailors and civilians in open revolt in Berlin, following the collapse of the Kaiser's war machine in 1918.

Freikorps troops arriving in Berlin to suppress the Communist uprising led by Liebknecht and Luxemburg in 1919.

German left-wing radicals Karl Liebknecht (center) and Rosa Luxemburg (right), both assassinated in 1919.

As Liebknecht and Luxemburg urged that the war be ended through revolution and a proletarian government established, the Spartacus League swelled to thousands. By 1918, when German military forces were on the verge of collapse, Liebknecht and Luxemburg agitated for a new order to the left. They exercised great influence with the suffering masses and were responsible for several armed and violent clashes in Berlin. As their political authority and the violence in their movement increased, pro-nationalist forces regarded them with greater concern. Yet the authorities believed that Germans would never completely reject the old regime. (In Moscow, Lenin predicted that no revolution could ever occur in Germany because Germans would storm a railroad station only after they had purchased the tickets.)

In late 1918, however, German sailors mutinied at Kiel, after learning that the High Command had decided to end the war in Wagnerian slaughter by sending out the Imperial fleet to fight to the death in one last naval battle. "Don't worry," wrote one young rebelling sailor to his father. "We are not going to let them kill us on the last day." The revolution spread, toppling authority everywhere and compelling the Kaiser to abdicate. Friedrich Ebert, leader of the Social Democratic Party, a well-intentioned but ineffective functionary, became chancellor.

In Berlin, the starving citizens found horses dead from earlier street fighting and carved the cadavers to obtain food. The Spartacus League showed itself in force and many of its members, under Liebknecht's leadership, were quickly elected representatives in the Reichstag and tried to bring Germany into the Communist fold, but those of the center and, especially, of the right, held on to the majority control of the government.

Through early January 1919, the Spartacus League became even more powerful. Their armed bands roved the streets of Berlin, attacking anyone who opposed them. Then the Spartacists openly attacked the police and the few army contingents in the city. Open warfare ensued. Chancellor Ebert called 3,000 Freikorps volunteers to the city to quell the uprising, these men being seasoned troops from the Western Front, all representing right-wing elements. They employed heavy and light machine guns to mow down the Spartacists, who then conducted guerrilla warfare, while Liebknecht and Luxemburg went into hiding.

Freikorps elitists, officers of the Volunteer Division of Horse Guards, searched for the Spartacist leaders and found them on the night of January 15, 1919. Both Liebknecht and Luxemburg were hustled to the officers' headquarters at the Eden Hotel. They were tried and condemned by a kangaroo court and a few hours later, Liebknecht was escorted through a rear door of the hotel to an alley, where two cars waited.

As Liebknecht walked through the door, a soldier named Runge smashed him in the head with the butt of his rifle. The dazed man was pushed into the back seat of a car and whisked away. Next Rosa Luxemburg was led through the door. The same sentry smashed the prisoner's head with the butt of his rifle. Luxemburg was shoved half conscious into the back seat of the second car. A Lieutenant Vogel then emptied his gun into her head and her body was dumped into the Landwehr Canal, where it was found several days later. Liebknecht had been taken to a deserted stretch of road, where he was pushed from the car. As he stumbled away, several soldiers shot him. His assassins later claimed that their prisoner was shot while attempting to escape.

Spartacist demonstrators display images of Liebknecht and Luxemburg only days following their assassinations by right-wing Freikorps troops in Berlin.

The assassinations of Karl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg marked the establishment of the Vehme—a pro-nationalist, pro-militarist organization (the precursor of Hitler's Brown Shirts) whose self-appointed judges and executioners targeted "traitors" to the German cause as they conceived such manufactured treason. After the murders of Liebknecht and Luxemburg, the Vehme continued to assassinate prominent political figures for several years. Few were ever punished. Runge, the soldier who had assaulted both Liebknecht and Luxemburg, was dismissed for "leaving his post," and for "improper use of weapons." He was sentenced to two years in prison, but served only a few weeks behind bars. Vogel, the only person identified as having a direct hand in the assassinations, was brought to trial and sentenced to two years in prison. He, like Runge, also served a cynically short sentence.

ERZBERGER AND RATHENAU/ August 29, 1921; June 24, 1922

The deaths of Liebknecht and Luxemburg were the forerunner assassinations of political murders that spread like a devouring cancer across the fierce political landscape of Germany. Financially backed by the diminished but still-intact German army and the industrialists, who had supplied Germany with its tools of war, right-wing extremist groups routinely slayed leftist leaders. One of these was Matthias Erzberger (1875-1921), a leader of the left-leaning Center Party. He had openly opposed Germany's entry into World War I and had helped to further peace proposals in the Reichstag in 1917.

Following World War I, Erzberger assumed many governmental posts in the Weimar Republic and was intensely hated by right-wing and reactionary groups for accepting the Versailles Treaty. He headed the Wurtemberg Center Party in the Reichstag in 1920 and, at one time, was the country's minister of finance. In that capacity, Erzberger had refused to secretly channel funds to refinance the impoverished German army whose size and weapons had been restricted by the Versailles Treaty. German militarists and business leaders placed his name at the top of their "elimination" list.

When it was learned that Erzberger would be vacationing at a remote resort in the Black Forest, several assassins from the fanatical right-wing National Organization Council were sent to kill him. These heavily armed killers were made up of several ex-officers of the German army. They had served on the Western Front in World War I and believed that Erzberger was one of the chief political architects who had "sold out" Germany to the Allies.

On August 29, 1921, Erzberger left his room at the resort and was strolling about the grounds with another member of the Reichstag. He was suddenly confronted by a group of men stepping from behind some bushes. Two of them rushed forward with guns aimed, emptying their pistols into Erzberger and killing him on the spot. As had been the case with the murderers of Liebknecht and Luxemburg, Erzberger's slayers got off with light punishments.

With Erzberger out of the way, the right-wing plotters went after bigger game, planning the assassination of Germany's most prominent and respected leader of liberal causes, Walther Rathenau (1867-1922). To his enemies, he symbolized the post-war sell-out of the Weimar Republic to the Western Powers who had imposed a harsh and unfair peace upon Germany. His insistence that his countrymen pay war reparations on a timely basis struck many embittered German nationals as unpatriotic.

The fact that Rathenau had negotiated an unpopular treaty with the U.S.S.R. was held up as another example of the sinister conspiracy that existed between the Communist regime and the German left-wing in the chaotic days following World War I. As foreign minister, Rathenau had negotiated with the Soviet Union the Treaty of Rapallo on April 16, 1922, one that established friendly diplomatic and trade relations between the two countries and did much to make the Western Allies reconsider their harsh treatment of Germany.

Rathenau was also Jewish. To the rabid anti-Semites, and there were millions of these in Germany who were convinced that the Jews had been behind the financial collapse of Germany (a lie that Adolf Hitler would brutally and effectively employ in his climb to power), Rathenau was the glaring object of their racial hatred. As a Jew, Rathenau was vilified by the opposition press, extremists on the right linking him to a farfetched Jewish-Masonic conspiracy first outlined in the Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion, a spurious document composed by the czar's secret police (Okhrana) in 1903.

Rathenau's father, Emil Rathenau, was head of the enormous Allegmeine-Elektrizitats-Gesellschaft (AEG), and, as head of this giant utility, he stood accused of being one of the diabolical Elders who plotted the demise of Christian civilization. Theodor Fritsch, publisher of the right-wing Hammer, called Walther Rathenau the secret "power behind Bolshevism," alleging that his appointment to serve as foreign minister came about as a result of political threats and financial coercion. A nationalist call echoed throughout Germany for Rathenau's assassination. Speaking for the fledgling Nazi Party, Alfred Rosenberg (who was to become infamous in a few years as Adolf Hitler's "expert" on Semitic affairs) said Rathenau was "ripe for the gallows."

The Freikorps and the National Organization Council lobbied for Rathenau's death. As the killers of Liebknecht, Luxemburg and Erzberger, members of these right-wing groups marched through the streets of Berlin and sang loudly their anti-Semitic chant:

Shoot down the goddamn
Jewish sow,
Murder Walther Rathenau!

Rathenau himself often heard this ranting demand for his own death, but he ignored it. New York theater critic Alfred Kerr, heard the same street chant while visiting Rathenau in Berlin; he urged him to seek protection. The liberal politician shrugged and told Kerr that it was all a matter of fate and indicated his resignation to that fate by telling Kerr that he had recently dismissed his three bodyguards.

Liberal German politician Matthias Erzberger, assassinated in 1921 by officers of the right-wing Freikorps.

One of Germany's most enlightened leaders, Walther Rathenau, assassinated in 1922, knew he was marked for death.

The first to answer the cry of the German reactionaries was a young monarchist, Hans Stubenrauch, the son of a German general. The 17-year-old Stubenrauch believed that Rathenau ought to be put to death simply because he was a Jew and that all Jews had prayed for the defeat of the German army during the war. Through Freikorps member Willi Guenther, Stubenrauch was put in touch with Erwin Kern, member of the National Organization Council, this right-wing terrorist group having supported the abortive 1920 putsch led by Prussian aristocrat Wolfgang Kapp. Stubenrauch, Kern and others gathered in Berlin to plot Rathenau's murder.

Kern, eight years older than the impetuous Stubenrauch, decided that he was too young to be entrusted with the assignment of assassinating Rathenau. The task was given to Ernst Werner Techow, the son of a German magistrate. Techow, in turn, recruited his brother, Hans Gerd, and a naval officer named Karl Tillesen, into the conspiracy, which was carefully rehearsed and put into motion on June 24, 1922.

Rathenau left his home that morning shortly after 11 a.m. He climbed into an open car and his driver proceeded toward the ministry. Time and again his friends and advisers had warned him about riding about Berlin in an open car, but he ignored these cautions, appearing to flaunt death in the face. As his car proceeded down the Konigsallee, a second vehicle driven by two men in long leather coats pulled alongside. The driver of the second car, Kern, took careful aim with an automatic pistol and fired at Rathenau.

The foreign minister's chauffeur suddenly stopped the car on the Erdenerstrasse and called for assistance, just as a second assassin, a man named Fischer, hurled a hand grenade into the open car. The bullets fired by Kern and Fischer's grenade failed to kill the foreign minister, although he was fatally wounded. Returned to his residence, Rathenau died a short time later. Doctors examining his body discovered five gunshot wounds. Fragments from the grenade had fractured his spine and shattered his jaw.

The assassination of Walther Rathenau temporarily strengthened the shaky Weimar Republic. His cold-blooded murder galvanized opinions among the liberals and moderates, forcing many of the nationalists to temper their remarks in the Reichstag. The two assassins, Kern and Fischer were located and surrounded by police in a tower of the Saaleck Castle in Thuringia, where they were hiding out. Rather than surrender to the police and stand trial, Kern shot Fischer to death and then turned the gun on himself. Ernst Techow sought refuge at his uncle's home in Berlin. The uncle wanted no part of his nephew and turned him over to the police.

Freikorps troops marching in Berlin; members of this right-wing paramilitary organization fatally shot Rathenau while he was riding in his open car on June 24, 1922.

The Rathenau trial began in Leipzig on October 3, 1922. Techow and twelve co-conspirators accused of complicity in the murder appeared before four judges at the Kaiser Hall of Germany's Political Supreme Court. Under the recently enacted laws for "safeguarding the republic," Techow, his brother Hans, William Guenther, Gustav Goethe, a merchant from Halle, Rudolf Ziepke, a 24-year-old agricultural student who tore down a wanted poster following the murder, Wolfang Dietrich, Schuett Diestel, who hid the murder car, Otto von Salomen and Karl Tillesen were all sentenced to prison, given terms of from two months to fifteen years. The longest sentence was reserved for Ernst Techow who received fifteen years for driving the car from which Kern fired his fatal shots. None of these killers served out their full terms and were released within a short time. They were held up as heroes by the right-wing forces that were slowly taking over a nation of thirty-three million people.

In this rare photo, Walther Rathenau is shown in the back seat of an open car only minutes before he was shot.

"PREPARE ORATIONS FOR MY FUNERAL"/ June 10, 1924

While murders by right-wing fanatics in Germany became commonplace, Mussolini's fascists, having come to power in Italy in 1922, terrorized Il Duce's political opponents through beatings, kidnapings and assassinations. Their public posture and methods were no less flagrant than their German counterparts. Few Italian liberals thought to work openly against the fascists, let alone denounce Mussolini's oppressive regime. One person, Giacomo Matteotti (1885-1924) did challenge the strutting dictator. His was the voice of reason in fascist Italy, until it was permanently silenced by one of Il Duce's goon squads.

A socialist, Matteotti came to prominence in 1919 when he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. By 1924, as the secretary of his party, he had emerged as one of the few outspoken critics of Mussolini's dictatorial administration, which had seized power from the weak and ineffectual government headed by King Victor Emmanuel III in 1922. Matteotti arose in the Chamber of Deputies on May 30, 1924, accusing Mussolini and the fascist majority of rigging the recent elections. His two-hour indictment was frequently interrupted by angry taunts and threats from most of the 357 fascist deputies in attendance. Matteotti captioned his fiery denouncement of Mussolini with a prophetic statement: "Now you can prepare orations for my funeral."

Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini, shortly after he became Italy's head of state in 1922.

Mussolini's party newspaper, Popolo d'Italia, had earlier (on May 4, 1924) announced in blatant terms the assassination awaiting the defiant socialist: "Matteotti, that infamous swindler, that well-known coward and most despicable liar, would do well to be careful if, one day, his brains should happen to be beaten out, he would have no right to complain in view of the things he has said and written." La Grande Italia, another Mussolini organ, added: "The group to which Matteotti belongs is made up of brigands; the final return of common sense and an energetic move on the part of Il Duce will lead to their elimination."

That "elimination" occurred on June 10, 1924, when Matteotti was reported missing. He left his home at 4:30 p.m. that day to attend a meeting at the parliament building in Rome. That afternoon a janitor who worked in a house on the Lungo Trevere Arnoldo Brescia observed a suspicious-looking car containing six men, which was parked on the street adjacent to the Tiber River. Thinking that these men might be planning a burglary, the janitor jotted down the number of the license plate on the car (55.1216). A few minutes later, the janitor watched these same men seize a pedestrian and drag him into their car, not an uncommon sight in Rome during those troubled times.

Since October 30, 1922, the day Benito Mussolini came to power as Italy's prime minister, there had been more than 2,000 abductions committed, most of them carried out by members of Il Duce's fascists. The janitor thought nothing more of the matter, until Matteotti's disappearance was reported. He then went to authorities. There was an immediate outcry from the few liberal members of the Chamber of Deputies. Mussolini suddenly found himself in a difficult position. He assured the parliament that every effort was being made by the state police to locate the missing Matteotti: "As soon as the police were advised of Matteotti's absence, I myself gave strict orders that investigations be made diligently in Rome and at the border stations. The police are already on the track of suspects and everything will be done to clear up this affair, to arrest the guilty and bring them to justice."

Mussolini turned purple with anger when he learned that the police had traced the license plate of the abduction car to one of Il Duce's most ardent supporters, Filippo Filippelli, editor of the Corriere Italiano, another fascist newspaper. Il Duce had not expected the police to be so energetic and when Filippelli's identity was revealed, the dictator's problems increased. The Matteotti abduction had become a major scandal that obsessed the nation. Meanwhile, Filippelli's newspaper lamely suggested that Matteotti might have gone abroad for a while, for it was like him to travel unannounced on long vacations. Two months later, on August 16, 1924, the remains of Giacomo Matteotti were unearthed in the woods of Quartarella, outside of Rome.

By this time, there was little doubt in the public mind that the fascists were responsible for Matteotti's abduction and murder. The socialists had already withdrawn from their posts in parliament, an act of solidarity known as the Aventino Secession. The police announced the arrest of Filippelli and his gangster accomplice, an Italian-American from St. Louis named Amerigo Dumini. Il Duce's opponents announced that the abduction and murder of Matteotti had been an elaborate, well-planned conspiracy hatched by members of Mussolini's inner circle, including assistant secretaries of state in the interior ministry, Francesco Guinta and Aldo Finzi, as well as fascist party treasurer Giovanni Marinelli and press department chief Cesare Rossi.

Giacomo Matteotti (center, wearing bow tie), Mussolini's most outspoken political opponent, who was assassinated by Il Duce's fascists in 1924.

Amerigo Dumini was picked up at a railway station in Rome and was personally questioned by Police Chief Giardio De Bono, himself an ardent fascist. The chief advised the suspect to deny everything and remain quiet, which he did. However, a detailed memorandum prepared by Felippelli, in an effort to clear his own name, implicated Mussolini and other ranking party members in the murder and subsequent cover-up. When Il Duce was informed by De Bono that the conspirators intended to save themselves at the expense of the government, Mussolini ordered them brought to him. "Those rascals!" Mussolini ranted. "They want to blackmail me!" When the conspirators arrived, Mussolini took a soft approach, attempting to convince them to place the interests of the state ahead of their own, but Finzi and Rossi balked at the suggestion. Rossi then vanished, leaving behind a document accusing Mussolini himself of planning the Matteotti assassination and many other heinous political crimes.

This rare photo showing Matteotti's secret burial in 1924 was found in Mussolini's files; Il Duce did not want the remains of his assassinated political foe discovered.

Members of the Aventino coalition appealed to King Victor Emmanuel III in their fight to topple Mussolini and bring Matteotti's assassins to justice. The king was, as usual, evasive and noncommital. Presented with documents clearly indicating a larger conspiracy, the king shrugged and said: "I am not a judge. These things ought not to be told to me." He then launched into an unrelated anecdote about his daughter's recent adventures on a hunting expedition. Victor Emmanuel, however, was deeply concerned and quickly conferred with Mussolini, asking that a better face be put on Il Duce's fascist regime and asked that Mussolini appoint a new minister of the interior, one who was not a fascist. This move was made, but it little changed the widespread conviction that the fascists had murdered Matteotti.

The scandal would not go away. One by one, the conspirators were arrested. Filippelli, whose car was used to abduct Matteotti, was captured while attempting to flee the country. Albino Volpi, a fascist leader from Milan, who had supervised the abduction was seized near the Swiss border. Then Cesare Rossi surrendered to police and Giovanni Marinelli was jailed a week later. The publication by socialists of Rossi's damning memorandum clearly implicated Mussolini, but the king still refused to oust, let alone censure his prime minister. Victor Emmanuel III knew full well that if he antagonized Mussolini's Black Shirts, who were in total power, his fragile monarchy might be toppled.

Knowing this, Mussolini boldly went before the Chamber of Deputies on January 3, 1925, claiming full responsibility for the actions of his associates. He challenged the opposition to take action against him. He knew his adversaries were impotent before the fascist might that controlled Italy. No steps were taken to punish the six suspects. On December 1, 1925, a court in Rome voted to drop the case against Filippelli, Rossi and Marinelli. In 1926, five other conspirators were placed on trial in Chieti, a tiny village in rural Italy, far from Rome. Amerigo Dumini was absolved of guilt by the court on the grounds that he had sat in the front seat of the abduction car, so that he could not have participated in the actual killing, which took place in the back seat, where Matteotti was stabbed to death. Four others were convicted on charges of manslaughter. They served less than two months in prison.

Once the scandal subsided, Mussolini rewarded the men who had respected the code of silence in his state-ordered assassination. De Bono was named commanding general of all Italian forces in Africa. Giovanni Marinelli became the inspector general of the fascist party. Others less cooperative with Il Duce faded into oblivion or were driven into exile. Retribution was at hand following the assassination of Mussolini in 1945 and the end of World War II. In reopening the Matteotti case, the Italian courts tried Francesco Guinta and Cesare Rossi in absentia (as they were nowhere to be found). Amerigo Dumini, however, was brought to trial. Paralytic and near death, he was sentenced to prison for thirty years on April 4, 1947, the only killer to be punished for the slaying of Giacomo Matteotti.

A contemporary drawing shows Mussolini sitting on Matteotti's casket, clearly implicating Il Duce in his opponent's assassination. This caricature appeared in the 1924 underground newspaper Becco Giallo, one of the few anti-fascist publications still operating in Italy after Mussolini took power.

A DEATH IN VIENNA/July 25, 1934

As fascism spread throughout Europe, Austria, too, came under domination from the right in the form of a strutting little dictator named Engelbert Dollfuss (1892-1934). He would embrace fascism, which would not return his affection, but, would, instead, bring about his murder. The illegitimate son of a laborer and a farmer's daughter, the future chancellor of Austria never grew beyond four feet, eleven inches, and many incorrectly considered him a dwarf. (The image of this diminutive dictator inspired Sinclair Lewis to create a dwarf dictator of America in his novel, It Can't Happen Here, although that character's nature and methods were culled from the likes of Louisiana demagogue, Huey Long.)

Graduating from an Episcopal seminary in 1913, Dollfuss enrolled at the University of Vienna, planning to study law. He abandoned this ambition by enlisting in the Imperial Austrian army in 1914 at the outbreak of World War I. After graduating from the officer candidate school, Dollfuss served along the Alpine front, facing the Italians, from 1915 to 1918. By the time he was mustered out as a first lieutenant, the old Austro-Hungarian empire had ceased to exist. Dollfuss' uniform, medals and rank served for nothing following the war. A defeated Austria, in economic ruin, wanted nothing more to do with militarists. Dollfuss worked his way through law school as a farm laborer, earning a degree in 1922. Always pro-German, he joined the ultra-conservative Christian Socialist Party (which later became the Austrian People's Party), and rose through the ranks.

In 1930, Dollfuss was appointed president of the powerful Federal Railway Board and the following year he was appointed minister of agriculture. Austria was undergoing a terrible depression in 1932, as were most of its neighbors, and its government, torn between reactionary rightists and revolutionary leftists, was in a state of chaos. During a stormy parliamentary crisis in May 1932, Dollfuss was named federal chancellor (or prime minister). His support came from the Peasant Party and the Heimwehr (Heimatschutz), meaning Home Guard. The Heimwehr was a paramilitary organization led by reactionary officers who had sought to reestablish the supremacy of the military in Austria, operating much like Hitler's Brown Shirts (SA) in Germany.

The Heimwehr was headed by Major Emil Fey in Vienna and in the provinces by Prince Ernst Ruediger von Starhemberg, a descendant of an old Austrian line of nobles. Starhemberg was a pleasure-seeking playboy who acted more like a boy scout leader than a military chief. The prince considered his organization as a weak military force that, in his own words, acted out the part of "a kind of Praetorian Guard." Major Fey, who proved to be the pivotal person in the plot to assassinate Dollfuss in 1934, was one of the most decorated officers in Austria, a hero of World War I, who wore the coveted Cross of Maria Theresa.

As commander of the Vienna Heimwehr, Fey had an intense hatred for Marxists and all political leftists, but he always expressed his political views in vague terms, stating that he was first and foremost a soldier, a military man sworn to uphold the government. As was the case with all Heimwehr members, Fey was anti-Semitic, hating all Jews, and fiercely adhering to the twisted ideologies of Adolf Hitler, with one exception. Fey and his Heimwehr followers were careful not to offend the Catholic Church. Austria was and had been for centuries a predominately Catholic country.

Austrian Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss, assassinated by Nazi thugs in 1934.

Dollfuss himself, a clever power-hungry martinet, held the same beliefs as the Heimwehr. His goal was the utter destruction of all political opposition, chiefly the socialists, and assumption of dictatorial powers. He fearfully looked upon two threats to his ambition, the first being Hitler and his expansionist plans for Austria. The second threat, he believed, came from the powerful Republican Defense Corps, or schutzbund, headed by elderly leftist General Theodor von Koerner Sigmarigen, who was backed by the millions of socialists who had gained 44 percent of the Austrian vote in 1930.

In seeking protection against Hitler and the Austrian socialists, Dollfuss formed an alliance with Italy's Benito Mussolini, going to Rome in 1933 to sign an arms pact. Il Duce promised the little dictator that he would blunt any moves by Germany to annex Austria, but on the condition that Dollfuss move against the Republican Defense Corps. Dollfuss agreed and Mussolini, as a warning to Hitler, quickly moved his best Alpine troops to the Brenner Pass. Hitler, newly in power in Germany, was not prepared to face Mussolini's well-trained mountain fighters or any other nation in a military confrontation with his own weak forces. Instead, he encouraged thousands of Austrian Nazis supporting his cause to violently undermine Dollfuss' government.

Italy's Mussolini (left) is shown signing a pact with Austria to support Dollfuss (second from right) and his right-wing administration at Riccione on March 28, 1934.

Dollfuss, meanwhile, was given dictatorship through the fumbling of the Austrian parliament, which, on March 4, 1933, destroyed itself in a bizarre session. On that day a representative left the floor to go to the washroom, asking a colleague to vote for him, but the colleague marked the ballot incorrectly.

Chancellor Dollfuss (center, wearing cape) is showing reviewing troops in Vienna, April 1934.

The speaker of the house, Dr. Karl Renner, noting the irregularity, declared the balloting invalid and this led to a fiery debate in which Renner abruptly resigned as president of the assembly. His deputy resigned and so did the next deputy. In the explosive debate that followed, no one officially closed the session. Under Austrian law, only the president of the assembly or one of his deputies could convoke a new assembly. Because none existed, Dollfuss seized the opportunity to abolish parliament, stating that it could not function under the law.

In a March 7, 1933 declaration, the dictator announced that the Austrian parliament had eliminated itself and through this technicality, Engelbert Dollfuss assumed complete government powers. He immediately banned all public meetings and gatherings and imposed a strict censorship of the press. The little dictator believed that he had successfully choked off opposition to his regime inside Austria, but he now began to feel the weight of Nazi influence and subversion. Austrian Nazis suddenly began to demonstrate for a fusion of Germany and Austria, an Anschluss. The Nazis insisted that Austria be annexed to Germany since both were German-speaking nations that shared the same customs and traditions.

The defacement of this huge 1934 Dollfuss street poster (a swastika having been pasted over the chancellor's mouth) in Vienna was typical of the crude campaign conducted by Nazis in their attempt to wrest control of Austria.

This was not a new concept. For decades there had been strong movements to join the two countries and now, with the Hohenzollern and Hapsburg dynasties gone following World War I, the prospects of an Anschluss seemed inevitable. To support this movement, Hitler amassed a force of well-equipped troops along the German-Austrian border. In Munich, Theo Habicht, one of Hitler's leading Brown Shirt chiefs, was named "Inspector General for Austria," a pompous and illegal title conferred by Hitler upon a German with no credentials or legitimate office in Austria.

Habicht, a propaganda expert, began a smear campaign in which Dollfuss was portrayed as a pawn of the Jews, the Catholic Church and foreign powers. Radio stations along the German border beamed this propaganda into Austria around the clock. Austrian Nazis suddenly appeared in all major cities in Austria, painting the swastika everywhere. In June 1933, Nazis set off bombs throughout Austria in churches, synagogues and in the offices of liberal newspapers, killing and injuring many persons. Then the Nazis attacked Dollfuss' military police.

A group of Nazis hurled hand grenades into a group of officers in Vienna, killing several of them. Seeing that the Nazis were attacking his own fascist forces, Dollfoss banned the Nazi Party in Austria, arresting and imprisoning more than 1,500 of these men. Leaders such as Alfred Edward Frauenfeld, gauleiter of Vienna, fled to Germany and the protection of Habicht's organization. In response, Habicht boldly created the Austrian Legion, 15,000 strong and made up of Nazi expatriates from Austria. He armed these troops, parading them menacingly up and down the German border, threatening invasion at any moment.

Dollfuss, unnerved, tried to contact Hitler to negotiate some sort of truce, but the newly elected German chancellor made himself unavailable. Dollfuss' representatives were shunted off to see Habicht in Munich or the German ambassador in Vienna, Dr. Kurt Reith, and there the answer was always the same: Anschluss. Habicht, after some negotiations, brazenly demanded that before further truces could be considered, all charges pending against Nazis in Austria be dropped and that he be made vice chancellor, even though he was not an Austrian citizen. Dollfuss toyed with this idea, but made Major Fey vice chancellor instead.

A sudden move from the left changed everything in Austria. On the night of February 11, 1934, socialist leaders of the Schutzbund began shipping arms to workers in Vienna, Linz and other Austrian cities, calling them to arms against Dollfuss' totalitarian state. Widespread fighting broke out the next day. Leftist radicals called a general strike in Vienna and socialists took over many government buildings. Government troops, aided by Fey's Heimwehr, attacked, putting the leftists on the defense.

Dollfuss ordered his troops to assault and capture the huge housing areas, chiefly the Karl Marx House in Vienna, where several arsenals were stored. The complex was shelled. After four days, the brief civil war was over, the government troops and the Heimwehr having crushed all resistance. Many socialist leaders were rounded up and summarily hanged, hundreds more imprisoned. The 128 government and Heimwehr dead were buried with full military honors. The 193 socialists killed in the fighting were buried in a mass grave without ceremonies.

Heimwehr leader Emil Fey, whose fence-sitting during the Nazi coup and assassination of Dollfuss ended his political and military career.

Though world opinion turned against "that charming little chancellor from Austria," for his shelling of Austrian citizens, he gained newfound respect from his fellow fascist leaders. Hitler was startled by the direct action taken by Dollfuss; he had underestimated the little dictator's will to act. Mussolini sent Dollfuss letters of admiration for crushing the socialists. Still, the Nazis persisted in their fanatical cause to annex Austria to Germany. Joining the German Nazis were many right-wing Austrian politicians, the most important being Dr. Anton Rintelen, Austria's ambassador to Rome, who had held several important positions in the Austrian government since 1922. He and others plotted with Habicht, and guided them through a terrorist campaign in early 1934, planting bombs in electrical plants and water works, train stations and telephone exchanges. Soon the communication and transportation operations in and about Vienna were stalled or stopped entirely. This did nothing but incur the enmity of the Austrian people against their native Nazis. Dr. Gustav Otto Waechter, a Nazi leader in Austria, went to Germany and conferred with Nazi leaders, telling them that the terrorist campaign was proving ineffective and that there were not enough Austrian Nazis to take over the government. He proposed that Dollfuss be assassinated.

Hitler agreed. He ordered that the small but fanatical SS (Schutzstaffel) group, SS Standarte 89, led by Fridolin Glass, be the striking arm. This Austrian group of Nazis had several seasoned terrorists within its ranks, such as Paul Hurdl and Otto Planetta, who were chosen to carry out the murder of the Austrian chancellor. Their plan called for one Nazi group to seize the chancellery building, kill Dollfuss and hold his cabinet hostage, while a second group took over the main radio station to announce the lie that the government had resigned and that Dr. Anton Rintelen had become chancellor.

In order to have this plan succeed, Nazis throughout Austria would seize all government buildings and those Nazis in the Austrian army and in the police forces would take over command of all troops and police agencies. The success of this plan depended upon the cooperation of Major Emil Fey and his Heimwehr. Whether or not Fey was contacted by the Nazis or was in collusion with them in the plot to overthrow Dollfuss is not known to this day, but Fey's indecision during the time of that crisis sent Austria into a state of chaos. Hitler cautioned the assassins that they could expect no help from Germany or its troops or Nazi Brown Shirts as this would make the takeover appear to be a naked act of aggression by Hitler.

Dollfuss was wary of just such an attack, especially after Hitler, on June 30, 1934, purged the leaders of his own Brown Shirts, ordering the executions of scores of SA chiefs, including his once-trusted aide, Ernst Roehm. By late July 1934, the Austrian Nazis worked out their plan to take over the government. A defecting Austrian Nazi told police of the plan, but gave the date of attack as July 23, 1934, and when nothing happened on that day, police relaxed their guard. Emil Fey then received a report on the morning of July 25, 1934, that the chancellery would be seized, but receiving no more reports, did nothing, waiting to see events unfold.

Members of the SS Standarte 89 assembled in a gym that morning, dozens of these Nazis arriving either in the uniform of the Austrian army or as civilians carrying bundles and weapons. Those in civilian clothes then changed into Austrian uniforms and boarded trucks that drove toward the chancellery. Major Fey then received notice that these heavily armed men were moving on the chancellery. He decided to act. He called Dollfuss from a cabinet meeting he was then conducting in the chancellery, telling him of the impending attack. Dollfuss then addressed his cabinet members, stating: "Fey just told me something. I don't know if there is anything behind it, but perhaps it's better to interrupt our session now. Every minister should return to his own department. I shall let you gentlemen know when we can continue."

Austrian troops, under Dollfuss' orders, are shown attacking Vienna's Karl Marx House; socialist forces were crushed.

Austrian traitor, Dr. Anton Rintelen, who was selected by the Nazis to be Austria's new chancellor after they killed Dollfuss and seized the government.

Major Fey had ordered his Heimwehr troops to march to chancellery to protect the government, but this force failed to arrive. Police concentrated forces elsewhere in the city, these forces purposely misdirected by Nazi police officials. When an urgent call was made for police forces to be sent to the chancellery, only a single motorcycle officer arrived to "observe events."

There were a few guards at the chancellery, but their rifles held no bullets. More than 150 well-armed Austrian Nazis then arrived in trucks and raced into the chancellery building. Their leaders, Franz Holzweber and Otto Planetta, were both dressed as Austrian army captains. The invaders rounded up all the chancellery employees and locked them in basement rooms. In an upper floor, Dollfuss, Fey and Baron Erwin Karwinsky were startled to see Major Karl Wrabel burst through the door of Dollfuss' office. He shouted: "The Nazis are in the building!" Karwinsky grabbed Dollfuss by the arm and tried to lead him to a secret closet on the third floor where he could hide. Instead, Dollfuss headed for a corner room from which a backstairs led to the street. Before he reached the stairs, Otto Planetta burst into the corner room, pointing his pistol at Dollfuss.

Dollfuss held his hands before his face. Planetta fired twice and the chancellor fell to the floor. He cried out for help, but Planetta only sneered and snapped: "Get up!" Planetta later claimed at his trial that he had rushed into a darkened room and saw three shadowy figures. One of them raised an arm, he said, and he thought he was about to be fired upon and so he fired his pistol, unintentionally shooting Dollfuss. The chancellor had been struck by two bullets, one creating a superficial wound in the neck. The other was fatal, entering his throat and spinal column and exiting beneath the right armpit.

Dollfuss was left to bleed to death on the floor. The Nazis arrested Fey, Karwinsky and Wrabel, holding them prisoner. Viktor Stiastny, an SS man, then returned to kneel next to the fallen Dollfuss, unbuttoning the chancellor's jacket, not to give him relief, but to see if reports that Dollfuss wore a bullet-proof vest were true. They were not. Stiastny then took the chancellor's wallet and handed this to Holzweber, who was then marching into the room to inspect the premises. (The wallet was later found stripped of its cash.) Forty minutes passed before some of the SS men asked if any of the imprisoned chancellery employees knew how to administer first aid. Rudolph Messinger and Johann Greifeneder, two policemen loyal to the government, volunteered. They were taken upstairs, where they found the mortally wounded Dollfuss. It was 1:45 p.m.

The policemen were allowed to pick up Dollfuss and place him on a couch. Given bandages by the assassins, the policemen could do little for the stricken chancellor except to stop the bleeding. Meanwhile, the conspirators seemed to be in a daze. They were awaiting word that their fellow Nazis had seized the radio station, but no word came over the radio. The killers stood in silence about the chancellor's room. Planetta said nothing. He sat at the chancellor's desk, smoking a cigarette. Dollfuss was conscious, but confused. An SS man nervously told him that he would not have been shot if he had not resisted.

"How are my ministers?" Dollfuss asked.

"Alive and well," an SS man replied.

Then, perhaps thinking he was talking to one of his own Austrian army officers, Dollfuss said: "A major, a captain and several soldiers came in and shot me."

This angered one of the assassins, who shouted at the chancellor: "You are to blame for all this, bringing misery on the National Socialists of Austria!"

"I have always tried to do the best I could," moaned Dollfuss. "I always wanted peace."

The office of the Austrian Chancellery in Vienna, where Dollfuss was fatally shot by invading Nazis.

The body of Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss, who was left by his Nazi killers to bleed to death on a couch on July 25, 1934, while they negotiated their freedom.

"If that was the case," yelled another Nazi, "then why didn't you make peace with Germany?"

Dollfuss' reply was by then a weak murmur: "Children, you simply don't understand." He then asked to see Kurt von Schuschnigg, his minister of education, but he was told that Schuschnigg was not in the chancellery. Paul Hudl, a former member of the Austrian Imperial Guard, who had joined the Nazis, then pressured the dying Dollfuss to call Dr. Rintelen and have him form a new government. Dollfuss did not respond to this urgent request. He asked one of the policemen trying to help him to move his arms and legs, saying: "I feel nothing. I think I am paralyzed." He asked for a doctor and Hudl refused this request. He asked for a priest. Hudl and Planetta refused.

Outside the chancellery, loyal Austrian forces were now closing in on the Nazis. Only fifteen minutes after the SS Standarte 89 occupied the chancellery, Fey's Heimwehr troops arrived, along with government troops and squads of police. They surrounded the building and began arresting any suspicious person near the chancellery. About a block away they arrested Nazi leader Fridolin Glass, who was disguised as an old peddler. Another leading conspirator, Dr. Waechter, sat in a nearby restaurant nervously eyeing the troops now surrounding his fellow Nazis. It had been his job to enter the chancellery and negotiate the surrender of the cabinet, but eight of the eleven ministers had fled the building before the invading Nazis arrived. Now there was nothing to negotiate. Dr. Rintelen and other Austrian Nazi leaders sat in the Hotel Imperial waiting for good news that never came.

Inside the chancellery, Holzweber and Planetta were gripped by inertia, realizing that no Nazi uprising was in the offing and that their colleagues had failed to take over the radio station and other important government buildings. Further, they now realized that the thousands of secret Nazis in the police force and army would not reveal their true political sympathies. Holzweber later stated at his trial: "I had been told that there would be no bloodshed, that a new government had been formed..."

Meanwhile, Kurt von Schuschnigg was made provisional chancellor and he ordered more troops to the scene of the uprising. Inside the chancellery, Planetta exploded, brandishing his pistol at the dying Dollfuss, shouting for him to order Major Fey to call off the troops surrounding the chancellery and to appoint Dr. Rintelen chancellor. Dollfuss, a ribbon of blood on his mouth, uttered some vague remarks and sank into unconsciousness. His killers sat in chairs about him, staring at him with helpless hatred. They simply sat there and waited for him to die. At about 4 p.m., Dollfuss uttered his last: "Give my regards to my wife and my children."

Upon realizing Dollfuss was dead, Planetta went to the imprisoned Major Fey, who apparently made a deal with the Nazis. Planetta wrote in pencil on a scrap of paper: "Dr. Dollfuss has been injured and has resigned from the government. He has appointed Dr. Rintelen as his successor. All armed forces are now under Fey's command." This note was delivered through the police lines outside the chancellery to Police Chief Eugen Seydel, who ignored it, and then had Rintelen arrested.

Fey continued to negotiate on behalf of the Nazis, first addressing his Heimwehr troops from a high balcony where Holzweber held a pistol to his head, then later on the phone, asking officials that Dr. Rintelen be appointed chancellor. He was told that Schuschnigg was now chancellor and that Rintelen was in custody. He was told to inform the Nazis to surrender or that they would be "wiped out to the last man." When asked about Dollfuss' condition, Fey lied, saying that "his injuries are rather serious." Fey knew by then that Dollfuss was dead. Fey's preposterous behavior signaled an end to his career, but he was never prosecuted in the assassination in order to keep his Heimwehr forces loyal to the government.

Of the fifteen Nazis who had shot their way into the radio building, killing several guards and briefly forcing an announcer to broadcast the downfall of Dollfuss and the appointment of Rintelen, thirteen had been driven to the top floor of the Ravag Building and were captured after a gun battle. One SS man had been killed and another escaped. When two officers went to Rintelen's suite at the Hotel Imperial, Rintelen shot himself, but he bungled the suicide, only wounding himself in the side. He was taken to a hospital where he recovered. He would later be imprisoned, then released shortly before the German Anschluss and become a Nazi functionary, dying almost unknown and unlamented in 1946.

Nazis in the provinces rose briefly, but all too late, and were crushed by the Austrian army and the Heimwehr. The fate of the SS men in the chancellery was negotiated with Schuschnigg, who agreed to allow the Nazis safe conduct to the German border, if they surrendered their arms. This the Nazis did, but, as they were climbing into trucks to be transported out of the country, Dollfuss' half-naked body was discovered and Schuschnigg announced that the Nazis had violated the agreement, which was based on no loss of life. Now it was revealed that they had assassinated the chancellor and that they would stand trial for the crime. All were arrested and imprisoned.

SS leader Franz Holzweber, who directed the seizure of the chancellery.

Adolf Hitler, who first believed that the Nazi coup had been successful, now learned that the SS men had failed. He publicly denounced the assassination of Dollfuss as "a cruel murder," and backed away from Habicht and his scheming associates. The SS men turned on each other. Holzweber was named by his fellow Nazis as the leader of the coup and Planetta was named as Dollfuss' assassin. Holzweber and Planetta were convicted of armed sedition and murder. Both were condemned to death on July 31, 1934. Three hours later both were escorted to a gallows erected in a prison courtyard. Holzweber was the first to hang. As the rope was placed about his neck, the Nazi fanatic screamed: "I die for Germany! Heil Hitler!" Holzweber was then hanged manually, three men yanking him slowly upward until, after twelve agonizing minutes, he strangled to death. Planetta followed, he, too, shouting: "Heil Hitler!" He was then yanked upward and died of slow strangulation.

Nazi Otto Planetta, who shot Dollfuss. He and Holzweber shouted "Heil Hitler!" before they were hanged.

Hans Domes, who had led the small Nazi contingent in an attempt to take over the radio station in the Ravag Building, and who had killed a number of persons in that abortive attempt, was condemned and executed. Four policemen and one soldier who had sided with the Nazis, were also put to death. All other surviving Nazis received long prison terms, but all were released four years later when Hitler took over Austria in 1938. Though he publicly denounced the assassins at the time of their capture, Hitler, four years later, when the Anschluss occurred, lionized Holzweber and Planetta as heroes of national socialism.

TWO MURDERS IN MARSEILLES/ October 9, 1934

The blatant killing of Dollfuss in Austria by the Nazis was followed by a double assassination in Marseilles less than three months later. These murders, which claimed the lives of King Alexander I (Karageorgevic, 1888-1934) of Yugoslavia and French foreign minister Jean-Louis Barthou (1862-1934), were initially thought to have been engineered by fanatical Croatians seeking to advance their separatist cause. The real financiers and strategists for this double assassination, however, were fascists and Nazis to be found in Rome and Berlin.

King Alexander I (Karageorgevic) of Yugoslavia, killed in Marseilles in 1934.

In 1921, Alexander became king of a polyglot nation after the death of his father, Peter Karageorgevic. His father had assumed the throne of Serbia following the assassination of King Alexander Obrenovic and Queen Draga in 1903. Their killers, led by Dragutin Dimitrijevic, head of Serbia's secret Black Hand Society, intended to place upon their country's throne a strong pro-Serbian monarch, which had been found in Peter Karageorgevic. His son, Alexander I, was equally pro-Serbian. It was that staunch national position that caused him to be marked for murder by Croatian zealots.

When Alexander inherited the Karageorgevic throne, he was no longer merely the king of the Serbs; Serbia had gone out of existence in 1918 following World War I, having been absorbed into the sprawling new country called Yugoslavia, which included the old kingdoms of Serbia, Croatia-Slovenia, Montenegro, Bosnia and Herzegovina. Welded into one nation, these old countries were still made up of many nationalities having separate cultures and religions. Serbia, still the dominant segment of Yugoslavia, had been an independent nation for more than a century and had for decades resisted annexation by the lethargic Austro-Hungarian empire, its ancient monarchy dissolved at the end of World War I. Serbia fiercely protected its nationalism, as it would throughout the century, leading to Serbia's disastrous invasions of its neighbors and genocidal massacres that would, in the 1990s, label its leaders war criminals.

Croatian leader Ante Pavelic, who planned the murder of King Alexander.

Serbia remained within the Yugoslavian nation only because King Alexander remained staunchly Serbian in outlook and policy. The Croats, however, having lived long under the umbrella of Austria, had enjoyed, unlike its Slavic neighbors, economic prosperity. Customs and traditions differed sharply between the Serbs and Croats. Serbia largely followed the Greek Orthodox religion, while Croatia followed the Roman Catholic Church. There was even a sharp contrast in the alphabets of their languages. Serbia employed the Cyrillic alphabet and Croatia that of the Latin. At all levels of leadership—political, educational, business—the Serbs and Croats were dedicated to each other's subjugation. Alexander consistently sided with Serbian aims and was despised by many right-wing Croatians, who formed a secret terrorist society of a paramilitary nature, called Ustacha, a counterpart organization to Serbia's dreaded Black Hand Society.

Ustacha's leader was a squinty-eyed nationalist fanatic, Dr. Ante Pavelic, called "Poglavnik" (a synonym for leader). Pavelic had for decades worked to undermine and destroy the Karageorgevic dynasty. In the 1920s, Serbs and Croats clashed violently, even in the Yugoslavian parliament. In 1928, several Croat leaders were shot to death by invading Serbian terrorists as they sat in their seats in parliament. This bloody outburst caused Alexander to dissolve that political body and assume dictatorial powers in Yugoslavia. From that moment, Dr. Ante Pavelic and his Ustacha followers began making plans to murder the king.

King Alexander I of Yugoslavia and French Foreign Minister Jean Louis Barthou, shown moments before both were assassinated.

When an upcoming meeting between Alexander and French foreign minister Barthou was announced in 1934, several factions began to plan the assassinations of both. The Nazi hierarchy in Berlin and Mussolini in Rome had no love for the Yugoslavian ruler, and particularly hated the 72-year-old Barthou, who was part of France's old guard, a close associate of Clemenceau and Poincaré, dedicated foes of fascism. For a decade, Barthou had sought to strengthen France's position against the fascist nations of Germany, Italy and Hungary, establishing pacts and agreements with Yugoslavia, Rumania and Czechoslovakia, all of these eastern European countries forming a sort of geographical buffer against the expansionist aims of Hitler and Mussolini. Although he paid lip service to Hitler, Alexander I of Yugoslavia was, like Barthou, an avowed foe of Nazi Germany.

As soon as he learned of the impending meeting between Alexander I and Barthou that would further cement Yugoslavian-French relations, Ante Pavelic called several top assassins to his Ustacha headquarters at Yanka Puszta, a small Hungarian village on the Yugoslavian border. Hungary and Italy, supporting the pro-fascist Ustacha movement, allowed this terrorist group to establish several paramilitary sites in their border territories and even funded their operations. In Berlin, Ustacha agents were welcomed and received the specific financial support of Heinrich Himmler, head of Hitler's dreaded secret police, the SS. The Berlin-based Croatian newspaper, Independent Croatian State, regularly published its fascist propaganda, and, on August 16, 1934, boldly called for the assassination of Alexander I.

Some time in September 1934, Ante Pavelic organized a team of assassins, sending three of them to Marseilles. Here they were to position themselves along the motorcade route taken by Alexander and Barthou, after the Yugoslavian monarch arrived in that port city on October 9, 1934, on the Yugoslavian cruiser, Dubrovnik. The three assassins—Mio Krajl, Eugen Kvaternik (alias Eugen Kramer) and a man named Velitchko, a Bulgarian known to be an intimate of Ante Pavelic and who used the alias of Vlada Chernozamsky—were armed with explosives and pistols.

When the Yugoslavian cruiser anchored at Marseilles, a vedette boat took King Alexander to the Quai des Belges, where Barthou warmly greeted the monarch, escorting him to a waiting open-air touring car. The car proceeded toward the prefecture where an official city welcome would be extended to the Yugoslavian sovereign. Accompanying the touring car was a troop of French cavalrymen. An officer on horseback with saber drawn rode on either side of the touring car, with more mounted officers riding before and behind the car. The crowds along the parade route were thick and a police line held spectators back as they enthusiastically greeted Alexander and Barthou.

As the car turned onto La Cannebiere, which was the city's equivalent of New York's Fifth Avenue, with its posh shops, the city's most affluent citizens lining its way, the ovation for the cortege increased in tempo, friendly cheers that caused Alexander to smile at the warm welcome. He waved at the thousands pressing against the sagging police cordon, then turned to Barthou and French General Alfonse Georges, who was also riding in the car, and said: "It is a great pleasure to be once more in France." These were the last words he would ever utter. At that moment, Colonel Poillet, who was riding on horseback alongside the car, saw a man break through the police line, holding something in his hand. Poillet mistook the object held by the man for a camera and shook his head, saying almost offhandedly to the driver of the touring car: "Another of those damned photographers!"

Colonel Poillet (shown on horseback at left) slashes his sword downward on the assassin (arm raised above head), who has just fired fatal shots into Alexander I and Jean Louis Barthou.

But Poillet was tragically mistaken. The running man was Velitchko and he was holding a gun. In a matter of seconds, he leaped upon the running board of the slow-moving touring car, aimed the weapon at Alexander, and began firing. Two bullets entered the king's chest and he slid downward in the car seat, dying. Velitchko fired once more, his bullet striking Barthou, severing an artery. Barthou would bleed to death before proper medical attention was given to him. General Georges, who had been looking the other way when the assassin leaped upon the running board, turned and tried to grapple with the gunman, who was leaning into the car and shouting incoherently as he wildly fired his gun. In the struggle, Georges was hit by no less than four bullets. He would take six months to recover from his wounds.

The killer seemed to be intent on slaying everyone in the car and took no pains to flee the scene, hanging on to the moving auto and systematically firing every round in his eight-shot weapon. He was struggling to free another gun inside his coat pocket, when Colonel Poillet wheeled his horse about and began hacking away at the assassin with his saber. Poillet struck Velitchko several times on the back and head, finally driving him off the running board of the car, which had come to a halt. Members of the crowd broke through the police lines to attack the killer as well as others whom police later believed to be part of the plot, their intent to silence the assassin before he could be captured alive and thus prevent him from revealing their identities.

King Alexander I, shown dead in the back seat of the car, where he had been fatally shot by a Croatian terrorist.

Velitchko finally fell unconscious to the pavement, bleeding from several deep saber cuts received at the hand of Colonel Poillet. Police officers picked him up and hurried him to a hospital where he remained in a coma for several hours. There Velitchko died without ever regaining consciousness. Alexander I was already dead; he had died within minutes after being mortally wounded in the car. Barthou died an hour later. The assassins had accomplished their task with amazing ease, eliminating two of fascism's most ardent foes in a matter of minutes.

The killer of Alexander I and Jean Louis Barthou, known as Velitchko and who used the alias Vlada Chernozamsky.

Inside the coat pockets of the dead killer, police found a second unused gun and two bombs, along with a fake Czech passport that identified him as Peter Kaleman (another alias), a businessman from Agram. The body was carefully inspected and on the dead man's arm was found a fearsome tattoo showing a skull and crossbones and Bulgarian words that meant "Liberty or Death." Beneath this were the initials BMPO, which stood for the Bulgarian terrorist group to which the dead man belonged. According to police, Velitchko was also using at the time of the killings, the alias of Vlada Chernozamsky. It was clear to the authorities that Velitchko knew that he stood no chance of surviving his attempt on the lives of his victims and was willing to lay down his own life to achieve the murderous goals of the Ustacha, which is exactly what he did. His identity was never fully learned.

Krajl, who had been identified in the crowd when Velitchko attacked Alexander and Barthou, fled the country, but he, and two of his accomplices were later tracked down and returned to France, where he and the others received life sentences. Mastermind Ante Pavelic was tried in absentia and condemned to death. When the Germans overran Yugoslavia in 1941, Pavelic was made dictator of Croatia, committing countless genocidal massacres. Mussolini and Hitler reveled at the deaths of their former political foes. Heinrich Himmler then took great pains to secure newsreel footage taken on the spot by an alert cameraman that showed the assassinations in Marseilles. Himmler studied this footage hours on end, so that he could best learn how to provide complete protection for Adolf Hitler at his public appearances.

THE FALLING FASCISTS

The countless murders and genocidal slaughter enacted by the fascists of Italy, Germany and Japan as those countries plunged the world into war went on for more than a decade. Assassination became routine for the Nazis and its chief practitioners, Heinrich Himmler and his henchman, Reinhard Heydrich, better known as "Hitler's Hangman." During the darkest days of the war, the Allies, unable to immediately mount an invasion of Europe, bombed the fascist cities by air and conducted raids along the French coast. Many believed that large segments of populations in the European nations conquered by the Nazis were in secret collaboration with Hitler's legions.

The free Czech government in exile in London, headed by President Eduard Benes, realized that many collaborators made it appear that the Czechs as a nation had willingly joined the Nazi camp. It was necessary to change this image, as well as rid Czechoslovakia and Europe for that matter of Reinhard Heydrich, who had become Acting Protector of Bohemia and Moravia, which also included most of what was left of Czechoslovakia. To that end, a small group of Czech parachutists were dropped into the country in early 1942. Their dedicated goal was to assassinate Heydrich.

"THE HOG HAS GONE TO THE BUTCHER"/ May 27, 1942

Reinhard Heydrich (Reinhard Tristan Eugen Heydrich, 1904-42) was Adolf Hitler's epitome of the Aryan superman in the Nazi Third Reich. He was tall, lanky, blue-eyed and blonde-haired. His nose was long, thin and pointed, as was his chin. Everything about the man seemed pointed, like the tip of a spear. He had joined the German navy, but he was subsequently cashiered by Admiral Erich Raeder for jilting the daughter of a shipbuilder he had seduced. He then went to Heinrich Himmler, ingratiating himself with the future chief of the SS and Gestapo. Heydrich longed to be reinstated to the rank of an officer and Himmler was his passport to this post, as well as to awesome power.

Born March 7, 1904, in Halle on the Saale, Heydrich was the son of an opera singer and an actress. Upon graduating from high school, he joined the Freikorps, the right-wing organization that routinely assassinated liberal German politicians such as Matthias Erzberger and Walther Rathenau. He became a naval cadet in 1922, training at Kiel, then served on the cruiser Berlin the following year. He befriended the skipper of the vessel, Captain Wilhelm Canaris, who later became head of navy intelligence and the most accomplished German spymaster of WW II.

In 1926, Heydrich was promoted to sub-lieutenant, attending the Naval Signal School, where he excelled as a navigator and mathematician. Heydrich played the violin with expertise and would openly weep while playing long compositions, typical of a man whose nature was severely split between the sentimental and the cruel. His off-hours were spent cultivating contacts with right-wing politicians and militarists, who helped to advance his career, including his promotion to lieutenant in 1928, while he was serving on the flagship, Schleswig-Holstein. By then his brutal personality had been exposed to the rank and file about him. He was feared and disliked for his harsh mannerisms and his habit of blurting commands.

Heydrich's style was typical of the Prussian officer of the day. Even though he had no such background, he emulated the conduct of these arrogant, strutting martinets, eschewing cordialities and courtesies. He always gave orders with a guttural bark, expecting total obedience from underlings. His treatment of women was equally abrasive. In 1930, he dallied with the daughter of a director of I. G. Farben, the industrial conglomerate that had backed the Kaiser's war machine in World War I, and would, like Krupp, produce war materials for Hitler's armies. When the girl asked Heydrich to marry her after he made her pregnant, he told her that he could never wed a loose woman who had given herself to him before the proper nuptials. Her enraged father went to Admiral Raeder, who then ordered Heydrich court-martialed. At this hearing, Heydrich incensed his superiors by his haughty manner and defiant outbursts. He was cashiered in April, 1931.

Early in his career, Reinhard Heydrich, right, is shown with German Abwehr chief Admiral Wilhelm Canaris.

A short time later, Heydrich married Lina Mathilde von Osten, a tall, blonde woman who idolized Heinrich Himmler. It was Heydrich's Prussian-born wife who convinced the apolitical ex-navy officer to attach his future to the Nazi Party. Through her contacts in the S.A. (Hitler's Brown Shirts), Lina arranged for Heydrich to meet Himmler on June 14, 1931. At that time, Himmler was seeking a competent, counter-espionage officer to head his Security Service. After a twenty-minute interview with Heydrich, the diminutive Himmler approved him for the post. A short time before this event, Heydrich had joined the Nazi Party. He was later named as head of the SD (Sicherheitsdienst), a secret police inside the secret police. Heydrich and his men spied on Nazi Party members, constantly checking their loyalty to the party and, especially, to Adolf Hitler. As such, Heydrich became one of the most dreaded men in Germany.

Reinhard Heydrich (second from right) is shown with SS chief Heinrich Himmler (second from left) as they enter Nazi headquarters at Hradcany Castle in Prague, October 1941.

Heydrich loved his ferreting job. A fellow SD agent later stated that he was "a born intelligence officer ... a living card index, a brain that held all the threads that wove them all together." He devoted himself wholly to his chores. His only hobby was fencing, at which he became a master and competed so expertly that he found few who would accept a challenge from him. It was the bureaucratic Heydrich who organized the SD, then the SS and its Gestapo into an effective internal secret state police force, answerable to no one except Himmler. To his face, Heydrich was servile to Himmler, who was Hitler's favorite henchman, but behind Himmler's back, Heydrich showed nothing but contempt for his superior, calling him "weak and without courage." It was the authority and power of the SS that intrigued and captivated Heydrich. He loved power above all.

During the 1930s, as the Nazis took over Germany and then looked covetously to its neighbors for conquest, Heydrich's star rose with that of his boss, Himmler. He became the second-most powerful man in the sinister SS and Gestapo. It was the cold-blooded Heydrich who developed and organized the concentration camp extermination systems to implement Hitler's plan of ridding the Reich of Jews and political opponents, as well as millions of others the Nazis found "undesirable." This was the "final solution," systematic genocide, mass murder that began in the late 1930s. Others, such as Adolf Eichmann, worked out the logistics, transportation and methods of murder, but it was Heydrich who outlined the general procedures and set in motion the awful slaughter. As the creator of such, Heydrich was rightly dubbed "Hitler's Hangman," or "The Blonde Beast."

In September 1941, Heydrich, while secretly planning to oust Himmler and take his place, was appointed Acting Protector of Bohemia and Moravia. He moved into Hradcany Castle in Prague, the ancient seat of Bohemian kings, where he ruled Czechoslovakia with an iron hand. Within a few weeks of his arrival, Heydrich ordered hundreds of suspected political opponents executed without trial. Thousands more were sent to concentration camps. The walls of Prague buildings were plastered and replastered with lists of those who had been arrested and shipped off to concentration camps and to their deaths, lists Heydrich personally organized.

Reinhard Heydrich, who had taken command in Prague, Czechoslovakia, on September 28, 1941, is shown (right foreground) in the courtyard of his Nazi headquarters at Hradcany Castle.

Heydrich is shown with his pregnant wife, Lina Mathilde von Osten Heydrich, a devout Nazi, who had advanced her husband's career by introducing him to Heinrich Himmler. This was the last photograph taken of Heydrich, shown attending a concert at Wallenstein Palace.

In response, the Free Czech Government in exile in London organized a dedicated group of Czech freedom guerrillas—Jan Kubis, Joseph Gabcik, Adolf Opalka, Jan Hruby, Joseph Bublik, Joseph Valcik, Joroslav Svarc and Karel Curda—to kill Heydrich. Once inside Czechoslovakia in early 1942, the guerrillas donned civilian clothes and began to trace Heydrich's movements. This proved to be more difficult than expected. The clever Heydrich knew he was marked for murder and carefully avoided predictable routines and purposely took different routes each day from his villa outside of Prague to his offices in Hradcany Castle.

The Czech guerrillas made several plans to kill Heydrich, but all of these schemes failed. On May 23, 1942, Joseph Novotny, a watchmaker, was called to Heydrich's office to repair an antique clock. He was a member of the underground and while he was repairing the clock, he quickly looked over documents on Heydrich's desk. He found the Reichprotector's complete schedule for May 27, 1942, the day Heydrich was to leave Prague for Germany. Novotny crumpled the piece of paper and threw it into a wastecan, which was later emptied by a Czech housekeeper. The schedule was retrieved and turned over to the guerrillas, who then made plans to assassinate Heydrich on that day.

Jan Kubis, who fatally wounded Heydrich on a Prague street.

Joseph Gabcik; he tried to shoot Heydrich, but his gun jammed.

Gabcik, Kubis and Valcik were to position themselves along the route Heydrich's limousine would take from his villa to Hradcany Castle. At a bend in the road where the car would be forced to slow down, Gabcik would step from the curb and empty his sten gun into Heydrich and his driver, Lieutenant Klein. Backing up Gabcik was Kubis, who carried a bomb. If Gabcik failed to kill Heydrich, Kubis would demolish the car with his bomb.

Heydrich left his villa at 10 a.m., on the sunny, mild morning of May 27, 1942. He had spent time that morning playing with his three children, then said goodbye to his wife, who was expecting another child. Heydrich's car proceeded along an open road for some distance. Another car preceded it, keeping a short distance in front of Heydrich's car. This car was driven by another underground worker, Rela Fefek. When both cars approached the bend in the road, Valcik, who was positioned at this point, produced a mirror he used to signal Gabcik and Kubis, letting them know that Heydrich's car was approaching. At the bend, Fefek brought his car to a halt, stopping Heydrich's following car.

The rear end of Heydrich's car shows a hole where the blast of Kubis' bomb sent a metal spring from the back seat into Heydrich's lower back, a fatal wound.

Gabcik stepped from the curb, his sten gun hidden beneath a raincoat. He threw the coat away and aimed the gun at Heydrich. He squeezed the trigger, but nothing happened. The gun had jammed. Heydrich and his driver were at first shocked into frozen silence at the sight of the would-be assassin. They regained their composure and both drew pistols. Heydrich stood up in the back seat of the open car and aimed his pistol at the helpless Gabcik, who frantically worked the sten gun without success. At that moment, Kubis ran forward and took a bomb from his briefcase, hurling the bomb, which landed at the rear of the car, exploding. Gabcik and Kubis were showered with shrapnel as they ran across the street to escape.

The explosion tore apart the right side of the back end of the Mercedes in which Heydrich was riding, sending a piece of shrapnel into his back (this was actually a piece of metal spring from the back seat of the car, which had blown upward and into Heydrich). He stood for a moment and then collapsed onto the rear seat of the car. Klein was also seriously wounded. Pedestrians ran past the car and the two stricken Nazis as if they did not exist. Heydrich called out for help, but no one came to his assistance. A trolley car packed with people went around the car, its passengers looking down approvingly at the bloody scene. Finally, a female collaborator commandeered a van into which the wounded Heydrich was placed. He was driven to Bulkova Hospital. Doctors first thought that Heydrich would survive his wound. The shrapnel entering his body narrowly missed the spine, kidneys and major arteries. However, infection set in and Heydrich died of septicemia on June 4, 1942.

Before that time, SS and Gestapo agents, as well as hundreds of German troops, were swarming through Prague and neighboring villages in search of the assassins. One of their number, Karel Curda, had deserted these patriots. A few days after the bombing, Curda appeared in the SS offices in Prague to claim a large reward for identifying the killers. He told the Nazis that his seven fellow parachutists were hiding in a basement crypt of the Church of St. Cyril and St. Methodius. Hundreds of troops surrounded the church, where a battle broke out. After a prolonged gunfight in which the Germans used automatic fire, bombs, gas and water (to flood the underground crypt) in an effort to force the parachutists to surrender, the freedom fighters either died at their posts or committed suicide. The fate of these heroes was repeated in ghastly numbers over the next few weeks.

Hitler and Himmler sought vengeance for the assassination of their arch executioner, ordering wholesale reprisals. On the day of Heydrich's death, 152 Jews were summarily executed in Berlin. Himmler announced these deaths as being connected to a Jewish plot and continued to use this false claim to order the deaths of thousands of Jews in the months thereafter.

The St. Cyril and St. Methodius Church, where the parachutists took refuge, all killed here in a prolonged battle with German troops.

On June 9, 1942, Captain Max Rostock led ten truckloads of German Security Police into the small town of Lidice, which was near Prague. All males above the age of sixteen were rounded up and imprisoned in barns and other buildings owned by Mayor Horak. All 172 males were taken from the buildings the next day and shot in open fields. All women in the village, 195 females, were shipped to concentration camps and more than half of these would be executed. The orphaned children of these victims were sent to German homes to be raised by John Carradine, right, plays Heydrich, threatening a priest in Douglas Sirk's 1943 film, Hitler's Madman.

"good Germans." No trace of these tragic children was ever found.

After its inhabitants were removed, every building in Lidice was dynamited and leveled by bulldozers to the ground, so that no trace of the village remained. Though many paid for Heydrich's assassination, few mourned the passing of this ardent Nazi and mass murderer. Hitler and Himmler attended a pomp-filled funeral ceremony for Heydrich in Berlin, but many fellow Nazis felt relief at the passing of this cold-blooded killer. Sepp Dietrich, a German panzer general, spoke for his peers when he said, after hearing of Heydrich's assassination: "The hog has finally gone to the butcher!"

THE ATTEMPT ON HITLER/July 20, 1944

Germany's war-mongering dictator, Adolf Hitler, haranguing a crowd in Berlin in 1933; his lunatic beliefs would bring death to more than twelve million people.

A little more than two years after Heydrich was assassinated in Prague, with the Third Reich collapsing on all fronts, high-ranking officers of the German army made an attempt to end the war by killing the madman who had led them to military disaster, Adolf Hitler (1889-1945). The German army, along with the country's industrialists, had initially backed and financed Hitler in his political climb to power. This Prussian cabal mistakenly thought Hitler to be the only politician who could defeat the forces of Bolshevism that threatened to take over Germany immediately after World War I. In supporting Hitler, these power brokers believed that they could control Hitler, but they simply replaced one tyranny for another.

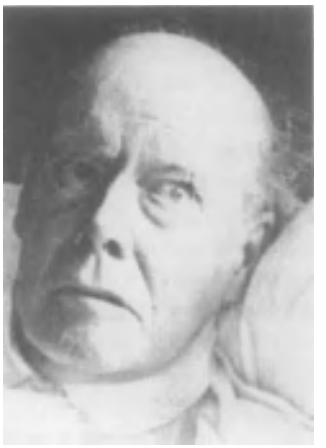
A shrewd and cunning politician, Hitler was born on April 20, 1889, in an inn at a small Austrian town near the German border (a claim made in late 2002 insisted that he was born in a small village in Germany). His father, Alois Hitler, was a minor Austrian customs official, a stern parent, unlike his kind-hearted wife, Klara Poelzl, Hitler's mother. Five children were born to this marriage, three dying in infancy. Adolf Hitler was the third surviving child. His sister Paula, born in 1894, lived to see her brother rule Europe and die in shame.

Hitler attended five different grade schools, his family often moving as his father changed jobs. He was a listless student, at one time attending a school operated by Benedictine friars at Lambach, where he sang in the choir. Raised a Catholic, Hitler thought to become a priest, but abandoned that vague ambition, believing that he had enough talent to become a successful artist. He rebelled at his father's insistence that he become a civil servant, hating the idea of being chained to a desk, sorting and filing papers for the rest of his life.

Adolf Hitler as a youth when living a hobo's life in Vienna.

In constant rebellion with his father and his teachers, Hitler's grades were so poor that he was compelled to transfer from a private institution to a state school at Steyr. He did no better there and left without graduating. One of his teachers, Professor Eduard Huemer, later stated that Hitler "lacked self-control, and, to say the least, he was considered argumentative, autocratic, opinionated, bad-tempered and unable to submit to school discipline." Hitler blamed his teachers for his own failure, saying later that they had suppressed his natural talents and intellectual gifts, that these academics were "congenital idiots," and "tyrants."

Upon the death of his father in 1903, Hitler, at sixteen, was left to drift about on his own. He got drunk one night in Steyr, becoming so ill that a milkmaid had to help him walk home. He vowed never to drink liquor again. As his widowed mother struggled to support her two children, Hitler refused to work, loafing for almost three years, reading romance novels and attending operas where he listened with obsession to the brooding, bombastic music of Richard Wagner, his idol. (He befriended the Wagner family after he came to power, its members embracing his Nazi philosophy.) As a teenager moving from one small Austrian town to another and sometimes visiting Bavaria (he held great admiration for Germany and its iron-willed Kaiser Wilhelm II), Hitler harangued total strangers, spewing forth amateur philosophies, but mostly shouting out his racial hatreds and his support for a strong military presence to "keep law and order."



Crackpot British philosopher Houston Stewart Chamberlain, who became a mentor to Hitler, advancing the madman's genocidal theories.

In Linz, Hitler lived like a hobo, sponging off the few young persons who befriended him. One friend, August Kubizik, later described the teenage Hitler as having an uncontrollable temper. When anyone disagreed with him, said Kubizik, Hitler flew into hysterical tantrums, screaming until he almost collapsed. Moving to Vienna, Hitler, convinced that he was a great artist, attempted to enroll in the Vienna Academy of Fine Arts in October 1907. After completing an examination, he was rejected, told that he had no aptitude for art. So enraged at this rebuff was Hitler that he nurtured a deep-seated hatred for Austria, his native country. He vowed that he would make Vienna and Austria pay for the rejection. Three decades later he humiliated the Austrian Government by sending his storm-trooping forces through Vienna's streets after a trumped-up Anschluss, which annexed this country to Germany.

In 1908, Hitler's mother died, an emotional blow from which he never fully recovered. Without her meager support, he drifted into the backwaters of Vienna, living hand-to-mouth from 1909 to 1913. While his clothes went to rags, Hitler wandered about cafes and tried to sell sketches to sidewalk patrons, but few were interested in his sterile, unimaginative drawings. He found himself standing in long queues each day, waiting to be fed by charity kitchens. Hitler survived in these days by moving from one hovel to another, dwelling in Vienna's Jewish ghetto. Vienna at that time was home to more than two million people, 200,000 of them Jews. Hitler hated them, relegating them to the status of foreigners, even though most were native-born Austrians.

"I began to see Jews and the more I saw," he later wrote, "the more sharply they became distinguished in my eyes from the rest of humanity ... Later I often grew sick to the stomach from the smell of these caftan-wearers." His pathological hatred for Jews went to the marrow of his warped thinking: "Was there any form of filth or profligacy, particularly in cultural life, without at least one Jew involved in it? If you can cut even cautiously into such an abscess, you found, like a maggot in a rotting body, often dazzled by the sudden light—a kike!" He blamed everything sinister and evil on the Jews. White slavers operated widely in Vienna and prostitution was rampant. This, in his twisted views, Hitler blamed on the Jews: "I recognized the Jew as the cold-hearted, shameless and calculating director of this revolting vice traffic in the scum of the big city."

To feed his ravenous bigotry, Hitler avidly read the works of minor writers who shared his racist hatreds, the most influential being an obscure crackpot, Count Joseph Arthur de Gobineau, a French philosopher and author of a four-volume work, Essai sur l'Inegalite des Races Humaines, in which he contended that "the racial question dominates all the other problems of history." A French diplomat living in Germany, Gobineau drew up a chart of sorts in which he listed the nationalities and races in the order of their declining importance. Those at the bottom of his list, the Jews, were decidedly "inferior." This became the hub of Hitler's racial theories, along with those stemming from English philosopher, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, later a mentor of Hitler, who advocated the bigoted ideas of Gobineau.

To these racist philosophers Hitler coupled the writings of Georg Ritter von Schoenerer, who advocated unification of Austria and Germany to form a super power that would dominate Europe. All of these illogical theories were incorporated later by Hitler into his Nazi manifesto, Mein Kampf (My Struggle), and later into horrible practice by Heinrich Himmler's dreaded SS and Gestapo. By May 1913, when Hitler was defining his dark hatreds, he received a notice that he was about to be drafted into the Austrian army. He fled to Bavaria, settling in Munich. On August 2, 1914, Hitler joined a huge and enthusiastic crowd assembled in front of

This amazing 1914 photo shows a crowd assembled at Munich's Odeonsplatz in front of Feldherrnhalle to hear Germany's proclamation of war. Hitler can be seen (circled, inset above) in the crowd cheering the news.

Munich's Feldherrnhalle that wildly cheered the announcement that Germany and Austro-Hungary had declared war on the Allies. An amazing photo, found years later by one of Hitler's official biographers, shows Hitler standing in the crowd.

Where Hitler refused to serve in the Austrian army, he was eager and excited at serving Germany, enlisting in the 16th Bavarian Reserve Infantry regiment and was one of the first to see action in October 1914 in the first battle of Ypres. It was here that Hitler's regiment was all but wiped out, only 600 out of 3,500 surviving as the British turned back the German drive toward the English Channel. Hitler, who rose to the rank of corporal, thrived on the war, preaching to his fellow soldiers that the war was the fulfillment of Germany's destiny, one which decreed the conquest of Europe. He fought in several battles and was wounded twice, shot in the leg and later gassed. He was cited for bravery, twice given the Iron Cross, first and second-class.

Hitler as a corporal in the 16th Bavarian Infantry Regiment; he was twice wounded.

Hitler was not well-liked by his fellow soldiers, who thought him to be a raving monarchist and warmonger. When the German war machine ground to a halt and the Allies won victory after victory, Hitler denounced secret cabals of Marxists and Jews as being behind the German defeats. When the war ended in November 1918, Hitler returned to Munich to find the city in chaos and in the hands of a Marxist regime led by Jewish writer Kurt Eisner. He was edified to see the newly established Weimar Republic suppress this uprising by sending thousands of Freikorps troops (right-wing German veterans of the war) to Munich, where Eisner was assassinated by Anton Arco-Valley, a Freikorps leader.

Hitler moved about Munich, looking for political affiliations and found it with a small group called the German Workers Party, headed by Anton Dexler, a locksmith. The party was dedicated to the eradication of all Marxists and Communist trade unions. Hitler became Dexler's slavish minion, running errands for the party leader. At one party meeting in 1919, Hitler befriended Ernst Roehm, a former army captain with small, piggish eyes and a porcine face scarred by the ravages of war. He was an avowed homosexual as was the case with most of the early-day storm-troopers Roehm recruited and who would later form the hundreds of thousands of thugs organized as the brown-shirted SA.

Hitler recognized Roehm's organizing abilities and used him to wrest control of the German Workers Party from Dexler. Another member of this small party, Dietrich Eckert, an alcoholic playwright and morphine addict, became Hitler's mentor and helped to shape him into a political entity, training him in the techniques of oratory and drama. Eckert had not served in the army during the war, but had been confined in a lunatic asylum in Vienna, where he occupied his days by writing racist plays, using the mentally disturbed inmates to enact these weird dramas.

When Eckert first heard Hitler address a small group, he realized that the young man had a hoarse, but commanding voice and a forceful, even intimidating personality that, with cultivation and refinement of dramatic pauses and delivery, could captivate audiences. The 58-year-old Eckert took Hitler under his wing, tutoring him in effective use of the German language, writing his speeches and introducing him to others who shared their common hatred for Jews, foreigners and Communists. It was through Eckert that Hitler met many of those who later became his slavish lieutenants, including Rudolf Hess and Alfred Rosenberg, who was to become the so-called "philosopher" of the Nazi Party.

In 1920, Hitler was named propaganda chief of the German Workers Party and quickly organized mass meetings. At one of these, held at the massive beer hall, Munich's Hofbrauhaus on February 24, 1920, Hitler stood before thousands of right-wing citizens. He ranted his rather senseless philosophies for five hours, a bizarre, physically exhausting tirade that nevertheless riveted the audience with his mesmeric and hortatory delivery. He was immediately named head of the party, the title of which he changed to the National Socialist German Workers Party or the Nazi Party for short.

Hitler in 1921, when he was a member of the German Workers Party in Munich.

Hitler preached his race hatred and nationalist theories at dozens of meetings throughout Munich and Bavaria. Thousands of discontented war veterans flocked to his black banner, by then adorned with an enigmatic swastika. This symbol, a hooked cross known as the hakenkreuz, had been seen by Hitler on the helmets of the Freikorps troops that had entered Munich to quickly crush the Eisner uprising. This symbol, which came to be known for everything evil, dated back to the time of Troy and could also be found in ancient China, its original meaning unknown.

A born propagandist, Hitler ordered this symbol to be placed on flags, armbands, stationary, posters, circulars, flyers and medals, all of these items widely distributed to recruited members. Hitler designed the Nazi flag himself, creating a flag of red, white and black, the colors of the old monarchist banner, with the swastika in the middle of a white circle. These were seen by discerning observers as the trappings of a political humbug, but within a decade they were transformed into the symbols of national authority.

With donations from middle-class citizens, shopkeepers and businessmen who believed Hitler's lie that Germany had been betrayed by German Jews and liberals negotiating the end of World War I at Versailles, the Nazi Party grew in great numbers, expanding its chapters throughout Germany. In Bavaria, where his strength was substantial, Hitler enlisted the aid of retired General Erich von Ludendorff, a Prussian army commander who had directed many of the German armies during World War I. Thinking he could easily topple the local government headed by Gustav von Kahr, Hitler, on November 8, 1923, attempted a putsch that would put the Nazis in power in Munich. The elderly Ludendorff supported that march on the government offices, but Hitler's rowdy storm troopers were shot down in the abortive uprising by government police and troops. Hitler survived the shootings and was arrested, tried for treason on February 26, 1924 and was given a five-year prison sentence.

While serving his sentence in comfortable quarters at Landsberg Prison, Hitler busied himself with writing Mein Kampf. He served less than a year and when he was released, he had gained more supporters than ever before. Tens of thousands joined the SA, these storm troopers contributing large amounts of their meager salaries to support and expand the Nazi Party. They marched through the streets of every German city day and night, armed with clubs, shouting their racist epithets. By the late 1920s, hundreds of thousands had flocked to the brown-shirted SA, which now posed a real threat to the authority of the government and outnumbered the country's armed forces, a fact that alarmed the German High Command.

Hitler's stormtroopers (SA) are shown marching into Munich in 1923 in an attempt to take over the Bavarian government in an ill-conceived putsch.

High Command generals, however, saw Hitler as an opportunity to expand their forces, which had been restricted in size by the Versailles Treaty. They secretly aligned themselves with Hitler, as did German industrialists, believing that the extremely right-winged Nazi Party was the answer to Germany's political, economic and military woes. By 1932, Hitler and his Nazi Party was the dominating political force in Germany. Hitler's star rose higher in 1933 when his party scored stunning victories at the polls. The aging General Paul von Hindenburg, Germany's top military leader during World War I, headed a badly managed government that tottered on the brink of disaster. Hitler, backed by the army and industrialists now had huge funds at his disposal.

Hitler then successfully bribed his way to power, giving a large amount of money to Oskar von Hindenburg, the German president's son, to convince his father to name Hitler as the country's new chancellor. After his appointment, Hitler formed his cabinet on January 30, 1933. Tens of thousands of Nazi storm troopers jubilantly marched by torchlight through the streets of every city and town in the country in celebration. A dark age then descended upon Germany. In consolidating his power, Hitler, through his second-in-command, Hermann Goering, had the Reichstag (the German parliament building in Berlin) burned down on February 27, 1933, to deprive opposition delegates of an assembly area. The arson was blamed on a Dutch halfwit, Mariunus van der Lubbe, who was railroaded to execution.

Hitler then won forty-four percent of the electoral vote in Germany in nationwide elections on March 5, 1933. He eliminated all political opposition by decreeing that no party other than the Nazi Party was legal in Germany. Under a bogus threat of a Communist takeover, he next ordered the Reichstag to turn over all constitutional powers to him to save Germany from destruction. He thus became dictator over thirty-three million people. The only force standing in Hitler's way was the army's High Command. German militarists, however, were alarmed at the power and forces of the Brown Shirts under the command of Ernst Roehm. They told Hitler that he would have their full cooperation if he eliminated the SA paramilitary forces. This meant the execution of Roehm and his top lieutenants, the very men who had for a decade enforced Hitler's edicts, who had year-by-year bullied Hitler into power.

Hitler did not hesitate. In an all-night session, Hitler,

Hitler (fourth from right) stands next to General Erich von Ludendorff (fifth from right) of WW I fame, who was embarrassed by his involvement in Hitler's abortive Beer Hall Putsch in 1923, one that sent Hitler to prison.

Himmler, Goering and Paul Joseph Goebbels, Hitler's propaganda minister, prepared SA death lists, in preparation for what later became known as the Night of the Long Knives, June 30, 1934. On that day Hitler flew to Wiessee, a lakeside resort outside of Munich, where Roehm and many of his top associates were vacationing. Accompanied by a heavily armed escort of Himmler's SS, Hitler stormed into the inn where Roehm and others were sleeping. Hitler, though he knew Roehm was homosexual, feigned shock at discovering the SA leader and other men sleeping together. With a pistol in hand, he stood at Roehm's open door, calling these loyal Nazis "repugnant beasts" and ordered them shot without trial.

Roehm was taken to a nearby prison and placed in a cell. He was given a loaded gun to use on himself. When the puzzled SA leader refused to commit suicide and insisted on seeing Hitler, two SS men entered the cell and shot him to death. Hundreds of SA leaders were rounded up throughout the country and met the same fate. Roehm's top deputy in Berlin, Karl Ernst, was about to go on his honeymoon and, when arrested and condemned, could not believe that he was about to be executed, right up to the time he was placed in front of a firing squad. He died giving the Nazi salute and shouting "Heil Hitler!"

Hitler and his close associates used this night of mass murder to also eliminate all of his old enemies. General Kurt von Schleicher, who had been Germany's last chancellor before Hitler took power and had strenuously opposed Hitler's new cabinet, was shot to death by SS men when he opened the door of his villa, outside of Berlin. His wife of only eighteen months ran forward and she, too, was shot and killed. Gregor Strasser, one of the leading members of the early Nazi Party, who had fallen out with Hitler, was also shot to death that night. Catholic Action leader Erich Klausener was killed in his office and his entire staff sent to a concentration camp. Gustav von Kahr, who had opposed Hitler in the abortive Munich Beer Hall Putsch of 1923, was taken to a forest near Dachau by Nazi thugs and hacked to death with pickaxes.

Hitler announced a few days later that seventy-seven "enemies of the state," who had been planning to overthrow his government, had been executed. The executions, in truth, exceeded 1,000, almost all of the victims being Hitler's old enemies. The SA was disbanded, many of its members absorbed into the army. Hitler now received the wholehearted endorsement of the army's High Command. Hitler, however, did not stop with the army. He knew that General Werner von Blomberg, head of the Wehrmacht, gave him only lip service and he replaced him with more slavish generals, ardent Nazis such as Wilhelm Keitel and Alfred Jodl.

When President Hindenburg died on August 4, 1934, all hope for a free Germany disappeared. In total control, Hitler, through Himmler and other minions, ordered the imprisonment of tens of thousands of intellectuals, church leaders, Jews and others thought to be enemies of the Nazi state. These hapless victims were thrown into newly created concentration camps where, years later, they were systematically murdered, their numbers mounting to a staggering twelve million (an estimated six million being Jewish) before World War II ended.

Conquest and German domination was foremost in Hitler's mind, and as the 1930s waned, his legions annexed neighboring provinces, then whole countries such as Austria and Czechoslovakia. On September 1, 1939, at the peak of his military and political power, Hitler launched open warfare by invading Poland. This compelled Polish allies England and France to declare war on Germany. France, along with Norway, Denmark, Belgium, the Netherlands collapsed under the German blitzkrieg within a year. The war would rage on for six more terrible years, the Allies finally invading Europe at Normandy on June 6, 1944.

This had a momentous and decisive effect upon the German army. It was steadily driven out of France and the Lowlands, retreating to the borders of the Fatherland. Many of Germany's top generals had known years earlier that Germany could not win its war of total conquest. Field marshals Heinz Guderian and Erwin Rommel had warned Hitler that he had extended his forces to the breaking point and that war materials and supplies could not support the German war effort. The dictator ignored these warnings and labeled these top military leaders "defeatists." He squandered hundreds of thousands of troops in vain battles in Russia, always giving the ridiculous order of "Victory or Death."

Hitler was on a path of national self-destruction, which caused small groups of anti-Nazis to plan his assassination, even before Hitler launched World War II. The dictator was well aware of such secret ambitions. On August 22, 1939, on the eve of his invasion of Poland, he announced to several of his generals that he could easily be assassinated "by a criminal or an idiot." On May 2, 1942, at Germany's high military tide, he stated that "there can never be absolute security against fanatics and idealists ... If some fanatic wishes to shoot me or kill me with a bomb, I am no safer sitting down than standing up." As a fanatic himself, who had ordered many another assassination (such as that of Austrian leader Engelbert Dollfuss in 1934), Hitler knew well what a dedicated assassin could achieve.

Certain German civilians had been plotting to get rid of Hitler before the outbreak of World War II. The most important group of these underground activists was led by Dr. Carl Goerdeler, the former mayor of Leipzig, and one-time minister in Hitler's 1937 cabinet. He enlisted the aid of many liberal-thinking Germans, including religious leader Dietrich Bonhoeffer and Ulrich von Hassell, but Goerdeler knew that to overthrow Hitler, the military must take an active part. For this purpose, he recruited many top ranking generals, including Ludwig Beck, Henning von Tresckow, Erich Hoepner, Eduard Wagner, Friedrich Olbricht and Heinrich von Stuelpnagel.

Field marshals who commanded armies were also enlisted, including Guenther von Kluge, Erwin von Witzleben and Germany's greatest hero, Erwin Eugen Rommel, the celebrated "Desert Fox," who had electrified the world with his brilliant victories in North Africa during the early years of the war. The plotters made many plans to kill the dictator, but seemed to get nowhere until Rommel set things in motion. He finally agreed to join the plotters and rid Germany of Hitler, saying to Goerdeler: "The people in Berlin can count on me." An effective plan to assassinate Hitler was then detailed by a group of dedicated junior officers that included Major Fabian von Schlabrendorff, Colonel Casar von Hofacker and Count Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg, who was the most ardent of the group and the most daring.

Hitler is shown in his cell in Landsberg Prison in 1924, where he spent his time writing Mein Kampf.

A contemporary cartoon shows Hitler trying to sell copies of Mein Kampf to disinterested beer hall patrons.

Adolf Hitler addressing followers at a Nazi meeting in 1932. Shown with him (left to right): Hermann Goering, Wilhelm Frick, Hitler, Gregor Strasser and Paul Joseph Goebbels, all meeting death through suicide, execution or murder.

It was agreed that the best place to assassinate the elusive Hitler—he changed his daily schedule without notice, so his whereabouts were always uncertain—would be at the heavily fortified Wolf's Lair, Hitler's military retreat near Rastenburg, in East Prussia, a site Hitler regularly visited to direct his ongoing war against the Soviet Union. Stauffenberg was selected as the man to do the job. He was to plant a bomb in Hitler's conference building and blow the dictator and his closest aides to pieces. As chief of staff of the Home Army, Colonel Stauffenberg had access to Hitler and made frequent reports to him on the status of the civilian soldiers, who had been called into army reserves.

Ernst Roehm (second from left), Hitler's close associate and leader of the powerful Stormtroopers (SA). Roehm is shown with SS chief Heinrich Himmler (at left), the very man who supervised Roehm's 1934 assassination at Hitler's orders.

On July 20, 1944, Stauffenberg arrived in Rastenburg from Berlin to attend a staff conference, where Hitler would be present. Stauffenberg, who had lost an arm and the sight in one eye during the war, carried a briefcase in which a timebomb was concealed. Since it was a hot day, the conference was held above ground and not in the underground bunker, where Hitler usually met with his staff. The building in which the conference was held was a squat, one-story structure. The windows had been opened to let in fresh air. Hitler and his officers gathered about a large table supported by solid wooden blocks. Stauffenberg made his brief report to Hitler, placing his briefcase at Hitler's feet, next to one of the large wooden blocks. Stauffenberg then excused himself and left the building, moving some distance away to await the explosion. In those seconds, the always animated Hitler, moved from his position at the table to inspect maps of the Eastern front. As he did so, the bomb went off. It was 2:42 p.m.

A terrific explosion tore through the one-room building, flames belching and smoke gushing through the open windows. Most of the roof was blown skyward. Bodies were hurled like rag dolls through the windows and doors. Stauffenberg stood about 200 yards away from the building with General Erich Fellgeibel, one of those involved in the plot and head of communications for the Rastenburg retreat. Stauffenberg, seeing the tremendous explosion, believed that no one could have survived the blast and told Fellgeibel to wire other conspirators in Berlin that Hitler was dead.

This was the signal that caused General Beck and others to seize key government buildings in Berlin, including the national radio station. Meanwhile, Stauffenberg went to the airport and flew back to Berlin. While he was in flight, Nazi officers at Rastenburg carefully entered the scorched conference building to find bodies strewn everywhere. A stenographer named Berger had been blown through a window. General Rudolf Schmundt, Hitler's adjutant, was dying of wounds, as was General F. Kortner. Generals Alfred Jodl, Karl Bodenschatz and Adolf Heusinger received severe wounds. Miraculously, Hitler had survived. Only minutes after Stauffenberg left to report him dead, the Fuhrer emerged from the building, staggering over debris and bodies.

Hitler's trousers were torn and his legs had been burned. He clutched his right arm, which had been bruised and momentarily paralyzed; he would let this arm hang slack for the rest of his days. A falling beam had struck Hitler's back, cutting him, but breaking no bones. Both of Hitler's eardrums had been punctured. He was a grim figure as he stepped from the smoldering ruins. His hair had been singed and smoke curled up from his hair and clothes. His face was blackened and his eyes rolled uncontrollably in his head. General Wilhelm Keitel, who had also amazingly escaped injury, caught up with Hitler and supported him to a rest area.

Fascist dictators Benito Mussolini and Adolf Hitler inspect the ruins of the conference room at the Wolf's Lair, where Stauffenberg planted the bomb on July 20, 1944.

Himmler, who was in another building at the time of the explosion, rushed to inspect the demolished building, then ordered bomb specialists to fly from Berlin to determine how the explosion had been set off. He initially believed that a bomb had been buried beneath the building and no one at this time suspected anyone who had been present at the meeting as being part of the attempted assassination.

Stauffenberg, still in flight, believed Hitler dead and that the generals in Berlin, who were part of the conspiracy had by then arrested Goering, Goebbels and all other fanatic Nazi leaders. He also believed that all important government buildings in Berlin had been seized and all military units taken over by officers loyal to the conspiracy. Nothing of the kind had occurred. General Olbricht had taken over the War Ministry building, but Berlin's radio station was still in the hands of Nazi propaganda minister Goebbels, who was then desperately trying to contact Rastenburg. Communications between the Wolf's Lair and Berlin had been shut down by Fellgeibel.

Most of the vacillating generals involved in the plot were so ineffective that they failed to seize their opportunity. Field Marshal Witzleben arrived at the military headquarters in Berlin to learn in shock that troops loyal to the conspiracy had not been activated and that most of the key buildings and posts in Berlin were still controlled by fanatical Nazis devoted to Hitler. Disgusted at events, he stormed out of the War Ministry and returned to his country estate, where he would be arrested the following day.

About two hours after the explosion, the shaken Nazis at Rastenburg began to suspect Stauffenberg. A sergeant reported to Himmler that Stauffenberg had hastily left the Wolf's Lair and flown to Berlin. Someone recalled seeing Stauffenberg place his briefcase next to Hitler before he excused himself from the meeting. Himmler then ordered Stauffenberg arrested when his plane landed at Berlin, but this message was delayed because Fellgeibel had shut down the communications center on the excuse that he did not want the world to know that an attempt on Hitler's life had been made. Fellgeibel stalled as long as possible before opening the line to Berlin.

Meanwhile, Hitler was preoccupied with having to greet his fellow dictator, Benito Mussolini, who was scheduled to arrive at Rastenburg at 4 p.m. by train on a state visit. The Italian dictator had little support left in his own country. When Nazi fanatic Roland Freisler, president of the People's Court, who prosecuted suspects in the July 20 bomb plot, railroading most of them to speedy executions (they were hanged by wires on meathooks). Freisler was later killed when a bomb dropped by an Allied plane blew up his courtroom.

Carl Goerdeler, one of the chief architects in the many plots to kill Hitler, who is shown on trial in Freisler's kangaroo court. Goerdeler was instrumental in persuading Field Marshal Erwin Rommel to join the conspirators in their 1944 bombing plot to assassinate the madman.

the war turned against Italy, Mussolini had been imprisoned by his own black-shirted fascists and had only recently been rescued by crack German commandoes led by Colonel Otto Skorzeny. Hitler managed to regain his composure and greet Mussolini at Rastenburg's train station. He then escorted the shocked Italian dictator to the still smoking ruins of the conference building, showing him with almost maniacal pride how he had managed to escape death only hours earlier.

The two dictators, who had been responsible for the deaths of untold millions, stood in the smoldering ruins and vowed eternal support for each other. Hitler, bordering on the hysterical, launched into one of his self-aggrandizing tirades as Mussolini stared in silence. Said Hitler: "I was standing here by this table. The bomb went off just in front of my feet ... It is obvious that nothing is going to happen to me. Undoubtedly, it is my fate to continue on my way and bring my task to completion ... What happened here today is the climax! Having now escaped death ... I am now more than ever convinced that the great cause which I serve will be brought through its present perils and that everything can be brought to a good end."

Mussolini solemnly nodded. (He later told an aide that Hitler at that moment seemed out of control and spouted mostly gibberish.) The Italian dictator replied: "Our position is bad, one might almost say desperate, but what has happened here today gives me new courage. After this miracle, it is inconceivable that our cause should meet with misfortune." The two dictators stood together in the smoking ruins, congratulating each other on being alive and able to pursue their plans of world domination, world destruction, if need be. The two dictators then retired to a rest area where they sat down with other Nazi officers to have tea, chatting at a tea party as mad as any occurring in Alice's strange wonderland.

Communications with Berlin had by then been reestablished and it was quickly learned that Stauffenberg had not acted alone and that a widespread coup attempt by High Command officers in Berlin was in progress. The traumatic reaction to the bombing and the ongoing uprising by high ranking military officers caused Nazi officers and officials surrounding Hitler to panic. They began accusing each other of negligence in warding off the assassination attempt, their screams and shouts causing the embarrassed Mussolini to turn Colonel Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg, who planted the bomb at the Wolf's Lair. He was executed.

General Freidrich Olbricht, who failed to activate his troops in the uprising. He was executed.

General Ludwig Beck, whose "suicide" was arranged by Nazi soldiers, when the 1944 coup failed.

red-faced. Hitler, however, was oblivious to this uproar. He sat in stony silence. Admiral Karl Doenitz, who had just arrived from Berlin, accused Goering of not rooting out the traitors of the High Command. Goering put the blame on the Foreign Office, shouting at Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop.

Hitler, who had been sucking on pills fed to him by his toady physician, Dr. Theodor Morell, suddenly jumped to his feet, causing the startled Mussolini to spill the contents of his tea cup. Froth foamed on Hitler's quivering lips. His eyes darted and rolled. He began screaming revenge for all those involved in the plot against his life, adding: "I'll put their wives and children into concentration camps and show them no mercy!" As Hitler stormed about the room raving, white-coated servants methodically went about pouring more tea into cups, ignoring the tirade of their master. Benito Mussolini sat stunned by the scene, saying nothing. He later stated to an aide just before his own assassination that the scene at Rastenburg was terrifying: "The place was like an asylum and the lunatics were everywhere. They were in charge."

Meanwhile, the plot to kill Hitler and wrest control of the government from the Nazis, Operation Valkyrie, as the conspirators had labeled it, had utterly collapsed. General Olbricht had not, as promised, ordered his troops out of their barracks to take over key Berlin installations. He was waiting for confirmation of Hitler's death. General Freidrich Fromm, head of the Home Guard, managed to get a phone call through to the Wolf's Lair from Berlin. General Keitel told Fromm that Hitler was alive and that all was well. Keitel then wanted to know the whereabouts of Fromm's chief of staff, Colonel Stauffenberg. He told Keitel he did not know. When he hung up, Fromm knew the coup had failed.

When Stauffenberg arrived at the Ministry, he was told that Hitler was alive. That mattered not, said the conspirator. The coup must be completed, he insisted. General Beck agreed, but little was done. In occupied Paris, General Stuelpnagel had made more headway. His troops had locked up more than 1,200 SS and Gestapo members and the coup in France was well in progress. Attempting to activate the conspirators, Stauffenberg barged into General Fromm's office, urging him to support the coup. Fromm, an expert fence-sitter who had half-heartedly agreed to support the conspiracy at the start, now changed his mind. Knowing that Hitler was still alive and that the Nazis still controlled all key government buildings and troops, he curtly told Stauffenberg to surrender, saying: "Count Stauffenberg, the attempt has failed. You must shoot yourself at once!"

Fromm and others loyal to Hitler were locked in their offices, while a cordon of troops loyal to the conspirators surrounded the War Ministry, but this was the only building in Berlin that the rebels controlled. Meanwhile, Paul Joseph Goebbels had been busy. He had surrounded the national broadcasting building with loyal Nazi troops and he constantly aired the news that though there had been an attempt on Hitler's life, the Fuhrer was very much alive. Coming to his support was SS Colonel Otto Skorzeny, the tough commando officer who had recently rescued Mussolini. Skorzeny persuaded tank commanders in Berlin to surround the War Ministry and, with SS units loyal to Hitler, he stormed into the building at 9 p.m. He freed Fromm and others, then arrested Beck, Olbricht, Stauffenberg and other conspirators.

Fromm ordered Beck to commit suicide, but the elderly general botched the job, only wounding himself. An SS sergeant then dragged Beck to a small room and shot him in the back of the neck, killing him. Stauffenberg, Olbricht and others were lined up against a wall that night and summarily shot to death. Later that night, a national broadcast aired a ranting Hitler who informed his battered nation that he was still alive to continue his self-destructive war. He minimized the extent of the conspiracy against him, placing all the responsibility on junior officers, careful not to implicate the large number of high-ranking generals involved. These generals and field marshals, however, along with thousands of others, were quickly tried in kangaroo courts and sentenced to death. Many did not wait to be arrested, but simply committed suicide.

Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, Hitler's greatest military commander (shown with his son Manfred and wife), who joined the conspirators in the July 20 plot.

Hitler is shown with his long-time mistress Eva Braun, whom he married on the last day of his life before the couple committed suicide in an underground Berlin bunker to avoid capture.

When Hitler learned that his greatest military leader, Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, had been part of the plot, he sent two staff officers to Rommel's residence where the Desert Fox was recuperating from war wounds. They offered Rommel two choices: He could have a public trial in which his certain conviction would bring about the ruination of his family or he could commit suicide (they provided poison pills) and his death would be attributed to his war wounds. In the latter instance, Rommel would be buried with military honors and his family's security would be assured. Rommel, to protect his loved ones, chose suicide, driving off with the two officers and swallowing the poisoned pills a few minutes later.

More than 7,000 persons paid with their lives for the assassination attempt made against Adolf Hitler. It was a great toll and a useless one in that Hitler himself would do what the conspirators had failed to achieve. He committed suicide with his long-time and newly married mistress, Eva Braun, as they sat in a small room in the Fuhrer's underground Berlin bunker on April 30, 1945. As Russian troops advanced everywhere in the city, loyal SS guards removed the bodies of Hitler and Braun and placed them in a shallow grave outside the Reich Chancellory, where they were drenched with kerosene and burned to obliterate identification. The bodies were later discovered by Russian troops and Hitler's remains were positively identified through a comparison of the remains and dental records. The world's worst mass murderer had finally come to the end desired by millions living and dead.

END OF IL DUCE/April 28, 1945

Two days before Hitler shot himself to death in Berlin, his fellow dictator, Italy's Benito Mussolini (Benito Amilcare Andrea Mussolini, 1883-1945), was assassinated, along with his mistress, Claretta Petacci, by Italian partisans. It was a fate Mussolini had avoided for more than two decades as he held Italy in his iron grip, but one he believed he would survive as miraculously as had Adolf Hitler in the July 1944 assassination attempt on the German dictator.

Benito Mussolini, Italy's fascist dictator, who joined Hitler in starting WW II and brought his country to ruin before he was assassinated in 1945.

Born on July 29, 1883 at Varano di Costa, a tiny farming community near the village of Dovia in Romagna, Mussolini was the son of a blacksmith, Alessandro Mussolini, who was an ardent socialist. He named his son after three distinguished revolutionary figures, Benito Juarez of Mexico, Amilcare Cipriani and Andrea Costa. The family was dirt poor and its heritage vague. In keeping with his self-aggrandizing traits, Mussolini, in 1928, had genealogists trace all the Mussolini families in Italy, then falsely announced that his lineage dated back to the Mussolini princes of Bologna in the 13th Century.

Mussolini's parents overindulged their listless son, sending him to private schools where he was taught by Catholic priests. (His educational background was amazingly similar to that of Adolf Hitler). He was a poor student, resisting all discipline and having no respect for his teachers. He had only one abiding interest and that was politics, becoming an activist at the age of sixteen. At that time he became obsessed with black apparel, wearing black shirts, pants, ties, thinking this attire gave him an image of individuality. The color black would remain his obsession and he later insisted that his fascist followers don black attire as a symbol of their loyalty to his political cause.

Mussolini, as a militant socialist, is shown under arrest at Rome's Piazza Barberini in 1915 for agitating against the war.

The Blackshirts of Italy would come to symbolize repression of freedoms, racial bigotries, military aggression and wholesale murder. Following his graduation from the Royal Normal School at Forlimpopolo, Mussolini became a teacher in rural schools, but his heart was not in this work. He quit this profession in 1902, going to Switzerland, where he believed he could learn more about politics and have his sharp opinions more easily printed in socialist newspapers.

Those opinions gradually changed from left to right, Mussolini abandoning the socialist beliefs of his father and embracing nationalist thought and politics. However, like his father, Mussolini maintained a deep hatred for the Catholic Church, maligning its prelates and popes in slanderous lectures. For such public tirades, Mussolini was often arrested, eleven times in 1912 alone. At one such arrest, Mussolini was thrown into a cramped, dungeon-like cell in Rome where he developed acute claustrophobia, a condition that would compel him in the future to occupy enormous offices.

Mussolini's office in Rome, which he established after he became Italy's dictator, was inside the grand Palazzo Venezia, and it was gigantic, so huge that it reminded visitors of a Mussolini's office for his newspaper, Il Popolo d'Italia, a fascist publication designed to advance his fearsome image. The flag showing a skull and crossbones was of Mussolini's own design and later adorned the flags under which his Black Shirts marched.

A barricade manned by Mussolini's followers was constructed to prevent Socialists in Milan from destroying Il Duce's office in 1922.

Mussolini (center, wearing a white ribbon across his chest) leads his fascist Black Shirts on the celebrated march on Rome in 1922.

grand hall. This enormous space undoubtedly compensated for Mussolini's ancient fears of confinement and restriction. American journalists William Bolitho and Ernest Hemingway, who interviewed the despot in the 1920s, were awed by Mussolini's office. The dictator sat at one end of the hall behind a large desk and it took visitors a great deal of time to walk across the hall. Mussolini would sit behind his desk and study these approaching visitors with piercing black eyes, his massive bald head bent downward, a scowl on his lips, causing the visitor, whether journalist or politician, to become uneasy and ready prey to Il Duce's verbal manipulations.

By 1914, Mussolini had discarded all socialist credos. He enthusiastically supported Italy's entry into World War I on the side of the Allies. This caused him to be expelled from the Socialist Party. He established his own newspaper, Il Popolo d'Italia, a right-wing publication that advocated the concepts of fascism. On his office wall was a flag of his own design, a black flag with a white skull and crossbones on it, signifying death rather than defeat. In 1915, pressured by opponents to live up to his beliefs in the war effort, Mussolini enlisted in the Italian army. He served for two years on the northern Alpine front, until he was wounded and mustered out in 1917.

Following the war, Mussolini stepped up his nationalist campaign, recruiting to his political ranks thousands of unemployed war veterans in northern Italy. In 1919, he went to Milan, industrial center of the country, and seized upon that city's depressed economy by organizing thousands of disgruntled ex-soldiers into his new fascist organization, Fasci di Combattimento. This was the beginning of the fascist state in Italy. For two years, Mussolini dedicated himself to this organization, made up mostly of ex-soldiers who had been denied their prewar jobs and had been ignored following the war they had helped to win. Many of Mussolini's new political recruits were thieves and cutthroats. He designed a simple uniform for this motley army of the unemployed, black shirts and ties, riding pants, black boots and a small fez-like cap with a jaunty tassel. The early fascist flag under which these men marched was black and bore a skull and crossbones, which now symbolized Mussolini's official motto: "Victory or Death!" Germany's dictator Adolf Hitler, who viewed Mussolini as a great idol in his climb to power, would repeatedly use this motto when sending orders to his field commanders during World War II.

As was the case with Hitler in Germany, Mussolini's rise to power was financed by right-wing industrialists, politicians and army officers, with the sole purpose of smashing the then powerful Socialists and Communists. To that end, Mussolini unleashed his army of Blackshirt thugs in savage street wars, where party offices of Socialists, Communists and Republicans were destroyed and opposition leaders were beaten. His goons even wrecked the offices of Avanti, the Socialist newspaper Mussolini had edited years earlier and had now come to epitomize all that he hated. His power spreading throughout Italy, Mussolini organized in November 1921 the Partito Nazionale Fascista, the official Fascist Party in Italy. He intensified his attacks on organized labor, branding the movement a Communist front and a threat to the government and to the country's well-being.

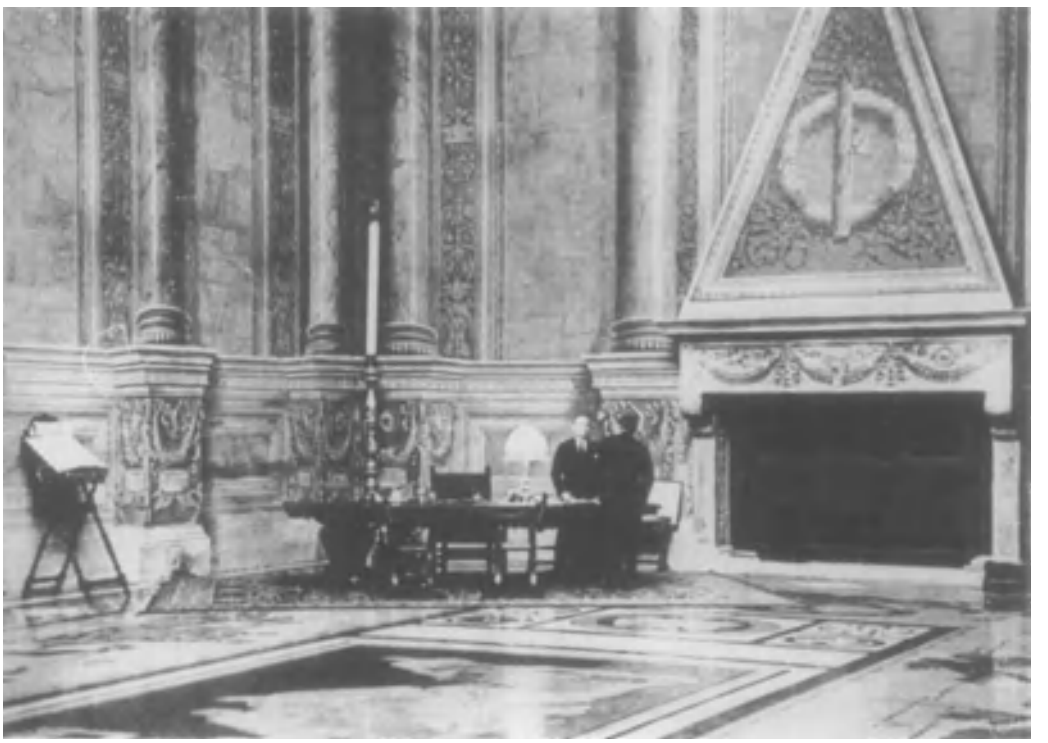
Fat with funds from industrialists, Mussolini gave himself a new name, "Il Duce" ("The Leader"). He gained the full support of the Italian army and the rich southern landowners poured more money into his swelling coffers. At this time, Mussolini vowed eternal support to his high-born financiers, but, like his former allegiance to the Socialist cause, he would renege on these pledges. His only real goal was the concentration of all national power in the hands of Benito Mussolini. He pledged his allegiance to the army, the monarchy, even to the Vatican, a church he had virulently attacked a decade earlier.

With the collusion of King Victor Emmanuel III, the army and the police, Mussolini, in 1922, led his Blackshirt legions in the celebrated March on Rome to ostensibly demand the resignation of government leaders who were mostly moderates and had no backing from the industrialists and owners of great estates. Mussolini, cautious and cowardly, refused to take one step in this "historic" march until he received written assurances from the king and the chiefs of the army that his Blackshirts would receive no forceful opposition in their trek to Rome. Receiving this written approval from the king, Mussolini then led thousands of Blackshirts in snaking columns into the city of Rome, his Blackshirts having been drilled long in advance on how to approach the city from towns surrounding Rome so that they would uniformly converge at the government offices with Benito Mussolini at the head.



Mussolini is shown facing a visitor to his enormous "office," the famous "Long Room" in the Palazzo Venezia. Il Duce would study guests as they approached from the far entrance to his desk, causing them to feel ill-at-ease and awed by the enormous space he occupied, an image suggesting his supreme authority.

Accompanying Mussolini were ardent fascist leaders that included General Emilio De Bono, Cesare Maria De Vecchi, Italo Balbo, M. Terruzi and Francesco Guinta. As an estimated 100,000 Blackshirts marched, legions of Blackshirts throughout Italy seized prefectures, police offices, radio stations, and all anti-fascist newspapers, trade unions and associations. By the time Mussolini reached Rome in his short march, he and his fascists had virtually eliminated all freedom of speech and press and crushed all political opposition. He controlled all communications and from that day forth Italy would hear only one voice, one thought, that of fascism.

This lightning seizure of power would be studied well and emulated with almost identical measures by Adolf Hitler. Hitler's Brown Shirts were patterned after Mussolini's Blackshirts. Hitler adopted a swastika instead of a skull and crossbones. He modeled his bombastic, hortatory speeches after those of Mussolini. The only difference between these two dictators was that Hitler's regime was even more repressive, tyrannical and murderous than that of Benito Mussolini. They were born allies, inhuman and unconscionable, willing to destroy their own people and nations to achieve their dark dreams of conquest.

King Victor Emmanuel III was present to warmly greet Italy's "new savior," who was appointed the new head of state and was authorized to appoint his own ministers to all important government posts. By then the cabinet of Luigi Facta had resigned and Mussolini suddenly held total power in Italy. He began by appointing fascist members to his cabinet and gradually wresting complete control of the government, illegally supported by one rigged election after another. He ordered all opposition smashed. His most important opponent, Giacomo Matteotti was abducted by fascist killers in June 1924 and brutally murdered on Il Duce's direct orders. To make sure that Matteotti was not used as a martyr by his opponents, Mussolini ordered the body secretly buried.

Mussolini dramatically solved Italy's enormous unemployment by draining the sprawling Pontine marshes and converting the Po Valley and other districts into highly productive agricultural centers. He streamlined Italy's railroads so that, within a few years, Italy became known, with

One of Mussolini's "baby factories," children scheduled to fill the ranks of his future armies.

Mussolini's well-oiled propaganda machine, as a country where "the trains always ran on time." Using a massive work force, Mussolini leveled whole towns and rebuilt them. The roads were paved and industry boomed, but always on a war footing. Factories turned out tanks, not cars, rifles and machine guns, not washing machines.

To the women of Italy, Mussolini had only one message: Bear children and more children and more children. He wanted these children for his armies in the next decade and boldly said so, encouraging women to have as many children as possible. Women who produced record numbers of male children, future soldiers, were rewarded with money and handsome jobs.

Mussolini reveled in his power and image as boss of Italy, thinking himself to be a new Caesar. From the high balcony of the Palazzo Venezia in Rome, he overlooked a huge square to which tens of thousands of fascists flocked every time he made a speech. He jutted his prominent jaw and smirked and scowled for the always-grinding cameras. Then, crossing his arms, hammering his fists on the balcony railing, the Italian flag fluttering next to him, he roared out his plans for "Italy's new age of glory," threatening to crush any country that dared to interfere with Il Duce's plans for conquest. To that end, he looked for years with covetous eyes to Albania and Ethiopia as he built up his war machine.

While making these plans, Mussolini took pains to rid himself of his most unruly followers, sending these Blackshirt legions to Spain to aid Francisco Franco, another fascist dictator, in defeating that country's Republican forces. Mussolini knew that he would lose most of these brutal thugs in Franco's life-wasting battles. Franco adopted this tactic when his World War II partners, Hitler and Mussolini, demanded that he return the aid they provided him in the late 1930s. Franco gave Hitler thirty thousand men—the Blue and Arrow Divisions—made up of his most fanatical fascists. These troops, as Franco expected, were decimated on the Russian front. Franco, like Mussolini before him, had conveniently squandered the lives of his most uncontrollable followers in a foreign war and thus prevented these maniacal minions from threatening his own regime in the future.

Before dumping his flotsam into Spain, Mussolini launched his first aggressive act abroad by invading the primitive and virtually helpless country of Ethiopia in 1935. A year earlier, Il Duce made elaborate plans to quickly conquer this impoverished African nation, building up war materials and troops along Italy's Mediterranean ports. Then, on December 5, 1934, Mussolini's agents staged a fake attack on Italian troops at Wal Wal, giving Il Duce the excuse to declare war on Ethiopia. (Hitler, always emulating his idol Mussolini, would use the same ploy in staging a fake attack on a German radio station on the Polish-German border to attack Poland and start World War II in 1939.)

Ethiopian Emperor Haile Selassie made a moving appeal to the League of Nations for intervention and aid, but this ineffective international community did neither. Marshal Emilio De Bono led tens of thousands of Italian soldiers to Ethiopia, transporting these troops through the Suez Canal. The British controlled the Canal at that time, but since Italy was paying $2.50 for each of its soldiers to pass through the Suez, the British allowed the invasion ships through the locks, thus encouraging Mussolini's plans of conquest in Africa.

Italy's King Victor Emmanuel III, who welcomed Mussolini's dictatorship in 1922.

After conquering Ethiopia (Abyssinia) in 1936, Mussolini's forces invaded Albania. As a leader of a maverick nation, Mussolini withdrew from the League of Nations in 1937 and drew even closer to his alter ego, Adolf Hitler. He toyed with Hitler for some time, playing the part of Austria's protector when Hitler, as early as 1934, attempted to seize the Austrian government through the assassination of its own fascist leader, Engelbert Dollfuss. Mussolini rushed his best Alpine troops to the Austrian border, which suddenly caused Hitler to denounce the Nazi executioners of Dollfuss, postponing his plans to take over Austria, an event that would not take place until 1938, when Mussolini then nodded his approval of the Anschluss.

In his personal life, Mussolini was a man of two faces. Posing as a loving father and husband, he kept dozens of mistresses, spending most of his nights with film actresses or nightclub entertainers. In 1932, he met 20-year-old, blue-eyed, husky-voiced Claretta Petacci, the daughter of a physician. She became his mistress and would stay with him long after he fell from power. Her torrid affair with Il Duce would not end until they died violently together, their bodies mocked and mutilated in a Milan gas station in 1945.

Italy itself was mutilated by that time. Mussolini not only robbed his country of its male youth to feed his endless invasions of small countries, but he persecuted liberals, Socialists and Jews through his secret police, an agency not unlike that of Hitler's Gestapo and SS in its practices of barbaric torture and murder. Mussolini's secret police mercilessly hunted down innocent persons who were anonymously named as "enemies of the state." Those who failed to identify those critical of Il Duce were themselves arrested and imprisoned. Mussolini turned his country into a nation of quaking informers. Like Hitler, he established many concentration camps, albeit he had no plan of mass extermination, as did the Nazi executioners Heinrich Himmler and Reinhard Heydrich. In war, however, Il Duce ordered his generals to show no mercy. Mass executions of captured prisoners became commonplace. Early in World War II, Mussolini was branded a war criminal and was scheduled to stand trial once hostilities had ended. Il Duce laughed at such condemnations. He would try his enemies, he said, but no one would ever haul him into court.

By 1939, despite internal unrest, riots and mass protests, Mussolini embarked on world conquest, signing a military alliance with Hitler's Third Reich. Japan also added its signature to this joint pact, and these three aggressor nations would form the unholy Axis alliance, bent on the destruction of world democracy. When World War II began, Italy's African legions took the full brunt of battle in North Africa, and, after two years, collapsed under Allied attacks. The invasions of Sicily and southern Italy followed. Mussolini's once unchallenged leadership was then scorned and ridiculed by his own people. By late 1944, Mussolini was completely out of favor with his countrymen. Allied troops overran southern Italy and surrounded Rome. In desperation, the Fascist Council deposed its founder and leader and King Victor Emmanuel III ordered Mussolini's arrest in an effort to appease the victorious Allies. Il Duce was placed in custody as Marshal Pietro Badoglio headed a new Italian government that immediately sued for peace.

Mussolini, a leather-lunged orator, addressing thousands of fascists gathered beneath a high balcony at the Palazzo Venezia.

Two dictators who thought to conquer the world—Benito Mussolini and Adolf Hitler, 1937.

Mussolini's long-suffering wife, Rachele, who knew of his endless affairs, but said nothing.

Claretta (Clara) Petacci, Mussolini's permanent mistress after 1932, loyal unto death.

Claretta Petacci, vacationing with Mussolini at Rimini, a snapshot taken by Il Duce.

The Nazi armies in Italy, however, seized Rome and Hitler personally directed his top commando leader, Colonel Otto Skorzeny, to free his ally, Benito Mussolini. Skorzeny located Il Duce, who was then imprisoned in a mountaintop retreat at the Gran Sasso. In a spectacular and hazardous mission, Skorzeny led his parachutists to the mountaintop retreat and freed the Italian dictator, taking him to a single-engine plane that took off from a perilously small plateau. Mussolini was taken to Rastenburg, arriving just in time to witness the wreckage of a conference building at Hitler's Wolf Lair, where the German dictator narrowly missed assassination.

Mussolini (right) is shown with SS Colonel Otto Skorzeny, who rescued him from the mountainous Gran Sasso prison in 1944.

Promising his rescuer Hitler that he would return to Italy and reestablish a strong fascist government, Mussolini did return to his native country. He set up headquarters in northern Italy, but he found few supporters. He was now an unwanted tyrant. The always faithful Claretta Petacci accompanied her longtime lover, remaining with him as he moved from one hideout after another. After Milan fell to the Allies on April 25, 1945, Mussolini was taken northward by a heavily armed German force, but this convoy was stopped and captured by an even larger force of Italian partisans. Almost all of these partisans were Communists, who hated Il Duce. The Germans had attempted to hide Mussolini and his mistress in one of their trucks, disguising the Italian dictator in the uniform of a German private. He was, however, identified, and he and his aides, along with Petacci, were taken by the partisans to the town of Walter Audisio, the Italian partisan who assassinated Mussolini and Claretta Petacci.

Dongo, on Lake Como, placed under guard in a small farmhouse.

On the morning of April 28, 1945, Walter Audisio, using the alias of Colonel Valerio, rushed into Mussolini's room, saying: "I have come to free you!" He escorted Mussolini and Petacci outside to a waiting car, but the dictator grew wary at the sight of the Communist guards pointing their weapons in his direction. "I'll give you an empire," Il Duce whispered in Audisio's ear. Audisio did not reply, but only ushered him into the back seat of the car. After the car had gone about 500 yards, Audisio ordered the driver to stop. He pointed a revolver at Il Duce and his mistress. He ordered them out of the car and then told them to stand next to a stone wall. Audisio then said rapidly: "By order of the High Command of the Volunteer Freedom Corps, I have been charged to render justice to the Italian people."

Claretta Petacci began to scream: "You can't kill us like that! You can't do that!"

Audisio shouted to her: "Move aside, or we'll kill you first!" He pulled the trigger of his revolver, but nothing happened. Audisio threw it to the ground and grabbed a French-made machine pistol from his driver, Michele Moretti. Audisio pointed the weapon at Il Duce. The jut-jawed, bald-headed dictator unbuttoned his gray-green jacket and defiantly shouted: "Shoot me in the chest!" Before Audisio could fire, Petacci, in her final act of loyalty to Mussolini, ran forward and grabbed the barrel of the gun held by Audisio, who fired a burst that tore through her heart and instantly killed her. He then fired two more bursts, nine shots in all, which ripped into Mussolini. The tyrant fell dead.

The partisans threw the bodies into the car and the next day the corpses of Mussolini, Petacci and other fascist aides were driven to a bombed-out gas station in Milan, where a host of Communist partisans had gathered. The bodies were dumped onto the sidewalk and hundreds kicked and mutilated them. Women came forward and urinated on Mussolini's upturned face, many screaming vengeance for their sons who had been killed in Il Duce's wars. The mob stomped over the bodies, performing a bizarre vengeance dance upon the corpses.

The badly abused bodies were then hoisted upward by the heels and tied upside down to the girders of the gas station. The mob cheered and pelted the bodies with rotten fruit and stones. Claretta Petacci's skirt hung about her face, exposing her private parts, which caused several of the female partisans to insist upon propriety. Petacci's skirt was tied tightly to her legs to preserve some modicum of decency. A silence then consumed the crowd, which had exhausted its hatred on the tattered remains. No one spoke for some time. Then a woman who was standing beneath the body of Claretta Petacci said to a friend: "Imagine. All that and not even a run in her stockings."

The mutilated bodies (left to right) of Achille Starace (a Mussolini supporter), Benito Mussolini and Claretta Petacci, hanging from the girders of a gas station in Milan's Piazalle Loreto, on April 29, 1945, one day after the dictator and his mistress had been shot to death by Audisio.

The horrible assassination and mutilation of Mussolini preceded the death of Adolf Hitler by only a few days. The German dictator would shortly send a bullet into his mouth and end his life as Russian troops closed in on his underground bunker in besieged Berlin. Upon hearing of Mussolini's finish, British leader Winston Churchill rushed to a house full of guests and elatedly announced: "The bloody beast is dead!" But when he heard of the details and the execution of Claretta Petacci, Churchill labeled Audisio's actions as "treacherous and cowardly."

General Dwight David Eisenhower, Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, also received the gruesome details of Mussolini's assassination and final public humiliation. Days later he was shown a picture of the bodies hanging before the crowds at the Milan gas station. Eisenhower winced and said: "God, what an ignoble end! You give people a little power and it seems like they can never be decent human beings again."

THE RETURN OF THE NATIONALISTS

Following the two world wars of the 20th Century, many subject nations sought to establish their independence, employing diplomacy, strikes and even open rebellion to gain sovereignty. Some independent factions—ardent nationalists—resorted to state murders. The largest of these long-suppressed countries was India, which had known its share of such bloodshed. India's most notorious assassins were best remembered through the countless murders committed over the centuries by the followers of Kali (Thugee or Thugs, see Secret Criminal Societies). These murders were cult killings, however, that were not motivated by political ambitions, albeit scores of Indian leaders had been murdered by political rivals throughout the country's recorded history. In the modern era, the most significant assassination in India involved a dedicated pacifist who doggedly led his country to independence by advocating passive rebellion and was himself overwhelmed by the violence he hated at the hands of fanatical Hindu nationalists.

"HAI, RAMA!"/January 30, 1948

More than any other Indian leader, Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi (1869-1948), called "Mahatma" by his devoted friends and followers, was responsible for ridding India of British rule through his doctrine of nonviolent protest. Gandhi came to be known as India's greatest political, social and religious leader, a man of simple tastes and burning idealism, one who led by heroic example. His political achievements were enormous, his teachings inspired. Born on October 12, 1869, in Porbandar, India, Gandhi came from a family of well-to-do merchants, members of the Banya, a trading class. His parents practiced Hindu and were members of the Vaishnava sect, advocates of Jainism. They hated the taking of human life and refrained from eating meat, fowl and fish.

Mohandas "Mahatma" Gandhi, India's great pacifist leader, assassinated in 1948.

Gandhi was born into an era in which the British ruled supreme. It controlled all of India's high-level government positions, its courts and military organizations. India's commerce was dominated by British businessmen who controlled the country's largest trading firms. But under the British, Gandhi's caste nevertheless flourished, controlling commerce at large. Possessing an agile mind and an excellent memory, Gandhi learned English and spoke it fluently, graduating at the top of his class in India before being sent to London in 1888, at age nineteen, to study law. (One might wonder what Gandhi, who despised violence, must have thought that year in which London was plagued by the slaughterhouse murders of Jack the Ripper, a grim symbol of violence that permeated Western culture.)

In England, Gandhi wore Bond Street tailored clothes and tried to adapt to British society. He entered a dancing school, but gave this up as he could not follow rhythm. He studied the violin, but abandoned these studies, quickly realizing he had no musical aptitude. His social life was lonely. He avoided law school dinners and fetes since he would be offered roast beef and be expected to drink wine, forbidden by his religion. Ignored by his fellow students, Gandhi spent much time in prayer and reflection. His lifelong habit of prolonged meditation was honed in England as an emotional and intellectual refuge.

Receiving his law degree in 1891, Gandhi returned to India, establishing his law practice in Bombay. He soon realized that he knew little of Hindu or Muslim law and proved to be inept as a trial lawyer in the lower courts, where such laws prevailed. His first case, defending a client's property rights, was a shambles. The introverted Gandhi could not bring himself to cross-examine witnesses. He later remembered: "I stood up, but my heart sank into my boots. My head was reeling and I felt that the whole court was doing likewise. I could think of no questions to ask!" He lost the case and returned the client's fee. He refused further trial work, confining himself to the drafting of contracts and wills. Failing to earn a living as a lawyer in Bombay, he practiced in Rajkot, where his family had resettled, but he failed again.

Looking about for new opportunities, Gandhi saw one in South Africa, where thousands of Indians had migrated in search of work. He relocated to South Africa to represent Indian clients in a dispute about trading rights. Though he was facing racial laws, he managed to win the suit. During the Boer War, in which Indian citizens were compelled to serve, Gandhi demonstrated his early nonviolent bent by organizing an Indian stretcher-bearer service. Gandhi had at an early age wholly embraced the credo of Satyagraha, the lifestyle of nonviolence and never swayed from this philosophical posture. He spent twenty years in South Africa battling for the rights of Indians.

Gandhi as a successful attorney in South Africa in the late 1890s. Through his non-violent protests and demonstrations, he gained rights for Indians in South Africa.

Gandhi boarding a train, en route back to India from London in 1931, after having failed to win a promise of independence for his country from the British government.

On several occasions, Gandhi was jailed, but he amazed his warders by his bland acceptance of incarceration. He passively resisted all compromise though he was a model prisoner. In the end, Gandhi achieved the near-impossible in South Africa. Through his legal efforts and social leadership, he managed to have the unjust taxes against coolies and Indians repealed. Thanks to his indefatigable efforts, Indian marriages in South Africa were made legal and recognized under the law. By the time he left South Africa in 1914, Gandhi had brought about government recognition of Indians and Indian status was raised to a legal peer level in that country.

These achievements had brought personal privation to Gandhi, suffering shared by his wife, Kasturbai, who joined him in South Africa in 1896 and to whom he been betrothed at the age of thirteen as was then the Indian custom. Illiterate, Gandhi taught her how to read and schooled her in many intellectual pursuits then denied most Indian women. She bore him four children. Kasturbai would remain loyal to Gandhi throughout his life. The couple briefly moved to London, where, during World War I, Gandhi again organized an Indian stretcher corps to serve British troops at the front, before illness caused him to return to India.

Gandhi and his wife established a crude commune called an ashram at Ahmadabad in Gujarat. They lived in a simple hut roofed by dried ferns taken from the surrounding jungle. Abstinence became their lifestyle, with Gandhi and his growing followers eating only vegetables and upholding a strict diet. Walking was a daily exercise practiced as religiously as meditation. Modern machinery was shunned. Homespun dhoti served as the family's only apparel.

To oust the British from India, Gandhi had earlier established his popular pacifist movement. Many of his followers were among the masses assembled at the large square, Jalianwalla Bagh, in Amritsar, on April 13, 1919. On that day, British General Reginald Dyer led his troops to the square and ordered the Indians to disperse, charging them with illegal assembly. When the crowds did not break up, Dyer ruthlessly ordered his men to open fire. More than 400 Indians were slain and hundreds more wounded.

This genocidal massacre moved Gandhi to conduct a countrywide tour of India, urging all Indians to boycott the British. He persuaded hundreds of Indian government officials to give up positions and titles bestowed upon them by the British. He urged Indian parents to keep their children out of British-sponsored schools and, most effective of all in his arsenal of nonviolent weapons, he aggressively campaigned against any Indian paying any kind of tax to the British government in India.

Followers of Gandhi were easily identified—they wore the famous "Gandhi cap," or khaddar, and were noted for their nonviolent, passive resistance to the British. Through his policies, Gandhi believed he would be able to force the British to quit India and allow the country its long-sought home rule. The result, however, was a stiffening of British resolve to hold on to India. When British rule tightened, Indians by the tens of thousands, abandoned Gandhi's policies and resorted to violence. In 1921, when the Prince of Wales visited Bombay, riots ensued in which fifty persons were killed. The next year saw widespread bloodshed, with rioters attacking police stations and burning government buildings.

Shown traveling on foot in Bengal in 1946, Gandhi attempted to quell bloody Hindu-Muslim confrontations.

In 1924, the British decided to rid themselves of the pesky Gandhi. He was arrested with many of his followers, including Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru. While in confinement, Gandhi began one of his historic fasts, threatening to starve himself to death until the British relented and granted home rule. This situation was to be repeated many times, with the British arresting and then releasing Gandhi before he brought about his own death through starvation. At the beginning of World War II, Gandhi gave limited support to the British, condemning the fascist nations waging war, but some time later he urged anti-British demonstrations that were interpreted as obstructions to the British war effort. He was once again jailed and once again undertook his fasting campaign, which resulted in his release in 1944.

At that time, Gandhi ostensibly retired from political life, being replaced by his hand-picked protege, Nehru. Yet, in the following year, India was plunged into a nationwide bloodbath when Lord Louis Mountbatten, the last British viceroy of India, thought to settle the age-old conflict between the Hindu and Muslim factions by partitioning these two opposing religious sects in 1947, sending all Muslims to Pakistan and keeping all followers of Hindu (the predominate religion in the country) within India. This decision caused a great upheaval, compelling more than four million migrating refugees to clog the roads of the country for more than a year. Widespread riots, arson and murders ensued.

Though independence came to India in 1946, the conflict between Hindus and Muslims continued to rage. Gandhi came out of retirement to quell the nationwide strife. He toured the vast stretches of Bengal on foot, preaching every step of the Gandhi conferring with his protege and successor Nehru after gaining independence for India from Great Britain in 1946.

Only hours after he was assassinated on January 30, 1948, Gandhi's body lies in state at the Birla House in Delhi; his granddaughters sit on either side of his corpse.

way his nonviolent philosophy and attempting to bring peace between Hindu and Muslim leaders. Chronicling Gandhi's movements was a 37-year-old Hindu fanatic, Nathuram Godse, the editor of a right-wing newspaper and a member of Mahasabha, a violent Hindu organization that opposed everything Muslim.

Godse blamed Gandhi more than anyone else for the religious partitioning of India and felt that this act had injured Hindus more than Muslims. He resolved to murder Gandhi, a Hindu, whom he believed had betrayed his own religion. Godse put together a group of conspirators in plotting the assassination, including his younger brother Gopal, Narayan Apte, Mandanlal Pahwa, Vishnu Karkare, Pahwa Shankar Kistayya and Digambar Badge. The group busied itself by collecting weapons and bombs while tracking Gandhi's movements.

On January 20, 1948, the group made its first attempt on Gandhi's life. Pahwa Shankar Kistayya set off a guncotton explosive that erupted in the middle of an open-air meeting Gandhi was conducting in the gardens of the Birla House in Delhi. No one was killed and only a few persons were slightly injured. The would-be assassin was seized by police while fleeing and the meeting went on. It was later claimed that Pahwa gave the names of all those involved in the conspiracy to kill Gandhi, but police officers sympathetic to Godse's plans, did nothing to prevent further attempts on Gandhi. Ten days later, on January 30, 1948, Gandhi, despite warnings that there would be a second attempt on his life that day, resolutely called for another meeting in the gardens of the Birla House.

Gandhi's assassins, Nathuram Vinayak Godse (left) and Narayan Apte, both executed.

Weak from recent fasting, Gandhi walked shakily into the gardens, supported on either side by two grandnieces. He chatted freely with those around him, smiling and seemingly at peace. Hundreds of followers gathered about him, parting to make a path for him as he walked slowly through their ranks. At that moment, Nathuram Godse strode up to him wearing a Gandhi cap, supposedly indicating that he was a supporter of Gandhi. He bowed respectfully before Gandhi, then quickly produced a gun and fired three shots, firing almost point blank, felling the great Indian leader.

Gandhi cried out: "Hai, Rama! Hai, Rama!" ("Oh, God! Oh, God!") The 78-year-old leader died a short time later.

The massive funeral for Gandhi that followed in Delhi was one of the most spectacular to ever occur in India. Hundreds of thousands attended the services as Gandhi's bier was pulled through flower-strewn streets. The corpse was then burned on a huge funeral pyre. By that time, Godse and his fellow conspirators were in prison, awaiting trial. The assassin freely admitted killing Gandhi, proclaiming to the world that he considered his actions to be that of a patriot, that he had rid India of a religious betrayer, who had brought misery and death to the Hindus. Godse submitted a 92-page statement to the court in which he assumed full responsibility for the assassination, stating that he alone bore the burden of guilt. The court decided otherwise, convicting all seven of the conspirators. Godse and Apte were sentenced to death, the rest to life imprisonment.

On November 15, 1949, after all appeals had been denied, Godse and Apte were escorted to the gallows. Both men stood on the scaffold and chanted "India United!" They were then hanged. Apte died instantly, his neck broken. Godse strangled to death, struggling for almost fifteen minutes before he succumbed. It was reported that the executioner had purposely prepared the rope incorrectly so that Godse would suffer an agonizingly slow death. Nathuram Godse believed to the last moment of his life that he would be remembered as an Indian hero and that his memory would live forever in the history of his troubled country. Just the opposite occurred. His name is never mentioned in India. The saint-like Gandhi, of course, remains as one of India's immortals.

THE ATTEMPT AT BLAIR HOUSE/ November 1, 1950

For decades, restless political groups in Puerto Rico, a U.S. territory, had striven to gain independence, but to no avail. Frustration and impatience with the U.S. government, reticent in granting independence, led many militant Puerto Ricans, members of the most radical elements in the Puerto Rican Nationalist Movement, to decide on direct action. A few believed that the assassination of President Harry Truman would dramatically demonstrate their cause. Like the Hindu nationalists who had murdered India's great leader, Mahatma Gandhi, two years earlier, some Puerto Rican nationals were convinced that Truman was the symbol, if not the cause, of their country's inability to become independent.

Oscar Collazo and Griselio Torresola made plans to kill Harry Truman (1884-1972), the thirty-third president of the U.S. on November 1, 1950. They believed they would have easier access to Truman since the always heavily guarded White House in Washington, D.C., was then undergoing redecorating and Truman was residing across the street at the Blair House, where only a few guards were posted. Blair House, separated from Pennsylvania Avenue by only a strip of grass, was a Secret Service man's nightmare. Had the would-be assassins been better prepared, and had known the positions of the few guards posted about Blair House, the outcome of their abortive attack might have been altogether different.

Oscar Collazo was born in Puerto Rico in 1914 and automatically became a U.S. citizen at age three under the Jones Act. He migrated to New York city at the age of seventeen, where he worked at a number of unskilled jobs. There he experienced first-hand the then widespread prejudices against Puerto Ricans and gradually became active in the Puerto Rican independence movement. He married Rosa Mercado and lived with her in the Bronx, along with two of her daughters from a previous marriage. Collazo became a leader of the Puerto Rican nationalists as well as a union leader in the factory where he worked as a metal polisher. He was thought to be a quiet, reasonable man, who was well-liked by his employers and fellow workers.

Less is known about Griselio Torresola, who also lived in the Bronx. One story held that Torrsola and Collazo were friends and had spent months planning to murder President Truman. Other reports insisted that the two men did not know or meet each other until a few weeks before they made the attempt on Truman's life and had simply connected through the underground network of their faction, the Independistas. They were certainly drawn together by a mutual desire for Puerto Rican independence. Both were fierce and fanatical in their beliefs and both had resolved to spend their lives, if need be, in killing Truman.

President Harry Truman playing the piano at the National Press Club in Washington, D.C., while actress Lauren Bacall listens to his rendition of "The Missouri Waltz," a photo that caused critics of the feisty Truman to say he lacked dignity.

Bess Truman, Harry Truman and actress Tallulah Bankhead (kissing the president's hand) attend a rally in New York City; Mrs. Truman was with her husband in an upstairs bedroom, dressing for a ceremony, when two assassins tried to shoot their way into Blair House on November 1, 1950.

On the morning of November 1, 1950, Collazo and Torresola made their way toward the Blair House armed with guns Torresola had obtained. The assassins apparently arrived in Washington that morning or a day or so earlier, but they had sketchy information as to Truman's whereabouts. As they neared the Blair House, they separated, each approaching the front entrance from opposite directions. White House policeman Donald Birdzell was guarding the entrance to Blair House, standing at the bottom of the stairs leading to the front door. When he heard a faint click, he turned to see a man—Collazo—aiming a Walther P-38 automatic pistol at him. The gun misfired, and when Collazo fired again, a misdirected shot, a bullet hit Birdzell in the leg as he made a grab for his own pistol.

Birdzell ran out into Pennsylvania Avenue. As Collazo dashed up the stairs, two other guards, Joe Davidson and Floyd Boring, began shooting at him from the street, as did Birdzell. Collazo ducked on the staircase and was wounded slightly. He tried to get into Blair House, his only barrier being a screen door with a small latch on it. At this moment, Torresola approached from the other direction. Hiding behind a hedge, he shot Leslie Coffelt, a guard stationed in a sentry booth just outside Blair House. Although fatally injured, Coffelt fired back, hitting Torresola in the head, killing him instantly. Coffelt, who had been shot in the chest, died in a hospital less than four hours later.

Collazo, meanwhile traded shots with Birdzell, Davidson and Boring. He was hit several times, one bullet striking his chest and sending him toppling to the stairs where he lay bleeding and unconscious. Twenty-seven shots had been fired by all parties in the three-minute gun battle. At the time of the shooting, Truman and his wife Bess were dressing to attend a ceremony that would honor British Field Marshal Sir John Dill. Hearing the shots, Bess Truman went to a window overlooking Pennsylvania Avenue and saw Birdzell lying in the street, blood streaming from his leg wound. She gasped and then said to her husband: "Harry, someone is shooting our policemen!"

Truman ran to the window, pushing his wife away. He stuck his head out the window. At that moment, he saw several Secret Service agents rushing from Blair House into the street, guns drawn. Then he saw Torresola falling dead onto the hedge. One of the Secret Service agents looked up to see Truman and shouted: "Get back! Get back!" Truman obeyed. He quickly dressed, then hurried downstairs to confer with aides. He was told that only two assassins had attempted to enter Blair House, that one was dead and the other was wounded and en route to a hospital. The president decided to attend the military ceremony at Arlington Cemetery. When an official suggested that he cancel his appointment, Truman brushed off the notion, saying: "A president has to expect these things."

Oscar Collazo, one of two Puerto Rican nationalists who tried to assassinate President Truman, is shown wounded in the head and unconscious at the foot of the stairs leading to the Blair House.

Investigators found in Torresola's clothing a letter written to him by Pedro Albizu Campos, leader of the Puerto Rican Independista Party. The missive stated that Torresola would assume the leadership of the party in the U.S., indicating that this would occur once he had accomplished his mission. The wounded Collazo talked freely to U.S. officials, admitting that he and Torresola had poorly planned their attack and were not even sure that Truman was inside Blair House when they rushed the building.

Collazo was arrested, charged with the murder of Coffelt, assault with intent to kill two guards, and the attempted assassination of President Harry Truman. Rosa Collazo was also arrested and charged with complicity, but was later released. Collazo was found guilty of Coffelt's murder in March 1951, and was sentenced to die in the electric chair on August 1, 1952. Though he declined his right to plead for clemency on July 24, 1952, Collazo's life was spared, when Truman commuted his sentence to life imprisonment.

The U.S. State Department had advised Truman that allowing Collazo's execution would seriously jeopardize U.S. relations with Latin America. Truman's announcement came just one day before Puerto Rico became a "free commonwealth." Ironically, Truman, the target of the nationalists, had for years argued in the U.S. Senate on behalf of that very legislation. In September 1979, President Jimmy Carter, for "humanitarian" reasons, granted a presidential pardon to Collazo and three other Puerto Rican nationalists, who had been convicted of an armed attack on the U.S. House of Representatives in 1954.

MURDER OF A BLACK NATIONALIST/ January 18, 1961

For six decades Belgium had controlled the ore-rich Congo, claiming the territory in 1908, exporting its vast amounts of copper, gold and ivory, while showing little concern for the region's native population. In 1960, Belgium finally agreed to grant its colony independence. The Belgium government announced its decision to begin the process of independence for the Congo early in 1959. Their five-year plan was to begin with local elections that December.

The nationalists, headed by Patrice Lumumba (1925-1961), objected to the Belgium plan, claiming that the candidates in the elections would be nothing more than puppets of the Belgium government. A boycott of the elections was called, which the Belgians answered with repression. On October 30, 1959, an outbreak in Stanleyville resulted in thirty deaths, and the following day, Belgium authorities arrested Lumumba, charging him with inciting to riot.

Congo's Patrice Lumumba, killed in 1961.

Lumumba is shown being released from prison in January 1960 in order to participate in the Belgian-Congolese conference that would establish the independence of the Congo.

A member of the Batetela tribe, Lumumba was born in the village of Onalua in the Kasai Province of Belgium Congo. His membership in the Batetela tribe assumed significance in his later political career. His two foremost rivals, Moise Tshombe and Joseph Kasavubu, both belonged to larger tribes, which provided the majority of their support, giving their movements a regional quality. Lumumba called attention to the contrasting all-Congolese nature of his own movement, while efficiently organizing his own forces.

Educated at a Protestant mission school, Lumumba took a job in Kindu-Port-Empain. He joined a small coterie of educated Africans known as évolués, developing literary ambitions. He wrote poems and essays for Congolese journals. After applying for and receiving full Belgium citizenship, Lumumba moved to Leopoldville, where he worked as a postal clerk. He then moved to Stanleyville, working as an accountant in the post office, joining the Cercle Libéral in 1955. He also launched his political career in that year, becoming the president of a Congolese trade union for government employees serving in the Orientale Province. This trade union had no affiliations with other established trade union federations in the Congo. He joined the conservative Belgium Liberal Party, an independent group that also had no affiliation with the strong union trade federations.

Lumumba's career was derailed when he was arrested for embezzlement from the post office in 1956. He was fined and sentenced to a year in prison, a charge many later claimed was false and one devised by government officials to eliminate a potential political adversary. Following his release from prison, Lumumba became a militant politician. In October 1958, he founded the Mouvement National Congolais (MNC), whose aims included total independence for the Congo.

That same year, Lumumba attended the Pan-African conference in Accra, Ghana, where he met nationalists from all over Africa and became a member of a permanent group set up by the conference. From this point onward, Lumumba's political views turned radical as he embraced militant nationalism. Although he declared himself neutral in the Cold War, the U.S. and its allies came to perceive Lumumba as little more than an agent of Soviet interests. The riots he was charged with inciting on October 30, 1959 in Stanleyville were inspired, Belgium officials also believed, by the Soviets.

Lumumba's MNC organization then decided to reverse its position and enter the elections. They won an impressive victory in Stanleyville, receiving more than ninety percent of the vote. Sensing the inevitable course of events in the Congo, the Belgium government held a Round Table Conference in Brussels in January 1960, inviting the various Congolese parties for the purpose of discussing political change. When the MNC refused to participate without Lumumba, he was released from prison and brought to Brussels. The summit resulted in national elections being scheduled for May 1960 and independence to take place on June 30.

Despite the plurality of parties entering candidates in the election, the MNC had by far the best results and Lumumba emerged as the leading nationalist politician. When attempts to block him from assuming authority failed, he was asked to form the first government. He did so on June 23, 1960. One week later the last vestiges of Belgium's old colonial rule were swept aside. The West believed that it had scored a victory with the election of Joseph Kasavubu as the nation's first president. Kasavubu, in turn, appointed Lumumba his prime minister.

Only a few days after independence was formally declared, units of the army, or Force Publique, revolted, in part, because troops objected to their Belgium commander. In the midst of this chaos, the mineral-rich province of Katanga, led by Premier Moise Tshombe, declared its independence from the Congo. Tshombe partitioned his district and determined to hold it with military force. Belgium then sent troops to Katanga on July 9, 1960, on the claim of protecting Belgian nationals. However, most of the Belgium troops arriving in Katanga were present to support Tshombe's bid for secession.

The Congo was now the world's trouble spot, and the latest theater of East-West tension. The new government appealed to the United Nations to help force the Belgium troops out of the Congo and restore order. The United Nations complied, but the UN forces arriving in the Congo on July 14, 1960, were disinclined to follow the orders of Lumumba, Kasavubu and others. Lumumba had put his own army into the field and these troops were unreliable and difficult to control, even by Lumumba, who lacked organizational experience. His aides had had little time to solidify political affiliations. Despite Lumumba's efforts, the Belgium troops remained in Katanga and Tshombe moved the province closer to independence.

Congo's strongman, Colonel Joseph Mobutu, shown in September 1960, announcing that the army would take control of the Congo, while he ordered all Soviet "aides" to leave his country. He holds a Russian pamphlet with a photo of Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev.

Joseph Okito (left, sitting), president of the Congolese senate, and Lumumba, shown under arrest, killed hours later.

Six months after the assassination of Patrice Lumumba, Joseph Kasavubu, president of the Congo (left), and Colonel Mobutu, ride in a parade commemorating the Congo's independence.

When failing to get cooperation from UN forces, Lumumba asked the Soviet Union for assistance in moving his troops to Katanga. He also requested that representatives of all of the independent African states meet in Leopoldville in August 1960, where they were expected to support his move to suppress Katangan independence. His actions were quickly interpreted to be threatening to Western interests. In an effort to pacify the alarmists in the West, Kasavubu dismissed Lumumba on September 5, installing in his place Joseph Ileo.

Lumumba refused to accept the legality of Kasavubu's dismissal and continued to insist that he was the legitimate head of the legal government of the Congo. Although Lumumba won the support of the newly elected parliament and was granted full military powers, Congolese army leader, Colonel Joseph Mobutu, staged a coup and seized power on September 14, 1960. Mobutu then worked out an agreement with President Kasavubu. When, in October, the UN General Assembly recognized Kasavubu's government, the independent African nations split sharply over its decision.

Lumumba, meanwhile, campaigned to have his own authority recognized and Kasavubu overthrown. Belgium insisted that Lumumba be silenced after all attempts at reconciliation between Kasavubu and Lumumba failed. The Armee Nationale Congolese, which had remained loyal to Lumumba, cordoned off his house and demanded that UN peacekeeping troops leave the country. The UN Security Council then believed that the Soviets were attempting to drive a military wedge into the Congo, a conviction shared by U.S. authorities. On August 18, 1960, U.S. President Dwight David Eisenhower indicated that something should be done about Lumumba. Allen Dulles, director of the CIA (U.S. Central Intelligence Agency), interpreted Eisenhower's remarks as an order to assassinate Lumumba, even though the prime minister had recently visited the U.S., where he had been promised economic aid by the U.S. State Department.

CIA operatives in Africa allegedly began planning the murder of Patrice Lumumba. At first they thought to kill him with a lethal injection of a deadly virus common to the Congo, but Lumumba evaded CIA assassins by slipping out of his home in Leopoldville and going to Stanleyville. He was arrested by troops under the command of Colonel Mobutu and returned under arrest to Leopoldville. Other CIA assassins arrived in Leopoldville with an elaborate plan to murder Lumumba, who was then under house arrest, but their wild-eyed schemes came to a costly nothing.

On December 2, 1960, Lumumba once again escaped from confinement, heading for Stanleyville, where his supporters still held control. On January 17, 1961, Kasavubu's forces, who had earlier captured the fleeing Lumumba, turned him over to the regime in Katanga. As assassination squad organized by the Katanga minister of the interior, Godefroit Munongo, shot and killed Lumumba the next day. News of the assassination pleased the Belgians.

The Katangan government then spread the word that Lumumba had been taken prisoner by unruly tribesmen who butchered him without authority in order to claim "some reward money." This tale was told to appease the Soviets, who nonetheless held the U.S., Belgium and President Kasavubu accountable for the assassination. Lumumba's death caused a worldwide scandal and even his enemies later came to proclaim him a national hero. Patrice Lumumba nevertheless died at the hands of those who were consumed by the very fierce nationalism that also burned within the heart of their victim.

DEATH OF A DICTATOR/May 30, 1961

There was nothing decent or honorable in the crude and ruthless character of Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina (1891-1961). He was a conniving, murderous thug who ruled the Dominican Republic (which occupied the eastern half of Hispaniola, an island in the West Indies) for thirty years and whose oppressive conduct finally compelled his own followers to embrace nationalism and end Trujillo's corrupt life. One of eleven children sired by a postal clerk, Trujillo rose to power through the military, one of the few opportunities available to him. He enlisted in the country's ragtag army in 1918 and survived in part by serving as a "gofer" for American troops during the U.S. occupation of the Dominican Republic of 1916-1924.

Like Fulgencio Batista in Cuba, Trujillo rose through the ranks to become head of the army and through military support seized power. In 1930, Trujillo ousted President Horacio Vasquez and declared himself president. He served officially in that capacity from 1930 to 1938, and again from 1942 to 1952, remaining the power behind the presidency when he was out of office.

Trujillo shored up his shaky dictatorship with nepotism and political murder, often employing torture and mass detention to strengthen his rule over the island nation. He achieved peace for his people, but deprived them of their civil liberties. After a hurricane destroyed seventy percent of Santo Domingo, the capital city of more than 800,000 people, Trujillo rebuilt the town by imposing rigid economic measures. Business prospered under his guidance and the Dominican Republic achieved as high a standard of living as the rest of Latin America, with, however, a disproportionate amount of the wealth going to Trujillo and his family.

The dictator levied crushing taxes on his people to pay off enormous foreign debts. He bragged about the fine roads he had ordered paved throughout the country, but said nothing of the many military checkpoints that dotted the roadways, posts established to stop any suspicious dissidents. In 1937, to demonstrate his power, Trujillo ordered more than 15,000

Rafael Leonidas Trujillo Molina, dictator of the Dominican Republic. His repressive measures, kidnapings and wholesale murders marked him for assassination in 1961.

Rafael Trujillo, Jr., the playboy son of the dictator, shown with film actress Kim Novak. He gave Novak a new Mercedes-Benz as a gift, as well as one to actress Zsa Zsa Gabor.

Haitian men, women and children, who had taken up residence along the border, killed in a thirty-six-hour period. This genocidal slaughter was committed to preserve the sanctity of the Dominican Republic, said Trujillo, which, he claimed, was threatened by impoverished Haiti. Haiti occupied the Western half of the island and later had its own ruthless dictator, Francois "Papa Doc" Duvalier, a voodoo witch doctor, who took power in 1957 and enforced his mad edicts through his secret police, the Ton Ton Macoutes (See Secret Criminal Societies).

Dr. Jesus Galindez, a Trujillo opponent, who was abducted from New York and murdered on Trujillo's orders.

As was the case with many dictators, Trujillo's downfall was rooted in his own efforts to suppress dissent. On February 27, 1956 (Dominican Independence Day), a Spanish scholar, Jesus Galindez, presented his doctoral dissertation on "The Trujillo Era" at the Columbia University in New York City. Galindez had lived in the Dominican Republic and was passionately opposed to the dictator's rule. His study was surprisingly balanced, giving Trujillo credit for his accomplishments as well as criticizing his widespread abuse of civil rights. Trujillo's highly efficient secret service, which had carried out kidnapings in New York and Havana in his name, informed Trujillo of Galindez's presentation. Two weeks later, on March 12, 1956, Galindez was kidnaped and flown to the Dominican Republic, where he was murdered on Trujillo's direct orders. Gerald Murphy, the American pilot of the plane that had taken Galindez to Santo Domingo, bragged about the kidnaping to other Americans in Miami. Murphy was killed on December 3, 1956, and his Dominican co-pilot, Octavio de la Maza, was arrested for his murder.

General Juan Tomas Diaz, a long-time Trujillo supporter, joined the conspiracy to assassinate the dictator.

The car in which Trujillo was riding was sprayed with machine gun fire by his assassins on May 30, 1961; more than fifty bullet holes were counted.

It was then common practice for Trujillistas to confess to crimes they had not committed, if the government requested that they do so. Those who cooperated and confessed were rewarded for their loyalty. De la Maza, however, did not comply. He refused to confess to Murphy's murder and offered evidence of his innocence. Kept in a Dominican prison, De la Maza hanged himself in his cell on January 7, 1957, his death ruled a suicide. Many in Trujillo's administration believed that the uncooperative pilot had been murdered on orders of the dictator, who had become savage in dealing with his real and imagined enemies.

By December 1958, Trujillo's excesses became such an embarrassment to his supporters in the U.S. government that the CIA began offering foreign aid to dissident Dominicans, who wanted to assassinate the dictator. Six months after the communist takeover of Cuba, an invasion of Dominican emigres left Havana for Ciudad Trujillo, but the coup attempt failed. Trujillo was swift in meting out retribution. Hundreds of suspected dissidents were arrested and tortured by the dictator's secret police. General Juan Tomas Diaz, a lifelong supporter of Trujillo, was appalled by the way the dictator and his playboy son, Rafael Leonidas "Ramfis" Trujillo, ordered him to ruthlessly treat the emigre prisoners of war. Diaz secretly became a dedicated opponent of the Trujillo regime.

In June 1959, only weeks after the failed invasion from Cuba, Trujillo was publicly ostracized by other Latin American leaders for attempting to have his agents assassinate Venezuelan president Romulo Betancourt. It was one of many foolish actions taken by the dictator in his declining years. He wasted millions of dollars on useless projects and lavished $50 million to secure arms for his beefed-up military forces. He even attacked the Catholic Church—its prelates had become increasingly critical of his bloody regime—which caused widespread unrest in this predominately Catholic country.

Trujillo's conduct had become vicious. He gained a bad reputation for cuffing puppet president Joachim Balaguer when enraged by events and spitting on subordinates and kicking palace aides in the groin. In the aftermath of the attempt on Betancourt's life, the Organization of American States voted to sever ties with the Dominican Republic and to impose economic sanctions. Trujillo then turned on his most devoted followers, his secret police implicating the relatives of General Diaz in a plot to oust him. Diaz, in turn, joined with Antonio de la Maza, the brother of the co-pilot murdered in the Murphy case, to develop a plot to kill the dictator.

On May 30, 1961, Trujillo was traveling by car along a country road to meet with one of his many mistresses when another car with at least ten men in it pulled alongside. The occupants in the other car opened fire and wounded Trujillo. The dictator's chauffeur wanted to drive off, but the enraged Trujillo ordered him to stop so that they could fight it out with the attackers. Though wounded, the 69-year-old Trujillo leaped from the car with his pistol in hand. He fired rapidly at the assassins and was wounded again. He continued to fire Retribution: The bodies of General Diaz (foreground) and Antonio de la Maza, who had led the conspirators in Trujillo's assassination, are shown in the morgue. These deaths were ordered by Trujillo's son, who seized power and was later deposed.

back, although he was bleeding severely from his wounds. The chauffeur later stated: "I heard machine gun fire behind us. I swerved our car to get away. The generalissimo jumped out, firing his revolver. Blood spurted from his back..."

Trujillo died as his chauffeur fired a machine gun at the other car, then retreated into a woods, leaving the fallen dictator behind. Trujillo's body was thrown into the trunk of a car that was later found abandoned along a deserted road. Those plotting the dictator's death had not planned to assassinate him on this day. They simply took the opportunity to murder Trujillo when it presented itself.

Diaz took temporary control of the country, but he was replaced by the dictator's son, Rafael, who arrested Diaz and his family members, charging them with his father's assassination. Diaz's wife was tortured and then Diaz and his son were executed. Pedro Cedeno and Amado Garcia were also arrested and executed. Within months, however, the young Trujillo, who had spent his father's millions in pursuing Hollywood starlets, was himself deposed by Balaguer and a coalition government. Elections were held in 1962, but a military coup led to civil war. In 1965, the U.S. intervened to help establish an elected government in the country.

THE RACIST ASSASSINS

Throughout American history, racist killers randomly selected thousands of victims, murdering them at will. In the last half of the 20th Century, three assassinations and one attempt struck down four very different leaders in the United States. These four crimes, committed in a ten-year period (1963-1972), were nevertheless tied to race hatred. The 1963 assassination of Mississippi civil rights leader Medgar Evers resulted in three trials that extended over thirty-one years before a mixed jury finally brought racist murderer Byron de la Beckwith to justice. In 1965, a black nationalist leader, Malcolm Little (Malcolm X), was killed by members of his own race. Three years later, in 1968, Martin Luther King, the great civil rights leader, was slain by James Earl Ray for reasons that remain enigmatic to this day. In 1972, white racist and Alabama governor George Wallace was shot and crippled for life by a would-be assassin who championed nothing more than his own limelight, an attack unwittingly invited by the victim himself when he ran as a racist candidate for the American presidency.

A MURDER IN MISSISSIPPI/ June 12-13, 1963

Medgar Evers (1926-1963), from the beginning of his civil rights crusade in Mississippi, anticipated his own assassination, viewing such a premature death as worthwhile. He had once said that he was not afraid to die to advance the cause of civil rights in the South. "It might do some good," he said. "If I die, it will be in a good cause. I've been fighting for America just as much as the soldiers in Vietnam."

Evers was born and raised in rural poverty to become the only full-time NAACP field representative in Mississippi. Educated at Acorn A&M, Evers saw action in World War II, then returned to his home state to take part in the fledgling civil rights movement. Shortly before his death, Evers coordinated a massive civil rights rally in Jackson, Mississippi, one that drew some of the biggest names in black show business. A few weeks later someone threw a molotov cocktail that exploded in the driveway of his home in Jackson.

Around midnight on June 12-13, 1963, Evers pulled his car into the driveway of his home with a load of T-shirts stamped "Jim Crow Must Go." The shirts were to be handed out the next day to a group of civil rights workers. Lurking nearby in some bushes was an assassin holding a Springfield rifle with a telescopic sight attached. As Evers got out of his car, the killer, at a distance of about 100 yards, fired a shot that struck Evers in the back, toppling him to the driveway. He was found dying in a pool of blood by his wife. Investigators found the Springfield rifle in a honeysuckle patch nearby, apparently discarded in haste by the murderer.

The shooting galvanized public opinion against segregationists. Even Governor Ross Barnett, a long-time opponent of integration, conceded that the killing was "a dastardly act." A $21,000 reward was offered for the apprehension of the killer. The FBI investigated the slaying and it was soon provided with evidence that identified the murderer. A latent fingerprint was found on the sight of the .30-caliber rifle by Captain Ralph Hargrove of the Identification Bureau of the Jackson Police Department. The fingerprint was matched to a 42-year-old member of the Ku Klux Klan (KKK), an ex-Marine and a white supremacist, who had been distributing anti-segregation pamphlets in Jackson at the time of the Evers murder. He was Byron de la Beckwith, known to his friends in the Klan as "DE-lay" Beckwith.

A trail of blood left by fatally-shot Medgar Evers as he attempted to crawl toward his home in Jackson, Mississippi, on the night of June 12-13, 1963.

Beckwith was arrested on June 22, 1963 and charged with the murder of Evers. He went on trial for the first time on July 8, 1963. Members of the White Citizen's Legal Fund offered to pay Beckwith's expenses, stating that his legal fight presented the "awesome spectacle of one man standing alone against the preponderant power, authority, wealth and ingenuity of the federal government." Beckwith, however, felt confident that he would be successful at his trial by an all-white male jury in Jackson.

On February 7, 1964, Judge Leon Hendrick declared a mistrial after the jury reported that it was unable to return a verdict. After eleven hours of deliberation and twenty ballots, the vote stood seven to five in favor of acquittal. The five votes for conviction came as a surprise to many court observers. Apparently, these jurors were not swayed by the testimony of two police officers, who claimed to have seen Beckwith at his home in Greenwood, ninety-five miles from Jackson, at the time of the murder.

Myrtle Evers, wife of the slain civil rights leader, gives her husband a farewell kiss as he lies in his casket.

Racist killer Byron de la Beckwith (at left in handcuffs) is shown at the time of his June 22, 1963 arrest for the murder of Medgar Evers. He would evade justice for three decades before going to prison for life.

Beckwith went on trial again, but another mistrial was declared by Judge Hendrick on April 17, 1964. Governor Barnett and leaders of the white supremacist movement (KKK) appeared in court to shake Beckwith's hand and wish him good luck. "Such actions were sufficient to warrant a mistrial," added Judge Hendrick. Under Mississippi law, however, a defendant could be tried again for the same crime. In this case, Beckwith was released under a $10,000 bail. He returned to his old job of selling fertilizer to the Delta farmers, and continued his efforts on behalf of segregation, confident that he would never be convicted in the Evers case.

In 1973, Beckwith was again arrested after he was caught planting a bomb near the home of Adolph Botnick, regional director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New Orleans. On January 19, 1973, the smiling Klansman was unanimously acquitted by a racially mixed jury. The Evers killing, however, continued to haunt Beckwith. Through the persistent efforts of the Evers family, NAACP and other organizations, Beckwith was again brought to trial in 1994 and this time a jury of eight blacks and four whites convicted him and sent him to prison.

Beckwith's attorneys appealed to the Mississippi Supreme Court, but, on December 22, 1997, the high court upheld the 1994 conviction. Beckwith was sent to prison for life. Myrtle Evers-Williams, the widow of the slain civil rights leader, stated that the court's decision had made her "deliriously relieved. It's like taking a deep breath and letting the air out of your lungs very slowly and saying: 'it's over' and really meaning it." Extended over thirty-one years, the Evers case drew enormous publicity and formed the basis for the memorable 1996 film, Ghosts of Mississippi.

THE KILLING OF MALCOLM X/ February 21, 1965

Malcolm Little (1925-1965), known as Malcolm X in the Black Muslim movement in the U.S., held just the opposite views of the heroic Medgar Evers. Little advocated racial intolerance and crusaded for black segregation, urging a mass migration from America by all members of the Negro race. He was staunchly supported by a militant coterie, until he altered his outlook and began to adopt a course of moderation, a path that led to his murder.

Born to a West Indian woman and a Jamaican-born Baptist preacher in Omaha, Nebraska, Little, following his father's death, was sent to a private school in Mason, Michigan, where he proved to be an above-average student. When leaving this school, Little went to Boston, where he lived by his wits, running numbers for gamblers, street hustling and pimping. During this time, he developed a serious cocaine habit, which he supported through armed robbery. He was arrested for just such an offense and was sent to the state prison at Charleston, Massachusetts. While in prison, Little met some Black Muslim advocates and began his transformation under their tutorship.

Little embraced the Black Muslim movement, which promoted the idea of black isolationism and the creation of a separate Negro state. He communicated with the leader of the movement, Elijah Muhammad and, following his release from prison in 1952, Little visited with Muhammad in the Chicago headquarters of the Black Muslims. He impressed the Islamic leader as an effective public speaker and propagandist. Muhammad appointed him to head up Mosque Number 7 in New York City. Little changed his name to Malcolm X, and began to preach black ethnic pride, separatism and segregation of the races—views consistent with Black Muslim teachings. Within a few years, Little was the leading national minister of the movement.

Black segregationist Malcolm Little, who called himself Malcolm X, assassinated in 1965.

Spiritual leader of the Black Muslims, Elijah Muhammad, who selected Malcolm Little to head his operations in New York City.

Internal conflicts within the Muslims resulted in Little's suspension on November 23, 1963, the day after President John F. Kennedy was assassinated. Elijah Muhammad was not pleased with an offhanded remark that Little made, to the effect that Kennedy's assassination was a case of "chickens coming home to roost." Little quit the Muslims on March 8, 1964, to form a separate congregation as Muslim Mosque, Inc. His views became more moderate and he began to preach racial tolerance and peaceful coexistence between the races. In this year, he founded the Organization of Afro-American Unity, which adopted the liberal views of the Organization of African Unity, a Pan-African movement that supported various African independent political movements.

Little's moderate views antagonized many hard-liners within the Black Muslim movement and he was frequently the victim of harassment from these dissident followers. On February 14, 1965, his home in Queens, New York, was firebombed. A week later, Little was to speak at the Audubon Ballroom in New York to give his views about a new racial order—one based on peace and healing. The night before his fateful appearance, Little confided to a friend that he believed the bombing of his house was not the work of Muslim fanatics, but a force much more sinister, a group he did not identify.

The next day, February 21, 1965, Little entered the packed auditorium and delivered a customary greeting to his followers: "As-salaam alaikum," meaning "peace be unto you." A few seconds later, a unidentified person in the crowd hurled a smoke bomb onto the stage. There was shuffling and confusion among spectators, who rose from their chairs. Fighting among spectators ensued, but Little's bodyguards seemed unable or unwilling to suppress the outbursts. Then a young black man approached the stage with a sawed-off shotgun. He fired a round of buckshot through the podium, striking Little in the chest. Two other gunmen emerged from the shouting throng and fired at the wounded leader as he lay on the stage floor, bleeding from mortal wounds.

The assassins fled from the building, but they were not energetically pursued by the bodyguards, prompting later speculation that Little was a victim of a larger conspiracy. Only one bodyguard took action, shooting at the fleeing gunmen and wounding one of them, Talmadge Hayer. Malcolm Little (Malcolm X) was pronounced dead a short time later. Three men were eventually arrested and charged with his assassination, the 22-year-old Hayer, 27-year-old Norman "3X" Butler and 30-year-old Thomas "15X" Johnson.

Although Butler and Johnson were admittedly members of the Black Muslims, there was some doubt expressed about their being present at the rally. The prosecution nevertheless identified Johnson as the person who fired the first shots. In Malcolm Little/Malcolm X, shown leaving his home in Queens, New York, after it had been firebombed on February 14, 1965.

The wounded Talmadge Hayer, one of the assassins, is shown being taken to an ambulance only minutes after the killing of Malcolm X on February 21, 1965.

February 1966, Hayer admitted on the witness stand that he had participated in the killing, but insisted that his co-defendants were innocent. Prosecutors contended that Little's murder was to serve as an "object lesson" to other Muslims who betrayed the faith. Hayer, Butler and Johnson were all convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced to life imprisonment on April 14, 1966, by New York Supreme Court Justice Charles Marks.

THE MURDER OF MARTIN LUTHER KING/ April 4, 1968

Where Malcolm Little/Malcolm X spent most of his public life preaching race hatred, Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929-1968), preached unity, love and peace. King's powerful doctrines were eventually embraced by Little, who looked upon King, as did many millions of hopeful blacks, as his mentor. He was recognized as the most influential civil rights leader in America, an eloquent and forceful speaker, whose dynamic and charismatic character drew many millions of blacks and whites to his cause. King, however, like Medgar Evers and Malcolm Little before him, met with assassination at the hands of an enigmatic racist.

King was the son of a respected Georgia Baptist minister. Steeped in the religious teachings of his father and maternal grandfather, who also preached the Baptist gospel, King went on to become the leader of the American civil rights movement. On December 1, 1955, while King was completing his doctoral dissertation at Boston University, a woman named Rosa Parks in Montgomery, Alabama, courageously defied the segregation laws of the city by refusing to surrender her seat on a crowded bus to a white passenger.

Parks' actions prompted King to spearhead a boycott of the Montgomery transit system, resulting in the desegregation of the city buses. King's methods then and thereafter followed the passive, nonviolent resistance practiced by his role model, Mohandas Gandhi, whose philosophy and lifestyle influenced King at an early age. King's triumph in Montgomery was a pivotal event in U.S. race relations, one that set the tone for all that was to follow. Encouraged by his success in Montgomery, King organized the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), a national platform from which he was able to focus attention on the plight of blacks in all sectors of American society.

By 1958, King had emerged as a national figure and the prime mover of social change in America. The volatile issue of black civil rights earned King a host of enemies, both north and south of the Mason-Dixon line. Experience had taught him not to fear death. Months before he was assassinated at the Lorraine Motel in Memphis, Tennessee in April 1968, King was quoted as saying: "Maybe I've got the advantage over most people. I have conquered the fear of death." There had been dozens of threats made against him over the years. In September 1958, while autographing copies of his recently published book, The Stride Toward Freedom, Izola Ware, a 42-year-old deranged black woman, pulled out a razor-sharp letter opener and plunged it through the left side of his chest. Fortunately, the blade narrowly missed King's heart. The 29-year-old King survived the attack and resumed his life's work.

America's greatest civil rights leader, Martin Luther King, assassinated in 1968.

Early warning: King removes a four-foot wooden cross (the calling card of the racist Ku Klux Klan) that had been burned on the front lawn of his Atlanta, Georgia, home. His youngest son Dexter stands next to his father.

In 1960, King moved back to Atlanta, where he participated in a protest against a local department store that prohibited blacks from eating at a lunch counter. King was arrested and sent to the Reidsville State Prison Farm for violating probation of a minor traffic conviction of several months earlier. The trumped-up charge was clearly an attempt by local officials to discredit and embarrass him. Through the intercession of Democratic presidential candidate John F. Kennedy, King was released from the prison camp.

Following the passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, a landmark piece of legislation that outlawed discrimination in employment practices of publicly owned facilities, King was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. In Washington, FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, a strident foe of King, bitterly denounced the decision of the Nobel Prize committee. Hoover, who had often criticized King as "the most notorious liar in the country," had authorized illegal wiretap surveillance on his home. One report held that at Hoover's specific orders, FBI agents sent a series of anonymous letters to Coretta Scott King, advising her of her husband's alleged marital indiscretions.

Shortly before the awarding of the prestigious Nobel Peace Prize, Hoover reportedly had one of his agents send a more ominous-sounding letter: "King—there is only one thing left to do. You know what it is. You have just thirty-four days in which to do it. It has definitive practical significance. You are done. This is but one way out..." Hoover's obsessive hatred for King intensified as the 1960s wore on. The FBI chief's continued criticisms of King caused his critics to focus upon the Bureau's own racial policies. To stem the rising tide of indignation against his federal agency for its deliberate exclusion of blacks, Hoover appointed his private chauffeur to serve as a "field agent." Although the chauffeur's duties remained the same, he was held up as a shining example of the bureau's outstanding commitment to "affirmative action."

An aerial view shows the March on Washington organized by King in 1963, with tens of thousands of demonstrators gathered about the Lincoln Memorial monument.

King is shown with U.S. Attorney General Robert Kennedy at the White House on June 22, 1963. Five months later, President John F. Kennedy, who had gotten King released from prison in 1960, would be assassinated in Dallas, Texas.

King embraces his wife, Coretta Scott King, after hearing that he had been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for 1964. This recognition elevated King's status to rank him as the world's most celebrated civil rights leader in the world.

In the early months of 1968, amidst the profound upheaval brought on in the U.S. by the unpopular Vietnam War, King formulated plans for a massive Poor People's March on Washington, a march that was to be made by people from all strata of American society. Plans for the March were interrupted by another significant news event taking place in Memphis, Tennessee. In February 1968, 1,300 employees of that city's sanitation department walked off the job to protest working conditions. The strike was marked by several bloody clashes between employees and undercover law enforcement personnel that left one person dead and 238 others injured. King and his entourage arrived in Memphis in early April to help restore order to the stricken city and perhaps effect a compromise between the warring factions.

J. Edgar Hoover hampered King's efforts from the beginning. He planted a news story in a local paper castigating the black leader for registering in a white-owned hotel. As a result, King decided to shift his base of operations to rooms 306 and 307 of the Lorraine Motel on Mulberry Street. His every movement was assiduously recorded by a team of FBI men sent to Memphis on the specific orders of Hoover, according to the reports submitted by the Black Caucus to the U.S. House Select Committee on Assassination in 1977, clearly implying that such round-the-clock surveillance of King's movements would have certainly recorded the actual assassination at the moment its perpetrator fired the fatal shot into King and that the perpetrator could have been easily and instantly identified.

On April 3, King delivered a speech before 2,000 enthusiastic supporters at the Mason Street Temple. "We've got some difficult days ahead, but it really doesn't matter with me now," he said. He then obliquely prophesied his own assassination: "Because I have been to the mountaintop. I won't mind. Like anybody, I would like to live a long life ... But I'm not concerned about that now." What prompted these remarks is not known, but it was later claimed that King had received recent death threats which he came to accept as real. King returned to his motel room where he spent the next twenty-four hours closeted with his advisers.

At about 6 p.m., April 4, 1968, King stepped out onto a balcony overlooking a parking lot. He conversed briefly with his chauffeur, before preparing to go to a dinner engagement with a local preacher. At that moment a shot rang out from across the courtyard. The bullet, fired from a 30.06 rifle, struck King in the right side of his jaw. He lurched backwards and collapsed. Stunned associates attempted to administer first aid, but the bullet had severed his spinal cord. Martin Luther King died at St. Joseph's Hospital at 7:05 p.m. Five days later, tens of thousands of enraged blacks rioted in many major cities, particularly devastating huge areas in Chicago, Baltimore, Cincinnati and Washington, D.C., where scores were killed and hundreds injured, until National Guard troops quelled the rioters and looters. Dozens of these rioters later served long prison terms.

By then, the Memphis police had stumbled across the first tangible clue in the King assassination. A zippered satchel, a bedspread and a cardboard sleeve containing a 30.06-caliber Remington rifle equipped with a telescopic sight was found in front of Guy Canipe's Amusement Company. Canipe and two of his customers, Bernell Finley and Julius Graham reported seeing a neatly dressed white man deposit these items before driving away in a white Mustang. In a cheap rooming house adjacent to the amusement company and one that shared a parking area of the Lorraine Motel, residents gave police descriptions of the individual who had registered in Room 5B earlier that morning. The man renting the room had called himself "John Willard" and had locked himself in the bathroom of his room much of the afternoon.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover (in a dramatic photo showing his reflection to suggest two separate personalities), who denounced King as "a liar" and undeserving of the Nobel Peace Prize. The Bureau chief went further, illegally wiretapping King's phones, having him trailed by FBI agents and reportedly sending his wife messages that alleged King's affairs with other women and sending King a note urging the civil rights leader to commit suicide.

Willie Anschutz and Charles Stephens told police that Willard had raced down the stairs of the boarding house seconds after the fatal shot had been fired. The assassin, police concluded, had apparently taken aim at King while crouching in the bathtub and firing from the bathroom window of his room, which allowed a clear view of the balcony on which King had been standing. How he knew which room King occupied in the Lorraine Motel and when he would emerge onto the balcony remained a mystery.

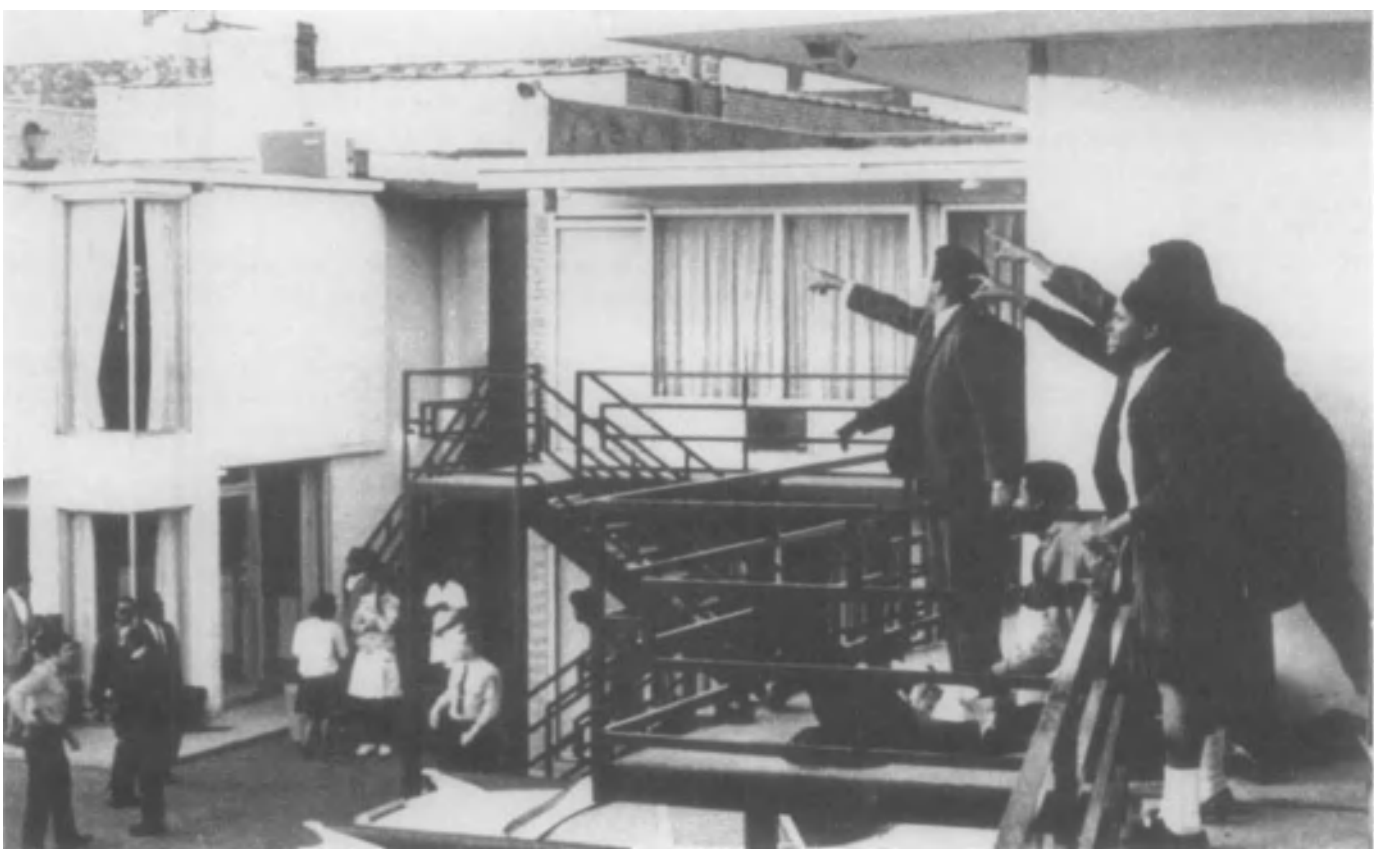
Lieutenant Rufus Bradshaw of the Memphis Police Department was assigned to investigate the assassination. While he and his men searched for the white Mustang, other detectives began examining the belongings hurriedly left by the killer. Found were a pair of pliers sold by the Romage Hardware store of Los Angeles. Laundry marks from a nearby cleaner enabled the police to identify the suspect as Eric Starvo Galt, whose residence was listed as the St. Francis Hotel in Los Angeles. Police learned that Galt had been attending a bartender's school and was taking dancing lessons. A photograph provided by the bartending school established that Galt was really James Earl Ray, a 40-year-old convict who had escaped from the Missouri State Penitentiary on April 23, 1967.

Ray was a three-time loser whose profile did not fit the mold of a politically inspired urban assassin. He was one of eight children born to James Gerald Ray and Lucille Maher. He was a troubled loner, who had dropped out of high school while in the tenth grade. In 1946, Ray joined the U.S. Army, serving most of his time in Germany as an infantryman and military policeman, but he proved to be a poor soldier. At one point, he was court-martialed for drunkenness and resisting arrest, serving three months at hard labor. He was discharged in 1948 for "ineptness and lack of adaptability to military service."

Following his release from the army, Ray began holding up gas stations and small stores. He was equally inept at crime. During a 1952 holdup, he dropped his wallet containing all of his identification papers. Police found the wallet and quickly

King and his wife (center) are shown with other civil rights leaders in a celebrated march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama in March 1965, a protest against state's segregation policies.

The last family photograph taken of the King family, a year before King was assassinated, shows (left to right) Dexter, Yolanda, King, Bernice, Coretta Scott King and Martin Luther King III.



Memphis, Tennessee, April 4, 1968: Martin Luther King lies dying (center, bottom at the railing) from a fatal gunshot, while his followers scream for help and point to the area where they thought the sniper was perched.

A simulated telescopic gunsight shows the assassin's view of the back of the Lorraine Motel in Memphis, Tennessee, and the balcony on which Martin Luther King stood when he was shot. A wreath is shown on the door of Room 306, which had been occupied by King.

tracked Ray down and arrested him. In 1959, Ray fell out of his stolen getaway car following another bungled robbery. Again, police picked him up and he was subsequently sent to the Missouri State Penitentiary at Jefferson City to serve a 20-year sentence for car theft and armed robbery. His escape warranted only a $50 reward for his capture.

After Ray's identification as King's killer, interviewers met with his father, James Gerald Ray, who insisted that his son lacked the capacity to execute a coldly calculated assassination. "He couldn't have planned it alone," said Ray's father. "He wasn't smart enough for that." Yet some of Ray's cell mates at the Missouri State Penitentiary told authorities that Ray had often stated he would kill King "if the price was right."

Police learned that three days after King was shot, Ray crossed the Canadian border and drove straight to Toronto, where he remained in hiding for a month, using several aliases. On May 6, 1968, he flew to London, England. While staying there, Ray reportedly had the notion of going to Rhodesia, after learning that that country had no extradition treaty with the U.S. Six days later he flew to Lisbon, where he was to reportedly contact co-conspirators or receive a final payment for killing King. He spent five days in the opulent Hotel Portugal, then returned to London, where he moved frequently from hotel to hotel, allegedly attempting to stay ahead of Interpol investigators. By then, Ray was sought internationally, Hoover posting his name to the FBI's Most Wanted list on April 20.

In June 1968, Ray made several calls to London newspapers, attempting to find information about joining mercenary forces in Africa. Then, on June 8, as he was about to fly to Brussels under the alias of "George Raymond Sneyd," he was arrested by British police at London's Heathrow Airport. While in the custody of Chief Inspector Alexander Eist of Scotland Yard, Ray allegedly confessed to killing Martin Luther King, a confession he would later deny. Ray reportedly stated to Eist: "I panicked [after seeing a police car near the rooming house in Memphis after King's shooting] and I threw the gun away. It was the only mistake I made." According to Eist, Ray claimed to have received a half million dollars for assassinating King.

Returned to the U.S., Ray, on March 10, 1969, pleaded guilty at his trial, following the advice of his attorney, Percy Foreman, who told him that if he were convicted by trial, he would most likely face the death penalty. In 1978, Ray told the Select Committee that he had agreed to plead guilty, because Foreman warned him that his innocent brother Jerry might be indicted as a co-conspirator and that his elderly father might be returned to prison for a crime he had committed in the 1920s. On March 11, 1969, James Earl Ray was sentenced to ninety-nine years at Brushy Mountain State Prison in Tennessee. Months later, the convicted assassin withdrew his confession in the hope of winning a new trial. (For years, he continued to ask for that trial, but state and federal courts denied his requests and officially rejected his appeals seven times.) In his attempt to be granted a new trial, Ray introduced new "evidence," to explain his presence and his strange movements in Memphis at the time of King's murder, "evidence" that shifted the blame onto a mysterious Latino known only as "Raul."

Ray stated that after he broke out of the Missouri State Penitentiary, he headed north to Montreal, Canada, where he met with Raul in a bar. Ray said Raul was involved in a gun-

King's funeral procession in Atlanta, Georgia, his casket carried on a farm wagon and drawn by mules to symbolize his slave ancestry. Tens of thousands—blacks and whites—marched in this huge assembly to honor the slain King.

Smoke billows from burning buildings in the black ghetto of Washington, D.C. (the Washington Monument is visible at top) as a result of widespread rioting and arson by blacks in violent response to King's assassination.

running operation and had supplied him with the weapon he used in making his escape from prison. Raul promised Ray considerable money if he would go to Birmingham, Alabama, to purchase a high-powered rifle with a telescopic sight. He said he acquired the rifle, but left it with Raul and his associates in Memphis. At the moment King was killed, Ray said, he was driving around Memphis in his new car. Seeing unusual police activity around the Lorraine Motel, he decided to flee the city. "As a fugitive [from prison], I tried to stay away from police," Ray told the House Assassination Committee. Richard A. Sprague, chief counsel for the Committee, dismissed all of these statements by Ray as mere fabrication.

Jesse Jackson, a black leader from Chicago, launched an attack on the FBI in relation to the King assassination. In March 1974, he demanded an immediate congressional investigation of the FBI, citing the Bureau's internal memorandums in 1967 and 1968, which had recently been released and revealed the existence of an FBI intelligence operation known as Cointelpro. The agency maintained secret dossiers, the memorandums cited, on various black militants, left-wing student groups and those individuals it deemed subversive. The purpose of Cointelpro was to "disrupt, misdirect, discredit, or otherwise neutralize the activities of black nationalists, hate-type organizations and groupings, their leadership, spokesmen and supporters."

The gutted, smoldering remains of a black neighborhood in Chicago destroyed by rioting blacks incensed at King's murder.

Jackson pointed out that agents were called upon to "prevent the rise of a messiah" who might galvanize the black movement. Jackson's implied allegations of FBI involvement with the King assassination were dismissed by the Justice Department following a four-month study concluded on February 2, 1977. Further, the final report, submitted by Michael Shaheen, director of the Office of Professional Responsibility, concluded that Ray had acted alone. But in the ensuing months and years, new facts and conjectures suggested a larger, more broadly based conspiracy in the King murder.

Journalist William Sartor put forth a theory in which certain Mafia figures accepted $300,000 from a white supremacist group to carry out the "hit" on King. Sartor claimed that Ray made his initial contact with the supremacist group in New Orleans. Hours before King was fatally shot outside his motel room, an eyewitness reported hearing a conversation between reputed Mafia kingpin Frank Liberto and another party in which Liberto said: "Shoot the bastard! Do it this afternoon. Shoot him, even if you have to do it on the balcony, just do it!" It was implied that the "other party" was James Earl Ray.

Another theory held that there was a conspiracy within the Memphis Police Department to support the Mafia-ordered murder of King. According to this theory, Memphis Police detective Edward Redditt was removed from a surveillance team guarding King only hours before the shooting after avoid extradition—this from a man who could not, it turned out, correctly spell "Rhodesia," much less explain its extradition laws. Regarding Ray's alibi, the mysterious "Raul," he could not provide a last name or a location where this person could be found. The House Committee hearings ended with no new ground being broken. Officially, the FBI, the Memphis Police Department and the Mafia were inconclusively linked to the tragic assassination of King, despite the compelling circumstantial evidence offered during the hearings.

For years afterward, myriad theories surfaced and persisted. One held that President Lyndon B. Johnson was behind the King murder. Another theory insisted that J. Edgar Hoover personally planned the killing. Another theory claimed that King was killed on orders of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and that he had been murdered with the precision of a military execution by specially trained army snipers. These wild notions aside, the FBI investigation into the shooting was accomplished on the side of expediency. Its files on the case are still, for the FBI photos of James Earl Ray, escaped felon, who was posted on the Bureau's "Most Wanted" list as the chief suspect in the King slaying. He is shown in 1952, following a botched robbery, in 1959, when he was arrested for armed robbery and auto theft, in 1960, after being sentenced to prison, and in 1966, following his prison escape.

Redditt suggested that a four-block area surrounding the motel be cordoned off for security purposes after hearing from informants that King was to be assassinated. This theory also insisted that during the police investigation of the murder Detective Redditt was held virtually incommunicado.

In August 1978, Ray appeared before the House Select Committee to relate his version of the events leading up to the King assassination. He proved to be an unconvincing witness, ill at ease before the cameras and a large crowd of spectators. Committee members refuted Ray's sworn testimony that he was not trailing King in Atlanta nearly a month before the assassination. They produced a laundry slip from that city showing the name of the alias Ray most frequently employed.

Yet, somehow, Ray, a petty thief, had gained access to resources that allowed him to travel extensively, buy a new car, take international flights, stay in opulent hotels and even have plastic surgery. He spoke of going to Rhodesia in order to most part, sealed. A congressional subcommittee headed by Louis Stokes, a black Democrat from Ohio, did examine in detail all of the FBI evidence made available to him and he concluded that Ray was the actual killer of King, and if he had been aided in his gruesome chore, that help stemmed from violent white supremacists, not from anyone in the U.S. government.

King's murder nevertheless continued to nag many figures to continue probes into the killing, obsessive crusades paralleled by investigators still pursuing inconclusive clues, theories and assumptions in the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. As late as March 1998, former FBI agent Donald G. Wilson came forward to state that he had found some papers in Ray's abandoned car in Atlanta, Georgia, on April 11, 1968, which he kept to himself out of fear that he would then be accused of disturbing a crime scene. The papers Wilson claimed to have found showed the name "Raul," written in

James Earl Ray (right), in custody and being led to jail; he wears a bulletproof vest to protect him against a possible attack (like the one successfully made against Lee Harvey Oswald in 1963 by Jack Ruby).

Ray's handwriting, and a phone number that, at one time, rang up the Vegas Club, a Dallas nightclub owned by none other than Jack Ruby, the man who killed Lee Harvey Oswald, the identified assassin of President John F. Kennedy.

Wilson's "evidence" was labeled "a total fabrication" by the FBI. Yet, Wilson's motive in coming forward, he said, was solely motivated by a sincere wish to shed more light on the case. "The King family wants to know the truth," Wilson said. "I thought I might be able to help." At the time of his discovery, Wilson was a 25-year-old FBI agent stationed in Atlanta, Georgia. He accompanied another, older agent to Atlanta's Capital Homes housing project on April 11, 1968, after local police informed the Atlanta field office of the Bureau that Ray's abandoned Mustang car had been found. When arriving at the scene, the other agent began talking with police officers. Wilson stated that he noticed the door to the passenger side of the Mustang was ajar and, using a handkerchief so as not to disturb any fingerprints, he opened it and out fell a small white envelope.

Wilson panicked, he said, and picked up the envelope and placed it in his pocket. He felt that he had made a misstep in a major crime case that might have brought down the considerable wrath of J. Edgar Hoover on his own head. Said Wilson in 1998: "Taking that split-second action had nothing to do with grand or noble reasons. This gets to the basic philosophy of the FBI. Everything was predicated on fear. Fear of Mr. Hoover."

The envelope retrieved by Wilson bore Ray's handwritten notes, including the name "Raul," which was written twice, the second time with the annotation "Canada," and notes on a torn-out page from a 1963 Dallas, Texas, phone book, one that bears the name of many persons named "Hunt," including the Hunt Oil Corp., which was headed by right-wing billionaire, H. L. Hunt, an avowed enemy of President Kennedy. Hunt's son, Nelson Bunker Hunt, paid for an anti-Kennedy newspaper ad that ran on the day President Kennedy was shot and killed in Dallas, Texas.

The destinies, including their separate assassinations (both considered unsolved by many), of John Fitzgerald Kennedy and Martin Luther King were umbilical in many respects. Kennedy was the first important white politician to come to King's support and was instrumental in having King released from a prison farm in 1960, where King had been imprisoned on trumped-up charges. Kennedy, once he took power in the Oval Office, continued to support and encourage King in his civil rights crusade, and none of this was lost on Kennedy's adversaries, who thought King to be a powerful (and dangerous) social arm of Kennedy's basic political philosophy. If, indeed, a vast conspiracy existed to murder President Kennedy, in lethal response to Kennedy's idealistic social and political programs, it is logical to conclude that that same conspiracy encompassed the eventual assassination of Martin Luther King, who shared and advocated the same goals.

The envelope discovered by Wilson in 1968 also contained cards from a Louisiana towing company and a Texas gun shop (where the murder weapon was ostensibly purchased). All of this explained little, other than to support Ray's claim that a person named "Raul" existed, or, perhaps, existed as an intentional fabrication, a mythical person to whom Ray, if he were caught, could later point an accusatory finger as the actual mastermind in the King assassination, an alibi created by Ray in advance of his crime to ameliorate his own guilt. Was this uneducated and unsophisticated petty thief capable of such calculating and Machiavellian precautions? Yes, said many, who insisted that he was intuitively clever and cunning enough to premeditate just such an alibi in advance of the murder.

Mrs. Coretta Scott King, who still believes that her husband's death resulted from a widespread conspiracy.

Fueling the conspiracy theories in the King case was a Memphis resident named Lloyd Jowers, who owned and operated Jim's Grill, located on the ground level of the boarding house in Memphis, where Ray roomed at the time of the King assassination. Jowers stated in 1993 that he had overheard customers in his bar plotting to kill King, and he insisted that Ray had nothing to do with the crime. He said that someone ordered him to go to the rear entrance of his grill on the evening of April 4,

A workman is shown finishing the lettering on the crypt that holds the remains of Dr. Martin Luther King, the great martyr in the cause of America's civil rights.

1968, the day of the shooting. He did so, he said, and, after the killing, was given a smoking rifle by a local police officer.

Jowers went on national TV to state that he had actually hired the gunman who had killed King and that it was not James Earl Ray. He said that he hired the professional killer as a favor to a then deceased produce dealer, who was reportedly linked to members of organized crime, but that he had no idea as to the identification of the intended victim (King). In response to these shocking statements, and updated comments made by Jowers, the King family filed a suit on October 2, 1998, against Jowers, accusing him and "unknown co-conspirators" of being involved in the murder of Martin Luther King. By that time, at the urging of President William Clinton and the King family, U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno ordered a limited inquiry into the 1968 assassination, an inquiry that merely rehashed and sifted previous evidence and claims, but came to no new conclusions. Jowers' remarks were dismissed as nothing more than extravagant claims made by an obscure publicity-seeker.

The King family, however, persisted in believing that a conspiracy existed in the slaying of Martin Luther King. Dexter King, the son of the slain civil rights leader, met with James Earl Ray in March 1997. Their emotional conversation was recorded on film. During that meeting, King asked Ray if he had killed his father. Ray stuttered the reply: "No, no, no. I didn't."

"I want you to know that I believe you," replied Dexter King, "and my family believes you."

King's widow, Coretta Scott King, joined with her son and other family members in requesting that a new trial be given to James Earl Ray. It was too late. Ray died in prison at age sixty-nine, of liver disease, on April 23, 1998. Later investigation disclosed that Tennessee officials had refused to allow Ray to leave the state for a liver transplant, throwing suspicion upon these officials, particularly after Ray's attorneys argued that without the operation Ray would be dead within a few months.

Hospitals in Tennessee had already refused to conduct such a transplant, medical officials stating that such an operation was not feasible because of Ray's advanced age and Tennessee prison officials then refused to allow Ray to travel beyond their state for just such an operation. Moreover, Judge Cheryl Blackburn decreed in September 1997 that Ray's attorneys had failed to produce any convincing evidence that would cause Ray's plea to be set aside so that he could be granted a new trial.

Investigators, researchers and writers continue to debate the conspiracy theories in the King assassination. Years after the murder, Jim Bishop, author of The Day Kennedy Was Shot, stated "that a consortium of racists paid Ray to fire the shot. At this point, I have no facts. My tracking shows that Ray lived high for the first time in his life six months before the shooting." David Garrow, author of The FBI and Martin Luther King, Jr., took an opposite view: "People are unwilling to accept that something as historically huge as the death of Martin Luther King could have been brought about singlehandedly by someone as humanly insignificant as James Earl Ray. People would rather believe that huge forces bring about huge events. But that's just not the way the world works."

"SOMEBODY'S GOING TO GET KILLED"/ May 15, 1972

George Corly Wallace (1919-), was sworn in as the forty-seventh governor of the state of Alabama on January 14, 1963, at a time when Dr. Martin Luther King was energetically crusading for black civil rights in the South. The election of Wallace, a farmer's son, to Alabama's highest office was viewed as a clearcut victory for segregationists and state's rights advocates, who violently sought to preserve the status quo still prevalent in the South. In his first year of office, Wallace justified the confidence of his constituency by strenuously attempting to prevent the desegregation of public schools in Alabama. In a celebrated incident emblematic of the civil rights struggle in the South, Wallace physically barred the path of James A. Hood and Vivian J. Malone, two black students attempting to enroll at the University of Alabama on June 11, 1963.

George Corley Wallace, the governor of Alabama, a dedicated segregationist, who ran for the presidency in 1972 and was almost assassinated.

In so doing, Wallace openly defied the directive of Deputy U.S. Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach, who demanded that Wallace comply with federally mandated orders that called for the peaceful desegregation of public schools in Alabama. At the time, Wallace argued: "My action is a call for strict adherence to the Constitution of the United States as it was written." The governor was forced to back down only after President John F. Kennedy issued an order federalizing the Alabama National Guard. Wallace stood aside as the black students registered for classes without further incident.

The school integration crisis soon spread to other Alabama municipalities. Before the year was out, Kennedy was forced to mobilize the National Guard to uphold the federal directives. Wallace, as a loser in his fight against the federal administration, nevertheless emerged as a national figure and champion of the far right-wing. "Segregation now, segregation tomorrow, segregation forever!" became the familiar battle cry from this churlish ex-prizefighter from Barbour County, Alabama. His folksy, down-home campaigning style appealed to white voters angered at what Wallace labeled "welfare loafers, lenient judges, pseudo-intellectuals, and pointy-headed liberals."

So popular was Wallace with the far right-wing that he believed his presidential chances were strong and that a white backlash would landslide him into the White House. In 1968, cheered on by a broad spectrum of people representing the extremes of the political right, Wallace entered the presidential race. His words were particularly encouraging to Southern Klansmen (members of the Ku Klux Klan) and white Northerners troubled by the issues of forced busing and the presence of youthful agitators on the nation's college campuses. Wallace promised to deal directly with such agitators, saying that any sitdown demonstrators who dared to block the path of his car would be run over. "It'll be the last car he'll ever lie down in front of," the governor vowed.

Wallace won five Southern Democratic primaries in 1968, but his presidential bid fizzled. He was encouraged to run again in 1972, when he believed his opportunity was strengthened by a generally weak field of presidential contenders. His slogan: "Send them a message," was clear enough to voters in Florida, who carried him to victory in the state primary over front runners Edmund Muskie, Hubert Humphrey and George McGovern. Wallace rolled on to victory in five more primaries and finished second in six others before taking his campaign to Maryland in May 1972.

It was a foray into unfamiliar territory. Not everyone in the "border" state of Maryland shared Wallace's extreme views toward race, the Vietnam War, or federally funded welfare programs. That much was evident at a rally in Frederick, Maryland, where someone hurled a brick at him. At Hagerstown, a group of students jeered him relentlessly, until the police were summoned. The incident unnerved Wallace, undoubtedly prompting him to state to an aide: "Somebody's going to get killed before this primary's over. And I hope it's not me."

The governor wrapped up his Maryland campaign on May 15, 1972, at an appearance at the Laurel (Maryland) Shopping Center, where he was greeted by 2,000 residents, who gathered about a podium in the parking lot. As usual, the specially constructed 600-pound podium was in place. Western singer Billy Grammar warmed up the crowd with renditions of "Detroit City," and "Gotta Travel On," while Wallace made his way to the platform. His speech was met with derision, especially by several collegians standing in the rear. "Go back to Alabama!" shouted one. "You don't even know where you are!" cried another, this being a reference to Wallace's own remark wherein he called Prince George County "Princess George County."

After nearly an hour of the candidate's hot rhetoric, aimed at "social schemers" and "ultra-false liberals," Wallace stepped down from behind his barricaded podium. A woman outfitted in Wallace regalia called to him: "Over here, George! Over here!" The candidate unbuttoned his jacket and moved toward the woman. At that moment a squat, blond-haired man wearing sunglasses pushed his way through the throng to

In this rare action photo, taken on May 15, 1972, would-be assassin Arthur Herman Bremer (wearing sun glasses) fires four bullets into candidate Wallace, his arm grabbed by a Wallace supporter.

Wallace and fired five shots from a snub-nosed revolver in quick succession.

Secret Service agents pounced on the would-be assassin even as he continued to fire. Four bullets struck the governor, who collapsed to the asphalt. Three other persons were injured, including Captain E. C. Dothard of the Alabama Highway Patrol, Secret Service Agent Nicholas Zarvos and a volunteer Wallace campaign worker, Dora Thompson, who was shot in the knee. Wallace was taken to Holy Cross Hospital in Silver Spring, where he underwent emergency surgery. Two bullets were removed during the operation and hemorrhaging was quickly brought under control. A third bullet, lodged near the spinal column, caused far more serious damage. George Wallace would never walk again.

The gunman, identified by the Secret Service as 21-year-old Arthur Herman Bremer, was taken into custody. Born and raised on the South Side of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Bremer fit the mold of the urban political assassin, who typified the chaotic 1960s. Described as a "withdrawn," "incredibly defensive" individual, Bremer left home in 1971 to study photography at the Milwaukee Area Technical College, supporting himself by working half days as a busboy at the Milwaukee Athletic Club and was a janitor at the Story Elementary School. On November 18, 1971, he was arrested for carrying a concealed weapon in his parked car. A court-appointed psychiatrist described him as "dull," but sane. He was released after paying a fine of $38.50.

On the same day that George Wallace declared his intentions to run for the 1972 presidential election, Bremer purchased a five-shot, snub-nosed revolver from a Milwaukee gun shop. A month later, on February 16, he quit his job to embark upon an odyssey that led to the shopping center in Laurel, Maryland. Bremer's initial target was ambiguous. He began following several candidates on April 7, 1972, when he was seen at a dinner given for Hubert Humphrey at New York's Waldorf Hotel. He turned up at the Sheraton Motor Inn in New Carrollton, Maryland, on April 15-18, 1972, then at a Wallace rally in Cadillac, Michigan, on May 10, and at another Wallace rally in Kalamazoo, Michigan, on May 12-13.

How it was possible for this unemployed busboy to finance such an expensive cross-country, eighteen-week trip was never explained. Certainly, his parents, who barely lived above the poverty line, could not have funded his bizarre expedition. Conservative estimates of his travel expenses were placed at $5,000. Yet, Bremer would later claim that his net worth was only $300. It was reported by Life magazine that Bremer had "companions" with whom he kept company shortly before his assassination attempt on Wallace. One of these mysterious friends was later identified as Dennis Cassini, who was found dead in the trunk of his car in Milwaukee, the victim of an apparent heroin overdose.

While stalking President Richard Nixon and George Wallace, Bremer kept a diary that indicated that he operated alone and that no conspiracy attended his plans for assassination. One excerpt read:

> "I've decided that Wallace will have the honor of—what would you call it? Like a novelist who knows not how his book will end—I have written this journal ... You know, my biggest failure may well be when I kill Wallace. I hope everyone screams and hollers and everything!! I hope the rally goes mad!! One thing for sure my diet is too soft. Weakens my posture, maybe effects my insides too. I am one sick assassin. Pun! Pun! Is there anything else to say? My cry upon firing will be, a penny for your thoughts.

Wallace (shown in wheelchair), paralyzed from the waist down from Bremer's wounds, abandoned his run for the presidency as well as his views on segregation, publicly stating his apologies to many black church parishioners.

The theory that Bremer was hired by powerful interests who wanted Wallace out of the way has no support in fact. It was rumored at various times that Charles Colson of the White House staff ordered E. Howard Hunt, infamous for his involvement in the Watergate scandal, to enter Bremer's apartment immediately after the shooting to "plant" several left-wing journals for the police to find.

At the time, Wallace posed the most serious threat to Richard Nixon's bid for a second presidential term of office. Interviewed by Barbara Walters on the Today Show, a crippled but recovered George Wallace stated: "So I just wondered if that were the case. How did anyone know where he lived within an hour after I was shot? I myself didn't know who shot me until several days later, but, of course, I wouldn't know because I was in a condition not to know."

Arthur Bremer, judged sane, was convicted of attempted assassination and sent to prison for a term of sixty-three years. His attempt on the life of George Wallace little changed his inexplicable perspective—his motives were never made clear—but his attack did alter the life of his victim. Paralyzed and confined in a wheelchair, Wallace eventually abandoned his racist views and several times publicly apologized to blacks at various church meetings for his former crusade to dismantle their civil rights.

KILLING THE KENNEDYS

John and Robert Kennedy, scions of a powerful family having great wealth and high-placed connections, were political idealists who sought to bring about radical social changes in America and did, but at the expense of their own lives. Both prematurely died at the hands of assassins, their mercurial careers nurtured and financially advanced by a ruthlessly ambitious father, Joseph P. Kennedy, who painfully lived to see his sons slain by obscure killers. The assassinations of John Fitzgerald Kennedy in 1963 and Robert Kennedy in 1968 were symptomatic of their times, an era of political and social upheaval they helped to create, where violent factions rampaged through the streets of almost all American cities and across college campuses, wreaking havoc in the name of protest against ancient evils.

Protest meetings, rallies and marches crusaded against America's attritional war in Vietnam, against civil rights violations in the South, against environmental offenses by insensitive American corporations, against any issues real and imagined. In this era of near anarchy, law enforcement, military and intelligence agencies reacted with what was often excessive force, compounding and accelerating the countless confrontations. Medieval fears again surfaced, consuming millions with suspicions of vast conspiracies that orchestrated and executed through ignorant henchmen the assassinations of Martin Luther King and, especially, the Kennedy brothers. The grim specter of such malevolent conspiracies exists to this day, looming ghost-like over the graves of these political and social martyrs.

President John Fitzgerald Kennedy, reportedly assassinated on November 22, 1963 by Lee Harvey Oswald.

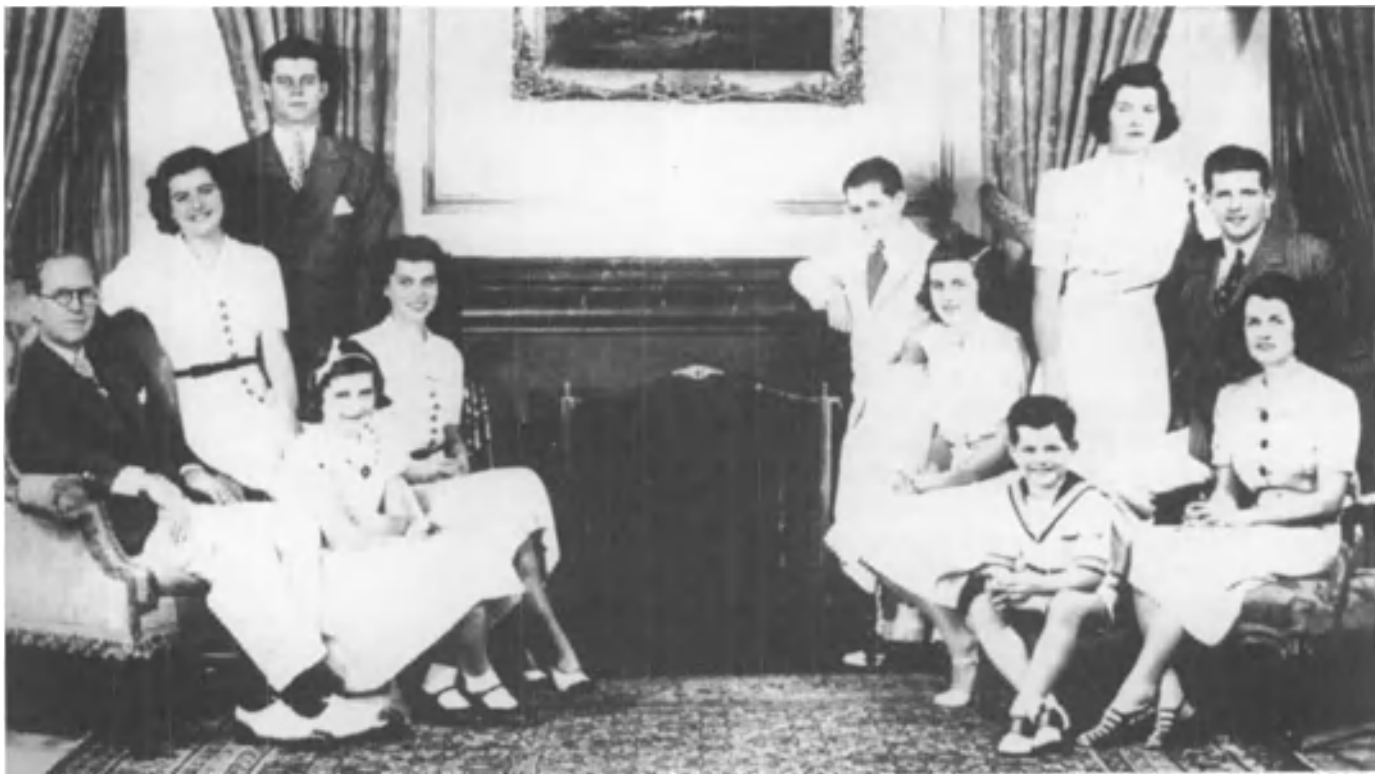
"THEY ARE GOING TO KILL US ALL!"/ November 22, 1963

One of the darkest days in 20th Century America occurred on November 22, 1963, when President John Fitzgerald Kennedy (1917-1963) was shot and killed from ambush in Dallas, Texas. This murder had repercussions around the world and devastated a whole generation of idealistic Americans, who believed that Kennedy represented a bright and shining future for the U.S. His administration had been compared with the mythical Camelot of King Arthur, where noble goals were achieved and, in the instance of the Kennedys, the great American promise of the Constitution was upheld and advanced for all. Under the Kennedy administration, minorities would share the fruits of their labor, education would soar to new intellectual heights, unemployment would be eliminated and the future of every citizen would be secured through enlightened welfare and retirement programs. No longer would America be owned by the robber barons, but would truly be the land of the free and the home of the brave.

Kennedy was born into great wealth on May 29, 1917, in Brookline, Massachusetts. His father, Joseph P. Kennedy, was a banker and stock investor who made millions in banking, stock investments, shipbuilding and real estate, as well as his investments in motion pictures, a hobby linked to his various Hollywood romances, chiefly with silent screen star Gloria Swanson. Joseph Kennedy maintained his large family in luxury. His docile wife Rose bore him nine children, five daughters and four sons. When Joseph, Jr., a pilot during World War II, was killed in action, John Kennedy became the political hope of the elder Kennedy, who had been ambassador to England (1937-1940) and had urged appeasement with Hitler, a disastrous decision that eliminated his own political ambitions.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy never lacked for anything and was not required to work. Through his father's dynamic personality and aggressiveness, however, Kennedy developed an early sense of responsibility. A gifted writer, he originally considered a literary career, later publishing Why England Slept (1940) and Profiles in Courage (1956), which was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. During World War II, Kennedy, like his older brother Joe, served with distinction. He had been a Navy officer commanding a PT boat in the Pacific and received decorations for heroism in saving the lives of his crew, upon which the stirring film, PT 109, was based.

Following the war, at his father's urging and with the Kennedy fortune to back him, Kennedy entered politics, becoming a U.S. congressman from Massachusetts (1947-1953) and a U.S. senator (1953-1960). In the close presidential election of 1960, when running against Richard Nixon, Kennedy became the first Irish-American Catholic to be elected to the highest office in the U.S. From the beginning of the short-lived Kennedy administration, there were many rumors that the president would be assassinated.



The Kennedy family in 1937 (left to right): Joseph, Sr., Patricia, John, Jean, Eunice, Robert, Kathleen, Edward, Rosemary, Joseph, Jr., and Rose Kennedy.

The Kennedy family in 1960 (left to right, seated): Eunice Shriver, Rose and Joseph Kennedy, Jacqueline and Edward Kennedy; (left to right, standing): Ethel Kennedy, Stephen and Jean Smith, John F. Kennedy, Robert, Patricia Lawford, Sargent Shriver, Joan Kennedy, Peter Lawford.

The first of these plots was hatched by a man who personally hated Kennedy. Unlike U.S. presidential assassinations in the past, this attempt was to be made by a man, who believed that Kennedy himself was undeserving of his office, because his family had "bought" the presidency with its incredible wealth. The killers of Abraham Lincoln, James A. Garfield and William McKinley had acted out of political motives, as had those who attempted to murder Andrew Jackson, Theodore Roosevelt, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry Truman, Gerald Ford and Ronald Reagan.

A month before Kennedy was to take office, 73-year-old Richard P. Pavlick, a former mental patient from Belmont, New Hampshire, decided to kill the president-elect, because he believed that Kennedy money had simply purchased Kennedy's election through massive TV advertising and political payoffs. Following the election, Kennedy rested at one of the family's vacation homes in Palm Beach, Florida. Pavlick followed him there and took up residence. He tracked Kennedy, photographing his home and the church he attended. He next purchased dynamite and rigged this to his car, planning to make a "human bomb" of himself. When Kennedy got into his car to attend church on Sunday, Pavlick would crash his own auto into Kennedy's, killing himself, Kennedy and anyone in and surrounding the victim's car.

On December 11, 1960, Pavlick drove up to the Kennedy home in Palm Beach, parking across the street. He had seven sticks of dynamite in his car, which he could set off with a switch. He watched as Kennedy, his wife Jacqueline and their daughter Caroline emerged and went to their car. There were a number of other children present. Pavlick changed his mind, when he saw Mrs. Kennedy and the children. "I did not wish to harm her or the children," he said. "I decided to get him in the church or someplace later." He drove off and waited for another opportunity. He visited the church Kennedy attended and even stood a few rows behind Kennedy, while the president-elect attended Mass. Again, he did not act. This was the last opportunity he would have, for Secret Service agents were fast closing in on the would-be assassin.

The Secret Service had learned from a postal inspector in Pavlick's home town that the old man had openly stated that he intended to kill Kennedy. Agents then learned that he was then in Palm Beach. On December 15, 1960, Pavlick was tracked down and arrested. A letter was found in Pavlick's possession, one which he intended to have read and published after he had assassinated Kennedy. It read in part:

> I believe that the Kennedys bought the presidency and the White House and until he really became president it was my intention to remove him in the only way it was available to me; the Supreme Court wouldn't enter any motion of mine, if asked, to stop the oath of office.
>
> If death and destruction and injury to persons has resulted from my vicious action then I am truly sorry, but it won't help any. It is hoped that by my actions that a better country and a more attentive citizenry has resulted and corrected any abuses of ambitious money-eyed persons or groups, then it will not have been in vain ... It was unfortunate for the Kennedys that John was elected President because it was Jimmy Hoffa who was to have been my target of destruction because of his "Go to hell the United States" attitude and because of the gutless cowards called the Congress of the United States who are afraid to clip his wings.

John F. Kennedy with his wife Jacqueline and children John and Caroline, about to attend church in Florida. A would-be assassin sat a few pews behind the family, waiting to kill the president.

Pavlick was not held for trial. He was judged insane and placed in a mental institution. This first attempt on Kennedy's life was followed by a second three years later, one tragically successful and committed by another nonentity, embittered and resentful of his own obscurity and futility. This was Lee Harvey Oswald, born in New Orleans on October 18, 1939, two months after the death of his father.

At age nine, Oswald lost his stepfather when his mother divorced. He grew up with little parental supervision and was habitually truant. By the age of sixteen, Oswald had dropped out of school and joined the Marine Corps. In 1959, he requested a discharge on compassionate grounds, pointing out that his mother was destitute and ailing. He was released from the Marines, but went home for only a brief visit, providing no support for his "destitute" mother.

Using his service pay, Oswald traveled to the Soviet Union, where he met and married 19-year-old Marina Nikolalaevna Prusakova. Oswald was given a residence visa, but was later informed that he could not obtain permanent residence in Russia. After a reported suicide attempt, he was given an exit visa and allowed to take his wife and small child back to the U.S. They arrived on June 14, 1962. What prompted Oswald to travel to the Soviet Union remains conjecture to this day, although it was later learned that he had, while serving in the Marines, obtained Communist materials, which he avidly read and had become an avowed Marxist. How the poorly educated Oswald supported himself and small family in Russia also remains a mystery. Again, conjecture has it that he was employed by and became the willing pawn of the KGB. Further, he was methodically trained as a professional assassin, before being sent back to the U.S. with the specific assignment of assassinating President Kennedy (an allegation Russian officials to this day emphatically deny).

Lee Harvey Oswald, who dropped out of school and the U.S. Marines, shown in 1959, after he defected to the Soviet Union.

Oswald is shown with his Russian wife Marina in 1961, when the couple lived in a small apartment in Minsk, U.S.S.R. Oswald told Marina in 1959: "I want to give the people of the United States something to think about."

In March 1963, using the alias of A. Hiddell, Oswald purchased from a Chicago mail order firm a 6.5-mm Mannlicher-Carcano rifle with a telescopic sight. He then bought a .38 Smith and Wesson revolver from a Los Angeles company. According to later information, Oswald, in April 1963, plotted to assassinate Erwin A. Walker, a right-wing retired army general, but abandoned his plan at the last minute. Some months later, Oswald attempted to return to Russia by going to Mexico City, where he visited the Soviet embassy, requesting a visa. (The Soviet Embassy in Mexico City was to be a consistent rendezvous for treasonable Americans working with KGB agents. In 1975, this embassy was used as a contact location by American traitors Christopher John Boyce and Andrew Daulton, who sold U.S. high-tech spy-in-the-sky secrets to Soviet spymasters.) When Soviet officials turned down Oswald's request for a visa, he then went to the Cuban embassy, but he was denied a visa to that country also.

This controversial photo was reportedly taken of Oswald by his wife Marina in the backyard of their Dallas home on March 31, 1963. Oswald holds the mail-order rifle he purchased and wears a pistol on his right hip. Some claimed that this photo was doctored, that Oswald's head had been imposed upon the body of another person to further incriminate him.

Oswald returned to the U.S., settling in Dallas, Texas. He obtained a job working at the Texas School Book Depository, moving inventory. A short time later, his second child was born. He then sent his wife and two children to live with friends at Irving, Texas. By early November 1963, Oswald was living on Beckley Avenue in Dallas under the alias of O. H. Lee. A short time later, he learned that President Kennedy would be making his first official visit to Texas, arriving in Dallas on November 22, 1963. The Dallas Morning News specifically outlined Kennedy's visit, providing in its pages the exact details of the route the president's motorcade would take through Dallas. At one point, the motorcade would move directly beneath the overlooking windows of the Texas School Book Depository building.

President Kennedy with Governor Connally and wife Jacqueline when arriving at the Dallas Airport, November 22, 1963.

On the day before Kennedy's arrival in Dallas, Oswald visited his wife and children in Irving, Texas. The next morning, he went to the sixth floor of the Depository building, carrying his rifle in a paper bag. He moved some boxes in front of a window that overlooked the roadway Kennedy's motorcade would follow. These boxes blocked any view of his presence at the window. He loaded his rifle, crouched next to the window and waited.

President Kennedy had been planning his trip to Texas since 1960. He had made a few brief trips to the state, but never an official presidential visit. By November 1963, this trip had become a political necessity. Trouble had been disrupting the Democratic Party in Texas for some time. Senator Ralph Yarborough, a liberal, was openly feuding with Governor John Connally, a conservative. Kennedy desperately needed Texas in his camp for the presidential election in 1964. He had barely taken the state in 1960, even with Lyndon B. Johnson, a Texan, as his vice presidential running mate. He hoped to patch up Democratic problems in the state, as well as drum up support for his candidacy throughout Texas. Originally, Kennedy expected to spend only one day in Texas, but his trip was extended so that he could be seen by more voters.

Roy H. Kellerman was the top Secret Service agent in charge of Kennedy's safety during the Texas trip. Other officials planned Kennedy's motorcades in many of the state's cities. The motorcade in Dallas would cover ten miles, passing through a section of suburban Dallas, the downtown area, then on to the Trade Mart via the Stemmons Freeway. To get to the Stemmons Freeway, Kennedy's motorcade would have to pass Houston and Elm streets, where the Texas School Book Depository building was located. On November 21, Kennedy, his wife, Johnson and Connally were in San Antonio. They then flew to Houston and then to Fort Worth. The next day, November 22, 1963, Kennedy landed at Dallas in Air Force One at 11:47 a.m. He was greeted by Vice President Johnson, who had flown ahead of him, landing in Air Force Two, following long-standing security measures. (The vice president never travels with the president in the same plane so that in the event of an air crash he can take over the leadership of the government if the president is killed or injured.)

President Kennedy, with his wife Jacqueline at his side, got into an open limousine, which was positioned as the third car in the motorcade. He sat on the right side of the rear seat of the limousine. In front of them, on jump seats, sat Governor Connally and his wife. Two Secret Service agents occupied the front seat, one driving, the other serving as a guard. President Kennedy was not an easy man to protect. He insisted that no Secret Service men ride in the back of the car or on the small running boards provided on presidential limousines. Also, he rejected the use of motorcycle police flanking his car. These accompanying policemen had to drive their cycles in front or in back of the car as Kennedy did not want any view of him to be obstructed. Since the day was sunny and bright, Kennedy ordered the bubbletop of the limousine removed.

Jacqueline and John Kennedy in the presidential limousine taking them through Dallas.

The first car of the motorcade contained Dallas Police Chief Jesse E. Curry and Dallas County Sheriff J. E. "Bill" Decker, along with Secret Service agents Winston Lawson and Forrest Sorrels, who had planned the route of the motorcade. Four policemen on motorcycles, two abreast, followed the limousine. The crowds along the route through downtown Dallas were cordial and dense. As Kennedy's car neared Dealy Plaza, Mrs. Connally leaned toward Kennedy and said: "You can't say that Dallas doesn't love you, Mr. President."

"That's obvious," Kennedy replied through a wide smile. He and Jackie Kennedy waved back at the crowds cheering and applauding them. It was a few seconds before 12:30 p.m. Suddenly, there was a loud sound, like a pop or crack, then another. Kennedy clutched at his throat with his left hand as his wife looked at him quizzically. The first shot fired by Oswald (if Oswald alone fired all the shots) was heard by Mrs. Kennedy, who first thought the sound was that of a backfire from one of the police motorcycles. When she heard the second shot, she saw the back of Kennedy's head torn wide open. She screamed: "Oh, my God! They have shot my husband! I love you, Jack!"

As he turned about to see where the shots were coming from, Governor Connally was shot in the back. He slumped into his wife's arms and moaned: "Oh, no, no, no. My God, they are going to kill us all."

"It's all right," Mrs. Connally told him. "Be still."

Secret Service agent Roy Kellerman turned in the right front seat when he heard the rifle fire, pulling his gun. He saw the president grab at his throat and then shouted to the driver, William Greer: "Let's get out of here! We are hit!" He grabbed a microphone over which he could talk to the lead car and said: "We are hit. Get us to the hospital immediately." At that moment, the president's limousine leaped forward. Clinton J. Hill, a Secret Service agent riding on the running board of the car behind the president's limousine, saw Kennedy clutch his throat.

Hill jumped from the follow-up car and ran to the president's limousine, jumping onto the left-rear running board and grabbing the small handrail. He fell backward when the limousine increased speed, but he managed to climb back onto the car. At that moment, Mrs. Kennedy appeared to be crawling over the back of the limousine, reaching for something. She was trying to retrieve a chunk of brain tissue that had been blown out of her husband's head. Hill pushed her back into the back seat with her dying husband, then lay atop the seat to shield the couple with his own body. Rufus Youngblood, the agent guarding the vice president, pushed Johnson down in the back seat of his own car, shouting: "Get down." He sat atop Johnson, gun drawn, as the motorcade roared away toward Parkland Memorial Hospital.

Spectators lined before a grassy knoll, the spot where Kennedy had been hit, were stunned by the shooting. Some screamed, others fell silent. A few alert citizens, along with police, began scanning the windows of the nearby buildings and some glanced back to the fence atop the grassy knoll behind which figures seem to be running. Meanwhile, Oswald calmly hid his rifle, but he left three empty cartridges on the floor next to the open window where he had fired his shots. He walked to the building elevator and rode it down to the second floor. By then policemen were swarming throughout the Texas School Book Depository building, having pinpointed the place where the killer had perched. Marion L. Baker, a motorcycle policeman, was on the second floor, talking to Roy Truly, a superintendent. He saw Oswald and called to him. Oswald calmly walked to him and Truly. "Do you know this man?" Baker asked Truly.

"Yes," Truly answered. "He works in the building."

Baker nodded and he and other policemen then ran up the stairs. Oswald then went to the company lunch room. Here he bought a soft drink and sipped it for some minutes. He then walked from the building without being stopped, going to his room on Beckley Avenue, where he changed his jacket and put his revolver in his pocket. He then went outside and began slowly walking down the street. Officer J. D. Tippit, patrolling the area in a squad car, called Oswald over to the car. Oswald dutifully stepped to the curb. He leaned into the open window of the car and quietly talked with Tippit, according to witnesses. Then, he abruptly straightened up and began walking away. Tippit jumped from the patrol car, shouting something after Oswald. The assassin turned and with a blank expression on his face pulled his revolver and fired four shots into Tippit, who fell dead. "Poor, dumb cop," Oswald was heard by a witness to say as he continued walking down the street.

An hour later, the ticket seller at the Texas Theater watched Oswald enter the theater without paying for a ticket. He called police. Officers soon arrived, racing into the lobby, where Oswald saw them approaching him. "Well, I guess it's over," he said in a monotone. He pulled out his revolver and aimed it at the officers, squeezing the trigger. The gun misfired. The officers rushed him, knocked him down and placed him under arrest. A short time later, he was charged with assassinating President John F. Kennedy and slaying Officer Tippit. By that time, President Kennedy, despite the desperate efforts of doctors at Parkland Hospital, had been pronounced dead.

Oswald emphatically denied having killed Kennedy and Tippit, although his palm prints clearly matched those found on the rifle ostensibly used to murder the president and the bullets that struck Kennedy and Connally were matched to Oswald's rifle. Further, bullets from Oswald's revolver matched those found in the body of Officer Tippit. While Oswald was being interrogated by Dallas police, President Kennedy's body was removed from Parkland Hospital and placed on Air Force One, then flown back to Washington, D.C. On board, sitting next to the dead president, was his widow.

Lyndon Johnson was also on board and he took the oath of office of president while the plane was in flight. He happened to have his father's small Bible in his pocket for this occasion. (This seemed odd to many, who later wondered why Johnson was carrying this symbolic book on this propi-

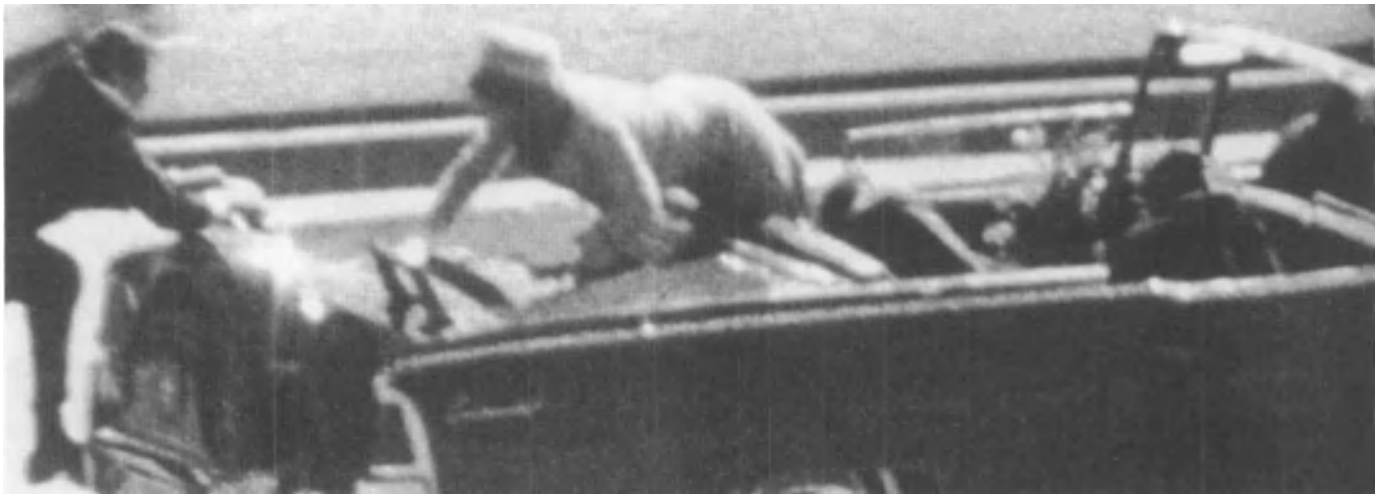
President Kennedy and his wife are shown sitting in the back seat of the limousine that took them past cheering crowds in downtown Dallas.

President John F. Kennedy, shown only moments before he was fatally shot in Dallas, Texas.

This FBI photo reproduces Oswald's perspective of Elm Street through the telescopic sight of his rifle, indicating that the assassin had a clear view when shooting the President.

The above photo shows President Kennedy at the moment he received the fatal shot to his head; at that moment, his head impacted backward, suggesting that this fatal bullet came from a direction other than the position occupied by Lee Harvey Oswald.

A few seconds after Kennedy was fatally shot, Secret Service Agent Clinton J. Hill (the moving figure between the two cars) is shown racing toward the back of the presidential limousine.



As President Kennedy slumps onto the back seat of the limousine, Jacqueline Kennedy is seen crawling over the back of the car to retrieve a piece of her husband's brain, blown onto the top of the car's trunk. Secret Service Agent Hill (left, on rear bumper), pushed Mrs. Kennedy back onto the seat next to her dying husband as the car raced toward Parkland Memorial Hospital.

Lyndon B. Johnson, with his wife and Mrs. Kennedy, takes the presidential oath, while on board on Air Force One.

Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy, her clothes stained by her husband's blood, is shown watching Kennedy's body being taken away in an ambulance from the Washington, D.C. airport after arriving from Dallas.

tious occasion and some later claimed that this signaled his prior knowledge of the assassination.) Mrs. Kennedy was bluntly asked to witness the swearing in of Johnson as the new president. She agreed, mutely standing by as the ceremony was performed. Upon landing, Kennedy's body underwent further examination, x-rays being taken and a detailed autopsy performed. None of this information was later released in order "to protect the feelings of the family."

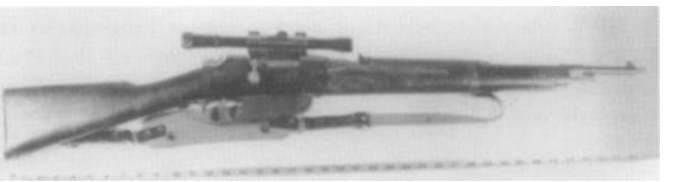
Although the president's immediate protection was the responsibility of the Secret Service, the FBI and, especially, Director J. Edgar Hoover, later came under severe criticism for not informing the Secret Service that Oswald had once been under suspicion as a security risk by the Bureau. He had been seen by FBI agents when handing out pro-Castro leaflets in Dallas a short time before the assassination. FBI agents John W. Fain and B. Tom Carter had interviewed Oswald on June 26, 1962, determining that, although they found him evasive and arrogant, he was not a security risk. A short time later, Oswald became a member of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, a Communist organization, according to the FBI.

Oswald, while under arrest, continued to deny his guilt in the assassination, insisting that he had not been on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository building when the fatal shots had been fired and that he was having lunch on the second floor with another employee he called "junior." The only employee in the building with that nickname was James Jarman, Jr., who denied having lunch with Oswald. Shown the murder weapon, Oswald denied it was his. Asked about the revolver he had brandished when arrested in the theater, Oswald merely shrugged, then said that he had been carrying the weapon because "you know how boys do when they have a gun; they just carry it."

Asked about his political beliefs, Oswald stated: "I am a Marxist, but not a Leninist Marxist." He was then asked what he thought of President Kennedy. "I have no views on the president," he replied. "My wife and I like the president's family. They are interesting people. I have my own views on the president's national policy. I have a right to express my views ... I am not a malcontent. Nothing irritated me about the president."

On the night of the murder, Dallas police headquarters was swarming with newsmen attempting to get more information about Oswald. At 11:30 p.m. that night, Jack Ruby, owner of several sleazy Dallas nightclubs that featured strippers and B-girls, was on the third floor of the police station. He was moving about freely with the reporters and chatting with policemen he knew. Ruby was a glad-handing gadfly, who thought himself to be an important person in Dallas. He catered to policemen who frequented his bistros and intimated connections with the Mafia and the crime syndicate. He bought free drinks for detectives, particularly vice officers, who came to his nightclubs and looked the other way from Ruby's B-Girl operations.

A newsman challenged Ruby's right to be at police headquarters on such an important event. The beefy nightclub owner grew defensive, then stated he was an "official interpreter" for the Israeli press, a lie. Ruby then turned to a detective he knew and snapped: "It's hard to realize that a complete nothing, a zero like that [Oswald] could kill a man like President Kennedy." Ruby's conduct had been erratic ever since the president had been killed. He had called many people long-distance to tell them that he would have to leave Dallas after the city had been shamed by the assassination. He wept with strangers over the subject. He visited the offices of newspapers and radio stations to bemoan Kennedy's loss and condemn his killer. He was on these occasions tolerated as a harmless character, even though he was willing to share his many opinions about the assassination. At one point, Ruby said that the killing was "the work of the John Birch Society or the Communist Party or maybe a combination of both." His dislike for Oswald quickly intensified to seething hatred.



Oswald's rifle (if this was the actual murder weapon), which was found on the sixth floor of the Texas Schoolbook Depository Building.

A shield of cartons had been placed around a sniper's nest reportedly by Oswald to conceal his presence at the window, where he fired four shots.

A situation photo showing assassination landmarks in Dealy Plaza in downtown Dallas at the time of the 1963 shooting; the Maltese cross indicates the location where Kennedy was hit.

The patrol car in which Officer Tippit was shot to death by Oswald, when he reportedly called out to the assassin.

Police are shown subduing Oswald in the lobby of the Texas Theater, where he had been hiding. He reportedly drew a pistol when the officers leaped toward him.

Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit, who was shot and killed by Oswald a short time after Kennedy was killed. This murder was debated, some claiming others murdered Tippit to further implicate Oswald.

Arriving at the Dallas Police Department headquarters to be booked for murdering President Kennedy and Officer Tippit, Oswald was defiant, arrogant and smug.

Jack Ruby (center profile) is shown on a police videotape as he mingles with reporters at Dallas Police headquarters a few hours after the Kennedy shooting.

Choked with emotion for two days and running about and pretending to be a newspaper reporter so that he could learn the whereabouts of Oswald, Ruby exhausted himself and did not go to sleep until 1:30 p.m., on Saturday, November 23, 1963. An hour and a half later the FBI office in Dallas received a phone call from an anonymous caller, who said that a committee had been established and "would kill the man who killed the president." At 10 a.m., Sunday morning, Dallas police began to move Oswald to the county jail for better protection. Secret Service agents and local officials argued with Chief Curry, who wanted to take Oswald through a basement exit for the transfer so that reporters could record the move. Curry had his way.

Shortly before 11 a.m. that Sunday, Ruby got into his car, putting a revolver into his pocket, one that he had invariably carried in his car inside a money pouch used to transfer receipts from his nightclubs to his bank. He had been acting strangely all morning. He mumbled incoherently, according to a cleaning lady and a striptease employee who borrowed money from him earlier that day. A short time later, Ruby walked into the basement of the Dallas Police Department and went unchallenged as he freely moved about with reporters. Guards later claimed that they had no idea how Ruby had gained entrance to the building, but he was nevertheless standing in the front rank of policemen and newsmen waiting for Oswald. At 11:20 a.m., Oswald was taken out of an elevator and was being escorted to an unmarked car parked in the underground police garage. The place was suddenly a madhouse, with TV cameras running, flashbulbs in hand-held cameras exploding and dozens of questions being shouted by a bevy of reporters.

Oswald had walked about ten feet from the downstairs garage office and into the crowd, when Ruby jumped forward, his right arm extended and a revolver clutched in his hand. He aimed directly at Oswald. Ruby, at the left of Oswald, jammed the gun into Oswald's chest and pulled the trigger once. Oswald let out a high-pitched scream and fell backward, pulling down with him the detective to whom he was handcuffed. Ruby stood over him, trying to squeeze the trigger of his revolver once more, but Detective L. C. Graves grabbed the cylinder of the gun and held it so that it would not turn. He then yanked the revolver from Ruby's grasp while several policemen lunged at Ruby, bringing him to the floor of the garage. "I hope I killed him!" Ruby yelled.

"Who is he? Who is that guy?" cried several newsmen.

Ever the limelighter, Ruby shouted: "I'm Jack Ruby! I'm Jack Ruby! All you guys know me!"

Ruby was brought to his feet and hustled into an elevator. As Ruby rode upward in the elevator, Detective D. R. Archer, who knew the club owner, said: "Jack, I think you killed him."

"I intended to shoot him three times," Ruby replied without emotion.

While Ruby underwent intensive interrogation, Oswald was rushed to Parkland Hospital, where the president had been taken and treated. Dr. Malcolm Perry, who had unsuccessfully tried to save President Kennedy's life, now worked to save Oswald. He was again unsuccessful. Oswald was pronounced dead at 1:07 p.m.

November 24, 1963: Jack Ruby (right foreground) steps from a crowd of newsmen in the garage of Dallas Police headquarters, gun in hand, aiming at Oswald.

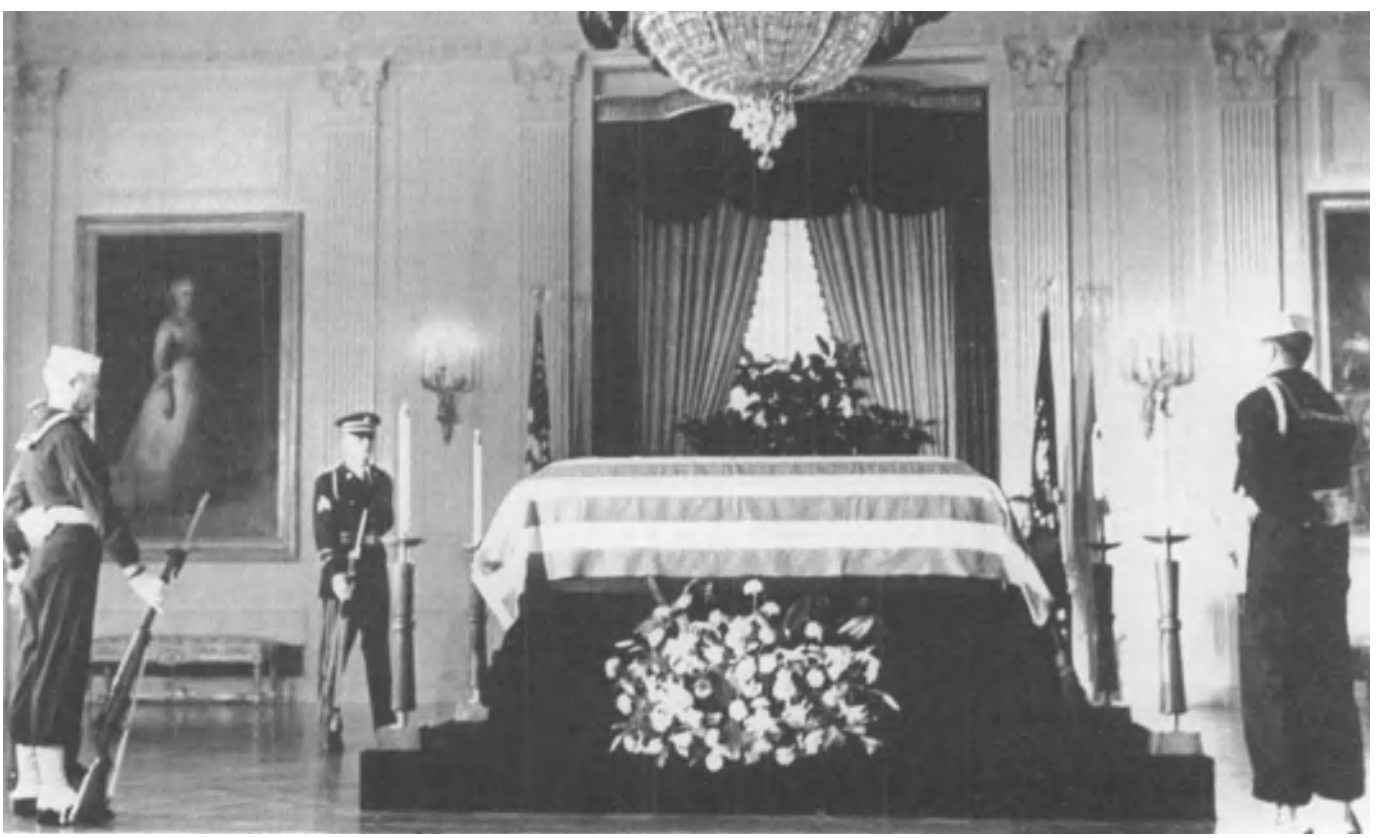
Ruby is shown firing a single shot into Oswald's abdomen, a lethal wound, before he was grabbed by officers.

Jack Ruby (center) is shown with interviewing newsmen, grandstanding for his cold-blooded murder of Oswald, a killing many later claimed was committed to prevent Oswald from revealing the identities of others involved in a conspiracy to kill President Kennedy.

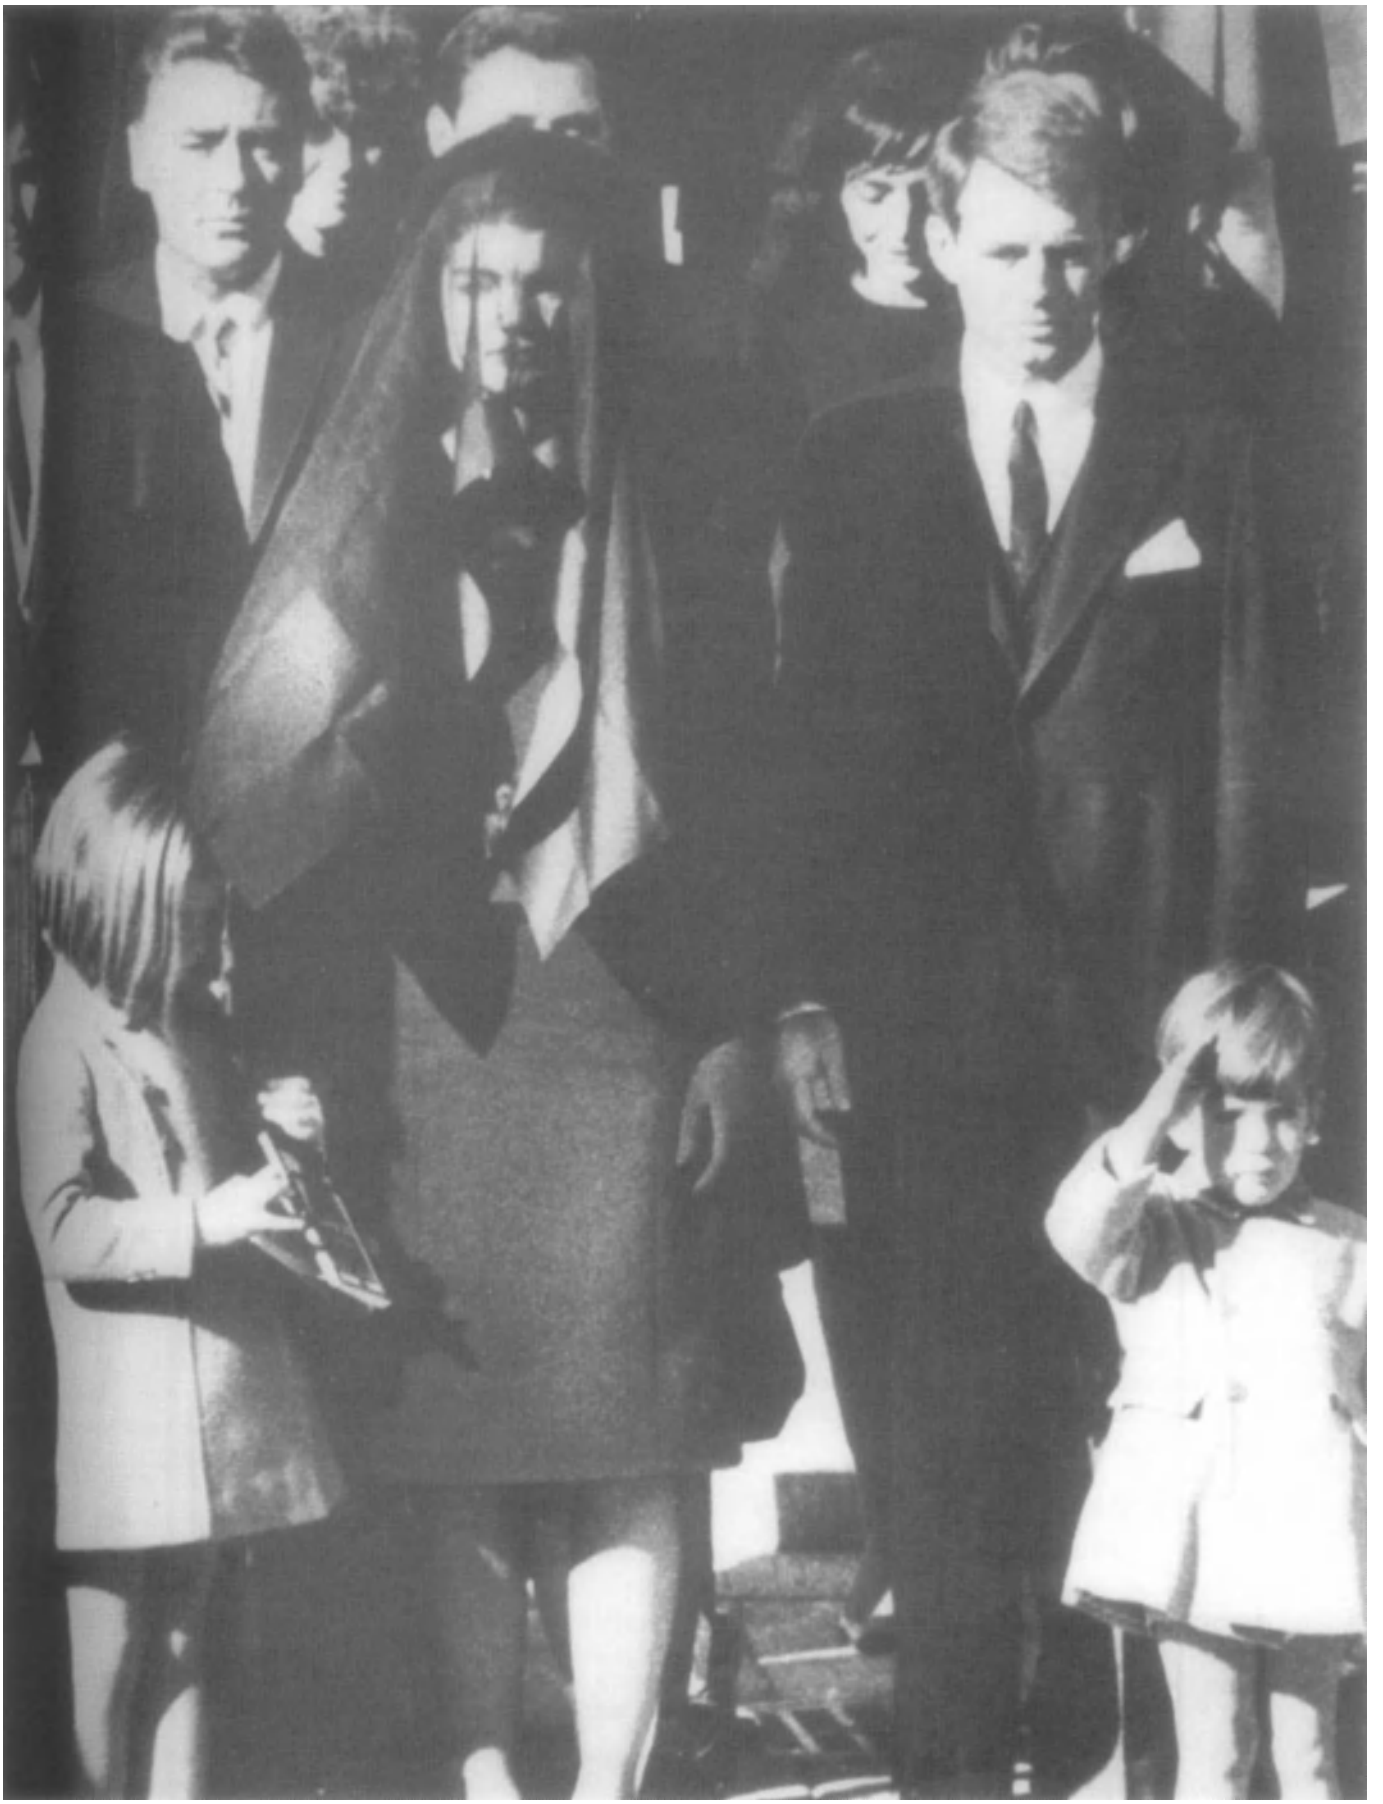
A short time later, the world watched funeral ceremonies in Washington, D.C., for the dead president as his cortege made its grim way to Arlington Cemetery. The Kennedy family stood solemnly reviewing the procession. Jacqueline Kennedy stood dressed in black, heavily veiled, and at her side was Robert Kennedy, the slain president's brother and heir apparent to the political dynasty of the Kennedy family. (He himself would the victim of an assassin's bullets five years later.) In front of them stood the president's children, daughter Caroline Kennedy, and his little son, John-John, his arm bent in a final salute to his martyred father. The procession was thronged with kings, queens, prime ministers, presidents, the dignitaries of ninety-two nations. It was a sorrowful and solemn procession, the image of which would linger long in the minds of those viewing it.

Oswald was buried in an obscure plot, while his killer, Ruby, was charged with murder. He was defended at his trial by celebrated defense attorney Melvin Belli, and prosecuted by Dallas District Attorney Henry Wade. Ruby was found guilty and sentenced to die in the electric chair, but he died of cancer in 1967, before his sentence could be carried out. His death was another nagging mystery in the myriad mysteries that surrounded the death of John Fitzgerald Kennedy. To this day, Ruby is considered by some to have been part of a plot to silence Oswald, who might have revealed the identities behind that so-called conspiracy to murder Kennedy.

For many years, exhaustive investigations were conducted under the supervision of the Select Committee of the House of Representatives, commonly called the Warren Commission, but its lengthy conclusions, released in 1979, offer only Oswald



November 23, 1963: President Kennedy's catafalque is guarded by U.S. servicemen in the East Room of the White House.



Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy, actor Peter Lawford behind her and Robert Kennedy at her side, watches the final funeral procession toward Arlington Cemetery. Caroline Kennedy stands at left; to the right is John-John, raising a final farewell salute to his slain father.

as the assassin. At the same time, the Commission was vague in answering the question of whether Oswald acted alone or was a member of an organized conspiracy. The Warren Commission even allowed for the possibility of other gunmen, at least a second gunman, who may or may not have fired at Kennedy at the same time Oswald fired his three rounds.

Dozens of theories still abound, stemming from many private investigations into the assassination. One was conducted by Jim Garrison, District Attorney of New Orleans, who was convinced that a local businessman headed a conspiracy tied to organized crime that brought about Kennedy's death. (Oliver Stone's 1991 film, JFK, an utterly muddled and disorganized production, was based upon this inconclusive investigation and offered such fragmented and ambiguous theories that the issue became even more confused.) Another persistent theory was that members of organized crime were behind the killing and had used their "gopher" Ruby to eliminate Oswald, who was profiled as nothing more than a "patsy" (set-up). The Soviet Union's KGB was labeled as another architect of the assassination, one that trained the naive Oswald as a killer robot, sending him to murder Kennedy, who had humiliated Soviet leaders in the Cuban Missile Crisis.

Another theory, which embraced part of Garrison's notions, was that Texas politician Lyndon Baines Johnson, was behind the murder. A power-lusting Johnson arranged the assassination, according to swindler Billie Sol Estes, a fellow Texan, who claimed that Johnson was a secret partner to his bilking schemes that reaped millions before he was sent to prison. Estes claimed that a henchman of Johnson's, a man named Wallace, who served as Johnson's "hitman" and had disposed of many of Johnson's political and business enemies, was the actual shootist, a marksman who fired the lethal bullet into Kennedy's brain from ambush behind the fence atop the grassy knoll.

Estes did not stop there, but went on to insist that this same killer murdered Mary Pichot Meyers, a Washington socialite, in 1964, a one-time Kennedy mistress, who kept a diary that contained incriminating evidence on Johnson and who was slain in order to silence her and obtain her explosive diary. The conspiracies involved in the assassination of John F. Kennedy seem endless and even the most fantastic theories are wholeheartedly embraced by those who insist that one mere malcontent could not have murdered the most powerful man in the world.

"WHAT THEY MAY DO TO ME, TOO"/ June 5, 1968

Robert Francis Kennedy (1925-1968), born in Brookline, Massachusetts, on November 20, 1925, was the seventh child of Joseph and Rose Kennedy. He grew up in the shadows of his older brothers Joseph, Jr., and John Fitzgerald Kennedy, both claimed by premature deaths, Joe in combat during World War II, John at the hands of a presidential assassin. Robert Kennedy would be at John's side as U.S. Attorney General, proving to be a relentless foe of organized crime, as well as a nemesis to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover. The chief of the Bureau staunchly maintained throughout his long career that no such thing as organized crime or a national crime syndicate existed, despite all the facts Robert Kennedy put before him.

Presidential candidate Robert Kennedy campaigning in California, where he won the Democratic primary in a landslide. His open support for Israel prompted an Islamic fundamentalist to plan his assassination in 1968.

Kennedy was a controversial figure in American politics, uncompromising when it came to organized crime and championing all the liberal causes advanced by his more famous brother, President John F. Kennedy. Following his brother's 1963 assassination, Robert Kennedy took up residence in New York, where he was elected a U.S. senator (1964-1968). In 1968, Senator Robert Kennedy ran for the Democratic presidential candidacy, openly siding with Israel in its ongoing confrontations with the Arab world, a position that marked him for assassination.

The 1968 presidential campaign was conducted vigorously by Kennedy. He stumped the nation to glean votes, appearing in rolled-up shirtsleeves, indicating that he was ready to work for his programs and political promises. He was seen as a champion of civil rights and the fearless foe of trusts and racketeers. From early indications it appeared that he would sweep the country and be elected by a landslide. He won the all-important California primary on June 5, 1968, and, with his wife Ethel, stood victorious before the podium in the grand ballroom of the Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles. Before him were cheering supporters, mostly young political workers.

Senator Kennedy and his wife Ethel stand at the podium in the Ambassador Hotel ballroom to thank supporters for the primary win in California on June 5, 1968. A few minutes later, Kennedy was fatally shot by an assassin.

"What I think is quite clear," the tired but jubilant Kennedy told his supporters, "is that we can work together. We are a great country, a selfless and compassionate country ... so my thanks to all of you and on to Chicago and let's win there." He would not go to Chicago. A few minutes later, like his older brother, President John F. Kennedy four years earlier and Martin Luther King two months earlier, he would be shot down by an assassin. When King was killed in April 1968, Robert Kennedy was told by a friend: "This must bring back terrible moments for you."

Kennedy thought for a moment and then replied: "Well, yes it does, and it makes me think of what they may do to me, too."

After his brief speech to his supporters, Kennedy left the stage at the Ambassador Hotel's ballroom. He made his way behind the stage, surrounded by bodyguards, going through a pantry area of the hotel's kitchen. He stopped for a moment to shake the hand of a kitchen worker, Jesus Perez, who had just washed his hands and was drying them. As Kennedy clasped Perez's hand, a small, dark-skinned youth holding a rolled-up Kennedy campaign poster approached the candidate. The poster concealed a .22-caliber revolver. (This was the same method used by Leon Czolgosz when he killed President William McKinley in 1901, Czolgosz using a handkerchief to conceal his murder weapon.)

The small man approached Kennedy with a blank, unsmiling face. He was 24-year-old Sirhan Bishara Sirhan, a Jordanian immigrant, who had lived in Palestine and hated the Israelis and all who supported them, especially Senator Robert Francis Kennedy. When only ten inches from the candidate, Sirhan threw away the poster and aimed the revolver at Kennedy, rapidly firing eight shots at almost point blank range. One of the bullets struck Kennedy in the head and he fell to the floor. Immediately, Kennedy's two black bodyguards, Roosevelt Grier, a one-time professional football player, and Rafer Johnson, an Olympic champion, along with other guards, leaped upon the assassin.

Sirhan was not easily subdued. He fought wildly, flailing his arms at his attackers and breaking a finger and spraining his ankle in the process. He was finally hustled out a back door and into police custody. The speedy method by which Sirhan was placed under arrest undoubtedly saved his life. There was such intense hatred for him that he was on the verge of being lynched by Kennedy's supporters.

Ethel Kennedy wedged her way through a crowd surrounding her fallen husband. His shirt had been torn open so that he could better breathe. His eyes were open, but he seemed not to recognize anyone and did not respond to questions. Someone placed a rosary in his hand as his wife shouted for the thick crowd to move back. An ambulance was called, but observers realized that Kennedy's wound was most likely fatal.

Next to the fallen Kennedy stood Andrew West, a reporter for the Mutual Radio network. He nervously reported the event: "Senator Kennedy has been shot! Is that possible, ladies and gentlemen? It is possible! I am right here. Oh, my God ... The Senator is on the ground! ... He is bleeding profusely ... The ambulance has been called for and this is a terrible thing! The shock is so great that my mouth is dry ... I do not know if the senator is dead or alive."

Arriving ambulance attendants placed Kennedy on a stretcher, taking him to a waiting ambulance that roared away to the Central Receiving Hospital. Here a team of surgeons fought to save Kennedy's life. It was first reported that Kennedy might recover, but it was speculated that he might be paralyzed or be reduced to a mindless hulk. Then a report stated that his head wound was critical. The next day, Robert Kennedy's death was announced.

His assassin, Sirhan, was indifferent to the murder he had committed, joking with guards at LAPD headquarters. He poked fun at John Howard, deputy district attorney, telling him that he was lazy and that he should exercise. W. C. Johnson, a police sergeant, handed Sirhan a cup of coffee, but he refused to take it, looking at the cup suspiciously. Then he asked Johnson to sample it. Johnson drank from the cup, then said: "If anything happens, we'll both go together."

Sirhan took the cup of coffee and grinned, saying: "I'll hold you to that." While talking with Johnson, Sirhan became fascinated with a current serial killer, the Boston Strangler, discussing the case with Johnson. The officer told Sirhan how the serial killer had choked to death one woman with Only moments after having been fatally shot, Robert Kennedy lies dying. A rosary had been placed in his limp hand. Like his brother, President John F. Kennedy, he moved about openly and was an easy target.

Assassin Sirhan Bishara Sirhan is held by Kennedy supporters only moments following his assassination of Robert Kennedy. He had planned to kill Kennedy a month before tracking him down in Los Angeles.

her own pantyhose and had then mocked her corpse by tying the pantyhose in a bow around her neck. "That's really cruel," Sirhan said. "I wonder often what would cause a man to do such a thing." The same question was being asked about Sirhan Bishara Sirhan. (In his rigid perspective, Sirhan undoubtedly divorced the assassination from that of a criminal act. He saw himself as an heroic man to be respected for killing Kennedy, having rendered Islam a great service.)

In a search of Sirhan's Pasadena home, investigators found a notebook in which the assassin had written: "Kennedy must be assassinated before June 5th." The killer was asked why he had written these words, but he refused to respond. Officials concluded that Sirhan intended to kill Kennedy before he won the California primary. The note was apparently written in May 1968, after Kennedy had made a strong speech in support of Israel and his intent to supply that country with arms with which to defend itself from the Arab nations that sought its destruction. Sirhan undoubtedly concluded at that time that Kennedy was an avowed enemy of his own people and resolved to take revenge upon the senator for the loyalty he had shown to his mortal enemies, the Israelis.

While Sirhan remained in custody, there was deep concern for a number of other people he had wounded in his wild assault on Kennedy. Paul Shrade, a director of the United Auto Workers union, had been hit in the head. William Weisel, an executive for the ABC network, had been struck in the stomach. Ira Goldstein of the Continental News Service, had been shot in the hip, and campaign worker Elizabeth Evans received a head wound. These persons survived, but their injuries were testament to the fury and reckless abandon of the assassin in killing his victim. Moreover, the bullets Sirhan had fired had reportedly been treated as dum-dum cartridges to make sure that they would cause the greatest damage.

Sirhan was tried in 1969 in a fifteen-week trial. He was defended by Grant Burr Cooper, one of the country's most prominent criminal defense attorneys, who recognized the assassin's guilt, but passionately pleaded for his life. Sirhan did not help his case by showing contempt for the court and the jury, blatantly confessing his guilt and acting as if he were a martyr to the Arab cause. He was convicted and, on April 24, 1969, he was sentenced to death. The assassin, however, cheated the executioner when the U.S. Supreme Court abolished capital punishment (later reinstated at the discretion of individual states.) From that time, Sirhan residing at San Quentin, doggedly applied for parole. Because Sirhan's sentence was commuted to life imprisonment, he became, under California law, eligible for parole after thirteen years. Sirhan was nevertheless routinely denied any parole.

ECCENTRIC AMERICAN ASSASSINS

The assassination attempts against two American presidents, Gerald R. Ford and Ronald Reagan, were committed by deluded if not demented would-be killers, two young women and a disturbed young man obsessed with a fledgling movie actress. Their motives in blindly attempting to kill these presidents remain inexplicable and enigmatic to this day. They were all, however, the products of overindulgence in an era that encouraged the most outlandish behavior and, in their warped perceptions, mindlessly interpreted individual expression as an acceptable right to commit political murder.

TWO WOMEN OF THE WEST/September 5, 1975; September 22, 1975

Gerald Rudolph Ford, Jr. (Leslie Lynch King, Jr., 1913-) was born in Omaha, Nebraska on July 14, 1913. His divorced mother moved with him to Grand Rapids, Michigan, and there remarried Gerald Ford, Sr., who adopted the child and gave him his name. Educated at the University of Michigan, Ford became a football star. Following service in World War II, Ford ran as a Republican for the U.S. House of Representatives and, in 1948, was elected a congressman from Michigan. Characterized as a conservative, he was an energetic supporter of Richard M. Nixon.

Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme, a follower of mass murderer Charles Manson, is shown under arrest in Sacramento, California after she attempted to kill President Gerald Ford on September 5, 1975.

Upon the resignation of Vice President Spiro T. Agnew, Ford was named the fortieth U.S. vice president by President Nixon to fill Agnew's vacated position on October 12, 1973. Ford became the first vice president to take office in the middle of an administration. Upon Richard Nixon's resignation from the presidency over the Watergate scandal, Ford became the thirty-eighth U.S. president. His rather lackluster administration was marked by two assassination attempts on his life.

The first of these attempts occurred on September 5, 1975, when Lynette Alice "Squeaky" Fromme, a follower of mass-killer Charles Manson, tried to shoot Ford at a political rally in Sacramento, California. Standing close to Ford, she aimed her .45-caliber automatic at the president, but it misfired. Secret Service agents and others pounced upon the diminutive woman, wrestling her quickly to the ground and then hustling her away. The president was stunned by the attempt on his life, never learning (nor did anyone else) why Fromme sought to kill him. She was later convicted and sent to prison for life.

A second attempt on Ford's life was equally puzzling. On September 22, 1975, Sara Jane Moore, a political malcontent and a woman with a history of mental problems, fired several aimless shots at Ford while he was outside a San Francisco hotel. Fast-acting Secret Service agents shoved Ford out of the line of fire, while quickly subduing the would-be assassin. She, like Fromme, gave incoherent reasons for the attempt on Ford's life. And, like Fromme, she was convicted and sent to prison for life.

Gerald Ford, it was believed, was the symbolic target of these two women, who vaguely believed he represented the policies and political behavior of the disgraced Nixon. By attempting to kill Ford, it was surmised, these women mistakenly thought to strike a blow at Nixon's corrupt administration. In their muddled thinking, they wrongly applied a "guilt by association" label to an otherwise innocuous, interim president, whose actions were, perhaps, the least controversial in recent American political history.

Gerald Ford is welcomed by his family on his return to the White House on the night after Fromm's attempt on his life in Sacramento. Shown (left to right) Jack, Betty, President Ford and Steve Ford.

"I AM DOING ALL OF THIS FOR YOUR SAKE"/March 30, 1981

The attempt on President Reagan's life on March 30, 1981, was the eighth such attack made against an incumbent president in U.S. history. In many ways, it was the most bizarre. Ronald Wilson Reagan (1911-), had only been in the presidential office for two months when the drama unfolded. He had just ended a speech before an assembly of building trade unionists at the Washington Hilton Hotel and was preparing to enter his limousine, when six shots sent his entourage and nearby onlookers scurrying for cover. The errant shots were fired from a .22-caliber revolver loaded with a deadly type of explosive bullet known as the Devastator. They struck President Reagan, Secret Service agent Timothy J. McCarthy, White House press secretary James S. Brady and Washington policeman James Delahanty.

Reagan, not immediately aware that a bullet had pierced his left side and entered his lung, was thrown to the ground and then into his limousine by bodyguards, then rushed to the George Washington University Hospital. Reagan was taken to surgery, where the unexploded bullet was removed. The bullet had bounced off a rib and caused the president's left lung to collapse. Nearly a gallon of blood was removed from his chest cavity during surgery. He nevertheless fully recovered from the wound. James Brady, who had been hit in the head, underwent more than six hours of surgery. He survived the ordeal, but remained partly paralyzed. The injuries to Delahanty and McCarthy were less serious.

President Ronald Reagan is shown on board a plane en route to Washington, D.C., accompanied by his wife Nancy. Reagan was selected for assassination by a mentally disturbed young man, who thought that by killing the president he would win the love of actress Jodie Foster.

A suspect was arrested on the scene and taken into custody. He was 25-year-old John Warnock Hinckley, Jr., a drifter who had recently criss-crossed the U.S. He was immediately identified at the shooting and wrestled to the ground by the president's guards. An official interrogating Hinckley told the press: "Initially, we thought he was another [Arthur] Bremer [who shot and wounded Alabama Governor George C. Wallace in 1972], but it didn't work out that way. There doesn't seem to be any information that he was stalking anybody." The gunman was the son of John Hinckley, Sr., a wealthy Denver oil engineer, who headed the Vanderbilt Energy Corporation.

The youngest of three children born to Joanne and John Hinckley, Sr., Hinckley was raised in Dallas, Texas. He completed his high school and enrolled in Texas Tech University in Lubbock, but business matters compelled his father to move the family to Denver, Colorado. In the decade leading up to the attempt on President Reagan's life, the younger Hinckley seemed to undergo a personality transformation. Some later claimed that he was tortured by an intense fear of failure and was envious of his older brother and sister, who had developed successful careers.

Hinckley's father was a staunch Republican and regular churchgoer, who quoted scripture in his company's annual report. "Something happened to that boy in the last six to eight year's time to break him from the family tradition and the family lifestyle," commented Clarence Netherland, a business associate of the elder Hinckley. "Out of the idealized, classic mid-American, all-American family, John apparently was the different one."

Hinckley retreated into a world of fantasy and self-delusion, fueled by one gnawing obsession: his insatiable desire to romance fledgling screen actress Jodie Foster, who had portrayed an underaged prostitute in Martin Scorsese's ultra-violent and excessively profane movie, Taxi Driver. This film depicts a drifter living out the miserably lonely lifestyle Hinckley himself had embraced and one that profoundly affected Hinckley's jaded outlook.

Psychiatrists studying Hinckley suggested that the would-be assassin sought to emulate the role of the urban vigilante, Travis Bickle, played with chilling aloofness by Robert DeNiro. A mailman from Lubbock, Texas, recalled a conversation he had had with Hinckley in early 1980, one in which Hinckley said: "If there was more people like the character Robert DeNiro played in the movie, there wouldn't be any problem controlling crime."

It was about this time that Hinckley began sending cards and letters to 18-year-old Jodie Foster, describing in graphic detail his growing affection for her. The actress, who was then reportedly receiving thousands of fan letters each month, disregarded Hinckley's gushing missives until Hinckley moved into an apartment near the Yale University campus, where Foster was attending classes.

Letters from Hinckley were sent to Foster's residence in New Haven, Connecticut. Alarmed at the contents of the letters, Foster turned the letters over to university officials, who kept them on file, revealing these letters after hearing of Hinckley's attack on President Reagan. The letters were then turned over to the FBI by campus police. One letter—written but never mailed to Foster only a few days before his attack on Reagan—stated:

> Jody [sic]
> I would abandon this idea of getting Reagan in a second if I could only win your heart and live out the rest of my life with you, whether it be in total obscurity or whatever. I will admit to you that the reason I am going ahead with this attempt now is because I cannot wait any longer to impress you. I've got to do something now to make you know in no uncertain terms that I am doing all of this for your sake. By sacrificing my freedom and possibly my life, I hope to change your mind about me.
>
> This letter is being written an hour before I leave for the Hilton Hotel. Jody, I'm asking you to please look into your heart and at least give me the chance with this historical deed to gain your respect and love.
>
> I love you forever.
>
> John Hinckley

When Hinckley's background was checked, it was learned that he had been arrested in Nashville, Tennessee, in October 1980, on a weapons possession charge at the same time that President Jimmy Carter visited the city, but authorities believed that Hinckley was not stalking Carter at that time. In January 1981, Hinckley purchased a .38-caliber handgun in Dallas, Texas, and was observed practicing with this weapon at a local rifle range. In February of that year, Hinckley returned to Denver to look for work, but was unable to obtain a job. He spent most of his time hanging around taverns and pool halls.

On March 23, 1981, Hinckley checked out of his $74-a-week hotel room in Denver and began a meandering trek across the U.S., ending in Washington, D.C. Officials pondered why he inexplicably flew to Los Angeles on March 25, 1981, only to board a bus bound for the East Coast the next day. He arrived in Washington on March 28, spending his final hours in the city writing his last letter to Jodie Foster in Room 312 of the Park Central Hotel, which was located just two blocks from the White House.

On August 10, 1981, Hinckley was formally indicted for his attempted assassination of President Reagan, and the wounding of Secretary Brady and two law enforcement officials. Government prosecutors had earlier rejected a plea-bargain whereby Hinckley would plead guilty to a lesser charge in return for a recommendation that he be sentenced under the special provisions of the federal juvenile law that protected offenders up to the age of twenty-six. The eight-week trial began in the courtroom of Federal District Judge Barrington D. Parker in April 1982. The degree to which a mentally deficient person was responsible for his or her own actions loomed large over the proceedings, an issue that had consumed the prolonged M'Naghten trial in England more than a century earlier.

Attorneys on both sides produced expert witnesses to support their contentions. The prosecution argued that Hinckley was perfectly sane at the time of his attack. According to prison psychiatrist Dr. Sally Johnson, the defendant "functioned too well" to be a certifiable schizophrenic. He merely wanted "to make his mark on the world," and that a presidential assassination was the perfect vehicle for the limelight-seeking Hinckley. The defense countered with Dr. William Carpenter, Jr., director of research at the Maryland Psychiatric Research Institute, who argued that Hinckley's mental illness made him virtually incapable of understanding that his attempt to kill the president was morally reprehensible.

On June 21, 1982, a jury of five men and seven women returned a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity, a decision universally assailed by almost all members of Congress, the media and the majority of the American public as a travesty of justice. Ranking members on Capitol Hill called for major revisions to the insanity laws. Called before a Senate subcommittee, the jurors explained that they had strictly been following Judge Parker's instructions to the letter, when he said that if Hinckley "either lacked substantial capacity to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law, or lacked substantial capacity to appreciate the wrongfulness of his conduct," he should be found not guilty. Consequently, Judge Parker ordered that Hinckley be confined to St. Elizabeth's Hospital in the District of Columbia. Hinckley on several occasions reportedly attempted to kill himself, but was successfully thwarted on every occasion. He was allowed visits with his parents outside the walls, but his privileges were curtailed when he resumed writing letters to actress Jodie Foster.

Secret Service agents and police officers pin would-be assassin John Warnock Hinckley, Jr. to the pavement, after his attempted assassination of President Reagan on March 30, 1981.

MURDERS IN THE MIDDLE EAST

The turbulent Middle East was (and is to the time of this writing) the most dangerous and politically disturbed area of the world in the second half of the 20th Century. This area had centered its most violent confrontations on Israel since that country's struggling birth in 1948. In that year, the U.S. was the first country to recognize Israel as a sovereign state and that recognition brought about the wrath of almost all Islamic countries that quickly aligned against the fledgling nation. To these Arab nations, Israel, carved from Palestine, was a interloping entity created by Western powers as a home (and safe haven) for millions of Jews displaced by Hitler's holocaust.

The new nation, in turn, displaced millions of Palestinians, acquiring and maintaining lands believed by Islamic leaders to be inherently Arab. Right-wing dictators, religious gurus and royal-born Arab leaders worked in military concert to destroy Israel. As a result, Israel was involved in constant confrontations with many of its neighboring Arab states, terrorism attacks, assassinations and open warfare becoming a grim routine over many decades.

Though the U.S. energetically attempted to defuse this political time bomb, it made little or no headway, until a visionary Arab leader decided that his country, Egypt, had waged too many futile wars and lost too many lives in its attempt to destroy the nation of Israel. He decided to make a lasting peace that would cement friendly relationships with his former foes and thus bring economic and social order to his country. In clasping the hand of Israel in friendship, however, Anwar Sadat, president of Egypt, like Robert Kennedy and many others before him, knowingly marked himself for assassination.

Sadat's assassins, as was expected, were Islamic fanatics, no less dedicated to their bloody cause as would be Osama bin Laden and his followers, who engineered the U.S. terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, D.C. twenty years later. (See Terrorism.) Fourteen years after Sadat was killed, Yitzhak Rabin, who sought to maintain peace with Islamic foes with the same dedication embodied by Sadat, was killed by right-wing fanatics of his own country, fanatics desperate to deny Palestinians the same independence that Israel had so long fought to preserve for itself.

"KILL THE TRAITOR!"/October 6, 1981

The murder of Egypt's president, Anwar Sadat (Anwar as-Sadat, 1918-1981) on October 6, 1981, was almost as spectacular as the massive military parade Sadat was reviewing at that moment. In fact, many of those in the reviewing stand, Sadat included, thought that the soldiers rushing toward them with automatic weapons raised in their direction were actually part of the ceremonies. Only a few moments before he was fatally shot, Sadat raised his arm and snapped a salute at the man about to kill him by firing four bullets into his body.

The assassination of Sadat was not an impulsive act, but one that had been in the making for some time. Many plots involved in killing Sadat had been fermenting for years, with some nearing completion two years before the actual assassination. Sadat well knew that he had been marked for death by Islamic extremists, but this was an accepted threat for any Arab leader who courted friendship with Israel and, to a lesser degree, the West. While resolving to bring Egypt into the 20th Century, Sadat was also determined to break with the archaic system by which his impoverished country replaced its leaders in one coup after another, replacing one tyrant after another.

Sadat came from a middleclass background and early on entered the military, becoming a cadet in the Egyptian army in 1937. He befriended Gamal Abdel Nasser, another cadet. Both believed that Egypt suffered from two corruptive forces, their own venal leaders and the oppressive rule of the British, which occupied the country in 1881 and made it a British protectorate in 1914 in order to control the Suez Canal. When entering the Egyptian officer corps, Sadat created an organization bent on establishing an Egypt free of foreign colonization. In 1942, while Egypt was ruled by a titular monarchy, Sadat was arrested and imprisoned for seditious activities, although he had never planned the violent overthrow of the government.

Released in 1948, Sadat was reinstated in the Egyptian army and became the right hand aide of his old friend Nasser. Both planned a bloodless coup to overthrow the corrupt government of King Farouk, who had looted the country to support his lavish lifestyle. On July 23, 1952, Nasser sent Sadat to Alexandria, where Sadat compelled Farouk to abdicate and leave the country. With the army under Nasser's control, Farouk complied and went into luxurious exile on the French Riviera. Nasser established a republic in 1953 and nationalized the Suez Canal in 1956. Despite all of his boyhood promises, Nasser remained the dictator of Egypt for eighteen years, elected repeatedly to the post of president through a one-party system. His regime was as harsh and totalitarian as Farouk's. Sadat silently served him as his chief aide.

When Nasser died of a heart attack in 1970, Sadat became president of Egypt. Thanks to Nasser's half-baked socialist regime, Egypt was a country teetering on financial ruin by the time Sadat took power. The country was then barely retaining diplomatic relations with the West and, also thanks to Nasser's scheming, had deeply involved itself with the Soviet Union, which hoped to gain a foothold in North Africa. By 1972, however, Sadat broke with the Soviets, expelling more than 15,000 Russian engineers and workers. He then cemented diplomatic relations with the U.S. Egypt's prestige, however, was still held in low esteem, especially after Israeli forces humiliated the Egyptian army in the 1967 war, where it gained control of most of the Sinai peninsula.

In October 1973, Sadat sent Egyptian forces in a swift tank attack which captured the Suez Canal and tore through the Israeli-occupied Sinai. This later became known as the Yom Kippur War, one ending with Egypt at a slight military disadvantage, but one that boosted its image and that of Sadat. At home, Sadat instituted many reforms, closing detention centers and prohibiting arbitrary arrests. He was re-elected to a six-year term as president by the Egyptian parliament in 1976.

Egyptian President Anwar Sadat (right, in suit and dark glasses) attends the 1975 funeral services for Saudi Arabia's King Faisal, who had been killed by a family member. Sadat's own assassination would come six years later.

Though Sadat had for years paid lip service to Arab nationalists and Islamic radicals, he aggressively sought the friendship of Western countries, particularly the U.S. and, in November 1977, took the surprising step of approaching Israel with the offer of a long-lasting peace between the two countries. This move shocked and angered the radical Arab leaders and Islamic fundamentalists, but Sadat nevertheless proceeded to cement relations with Israel, signing a peace treaty with Israel in 1979, a farsighted act that won for Sadat and his Israeli counterpart, Prime Minister Menachem Begin, the Nobel Peace Prize.

Though Sadat appeared to many Arab leaders as a compromiser, the Egyptian president worked hard to advance the Palestinian cause, meeting with President Ronald Reagan in August 1981 and urging the U.S. to enter negotiations with the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). When returning from this trip, Sadat was met with rising opposition, so violent that he ordered the arrest and imprisonment of more than 1,500 political dissidents. Among those imprisoned was the brother of an Islamic fanatic, Khaled Ahmed Shawki el Islambouli, a lieutenant in the Egyptian army and leader of an extremist sect called Takfir Wal-Hajira ("Repentance of the Holy Flight"). The founder of this sect, Sayyed Kotob, had been hanged for plotting the assassination of Nasser in 1966.

The sect was an offshoot of the ancient Muslim Brotherhood, which was dedicated to the killing of any Muslim leader branded as a heretic and traitor to Islamic fundamentalism. The Brotherhood traced its origins back to the 11th Century, claiming to have historic links to the dreaded Order of the Assassins. Islambouli believed himself, like Osama bin Laden, to be a religious descendant from that ancient organization. He diligently began to plan Sadat's assassination, selecting as his target date October 6, 1981, the day when Sadat would be reviewing troops in Cairo in celebration of the anniversary of the Yom Kippur War.

On that day, Islambouli loaded himself and several other heavily armed men into a truck that would accompany the troops on review. Sadat, wearing his full bemedaled uniform, sat in the first row of the reviewing stand, accompanied by his 52-year-old vice president, Hosni Mubarak. At a little after 1 p.m., a flight of Egyptian war planes flew over the reviewing stand. Sadat and his retinue stood up, looking skyward. With their attention averted, Islambouli ordered his men out of the truck and they raced across the reviewing field, firing from automatic weapons into the reviewing stand. As Islambouli ran forward, he shouted to his men: "Kill the traitor! Kill the traitor! Attack!" He threw a grenade that landed far short of the reviewing stand and exploded without causing any injuries. Another assassin tossed a second grenade, but this failed to explode.

Islambouli and the others then charged the reviewing stand, firing their weapons into the startled crowd. In a split second, Sadat took his eyes off the overflying planes, glancing at his Right-wing Muslims are shown attacking the reviewing stand on which President Sadat was mortally shot on October 6, 1981. He was assassinated by Islamic fundamentalists for making peace with Israel.

Among the dead and wounded at the reviewing stand in Cairo, President Sadat lies on a stretcher (above right), waiting to be air-lifted by helicopter to a hospital. He would die two hours later.

attackers. He was obviously confused by their actions. Sadat, in a final military gesture, inexplicably brought his hand to the bill of his cap and saluted Islambouli and his men. Perhaps he thought this might cause the attackers to pause and instinctively revert to military discipline and cease the attack.

His killers, however, were dedicated assassins, not devoted soldiers. They riddled the crowd with their gunfire. Sadat was struck by four bullets, two entering the left side of his chest, one striking near the collarbone that lodged in his neck. He swayed for some seconds before collapsing into his chair. Troops of the palace guard had attempted to stop the killers, but they had been shot down before the reviewing stand.

Minutes later, waves of loyal troops swarmed over the assassins, beating them to the ground. Eleven persons in the reviewing stand were dead and four palace soldiers were also killed. Thirty others were injured. Sadat, however, was still alive. A helicopter landed on the crowded reviewing grounds and removed him to a hospital, where surgeons worked for two hours to save his life. His wounds were fatal, however. Egypt had lost a great leader. Mubarak, a competent and loyal Sadat stalwart, immediately took over the reins of the government.

More than 800 dissidents were arrested as having been part of Islambouli's assassination plot. This number quickly dwindled to twenty-four, who were officially indicted for premeditated murder and conspiracy. All of the defendants, held in a large courtroom cage, were tried en masse in Cairo on November 21, 1981. They clung to the bars and shouted Islamic slogans, obscenities and threats at their accusers and prosecutors. Five of the accused openly admitted that they had killed Sadat to end "permissive Western influence" in Egypt. The arrogant Islambouli freely admitted to masterminding the assassination.

Five of the defendants, including Islambouli, were condemned to death, while seventeen others were given sentences ranging from life at hard labor to lesser prison terms. Of the five condemned killers, Islambouli and his right-hand henchman, Hussein Abbas Muhammad, since both had been members of the Egyptian army, were afforded military executions. They were shot to death by firing squad on April 15, 1982. Three others were hanged.

Leader of Sadat's assassins, Khaled Islambouli, who is shown shouting obscenities at court officials in a cage, where he and other defendants were held during their trial. Islambouli was executed by firing squad on April 15, 1982.

In the heart of Islam, for days following Sadat's murder, there was jubilation. In Beirut, Teheran, Bagdad and other Middle Eastern cities, Islamic fanatics fired automatic weapons in the air, performed bizarre death dances and gave fetes to honor the murderers. Sadat was considered by these violent terrorists to be an arch foe of Islamic fundamentalism, the very reason why Sadat had been hailed in the West as one of the most enlightened leaders of the Arab world. In the world view, Sadat was a paradoxical and unpredictable man, who not only led his own people with resolution and firmness, but one who put aside his own vanity and national pride for a greater good. Sadat had made the first positive move toward peace in a region of the earth where peace had not been known in decades. It had cost him his life.

A SLAYING IN ISRAEL/November 4, 1995

A soldier-politician and one of the youthful founders of Israel, Yitzhak Rabin (1922-1995) proved to be a masterful battlefield commander in the 1948 war for Israel's independence. He rose to the position of chief of staff by the time of the Six Day War in 1967, a lightning conflict that saw East Jerusalem, Gaza, the Golan Heights and the West Bank come under Israeli control. Rabin replaced Golda Meir in 1974 as Israel's prime minister, the first native-born Israeli to hold that office. In that capacity, Rabin gave his approval for the daring raid on Entebbe, Uganda, in 1976, to free Jewish hostages taken in a terrorist airplane hijacking.

Resigning in 1977 over a scandal involving finances, Rabin then served as ambassador to the U.S., further cementing U.S.-Israeli ties. He was again elected to the post of prime minister following a campaign that did not suggest the prolonged and eventual peace negotiations with Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat. Because of his role in the 1993 peace accords between Israel and Palestine in Oslo, Norway, Rabin, along with his political rival Shimon Peres and PLO chairman Arafat, received the Nobel Peace Prize.

Before that time, Rabin was slow to move in the direction of peace. When Palestine declared its dedicated uprising, the Intifada, in 1987, Rabin initially cracked down on the protesters, but he came to realize that the persistent and bloody demonstrations on the part of the Palestinians constituted "a full-blown popular uprising that ... could not be quelled by force," according to one of his biographers. The sustained month-after-month violence convinced Rabin that the Palestinian entity had to be recognized as an independent state and toward that end he resolved to establish peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Rabin recognized that the Palestinians were operating in the same pattern as had his own people in the Zionist movement that led to the establishment of Israel. Right-wing Zionists, however, resisted any peace settlement with the Palestinians. Among those considerable ranks was a young ultranationalist, Yigal Amir, who, with his brother Hagai Amir and a friend, Dror Adani, conspired to assassinate the popular prime minister. The conspirators considered several ways by which to kill Rabin. They thought they might rig the prime minister's car with explosives and blow him up. They considered poisoning him in a restaurant or even in his home. The conspirators finally opted for the most direct method: Someone would simply shoot down Rabin when he appeared at a public function.

Prime minister of Israel, Yitzhak Rabin, who sought peace with the Palestinians and was assassinated on November 4, 1995, at a peace rally in Tel Aviv, by a right-wing Israeli nationalist.

This murder plan was accomplished with more ease than expected, particularly since Rabin was a friendly, outgoing person who readily greeted his fellow Israelis wherever he went. Knowing this, Yigal Amir waited in the crowds of a peace rally in Tel Aviv on November 4, 1995. He worked his way slowly through the throng and when he got close enough to the prime minister, he shot and killed Rabin. The young, gum-chewing assassin, a wide and disarming smile affixed to his face, was taken into custody. He was quickly tried and convicted, then sentenced to life in prison. Hagai Amir received a twelve-year prison sentence and Adani was given a two-year sentence.

One of Yigal Amir's friends, Margalit Har-Shefi, was later indicted for failing to inform authorities of the plot. She admitted that Amir had boasted to her of his plans to kill Rabin, saying that by murdering the prime minister he would be able to stop the peace process and prevent handing over any Israeli territory to the Palestinians. Convicted, Har-Shefi was sent to prison for two years. Avishai Raviv was arrested in November 1998. He was an informer (using the code name "Champagne") for the Shin Bet intelligence service and founder of the radical right-wing group Eyal. He was later imprisoned for concealing evidence in the Rabin assassination. Eyal had conducted some of the most virulent demonstrations against Rabin during his dedicated move toward peace.

Smiling conspirators: Yigal Amir (bottom), who shot and killed Prime Minister Rabin and went to prison for life. His friend, Dror Adani, right, and brother Hagai Amir, top left, received lesser sentences for their roles in Rabin's assassination.

The West considered Yitzhak Rabin, like Anwar Sadat before him, a heroic martyr to the cause of peace in the Middle East. The sacrificial deaths of these two enlightened leaders, however, did not produce any lasting peace. Arafat, who shared the Nobel Peace Prize with Rabin, was later branded by President George Bush as a traitor to the peace Rabin gave his life to preserve. It was then believed that Arafat and the PLO had worked in secret concert with Osama bin Laden in the terrorist attacks against the U.S. in 2001.

OTHER ASSASSINATIONS AND ATTEMPTS, 1900-2002

July 29, 1900: Humbert I (Umberto I, 1878-1900), king of Italy, was fatally shot at Monza during a celebration by Gaetano Bresci, an anarchist who had traveled from Paterson, New Jersey, to carry out the murder. Bresci was later executed. Humbert was succeeded by his son, Victor Emmanuel III, who, in 1922, welcomed and supported the fascist dictatorship of Benito Mussolini.

April 15, 1902: Dimitri S. Sipiagin, Russian minister of the interior, was murdered at St. Petersburg, by student S. V. Balmashov.

New York Mayor William J. Gaynor, center, is shown bleeding from an assassin's bullet on August 6, 1910 on board a ship destined for Europe. Gaynor survived and his would-be killer, a disgruntled city employee, was sent to an institution.

July 28, 1904: Vyacheslav K. Plehve (Wenzel von Plehwe, 1846-1904), Russian minister of the interior, whose administration was marked by repressive measures, was killed at St. Petersburg, by a bomb.

December 30, 1905: Frank Steuenberg, former governor of Idaho, was killed in a dynamite blast of his Caldwell, Idaho, home, set off by IWW terrorist Harry Orchard (Albert E. Horsley). Orchard, sent to prison for life, was trapped into confessing dozens of such murders on behalf of William "Big Bill" Hayward, union boss of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), by undercover Pinkerton agent James McParland. Hayward was later tried for murder, but was acquitted on July 29, 1907, through the brilliant efforts of defense attorney Clarence Darrow.

July 1, 1909: Sir William Hutt Curzon Wylie, former British administrator in India, was shot dead by Madar Lai Dhingra because he opposed British rule in India. Dhingra was hanged.

October 24, 1909: Hirobumi Ito (1841-1909), prince and prime minister of Japan, was killed in Harbin, China, by a Korean nationalist.

August 6, 1910: William J. Gaynor, mayor of New York City, was wounded, when shot in the face by John J. Gallagher, a city employee angered at being fired from his job.

September 1, 1911: Peter A. Stolypin (1862-1911), prime minister of Russia, was fatally shot at the Kiev Opera House, in full view of Czar Nicholas II and his two daughters, by Mordka Bogrov, a spy for the Okhrana (the czar's secret police), who was also a Bolshevik assassin. Stolypin died five days later. Bogrov was later hanged. Stolypin's assassination was depicted in the 1971 film, Nicholas and Alexandra.

January 26, 1912: Liang-pi, leader of the Manchu court, disagreed with other Chinese leaders who wanted to depose China's last emperor, Henry P'u-Yi, and was slain at Tientsin by P'eng Chia-chen.

October 14, 1912: Theodore Roosevelt (1858-1919), president of the U.S., while campaigning for his third term with his Bull Moose Party, was shot and wounded at the auditorium in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, by 36-year-old bartender John P. Schrank. Tough Teddy, though shot in the chest (he would fully recover), remained standing and told a shocked audience: "It takes more than that to kill a Bull Moose!" Schrank, who claimed the ghost of President William McKinley (assassinated in 1901, see entry, pages 55-59) urged him to murder Roosevelt to prevent him from having a third term as president, was judged insane and institutionalized, dying in 1943.

Theodore Roosevelt, who survived an assassination attempt on October 14, 1912; the bullet was slowed when hitting TR's eyeglasses case.

March 18, 1913: George I (1845-1913), king of Greece, was murdered at Salonika.

July 31, 1914: Jean-Joseph-Marie-August Jaures (1859-1914), French socialist leader and pacifist, was slain in a Paris cafe by nationalist Raoul Villain, who was incredibly acquitted by an elderly jury (the youngest member being fifty-three) on grounds that he had acted as a patriot to rid France of an appeaser to Germany. Villain (who had first thought to assassinate Kaiser Wilhelm II) later moved to Majorca, Spain, where he ardently supported Francisco Franco's Falange (fascist) Party, and, in 1936, was himself assassinated by Republican gunmen invading his residence.

October 21, 1916: Count Karl von Sturgkh (1859-1916), right-wing prime minister of Austria-Hungary, was fatally shot three times in the back of the head while eating dinner in the restaurant of Vienna's Hotel Meissl & Schadin by Dr. Friedrich Adler, secretary of the Austrian Social Democratic Party, who had opposed Austria's role in World War I, that conflict energetically advanced by Sturgkh. Adler, a scholarly physicist, was sentenced to death, but released on October 31, 1918, when he was included in a general amnesty for all Austrian political prisoners.

August 31, 1918: Nikolai Lenin (Vladimir Ilich Ulyanov, 1870-1924), Russian Communist dictator, after delivering a speech to workers at a Moscow factory, was shot twice (in the left shoulder and in the neck and left lung) by Fannie Dora Kaplan (Fanya Kaplan-Roid), a mentally disturbed woman. Lenin survived, but the bullets were never removed, remaining with him until his death six years later. Kaplan, held incommunicado in the basement of Lubianka Prison, was strangled to death on September 3, 1918, by Cheka (Communist Secret Police) assassin Pavel Malkov, who later bragged that "the sentence [decreed by Cheka chief Felix Dzerzhinsky] was carried out ... with my own hands!" It was later speculated that Kaplan had acted on behalf of England's superspy Sidney George Reilly (Sigmund Georgievich Rosenblum, 1874-1925?). Reilly, a master of disguises, may have been on the scene, identified in the uniform of a Russian sailor and who may have stood momentarily over the wounded Lenin with gun in pocket to finish Kaplan's botched job, but fled upon the arrival of Red guards.

Communist dictator Lenin, who was almost killed outside a Moscow factory on August 31, 1918, by a mentally disturbed woman.

December 14, 1918: Sidonio Bernardino Cardosa da Silva Paes (1872-1918), president of Portugal, who had established a military dictatorship in 1917, was assassinated by rebels.

June 2, 1919: An attempt on the life of A. [Alexander] Mitchell Palmer (1872-1936), U.S. Attorney General, was made at Palmer's residence in Washington, D.C., by an anarchist who prematurely set off a bomb at Palmer's front door and blew himself to pieces. This and similar bomb attacks by anarchists caused Palmer to launch nationwide arrests and imprisonments of thousands of suspected left-wing radicals—socialists, Communists, anarchists, Bolsheviks—a ruthless campaign known as the "Red Scare," mostly illegal detainments and deportations organized by youthful Department of Justice attorney J. Edgar Hoover (1895-1972), who became chief of the FBI five years later.

U.S. Attorney General A. Palmer Mitchell, target of an anarchist bomber. Mitchell launched the massive Red Raids in retaliation.

March 8, 1921: Eduardo Dato Iradier (1856-1921), premier of Spain, was assassinated by an anarchist.

March 15, 1921: Mehmed Talat Pasa (1872-1921), grand vizier of Turkey, was shot to death by an Armenian assassin in Germany. Turkey, under Talat Pasa's leadership, had conducted a genocidal purge of Armenians.

November 4, 1921: Kei Hara (Hara Takashi, 1856-1921), prime minister of Japan, was at the Tokyo railroad station and was about to board a train, when he was stabbed to death by right-wing fanatic, Konichi Nakoaka, who was sent to prison.

February 15, 1922: Heikki Ritavouri, Finland's minister of the interior, was slain by a rightist extremist, who disapproved of Ritavouri's lenient treatment of Red Army prisoners in the 1918 war.

June 22, 1922: Sir Henry Hughes Wilson (1864-1922), who had served as military adviser to Protestant troops in Belfast, Ireland, during the Irish Civil War, urging ruthless persecution of the Sinn Fein, was shot to death by two Sinn Feiners, Reginald Dunne and Joseph O'Sullivan, who were executed on August 10, 1922.

August 22, 1922: Michael Collins, Irish Republican Army (IRA) leader and thereafter prime minister of the Free State of Ireland, was shot to death by IRA members, reportedly under orders from IRA leader, Eamon De Valera, at Beal-n-Blath, Cork, Ireland. The ambush attack that took the life of the fiery Collins was depicted in the 1996 film, Michael Collins.

Irish leader Michael Collins, shot dead in an ambush in County Cork, on August 22, 1922, killed by IRA assassins.

December 16, 1922: Gabjel Narutowicz (1865-1922), president of Poland, was assassinated in Warsaw, by anarchist Eligius Niewiadomski, only several days after Narutowicz took office. The killer was judged insane and institutionalized.

December 27, 1923: Crown prince Hirohito (later emperor of Japan) was unsuccessfully attacked in Tokyo by Namba Daisaku, who was executed a short time later.

November 19, 1924: Sir Lee Oliver Fitzmaurice Stack (1868-1924), British major-general and governor-general of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, was shot and killed while riding in his car in Cairo by eight Egyptian students, members of the "Society of Vengeance," a group dedicated to ridding Egypt of British rule. Seven of the killers were tracked down, identified by one of their number, and executed in 1925. The informer was sent to prison.

April 16, 1925: A massive bombing attempt was made upon the life of Boris III (1894-1943), czar of Bulgaria, when he attended the funeral of General Kosta Georgiev, who was Boris' staunch supporter and had been slain by Communists the previous day. Boris was almost killed in the bomb explosion, which demolished Saint Nedelja Cathedral in Sofia, Bulgaria, leaving 125 dead. Boris III survived a half dozen other attempts on his life and went on to cement strong relationships with Mussolini and Hitler, establishing his own military dictatorship in 1938, and ruthlessly ruling until his death in 1943.

April 25, 1925: William H. McSwiggin, a state's attorney in Chicago, Illinois, was shot to death, along with two others, in a machine gun attack reportedly led by South Side mob boss, Al Capone, during an election in which McSwiggin refused to rig votes for the Capone mob. Capone was never tried for the slaying, although a dozen witnesses initially stated that they saw him fire the submachine gun from a moving car that took McSwiggin's life.

July 10, 1927: Kevin Christopher O'Higgins (1892-1927), vice president of Ireland, was slain by IRA gunmen in Dublin, who sent six bullets into him from a moving car (they were never apprehended). O'Higgins, called "Ireland's Strongest Man," had ordered the executions of seventy-seven IRA guerrillas in 1922-1923, and was often the target of Irish revolutionaries opposed to the Free State government. O'Higgins' father, Dr. Thomas O'Higgins, had been assassinated in 1923.

November 14, 1930: Japan's prime minister, Osachi (Yuki) Hamaguchi (1870-1931), who opposed his country's militarists, was fatally shot by Black Dragon Society assassin Tomeo Sagoya. Hamaguchi would die from his wounds on August 26, 1931. His killer was found guilty of the assassination and sentenced to death on November 6, 1933, but he was released three months later on orders from Emperor Hirohito, who was reportedly behind the murder. Hamaguchi had learned that his killer was stalking him for more than a month before he was shot, notifying Interior Minister Kenzo Adachi, another member of the Black Dragon Society. Adachi, chief of Tokyo police, assigned detectives to trail the assassin, only to assure his ability to kill the prime minister. At the time Hamaguchi was shot in the Tokyo train station, Adachi's detectives and troops stood by without interfering with the assassin, having orders to protect the killer and not his victim. His successor, Tsuyoshi Inukai, also a pacifist and opposed to Japan's military expansionism, would be assassinated two years later (see entry, pages 100-107).

January 8, 1931: Emperor Hirohito of Japan was reportedly targeted for assassination by I Pong-chang, a Chinese dissident, who was later executed, but this was a staged attempt on Hirohito in an effort to make the Chinese appear as aggressors and to vindicate Japan's military incursion into Manchuria.

May 7, 1932: Paul Doumer (1857-1932), president of France, was shot to death while autographing books in Paris during a book fair sponsored by the Rothschild Foundation to honor French veterans of World War I (Doumer had lost four of five sons in that war). His killer, Dr. Paul Gorgulov (or Gorgoulov), a Russian immigrant, was thought to be a Soviet assassin. He was executed by the guillotine some months later.

Chicago mob boss Al Capone, who was seen by witnesses to kill state's attorney McSwiggin in 1925; the witnesses recanted.

December 30, 1933: Romanian Prime Minister Jon Duca, who had outlawed the Iron Guards, a fascist paramilitary organization, was shot to death by five Iron Guardists while alighting from a train in a small Carpathian town, his assassination ordered by Iron Guard leader Cornelius Zelea Codreanu. The assassins escaped.

December 1, 1934: Soviet revolutionary leader Sergei Mironovich Kirov (1888-1934), was slain in Leningrad, Russia, shot to death by government employee Leonid V. Nikolayev, who, along with twelve others were shortly tried and executed. Kirov's murder, according to best reports, was secretly engineered by Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin, who used Nikolayev as a pawn to launch a massive purge of all old Red Guard revolutionaries (seen by the paranoid Stalin as political rivals plotting his own assassination). The Stalin purge saw hundreds quickly tried in kangaroo courts as traitors, their imprisonments and executions shortly following. The 1991 film, The Inner Circle (AKA: Blizhnij Krug), profiled the Kirov killing, as well as a devastating portrait of Stalin.

February 4, 1936: Nazi leader Wilhelm Gustloff, was shot and killed at his residence in Davo, Switzerland by 27-year-old David Frankfurter, a Jewish medical student. Frankfurter stated that he murdered Gustloff, who had boasted he would turn Switzerland into a vassal state of Hitler's Third Reich, to rid the country of "a virulent pestilence." The assassin was sent to prison for eighteen years, the maximum sentence under Swiss law. Hitler used this assassination to launch widespread arrests and executions of Jews in Germany.

Nazi leader Wilhelm Gustloff, killed in 1936, after stating that he would convert Switzerland into a Nazi province.

Gustloff's killer, Jewish medical student David Frankfurter, shown at left in a Swiss court, before being sent to prison. His sentence enraged Hitler, who thought it lenient and caused him to step up his genocidal campaign against Jews.

February 26, 1936: Black Dragon assassins, operating under secret orders from militarists and Emperor Hirohito, killed Keisuke Okada (1868-1936), prime minister of Japan, and former prime ministers Makoto Saito (1858-1936), Korekiyo Takahashi (1854-1936), along with high-ranking army officers, all liberals who opposed Japan's military expansionism. These murders were part of a staged military uprising to make it appear to the West that the emperor was not in control of the country and that he was helpless to prevent military leaders from launching war in China and throughout the Pacific, a course of conquest Hirohito secretly planned with Baron Giichi Tanaka and others (see Inukai entry, pages 100-107).

July 16, 1936: Edward VIII (1894-1972, Duke of Windsor), king of England, was at London's Constitution Hill, when Jerome Pannigan hurled a loaded gun at him, causing no harm. Pannigan was sent to prison. Edward abdicated in December 1936, in favor of his brother and successor, George VI, in order to marry an American, Wallis Simpson (nee Warfield), who had two previous divorces. The controversial marriage was then unacceptable to the British government, which gave Edward an ultimatum—retain the throne or, if wedding Simpson, abdicate. He chose the latter. Some later claimed that Pannigan's futile attempt on his life influenced Edward's decision, but a British official more aptly depicted that decision: "In this rare instance, love triumphed, not fear of death."

July 16, 1936: Michael Stelescu, leader of the Brothers of the Cross, a Romanian fascist paramilitary organization in league with Codreanu's Iron Guardists, was shot to death by Codreanu's assassins in his bed, while he was recuperating in a Bucharest hospital from an operation. His killers admired Howard Hawks' 1932 crime film, Scarface, in which a rival is murdered while recuperating in a hospital, assassins carrying flowers into his room before shooting him to death. In this instance, the assassins fired thirty-eight bullets into their victim before leisurely leaving the hospital. Stelescu, ardently anti-German, had broken with Codreanu by refusing to work with Third Reich Nazis to take over the Romanian government.

August 18-19, 1936: Federico Garcia Lorca (1898-1936), great Spanish poet, dramatist and supporter of the Republican government, was arrested in Granada by Franco's Falangists (fascists). He was briefly imprisoned and then executed on orders of Falangist Governor Valdes Guzman. Fascist General Queipo de Llano personally supervised the firing squad that marched Lorca to a lonely countryside spot and shot him to death. This assassination was chillingly depicted in the 1997 film, The Disappearance of Garcia Lorca.

November 7, 1938: Ernst von Rath, a Nazi official, was fatally shot by Herschel Grynszpan, a Jewish student. Hitler, as he had done in the 1936 slaying of Nazi leader Wilhelm Gustloff, used this assassination to expand his genocidal persecution of the Jews, ordering widespread killings, unlawful arrests and imprisonments throughout Germany, creating savage nationwide mayhem against all Jews, which was later known as "Crystal Night."

Herschel Grynszpan, who assassinated Nazi official Ernst von Rath in 1938. The killing was used by Hitler to unleash a savage blood purge against Jews.

November 29-30, 1938: In an effort to rid itself of fascist leaders, the Romanian government imprisoned scores of Iron Guardists, sending their leader, Cornelius Zelea Codreanu (1899-1938) and seventeen of his top henchmen to prison. En route to Jilava Prison, the convicted Iron Guardists were removed from a truck along a lonely roadway where government assassins killed them all, including Codreanu, with machine gun fire. Codreanu had founded the Iron Guard in 1927, an anti-Semitic, anti-Communist organization that swelled to thousands of followers, who, for a decade, and almost at will destroyed Jewish-owned shops and beat and killed Jews, as well as left-wing opponents. It was Codreanu who had ordered the assassination of Romania's Prime Minister Jon Duca in 1933.

September 21, 1939: Romanian Premier Armand Calinescu (1893-1939), who had ruthlessly suppressed fascist Iron Guardists for two years on orders of King Carol II, was shot and killed in Bucharest by Iron Guard assassins, chiefly in retaliation for the 1938 assassination of Iron Guard leader Cornelius Zelea Codreanu.

March 13, 1940: Sir Michael Francis O'Dwyer, former governor of Punjab, was shot to death in London by extremist Udham Singh, a Sikh, who was hanged on June 25, 1940.

November 17, 1941: Ernst Udet (1896-1941), aviation pioneer, World War I German ace and a German Luftwaffe general under Hermann Goering, died under mysterious circumstances. He reportedly offended Adolf Hitler while intoxicated and was ordered to commit suicide or be assassinated.

December 24, 1942: Jean-Louis-Xavier-Francois Darlan (1881-1942), a French admiral and high commissioner for the Vichy Administration in North and West Africa, was murdered in Algiers by monarchist Fernand Bonnier de la Chapelle, who shot and killed Darlan in his offices. The assassin was later executed.

November 6, 1944: Walter Edward Guinness (Lord Moyne, 1880-1944), former chief of the Irish House of Lords and British minister of state for the Middle East, was killed in Cairo, Egypt.

February 24, 1945: Egyptian premier Ahmed Maher Pasha was murdered in Cairo by a nationalist.

June 9, 1946: Rama VIII (Ananda Mahidol, 1925-1946), the 20-year-old king of Siam (Thailand), who intended to turn his country into a republic, was shot to death in his bed chamber at his palace in Bangkok, while recuperating from an illness (some later claimed he had been poisoned). The assassination was reportedly committed by killers working for Nai Pridi, a secret Communist, who had installed Rama VIII on the throne to subsequently dispose of him and more easily take over the country. This claim was made by Marshal Phibul Songgram. who had been a Japanese puppet during World War II and was later tried as a war criminal. Songgram seized power in Siam in a bloodless coup on November 8, 1947, vowing to hunt down the king's assassins. In 1955, two royal pages who had been stationed outside of the king's chamber on the morning of his murder, were charged with the killing. They were tied to crosses and shot to death. Rama VIII had been raised in Switzerland, crowned in 1938 at age twelve. At the time, when interviewed by newsmen in Lausanne, he stated: "I don't think it's much fun to be king. I would rather stay here and play with my electric trains."

King Rama VIII of Siam (Thailand), an unwilling monarch who was assassinated in 1946. The king was murdered in his bedroom by two royal pages.

September 17, 1948: Count Folke Bernadotte of Wisborg (1895-1948), a descendant of French aristocracy and president of Sweden (1946-1948), was shot and killed in Jerusalem by radical Zionists of the LEHI faction. As mediator for the United Nations, Bernadotte negotiated the Israeli-Arab cease fire in 1948, but was thought by right-wing Zionists to be the unwitting tool of Israel's enemies. The newly formed Israeli government under David Ben-Gurion arrested several LEHI suspects, but none were convicted in the assassination.

December 28, 1948: Mahmoud Nukrashy Pasha, premier of Egypt, was killed in Egypt by members of the Muslim Brotherhood. Hasan al-Banna, an Egyptian politician, who had founded the Muslim Brotherhood, was himself assassinated in February 1949, by agents of the Egyptian government in revenge for Nukrashy's slaying. This organization, however, went underground and members of this same Islamic sect would assassinate Egyptian premier Anwar Sadat in 1981.

July 20, 1951: Jordan's King Abdullah ibn Hussein was assassinated.

October 16, 1951: Liaquat Ali Khan, prime minister of Pakistan, was shot to death in Rawalpindi.

December 23, 1953: Lavrenti Pavlovich Beria (1899-1953), deputy prime minister of the U.S.S.R., and dreaded chief of the NKVD/KGB (secret Soviet intelligence and police), was shot and killed by Politburo agents, along with several of Beria's henchmen, when they resisted arrest in their offices in Moscow, Russia. Following the death of Communist dictator Joseph Stalin, in March 1953, Beria thought to take over the Soviet government, instituting a widespread blood purge, but his enemies preempted Beria's murderous plans by killing him first.

Soviet leader Lavrenti Beria, head of the dreaded NKVD, was assassinated in Moscow on December 23, 1953.

January 2, 1955: Jose Antonio Remon (1909-1955), president of Panama, was sitting in his presidential box at the Juan Franco racetrack when machine gun fire left him dead and four other wounded by two gun men, who escaped. Vice President Jose Ramon Guizado, was charged with masterminding the assassination and was imprisoned, but later released and proclaimed innocent. Two years later, Adolfo Hans, reportedly a U.S. citizen, confessed to the murder, stating that his accomplice was William Campbell.

September 21, 1956: Anastasio Somoza Garcia (1896-1956), dictator of Nicaragua since 1933, was shot by assassins in Leon, dying from his wounds on September 29, 1956. His two sons succeeded him, the youngest, Anastasio Somoza Debayle (1925-1980) being overthrown by Sandinista rebels in 1979. He fled to Paraguay, where he was assassinated in 1980.

July 26, 1957: Carlos Castillo Armas (1914-1957), the dictatorial president of Guatemala, was shot to death by one of his own guards in Guatemala City. Castillo Armas had seized power in 1954, after his military forces overthrew president Jacobo Arbenz Guzman (1913-1971). Supported by the U.S. (CIA), Castillo Armas had suppressed unions, liberal dissent and left-wing parties.

July 14, 1958: King Faisal II (1935-1958), king of Iraq since 1939, along with his uncle, Crown Prince Abdullah and (the following day) Prime Minister Nuri as-Said, were assassinated at the royal Baghdad palace during a military coup led by General Kassem (Qassim), who was later ousted and executed on February 9, 1963.

September 25, 1959: Solomon Bandaranaike, prime minister of Ceylon, was killed in Colombo by a Buddhist monk.

September 9, 1961: Charles de Gaulle (1890-1970), president of France, was the target of an unsuccessful assassination in Paris by a killer (or killers) reportedly sent to murder the great French hero of World War II by a cabal of militarists. Several more attempts were made throughout the next two years. One of these attempts was profiled in the novel, The Day of the Jackal and 1973 Fred Zinnemann film of the same title.

April 1, 1963: Quinim Pholsena, foreign minister of Laos, was murdered in Vientiane by Chy Kong, the victim's bodyguard, who confessed to the assassination.

November 2, 1963: Ngo Dinh Diem, dictator of Vietnam, was shot to death by an assassin while being held prisoner in the back seat of an armored car. His brother, Ngo Dinh Nhu, was also killed, stabbed to death. Ngo Dinh Diem had been elected president of Vietnam in 1955, but was overthrown a short time before his murder by a U.S.-backed coup led by General Duong Van Minh. His assassins were never apprehended.

Deposed Vietnamese President Ngo Dinh Diem, assassinated in 1963, along with his brother Ngo Dinh Nhu in a U.S.-supported coup.

September 27, 1964: General Adib Al-Shishakli, deposed Syrian leader, was killed in exile in Brazil by a fanatical Druse leader who believed his people had been persecuted by the victim.

January 21, 1965: Hassan Ali Mansur (Mansour), premier of Iran, was murdered in Teheran. Four assassins were later executed.

September 6, 1966: Hendrik Frensch Verwoerd (1901-1966), prime minister of South Africa, who had strictly upheld the country's racial segregation (apartheid) and had forcibly resettled large colonies of blacks, was stabbed to death in parliament at Cape Town by Dimitri Stifanos. The assassin was later judged insane.

April 5, 1967: U.S. Vice President Hubert Humphrey, was the target of an apparent murder plot during his visit to West Berlin by eleven conspirators, who were arrested and imprisoned.

August 26, 1967: George Lincoln Rockwell, head of the American Nazi Party, was slain in Virginia.

October 8, 1967: Ernesto "Che" Guevara (1928-1967), Cuban Communist and revolutionary, was captured by government forces in Bolivia, where he had attempted to import a Communist revolution and was killed, along with some of his followers. Argentine-born Guevara had been Fidel Castro's military commander in the overthrow of Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista y Zaldivar in 1959. His life and assassination was profiled in the 1969 film Che!

February 3, 1969: Dr. Eduardo Mondlane, president of Mozambique Liberation Front, was killed when he received a bomb by mail at Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, sent by unknown assassins.

July 5, 1969: Thomas (Tom) Joseph Mboya (1930-1969), minister of economic planning for Kenya, was murdered at Nairobi by members of the Kikuyu tribe. Mboya was an ardent nationalist and member of the Luo tribe.

May 29, 1970: Pedro Eugenio Arambaru, former president of Argentina, was abducted and assassinated by terrorists whose demands for freeing political prisoners were denied.

November 27, 1970: Pope Paul VI was attacked by a knife-wielding assailant when he arrived at Manila's International Airport on a state visit to the Philippines. The Pope was unharmed.

November 28, 1971: Wasfi-at-Tall, prime minister of Jordan, was killed in Cairo by Palestinian assassins belonging to the Black September group.

September 9, 1972: Dr. Ami Shachori, agricultural adviser at the Israeli Embassy in London was killed by a mail bomb reportedly sent by Black September terrorists.

March 2, 1973: U.S. Ambassador Cleo A. Noel, Jr., U.S. Charge d'Affaires George C. Moore, and Belgium Charge d'Affaires Guy Eid were killed in Khartoum, Sudan, by Palestinian terrorists.

September 11-12, 1973: Dr. Salvador Allende Gossens (1908-1973), the Marxist president (from 1970) of Chile, was ousted in a military coup led by General Augusto Ugarte Pinochet, and was assassinated at the Le Moneda Palace in Santiago, by invading Pinochet troops. The military coup was backed by the American CIA, which was later cited as the architect of Allende's murder. U.S. officials denied any such collusion, stating that Allende "blew his brains out" with an automatic handgun just as usurping troops stormed into the palace. Dictator Pinochet was later indicted on charges of crimes against humanity. The Allende slaying was profiled in the incisive 1992 documentary film, Salvador Allende.

August 19, 1974: Rodger P. Davies, U.S. ambassador to Cyprus, was shot to death in Nicosia by a sniper.

November 11, 1974: Gunter von Drenkmann, president of the German Supreme Court, was slain by members of the Second of June Movement.

February 11, 1975: Richard Ratsimandrava, president of Madagascar, was shot to death in Tananarive.

March 25, 1975: King Faisal (1905-1975) of Saudi Arabia, was fatally shot at his Ri'Assa Palace by his 27-year-old playboy nephew, Prince Faisal bin Musaed bin Abdulaziz, reportedly to avenge the death of his brother Khalid, who had been killed in an earlier demonstration. When the prince could not convince his uncle to execute the policeman who had shot his brother, he resolved to murder Faisal. The playboy prince had attended San Francisco State College and had been repeatedly arrested in America for peddling hashish and LSD in 1969. He was thought unstable but sane and was tried and convicted of his uncle's assassination, then beheaded with a gold-hilted sword, his head placed upon a pike and put on public display.

King Faisal of Saudi Arabia, shot and killed by a playboy nephew on March 25, 1975.

August 15, 1975: Sheik Mujibur Rahman, president of Bangladesh, was assassinated in a military coup.

December 23, 1975: Richard S. Welsh, CIA chief in Athens, Greece, was fatally shot as he arrived home by unknown assassins.

February 13, 1976: General Murtala Ramat Mohammed, dictator of Nigeria, was shot to death by revolutionaries.

July 31, 1976: Christopher Ewart-Biggs, British ambassador to Ireland, was slain by a bomb in Dublin, reportedly planted by IRA terrorists.

September 21, 1976: Orlando Letelier (c.1931-1976), former foreign minister of Chile, was killed when his car blew up in Washington, D.C. He had been a staunch supporter of Dr. Salvador Allende Gossens, the Marxist president of Chile, assassinated in 1973, and had insisted that Allende's murder had been orchestrated by the American CIA. Several persons were tried and imprisoned for Letelier's assassination, but were later released.

February 3, 1977: Brigadier General Teferi Bente, Ethiopian head of state and six others on the military council of power were murdered during a coup led by Lieutenant Colonel Haile-Mariam Mengistu.

March 16, 1977: Kamal Jumblat, chief of the Druse terrorist organization in Lebanon was shot to death outside of Beirut.

March 18, 1977: Marien Ngouabi, president of the Congo, was shot to death at Brazzaville.

April 10, 1977: Abdullah al-Henjiri, former prime minister of Yemen and others were fatally shot in London by Zohair Akache, a Palestinian terrorist.

July 9, 1978: Abdul Razak Al-Naif, former premier of Iraq, was shot dead in London by members of the Iraqi secret service.

November 27, 1978: George Moscone, mayor of San Francisco and supervisor Harvey Milk, a professed homosexual, were both shot and killed by former supervisor Daniel James White, after White resigned and then attempted to reinstate himself. He was defended by attorneys who claimed that White was suffering from "a sugar high" when committing the fatal shootings after having consumed several Twinkies (the controversial "Twinkie Defense"). White was sent to prison, his sentence thought lenient by the large homosexual community in San Francisco, which caused widespread riots, following the sentence, on July 15, 1979.

San Francisco supervisor Harvey Milk and Mayor George Moscone, both assassinated in 1978 by Dan White.

February 14, 1979: Adolph Dubs, U.S. ambassador, was shot dead in Kabul, Afghanistan by Afghan Muslim fanatics.

March 22, 1979: Sir Richard Sykes, British ambassador to the Netherlands, was fatally shot at his home in the Hague by terrorists.

March 30, 1979: Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, former president and prime minister of Pakistan, who was overthrown in 1977, was assassinated in Rawalpindi, Pakistan.

August 27, 1979: Louis Montbatten (1900-1979), first earl of Mountbatten of Burma, a World War II hero, was killed along with two others on his yacht off the coast of County Sligo, Ireland in a bomb explosion. The IRA claimed responsibility.

October 26, 1979: Park Chung-Hee (1917-1979), president of South Korea (whose wife had been killed in an earlier assassination attempt), along with several aides and bodyguards, was shot to death in Seoul by forces led by South Korean intelligence chief Kim Jae Kyu during a military coup. Kyu and others was later sentenced to death.

March 24, 1980: Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero, who had publicly denounced the oppressive military regime in his country, was assassinated in San Salvador, El Salvador.

April 12, 1980: William Richard Tolbert, Jr., president of the Republic of Liberia, was killed after being overthrown in a military coup led by Sergeant Samuel Doe.

September 17, 1980: Anastasio Somoza Debayle (1925-1980), deposed Nicaraguan president, was shot and killed in Paraguay December 31, 1980: General Enrico Galvaligi, chief of security for prisons confining terrorists in Italy, was shot and killed.

January 21, 1981: Sir Norman Stronge, Protestant speaker of the Northern Ireland Parliament, and his son, James, former member of the Stormont Parliament, were shot to death in their home in Armagh, Ireland.

Pope John Paul II is shown wounded in Vatican Square, Rome, on May 31, 1981.

May 13, 1981: Pope John Paul II, and two others were shot and wounded in St. Peter's Square, Rome, while the Pope was traveling in his Popemobile through a dense crowd. The attacker was Mehmet Ali Agca, a Turkish terrorist in the pay of Bulgarian Communists. The Pope recovered and Agca was sent to prison.

August 18, 1981: Rosa Judith Cisneros, civil rights leader and legal adviser to the Salvadoran Communal Union, was assassinated in San Salvador, El Salvador, as she left her home. Her killers were not found.

August 30, 1981: Mohammed Ali Rajai, president of Iran, and others were killed in a bomb blast in Teheran.

September 14, 1982: Bashir (Bishin) Gemayel, president-elect of Lebanon, was murdered in east Beirut by a bomb reportedly planted on the orders of the Syrian secret service.

November 4, 1982: General Victor Lago Roman, commander of the Brunete First Armored Division, was assassinated in Madrid, Spain, by terrorists.

March 9, 1983: Galip Balkar, Turkish ambassador to Yugoslavia, was fatally shot and his driver critically wounded in Belgrade, Yugoslavia. Balkar died on March 11, 1983. Two separate terrorist organizations took credit for the killing.

August 21, 1983: Benigno S. Aquino, Jr. (c.1932-1983), a liberal Filipino politician who had long opposed dictator Ferdinand Marcos, was murdered when he alighted from an airplane landing at the International Airport in Manila, shot several times by assassin Rolando Galman, who was also shot to death by Aquino's guards. Corazon Aquino, the victim's wife, became president of the Philippines.

October 12, 1984: British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and members of her cabinet were targets of assassins at a conference in Brighton, England, where a bomb killed five persons and injured several more people.

October 31, 1984: Indira Priyadarshini Nehru Gandhi (1917-1984), who had ruled India for seventeen years (prime minister 1966-1977; 1980-1984) with the same neutral policies established by Mohandas Gandhi (to whom she was not related) and her father, Jawaharlal Nehru, was shot to death by two of her Sikh guards. She was at the time leaving her residence outside New Delhi to meet British actor Peter Ustinov to film a television documentary. Two of her many guards lining the path along which she walked, Beant Singh and Satwant Singh, stepped from their positions and fired several shots at her, killing her on the spot. They turned themselves into police officials. Both Sikh guards had taken vengeance for the military actions of the Indian army, which had earlier suppressed a Sikh uprising in Punjab and had attacked (on June 6, 1984) the Golden Temple at Amritsar, a Sikh bastion and holy place. Beant Singh, while in custody, attempted to seize a gun from a police guard and was shot to death. Satwant Singh produced a knife from his turban and was also shot, but he lived to stand trial. He, along with Kehar Singh, a government worker who had plotted Gandhi's assassination, were convicted and hanged on January 5, 1989.

February 1, 1985: Ernst Zimmermann, president of the West German Aerospace and Armaments Association, was fatally shot in Munich, Germany, by members of the Red Army Faction.

February 28, 1986: Sven Olof Joachim Palme (1927-1986), Sweden's prime minister, was shot and killed by a lone gunman as he was leaving the Grand Cinema in Stockholm with his wife. (Palme was not escorted by bodyguards.) His widow, Lisabeth Palme, later identified the killer as Carl Gustav Christer Petersson, a 41-year-old former mental patient with a history of alcoholism, who had been convicted of manslaughter in 1980 for the bayonet stabbing of a drug addict. Petersson denied killing Palme, but was found guilty in July 1989 and sent to prison for life. The Royal Court overturned the conviction on appeal, ordering the state to pay Petersson $50,000 compensation. In 1997, prosecutors attempted to retry Petersson, but Sweden's Supreme Court dismissed the case as having insufficient evidence on May 28, 1998. The Palme assassination remains unsolved.

Mental patient Carl Petersson, who was imprisoned for the 1986 murder of Sweden's prime minister, Sven Olof Joachim Palme; he was later released, having been wrongly convicted.

June 1, 1987: Rashid Karami, premier of Lebanon, was traveling in a helicopter when a bomb detonated, killing him.

October 15, 1987: President Thomas Sankara of Burkina Faso was overthrown and slain by his deputy, Captain Blaise Compaore, who seized power.

January 25, 1988: Carlos Hoyos, attorney general of Columbia, was abducted and murdered near Medellin, Columbia, by drug traffickers. Two of Hoyos' bodyguards were also killed.

April 16, 1988: Khalil al-Wazir (Abu Jihad), PLO leader, and three others were shot to death at his home in Tunis, Tunisia. His killers were identified as Israeli commandos.

January 25, 1989: Gustavo Alvarez Martinez (1933-1989), one-time chief of Honduran military forces, was shot and killed by machine gun fire, along with his driver, while riding in a car near his home in Tegucigalpa by six assassins dressed in the uniforms of the Honduran telephone company.

August 18, 1989: Luis Carlos Galan, a candidate for the presidency of Colombia, was killed in Bogota by Medillin drug traffickers. Galan had promised to wipe out the drug-terrorist organizations in Medillin after taking office.

November 22, 1989: Rene Muawad, president of Lebanon, was killed by a bomb exploding next to his motorcade.

November 27, 1989: Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane (1929-1989), president (since 1972) of the Comoro Islands, was shot and killed during an armed attack on his palace in Moroni, led by dismissed army officer Ahmed Mohammad.

March 22, 1990: Bernardo Jamamillo Ossa, who was running for the Columbian presidency, was shot to death by a gunman at the Bogota airport.

May 21, 1991: Rajiv Ratna Gandhi (1944-1991), former prime minister of India, was killed by a bomb during an election rally at Madras. He was the son of Indira Gandhi, who was assassinated in 1984.

June 29, 1992: Muhammed Boudiaf, president of Algeria, was shot to death by a gunman in Annaba.

May 1, 1993: Ranasinghe Premadasa, president of Sri Lanka, was murdered when a bomb exploded in Colombo.

March 23, 1994: Luis Donaldo Colosio Murrieta (1950-1994), the leading candidate for Mexico's presidency, was killed at a Tijuana rally when a lone gunman, Mario Aburto Martinez, fired two shots into Colosio. Ernesto Zedillo Ponce de Leon, Colosio's campaign manager, replaced the candidate and was swept into the presidency six months later. Martinez, the assassin, a despondent factory worker, was sent to prison for forty-five years. Continued investigations ordered by President Zedillo implicated Carlos Salinas de Gortari, former president and whose corrupt administration had sent him into self-imposed exile. He was interviewed by Mexican prosecutors in Dublin, Ireland, on November 27, 1996, stating that allegations that he had been involved in the Colosio assassination were "absolutely false and irresponsible."

April 6, 1994: Cyprien Ntaryamira, Burundian president, and Juvenal Habyarimana, president of Rwanda, were killed, along with eight others, when their plane was shot down by a ground-to-air rocket.

September 28, 1994: Francisco Ruiz Massieu, a presidential hopeful in the 1994 general election in Mexico, was shot and killed by Daniel Aguilar while Ruiz Massieu was addressing a large crowd in Mexico City. Like the Colosio assassination six months earlier, Ruiz Massieu's killing was placed at the door of former president Carlos Salinas de Gortari. Enough evidence was later unearthed to convict on January 21, 1999, the president's brother, Raul Salinas de Gortari, as the mastermind behind the Ruiz Massieu killing. He joined Aguilar in prison to serve out a fifty-year term.

Raul Salinas received a 50-year prison term for his complicity in the 1994 murder of Francisco Ruiz Massieu.

September 9, 1996: Joachim Ruhuna (1934-1996), the archbishop of Gitega, Burundi, was found dead in his car, which was blown up, along with his driver, two nuns and two children, reportedly by Hutu rebels.

October 2, 1996: Former Bulgarian prime minister Andrei Lukanov was shot to death outside his Sofia home by an unidentified assassin.

July 7, 1997: Councilman Miguel Angel Blanco (1968-1997), was kidnaped and killed near Ermua, Spain, by an ETA terrorist.

November 6, 1997: Alfredo Enrique Vargas, Venezuelan ambassador to Jamaica, was found shot to death in his Kingston apartment. His assassin was never apprehended.

February 6, 1998: Claude Erigmac, prefect of Corsica, while walking to a concert, was shot in the back and killed by an unknown assassin.

April 26, 1998: Guatemalan Bishop Juan Jose Gerardi Conedera, a civil rights champion who had reviewed a confidential report that detailed abuses committed by the military and rebels during Guatemala's 36-year civil war, was bludgeoned to death outside his residence in Guatemala City. Four persons were convicted as Gerardi's assassins on June 8, 2001.

May 4, 1998: Alois Estermann, commander of the Swiss Guards that protected the Vatican and the Pope, was shot and killed, along with his wife, by 23-year-old Swiss Guard Cedric Tornay, who then killed himself. It was speculated that Tornay acted out of vengeance for not receiving recognition for his services.

Basque town councilor Manuel Zamarreno, killed by ETA terrorists in 1998, when a motorcycle carrying a bomb struck his car.

June 25, 1998: Manuel Zamarreno (1956-1998), town councilor in Renteria, Spain, was killed by a bomb planted by ETA terrorists.

October 2, 1998: Sanjaasuregiin Zorig, a minister in the Democratic Coalition of Mongolia and a candidate for the post of prime minister, was stabbed and axed to death in his Ulan Bator home. His killers were never apprehended.

November 20, 1998: Galina Starovoitova (1946-1998), a member of the Russian Duma (parliament), was shot dead while entering her apartment in St. Petersburg, Russia. Her aide, Ruslan Linkov, was wounded by the assassins, thought to be "a team of contract killers." Starovoitova had crusaded against members of the old Communist regime and worked for social and political reform. Igor Artemyev, the city's vice governor, stated that the killers were undoubtedly part of the so-called Russian Mafia: "Bandits who want to get ... property and power and kill everybody who stands in their way—not only businessmen, as before, but also politicians who interfere with them."

March 23, 1999: Luis Maria Agana, vice president of Paraguay, was ambushed and shot to death, along with his driver, by four or more unidentified assassins.

April 9, 1999: Ibrahim Bare Mainassara, president of Niger, was ambushed and shot to death by rebelling troops.

October 27, 1999: Vazgen Sarkissian, prime minister of Armenia, and seven others were shot to death, when terrorists invaded a session of parliament.

January 15, 2000: Zeliko Raznjatovic (AKA: Arkan), Serbian paramilitary chief, was shot and killed, along with two aides, in the lobby of a Belgrade hotel. Four persons were later charged with the assassination.

June 8, 2000: Brigadier General Stephen Saunders, British senior military commander in Greece, was shot and killed while driving his car through a suburb of Athens by two heavily armed assassins on motorcycles.

January 6, 2001: Laurent Kabila, president of the Democratic Republic of Congo, was shot and killed at his palace in Kinshasa by a bodyguard.

June 1, 2001: King Birendra of Nepal, along with Queen Aiswarya and seven other members of the royal family, were shot to death by Crown Prince Dipendra, who then killed himself.

September 9, 2001: Ahmed Shah Massoud, a leader of the Afghan Northern Alliance fighting the Taliban forces, was fatally wounded (dying on September 15, 2001) in a bombing attack in Northern Afghanistan by two Taliban terrorists, who gained access to their victim by posing as journalists and who were killed in their suicidal assault.

September 24, 2001: Consuelo Araujo, cultural minister for Colombia, was kidnaped and later killed by revolutionaries.

October 14, 2001: Abdel Rahman Hamad, leader of the Palestinian terrorist group Hamas and who had ordered countless terrorist acts on Israel, was reportedly shot dead by Israeli snipers.

October 17, 2001: In retaliation for the killing of Abdel Rahman Hamad four days earlier, assassins of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), shot and killed Rehavam Zeevi, minister of tourism for Israel.

December 23, 2001: Bola Ige, minister of justice in Nigeria, was shot dead at his home in Ibadan.

February 14, 2002: Abdul Rahman, minister of aviation and tourism for Afghanistan, was beaten and stabbed to death at the airport in Kabul.

May 6, 2002: Pim Fortuyn, a right-wing, openly gay politician in the Netherlands, who opposed all immigration, was shot dead outside a radio station in Hilversum. Animal rights activist Volkert van der Graaf was charged with the assassination.

July 6, 2002: Haji Abdul Qadir, vice president of Afghanistan, was shot to death near his offices in Kabul.

July 23, 2002: Salah Sherhada, who established the miliary arm of the terrorist group Hamas, was killed with fourteen others, in an air strike on Gaza City by an Israeli fighter jet, reportedly on a specific mission to assassinate the terrorist leader.

CHAPTER TWO:

BIGAMY

Bigamists for centuries have vexed law enforcement officials, enraged former spouses and left in their wayward wakes countless deserted children. The conduct of such much marrying miscreants ranges from the prosaic to the bizarre. Many illegally wedded many times in the name of passion, but most often they were inspired to their myriad marriages by the attraction of social position, money or even power.

The bigamist has proven to be a clever creature, one hard to identify and locate by hunting police. Natural and convincing actors, they are adept at eliminating backgrounds and creating new identities, destroying old documents and forging new ones in obliterating any paper trail that might disclose an illegally discarded marriage. The bigamist is a consummate con artist and, too often, a murderer, enticing and capturing his (or her) victims with the most attractive lure known to mankind—love.

THE DECEPTIVE DUCHESS/1776

One of the most sensational early cases of bigamy involved a pretty young English girl, Elizabeth Chudleigh (d. 1796), who tearfully claimed that she had been forced to become a bigamist. What brought her to international notoriety was the fact that this fetching lass illegally married into the British aristocracy and became one of London's elite through her bigamous deceptions. At her trial, Chudleigh pointed between sobs to a scheming aunt as the cruel catalyst responsible for her illicit marriage to the Duke of Hamilton.

Born in Devon to well-to-do parents, Chudleigh grew to be an attractive young woman. At the age of eighteen, she became maid of honor to the Princess of Wales and, in the social whirl of English aristocrats, was soon courted by a bevy of titled young men. Among these hopeful swains was the Duke of Hamilton. She accepted his proposal of marriage, knowing, however, that the nuptials could not take place until he had completed certain duties in Europe.

Chudleigh's manipulative aunt, a Mrs. Hammer, had other plans. According to Chudleigh's courtroom tale, Mrs. Hammer disliked the Duke of Hamilton and preferred that her niece marry Captain Hervey, the son of the Duke of Bristol. To bring about that union, Mrs. Hammer proceeded to sabotage the long-distance relationship between Chudleigh and the Duke of Hamilton by intercepting and keeping letters from the Duke and spreading lies to her niece about the many infidelities committed by her intended.

From these dark communications, Chudleigh concluded that the Duke of Hamilton no longer loved her. She reluctantly agreed to marry Captain Hervey, the ceremony being conducted in a private chapel near Winchester in Hampshire. She realized her mistake when the Duke arrived from abroad, pleading to marry her. She turned him away, but did not mention her recent union to Hervey, going to Germany with her new husband on an extended honeymoon.

Chudleigh's marriage to Hervey proved to be a disaster. When the couple returned to England, Hervey, learning of his wife's affection for the Duke, grew bitter and abusive. He took to drink and began to use up his small funds. Then Hervey vanished. Before she was engulfed by poverty, Chudleigh resolved to set things right by simply destroying any record of her marriage to Hervey by tearing the official record of their wedding out of the register book.

Further, Chudleigh flattered and bribed a Mrs. Merrill, at whose mansion her marriage had been held, to destroy the household records that documented the Hervey union. Other than these documents, Chudleigh believed that there was no other written evidence to prove that she had ever been wed to Hervey. The clergyman who had conducted her wedding ceremony had since died.

England's infamous 18th Century bigamist, Elizabeth Chudleigh, shown when she was in her late teens.

Immersing herself in London society, Chudleigh soon won back the attentions of the Duke of Hamilton, whom she married in March 1769. Traveling with her husband some years later in Europe, Chudleigh had an argument with her husband's nephew. The nephew, who had never liked his aunt, began to investigate her background and, some weeks later, confronted Chudleigh with the accusation that she had illegally married his trusting uncle. He vowed that he would file a criminal suit against her on a charge of bigamy.

Chudleigh's trial for bigamy began on April 15, 1776, in London's Westminster Hall. The prosecutors, to avoid further scandal among the aristocracy, offered to settle out of court for a fine of £10,000. Although her generous and understanding husband, who did not for a minute believe his wife guilty, offered to pay the fine, the duchess would have none of it. Chudleigh, believing all records of her bigamous marriage to Hervey had been long since destroyed, insisted upon her innocence and thought that "vicious gossip" coming from her accusers would be quickly discarded by the court and that she would be vindicated.

The prosecution, however, had a star witness, Ann Cradock, a servant in the Merrill home, who swore on the witness stand that Chudleigh had married the missing Captain Hervey. (His disappearance was the cause of speculation that more than suggested he had been murdered by the cuckolding Chudleigh.) Further, Cradock testified that Chudleigh had given birth to Hervey's child while he was on duty at sea. Defense attorneys quickly accused Cradock of taking a bribe from the vindictive nephew who had brought about the suit.

Captain John Hervey, Chudleigh's first husband; records of this marriage were destroyed so that Chudleigh could wed a British lord.

Chudleigh at the time she was tried for bigamy as the Duchess of Hamilton in 1776; her refusal to settle brought about her disaster.

What sealed the fate of the duchess was the ledger she had tampered with years earlier and the statements of a clergyman's widow. The mutilated book surfaced at the trial and prosecutors took great pains to point out where the telltale page recording Chudleigh's marriage had been torn out. Moreover, the wife of the deceased clergyman testified that, although she had not been present at the ceremony, she recalled her husband mentioning the Hervey-Chudleigh wedding many times.

The court ruled against Chudleigh on April 22, 1776, but it took no action to imprison her for what was then a criminal offense demanding severe punishment. Her embarrassed husband paid her fine and then disowned his marriage. Chudleigh was stripped of her title. Disgraced, she left for France, living on a small pension provided by the kindly Duke of Hamilton and dying in Calais on August 26, 1796. She was remembered by her French neighbors as a quiet old woman, who tended to her flowers and knitting and often strolled along the waterways, peering for hours at the English Channel separating her from England, where she once dallied and danced with the peers of its aristocracy.

TWO BIGAMOUS RAKES/1803/1813

Two men, one in England, the other in Ireland, shocked their nations through their bigamous marriages in the late 18th and early 19th centuries. The first of these was a dedicated confidence man, the wholly unscrupulous John Hatfield (1769-1803). Born of poor parents in Cheshire, England, Hatfield was gifted with a smooth manner of speech, which he employed well in his years as a master swindler. His career began as a nomadic linen-draper, and, in his travels, encountered a young woman distantly related to the ducal house of Rutland.

Learning that she had a small dowry, Hatfield married the young woman and the couple moved to London. The Hatfields produced several children, but when the dowry ran out, Hatfield, assuming a false name, borrowed money and then deserted his family. He was exposed and sent to debtor's prison. When his wife died in poverty, Hatfield appealed to the Duke of Rutland, asking in the name of his dead wife that the duke aid him, saying that he was penniless and was the only parent of starving children.

The duke secured Hatfield's release and when Rutland became the Viceroy of Ireland, Hatfield followed him to Dublin, where he stayed in the best hotels and ran up enormous bills, falsely claiming to be in the duke's service. Thrown into Dublin's Marshalsea Prison for bad debts, Hatfield again wrote to the duke, begging for help. The kindhearted Rutland again paid his bills and had Hatfield released, but only on the condition that he leave Ireland.

Hatfield departed for Scarborough, England, but he did not reform. He posed as a wealthy gentleman, accruing large debts, until he was sent to prison for nine years. During that time, he was visited by a woman named Nation, a social reformer who came under the spell of the oily-tongued Hatfield. Upon his release, Hatfield married this gullible woman, spending all her money and then deserting her. He surfaced in Keswick, staying at the Queen's Hotel, where he posed as a wealthy retired officer, using the alias of Colonel Alexander Augustus Hope and claiming to be the brother of Lord Hopetoun. He seduced Mary Robinson, the attractive daughter of a rich innkeeper.

After cashing several forged checks, Hatfield ran off with Robinson, bigamously marrying her in Scotland. After a short time, as was his custom, Hatfield deserted the woman and illegally married at least two more women, supporting his lavish lifestyle through forged checks. He was by then identified as a notorious swindler, turned in to authorities by the very women he illegally married and deserted. Hatfield was arrested while wooing another gullible female in Carlisle and was quickly convicted of forgery and on several counts of bigamy, the latter offense serious enough to assure his death as an habitual criminal. He was hanged on September 3, 1803.

Henry Morris never harbored the grand illusions of John Hatfield. His bigamous ambitions had little or nothing to do with wealth and position. His appetite for women was simply insatiable, some later insisting that Morris was afflicted with a strange mental malady to marry any woman that caught his much-roving eye. In 1810, Morris worked in Dublin, Ireland, as a teacher, but this position was achieved, it was later learned, through fraud. He had presented forged credentials to qualify him for the job.

British bigamist John Hatfield, who was hanged in 1803, following his conviction.

Some time in 1812, while playing billiards with the father of one of his students, Dennis Murphy, Morris stated that he loved the 15-year-old Murphy girl. Because of his daughter's age, Murphy told Morris that he could visit the girl at his home, but that he would have to wait until she reached the age of sixteen to marry her. Morris then observed a prolonged courtship that went on for five months. While supervised by her father, the enraptured Murphy girl strolled through Dublin streets with Morris and sat at his side in her home while he read love sonnets to her.

The long courtship, however, worked a strain on Morris' patience. He began to drink and lose interest in his teaching chores. He then began to disappear from classes he was obligated to teach at the same time the Murphy girl was also listed as absent from those classes. Five months later, Morris abandoned all marital protocol and eloped with the underaged Murphy, going to Scotland, where the couple married.

Returning to Dublin, Morris attempted to make amends to Dennis Murphy, but the irate father grew suspicious and began to look into his new son-in-law's background. He discovered that Morris was self-taught and had no qualifications as a teacher. Worse, Murphy learned that the young man had wooed and abandoned four different young girls and that he was still married to a woman named Maria Fontaine. Murphy and some of his relatives obtained evidence proving that Morris had married Fontaine on May 15, 1811, abandoning her as he had with three other young females.

Murphy brought a criminal charge of bigamy against Morris, who was indicted in Dublin, in 1813. Three weeks before his trial, the prosecution's star witness, Maria Fontaine, collapsed and died of illness. Morris was nevertheless imprisoned and brought to trial. Throughout this period, the Murphy girl never ceased to stand by him, bringing home-cooked meals to his cell and holding his hand in court, weeping and vainly imploring her father to drop the charges against her husband.

Henry Morris (second from left, with his bigamous wife clinging to him), in a Dublin court in 1813, following his seven-year sentence to a penal colony.

Morris was convicted through the written statements of the dead Maria Fontaine. When the guilty verdict was announced, the defendant's teenage wife cried out to the court that it had committed a terrible injustice. The presiding judge sentenced Morris to seven years of hard labor at a penal colony in Australia, reminding him that the sentence was lenient in that other men had been hanged for less serious crimes. As Morris was being taken away by a court guard, the faithful Murphy girl ran to him, frantically holding on to him, as if she could withstand the verdict of the court. She was restrained, while her bigamous husband was sent to a ship sailing for Australia. She reportedly followed him there, waiting patiently until he was released and they were reunited.

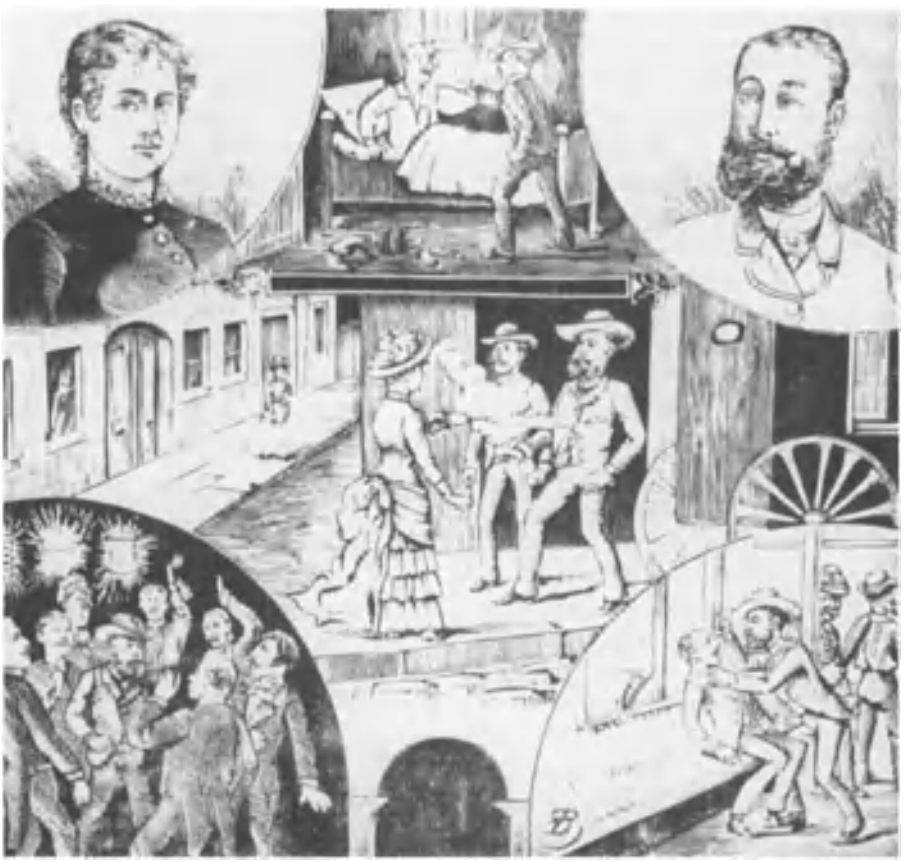
ONE WOMAN'S REVENGE/1885

Political ambition drove Theodore J. Boasso to lift himself from immigrant poverty to riches and power, gaining a lofty position that convinced him that he was above the law and beyond the reaching retribution of the woman he bigamously married. Boasso was the son of an immigrant printer who settled in New Orleans. With very little schooling, Boasso, at an early age, went to work as a ward heeler for the political machines of Mayor J. Vallsin Guillotte and Samuel D. McEnery, governor of Louisiana.



A contemporary montage records the misdeeds of Theodore J. Boasso, showing (clockwise) Mary Katherine Kuhn; Boasso arrested at gunpoint; Boasso; Boasso intimidating a witness; Boasso with underworld friends and (center) Mary Kuhn shooting Boasso in 1885.

Boasso, through cajolery and strong-arming, delivered the votes for his bosses and was so successful that he was rewarded with a cushy job, receiving an appointment as the director of the state insane asylum. He was, of course, wholly unsuited for this post, having no medical credentials or expertise in supervising the treatment of the mentally ill. Boasso rose higher. In April 1884, he was then named to the New Orleans Police Department as chief of detectives, a position then called chief of aids. Again, he had no experience or knowledge to qualify him for this position, one which he quickly proceeded to abuse.

Already having strong and long-lasting contacts with the New Orleans underworld, including the Mafia, which had infested the city's waterfront in large numbers, Boasso worked in collusion with burglars, confidence men and armed robbers. Whenever anyone identified one of these miscreants as having committed a crime, Boasso mollified or threatened the witnesses into having them drop their complaints. Stubborn citizens were swayed to keep silent when Boasso paid them off with heavy bribes. In one instance, a man from Colorado was swindled out of $40. Boasso gave him $150 not to prosecute.

Mayor Guillotte ignored the many complaints mounting against his chief of detectives. In fact, he went out of his way to publicly support his crooked henchman, attending public fetes and affairs with Boasso. In June 1885, the mayor accompanied Boasso to a private dinner held by Ambrose Kuhn, a wealthy grocer. At this time, the chief of detectives met Kuhn's beautiful twin daughters, becoming enamored of Mary Katherine Kuhn. He began courting the young lady, telling her that he was unmarried.

On June 20, 1885, Boasso eloped with the 18-year-old girl. The wedding was conducted by one of Boasso's cronies, a man who reportedly had no authority to marry anyone. Before consummating the marriage, however, Boasso assured his suspicious bride that their union was legal by showing her an official marriage certificate, one later proved to be bogus. Her father, however, became enraged when he learned that Boasso had fraudulently wedded his daughter. He barged into their love nest, knocked down Boasso and hustled his daughter back to his home.

Mary Katherine Kuhn not only learned how Boasso had mocked their union with a phony wedding, but learned that he was already married. Investigators working on behalf of her father then learned that the chief of detectives had bigamously married several women throughout Louisiana. The deceived young woman decided on revenge, seeking out Boasso and finding him as he emerged from a saloon with a friend on Anthony Street.

Boasso was joking with his friend about his fake wedding to the Kuhn girl, but his laughter choked to silent fear when he turned to see Mary Kuhn standing before him, holding a revolver in her hand. Without a word, she fired several shots, bullets entering his liver and back. As the chief of detectives fell to the street, Mary Kuhn was taken into custody by a policeman. After it was learned that she had been duped into marriage by a bigamous rake, Mary Kuhn was released without being charged.

The local papers published the tawdry details of the Boasso scandal, one which Mayor Guillotte could not cover up. He distanced himself from his chief of detectives and then publicly denounced his former protege as a "detestable cad and bigamist." He fired Boasso, who was still recuperating from his wounds in a hospital.

When he recovered, Boasso was tried for bigamy and forging a false marriage certificate. He was convicted and sent to prison, given a fourteen-year sentence. The strutting bigamist served only eight years of his sentence before Governor Murphy J. Foster pardoned him in 1894. Upon his release, Boasso was given a menial political job and soon faded from the public eye.

THE MARRYING "MAD FRED"/1892

Frederick Bayley Deeming (1854-1892), was not only one of the worst bigamists on record in England and Australia, but proved to be a mass murderer, who, without conscience or reservation, brutally slaughtered his wives and children. Deeming was a man of enormous ego. He considered himself an accomplished confidence man, but his unimaginative schemes produced, for the most part, little money over the many years he preyed upon trusting, naive women.

Deeming's early background is sketchy, but it is known, through his own admissions, that his mother and father had been confined in a mental institution and that he himself had been subject to mental disturbances as a child, his strange conduct and emotional outbursts earning him the sobriquet of "Mad Fred." After marrying in his late twenties, Deeming left his wife, Maria, and four children, in Birkenhead, England, sailing to Australia in search of work. He found a job as a gas fitter in Sydney, but was soon arrested for stealing company property and given a short prison term.

After his wife and children joined him in Sydney, Deeming spent a short time at honest labor. He was then arrested for filing a fraudulent bankruptcy. He posted bail and then fled with his wife and children, going to Port Adelaide, where he was living in 1888. At that time, Deeming resolved to live by his wits, which were limited, believing that he could earn vast sums through confidence games. During this time, he began moving throughout South Africa and Australia. He took passage on a steamer going to St. Helena and en route bilked two gullible brothers named Howe of a small sum.

For the next few years, Deeming moved nomadically about with his family, living briefly in Cape Town, Durban, Johannesburg, Port Elizabeth and Kimberley. During this period, he posed as a diamond mine operator in South Africa, selling bogus shares in his nonexistent mines. He was a flamboyant, fluent talker, who easily convinced the more rural and gullible victims to invest small sums in his mythical mine operations. He even managed to defraud a considerable sum from the National Bank of Johannesburg through a loan on his so-called diamond mines. Next he mulcted a man named Grice of £2,800, with the promise of selling him a large part of a gold mine he claimed to have in Klerksdorp. When Grice was about to meet Deeming to claim his shares, he was told by a confederate that Deeming was dead, having succumbed to a sudden illness.

Detectives were by then on Deeming's trail and he knew it. He sent his wife and children back to England and then, through a circuitous route, joined them there. Detectives pursued him to England and Deeming fled back to Australia, then once more returned to England, with law enforcement officials still pursuing. While in England, Deeming posed as a member of the aristocracy, forging and passing bad checks.

Deeming bigamously married several women at this time, bilking them of their savings and property before abandoning them. When some of these illegally married spouses reported him, Deeming fled to Antwerp. Here he posed as Lord Dun, marrying and fleecing another woman, then deserting her, as he had with others by suddenly leaving his hotel and paying his bill with a bad check.

Returning to England, Deeming gave a bogus check for £258 to a jeweler in Hull for several gems. He immediately embarked for South America, posing as a millionaire and entertaining his fellow passengers with wild tales of his experiences in Africa, stories Deeming had culled from penny-dreadful publications. When he arrived in Montevideo, however, Deeming was shocked to see detectives waiting for him. They had tracked him half way around the world. Placing him under arrest, British detectives returned him to England, where he was imprisoned to await trial on charges of bigamy and many financial swindles. During this time, Deeming unsuccessfully attempted to escape.

Frederick Deeming, bigamist and mass murderer, who was executed in 1892.

On October 6, 1890, Deeming was sentenced to nine months in prison for swindling the Hull dealer. Evidence in other cases was not strong enough to warrant additional convictions. Deeming served every day of his sentence, being released on July 16, 1891. He immediately went to the Commercial House in Liverpool and registered under the alias of Albert O. Williams. He claimed that he was a British officer serving in an Indian regiment and that he was looking for a suitable home, where his colonel could live in retirement. He specified that the house to be rented for the colonel have a concrete floor—this proved later to be part of his plan to murder his now unwanted family.

Deeming's wife, Maria, visited him regularly at the Commercial House, but he spent most of his time with Emily Mather, with whom Deeming was having an affair. At his wife's insistence, Deeming rented a cottage, Dinham Villa, at Rainhill, moving his wife and four children into it. A few nights later, while his wife and children slept, Deeming crept into the cottage and killed all five persons, crushing their heads with a heavy instrument. He then dug up the concrete floor in the kitchen and buried the bodies beneath, cementing the floor over them and even hiring a few unwitting workers to complete the job.

Some weeks later, Deeming brought Emily Mather to the cottage and, according to his own bizarre statements later, danced a jig for her on the concrete floor above the bodies of the family he had ruthlessly slaughtered. He married Mather, then set in motion another confidence scheme. He attempted to claim damages for an expensive picture he had sent by rail to another town. When this claim was refused and agents grew suspicious, Deeming sailed for Australia, departing with his new wife in October 1891. He was by then using the alias of Droven and later Drewen, settling with his wife in Melbourne, where he rented a house on Andrew Street in Windsor. A short time later, tiring of his wife, Emily, Deeming killed her and buried her body beneath a cement floor of his own creation.

Deeming then filed an application at the marriage bureau in Melbourne, but he suddenly left the city on January 5, 1892, thinking that detectives were again on his trail. On a boat sailing for Sydney, Deeming introduced himself to other passengers as Baron Swanston, meeting an attractive, young woman named Katie Rounsfell (or Rounsville) and promptly proposed marriage. She accepted and they made plans to wed in a short time.

Once in Sydney, Deeming obtained a job at a gold mine in Southern Cross, then sent for Rounsfell. Just as she was preparing to join him, Rounsfell received a visit from detectives, who informed her that her fiancé was a bigamist and a murderer. By that time, Deeming was already under arrest, charged with killing Emily Mather. Her body had been discovered by a rental agent named Connor. He had inspected Deeming's vacated house on Andrew Street in Melbourne, and, while walking into the bedroom, noticed the freshly cemented floor, which had been hurriedly prepared and had not properly dried. Connor kicked the lumpy cement that had cracked and a slab flipped over to reveal the face of a dead woman buried beneath, her eyes open and staring up at him.

The bigamist-killer had been careless, leaving documents that bore his aliases and his previous address in Rainhill, England. Australian detectives contacted police in Liverpool. The Dinham Villa was closely inspected and the five slain bodies of Deeming's first family were found. Deeming had been identified through his many identities and had been arrested for murder at Southern Cross on March 11, 1892. He was taken to Melbourne, where thousands of curious spectators turned out to see "the monster." As he was being escorted to prison, a group of vengeance-seeking residents tried to grab Deeming in order to lynch him, but he was saved by police officers and jailed pending trial.

Katie Rounsfell, Deeming's next intended wife and murder victim, is shown testifying at his trial in Melbourne.

While behind bars, Deeming wrote syrupy letters to Rounsfell, telling her that he was innocent and asking that she send him money. Katie Rounsfell was an heiress with considerable funds and notations found in Deeming's effects showed that he planned to transfer her assets to his own accounts and then kill her, as he had with others. Ms. Rounsfell, informed of these intentions, did not send Deeming any money.

As he awaited trial, Deeming seemed to be undergoing a number of epileptic seizures. His guards and prison doctors, however, insisted that these fits were faked by Deeming, considered by some to be a superb actor and capable of staging such fake attacks. Such fits may have been real, however, since Deeming was then suffering from the advanced stages of syphilis. At his trial, Deeming insisted that he was insane and had been for most of his life. He told a tale of seeing his dead mother almost every day and that this hideous apparition urged him to marry and murder all women he met.

Standing in the dock, he addressed the court, reading from a long speech he had laboriously written and one in which he insisted he was being prosecuted for a murder he had never committed. He also claimed that Emily Mather was still alive, although her corpse had long been identified before it had been given a decent burial. At the end of the speech, Deeming realized his address had made no impact on the court. He turned to the gallery of witnesses who had testified against him and said: "You people are the ugliest human beings I have ever seen!"

This and other pretended mad acts gained Frederick Deeming nothing. He was judged sane, convicted and sentenced to death. While awaiting execution, he attempted to gain as much notoriety as possible, announcing that he was Jack the Ripper. This claim, like most of those he had made in life, was false, contradicted by the events of his own life. Deeming was in Australia at the time of the Ripper murders in London's East End in 1888. On May 23, 1892, Deeming was taken before a crowd of more than 10,000 cheering spectators and was publicly hanged.

A LETHAL LADY BIGAMIST/1906

A tall, beautiful brunette, Emma LeDoux (1871-1941) was intelligent and creative, who spent a great deal of time on her hobby, photography. She also proved to be creative in exercising more sinister talents, bigamously marrying several men and murdering them. Little is known about LeDoux's early life, except that she was born Emma Head in Amador County, California in 1871 and that her first marriage was to a man named Charlie Barrett, who died in Mexico a short time after the couple moved there.

Emma LeDoux, bigamist and murderer; she died in prison in 1941.

LeDoux then married a man named Williams, who died under mysterious circumstances, leaving the widow a large sum of money from an insurance policy that LeDoux had arranged. In September 1902, LeDoux arrived in Jamestown, California, where she met and married Albert N. McVicar, but they separated when McVicar discovered his wife with another man. He drove her from her house, compelling LeDoux to support herself through prostitution.

While still married to McVicar, LeDoux moved to Stockton, California, staying with her mother, who owned a small farm outside of town. There, at a church social, she enamored Eugene LeDoux, marrying him on August 12, 1905. (She was best known later under the name of LeDoux.) While strolling along a Stockton street on March 11, 1906, LeDoux was startled when encountering her husband McVicar on a chance meeting. She said nothing of her marriage to LeDoux.

McVicar by then had deep regrets about having turned Emma out of his house, coming to believe that he had been the reason for her infidelities, that he had not given her the attention she deserved. The couple reunited that day, LeDoux forgiving McVicar for driving her to prostitution, or so she later said. Taking a room with McVicar only a few blocks from where her other husband, LeDoux, resided, Emma convinced McVicar to order new furniture for his house in Jamestown. If she was to move back with him to that city and resume their marriage, she said, she wanted the comfort of good furniture. McVicar happily agreed, paying for expensive furniture, which LeDoux carefully selected.

A few days after this purchase, LeDoux went to the store and tried to stop the shipment of the furniture, saying that she had changed her mind and wanted a refund. The store manager apologized, telling her that the furniture had already been shipped to Jamestown. "What good is that to me!" she said angrily before departing. One day later, LeDoux visited a doctor in San Francisco, who had been treating her for a venereal disease, asking him to provide her with drugs to ease her pain. The physician sold her some morphine.

On March 14, 1906, Emma LeDoux appeared in a San Francisco pharmacy, where she purchased some cyanide, telling the owner that she needed this in developing her photographs. (Small doses of this deadly poison was then used in the crude process of developing positive photographs from old-fashioned negatives.) To convince the pharmacist that she avidly worked at her hobby, she showed the druggist several photos of herself with different middleaged men. The pharmacist had her sign for the cyanide before she left his store.

McVicar and LeDoux arrived in Jamestown on March 15. McVicar, who worked as a lumberman, then abruptly quit his long-standing job on March 21, 1906, telling his employer that he was going to work on a farm owned by his wife's mother, which was located outside of Stockton. Meanwhile, LeDoux inspected the furniture that had been shipped to McVicar's home and told her husband that it was nothing but "cheap goods." She insisted that the furniture be returned and then persuaded her husband to return to Stockton with her and buy more expensive furniture from another store, which he did.

After the couple left this store on March 23, 1906, LeDoux returned to have the furniture shipped to an address in Stockton , which was the home of her other husband, Eugene LeDoux. (Emma explained her long absence to husband LeDoux by saying that she had been staying with her mother at her farm outside of town.) That night, according to law enforcement records, Emma LeDoux doctored her husband's coffee with knockout drops, morphine and cyanide, killing him. The next day she visited a leather goods store and purchased a large trunk, having this immediately sent to her room at a Stockton hotel, where she had been staying with McVicar. In another store she purchased some rope.

At 2 p.m. on March 24, 1906, Emma LeDoux arrived at the Stockton train station, where she ordered the trunk to be shipped to an address in San Francisco. The trunk was almost placed on the train, but since its contents bore no identification, it was shipped back to the baggage room at the Stockton train station. The baggage manager smelled a peculiar odor coming from the trunk and called police. Officers opening the rope-bound trunk found the crumpled body of Albert McVicar inside.

Police then conducted a widespread search for Emma LeDoux, but she was nowhere to be found. Her mother could not provide officials with any information as to her whereabouts and neither could Eugene LeDoux. She was finally tracked down to a small rooming house in Antioch, California, and arrested in early April 1906, her trial beginning one day before the devastating San Francisco earthquake ensued, a calamity that disrupted almost all civic functions in the Bay area and delayed LeDoux's trial. She was nevertheless convicted and received a prison sentence for bigamy and, in murdering McVicar, was sentenced to death.

LeDoux's execution by hanging was delayed when the Supreme Court of California ordered a new trial in May 1909. LeDoux, who had claimed innocence in her first trial, arranged a plea-bargain with prosecutors. She now confessed to murdering McVicar and her sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. (Writer James M. Cain studied this case, using LeDoux as one of several role models for his vixen, Cora, in The Postman Always Rings Twice, employing in that chilling novel the shifty plea-bargaining LeDoux had exercised to save her life.)

LeDoux was sent to the female center at San Quentin, being paroled on July 20, 1920. She was returned to prison for parole violations on July 9, 1921. She was paroled again on March 30, 1925. LeDoux was then thought to have been rehabilitated. She married a man named Crackbon, who died mysteriously two years later. Again, Emma LeDoux was thought to have murdered this new husband and her illegal selling of his property caused her to be once again returned to San Quentin. In 1933, she was transferred to the Tehachapi Women's Prison, but there would be no more paroles for Emma LeDoux. California's most notorious female bigamist-murderer died behind bars in Tehachapi in July 1941.

"THE DEAD ARE FOR THE DEAD"/1906

Johann Otto Hoch (1862-1906) does not hold the record for bigamous marriages in the United States, but the terrible claim that he murdered more bigamous brides than any other such malefactor can certainly be supported through the grim facts of his strange and lethal life. Born in Horweiler, Germany, Hoch married sometime in his mid twenties. In 1887, he deserted his wife, Christine Ramb Hoch, and their three children, immigrating to the U.S. His whereabouts in America are not known, until he surfaced in Wheeling, West Virginia in 1895, using the alias of Jacob Huff.

Hoch opened a saloon in a German neighborhood and began to look about for wealthy widows or divorcees to marry. In April, he married Caroline Hoch at a small ceremony conducted by Reverend Hermann C. A. Haas. Reverend Haas later told police that he recalled seeing Hoch give his wife some white powder, which, in afterthought, he believed to be poison. The woman died in agony a few days later and was buried in great haste by her husband. Before departing Wheeling, Hoch sold his wife's house, withdrew all her savings from a local bank and cashed in an insurance policy on her life in the amount of $2,500.

Hoch's quick disappearance nagged Reverend Haas, but he was unable to locate the missing saloon keeper. In 1898, however, Haas came across a Chicago newspaper , which showed a photo of a man named Martin Dotz, who had been arrested for swindling a furniture dealer. He recognized the man in the photo as the missing Hoch and sent a letter to the Chicago Police Department, this missive being received by Inspector George Shippy, who had been working on the Dotz case. Shippy and Haas then began a correspondence in which Haas told the detective that he believed Hoch/Dotz had murdered his wife in Wheeling.

Inspector Shippy by then had brought about Hoch's conviction for fraud and he was given a year's sentence in Cook County Jail. Shippy began to look into Hoch's background and continued probing after Hoch was released from jail. In a six-year odyssey that took him to San Francisco, New York and other major cities, Shippy pieced together Hoch's wandering travels. He found reports of more than 100 abandoned women, who had wedded a balding man with a thick upturned mustache, a description that fit Hoch. Forty-four of these females had married Hoch, who promptly deserted them after bilking them of their assets. Worse, more than fifty women had been murdered by Hoch, according to Shippy's count, from 1887 to 1897, including the hapless Caroline Hoch in Wheeling, West Virginia.

Shippy persuaded police in Wheeling to exhume Mrs. Hoch's body so that the remains could be tested for arsenic poisoning. Local officials discovered that the vital organs had been removed, leaving no telltale clues. Though Shippy did not have enough evidence to charge Hoch with murder, he vowed to find such evidence elsewhere. This he eventually did, in Chicago, where Hoch, a much-moving man, made the mistake of settling. Following his release from jail in 1899, Hoch worked as a bartender in the German community. On December 5, 1904, he married Marie Walcker and then poisoned her shortly after their honeymoon, having her body quickly buried.

Before Marie died in agony, Hoch and his sister-in-law Amelia sat at the woman's bedside. Hoch suddenly embraced his wife's sister, saying to her: "I can not be alone in the world. Marry me when she goes." Amelia Walcker was shocked to then hear Hoch state: "The dead are for the dead. The living are for the living." Days after Marie died, Amelia Walcker, married Hoch, turning her life savings, $750, over to him. He promptly vanished. The indefatigable Inspector Shippy was on the case. He had Marie Walcker's body exhumed and pathologists determined that the woman had been murdered by massive doses of arsenic.

Shippy then mailed copies of Hoch's photograph to newspapers nationwide. The photo was seen some days later in a New York newspaper by Katherine Kimmerle, who ran a boarding house in Manhattan. She contacted Shippy, telling him that she had recently rented a room to the very man he was seeking. Further, she said with some indignation, Hoch had had the nerve to propose to her only twenty minutes after he rented the room.

America's top bluebeard, Johann Otto Hoch (lower left) shown with his jailers in Chicago in 1906, shortly before he was hanged; Hoch reportedly married and murdered more than fifty women.

New York officers arrested Hoch at Kimmerle's boarding house, where he insisted that he was not the man in the newspaper photo. He insisted that he had never been in Chicago, that he was an unemployed hod-carrier, a lifetime resident of New York. "That man proposed to me when he first showed up here," Mrs. Kimmerle told police, "that man right there standing before you. Can you imagine? Why, only a cold-blooded wife-killer would have the nerve to make such a proposal. Arrest him!"

"She is saying these terrible things," Hoch said in a soft voice to officers, "because her heart is broken, because I turned her down. You see, this poor woman wanted me to marry her. I don't marry women I don't love. So I had to turn her down. She's just getting revenge. You fellows know how that is with women." The officers nodded and took Hoch into custody anyway.

When he was returned to Chicago, Hoch was charged with the murder of Marie Walcker. His defense attorney could not overcome the convincing evidence against him. Hoch was found guilty and sentenced to death. Inspector Shippy visited him as he awaited execution, confronting Hoch with dozens of photos of wives Shippy believed Hoch had married and murdered. "You killed all these women, didn't you?" he asked Hoch.

Hoch only smiled and said. "I am innocent of killing Marie and any of these other poor women. Look at those pictures, Inspector. Look at the faces of those tired old ladies. Would you marry any of those women?"

"No, but you did," Shippy replied. "And you took their money and property and killed them. You poisoned most of them and strangled others."

"You have the wrong man, Inspector," Hoch told him without emotion. "I will go innocent to the gallows." Shortly before he did go to the hangman, The Chicago Sun printed an article about Hoch, one which contained Hoch's six rules for success with women, all of which had been written down by the bigamist-killer and was found in his room. They read:

1) Nine out of ten women can be won by flattery.
2) Never let a woman know her own shortcomings.
3) Always appear to a woman to be the anxious one.
4) Women like to be told pleasant things about themselves.
5) When you make love be ardent and earnest.
6) The average man can fool the average woman if he will only let her have her own way at the start.

Before Johann Otto Hoch walked up the thirteen stairs to the wooden gallows waiting for him in the courtyard of the Chicago Criminal Courts Building on February 23, 1906, a reporter showed him his six cardinal rules, asking: "Did you write these rules?"

Hoch glanced at the list and said: "Why not? It was good advice." Minutes later he died dangling from the end of the rope.

THE BRIDES OF THE BATH/1912-1915

Unlike the crude conduct of bigamist-killer Johann Otto Hoch in America, England's George Joseph Smith (1872-1915) was always the gentleman, marrying and bilking his many wives with meticulous care. Intelligent and vain, Smith eventually turned to murder, ridding himself of several bigamous wives through a method of his own simple, but cunning invention. He was foremost a bigamist swindler, who resorted to murder only when his most enriching schemes demanded the deaths of his illegal wives.

According to the birth certificate he was using at the time of his arrest, Smith was born at 92 Roman Road, Bethal Green, London, on January 11, 1872. He lived in poverty as a child, his father struggling to support the family by selling insurance, then an unpopular business thought to be unsavory. Smith, however, in his own perverse perspective, would later recognize his father's business as a source of considerable personal income, when coupled to his unique brand of murder.

Poorly educated and left mostly to the streets, Smith, at the age of nine, stole some fruit from a vendor and, while fleeing, ran straight into the arms of a waiting constable. His impoverished parents did not contest a court action that sent the child to a reformatory for eight years, thrusting him into a brutal environment that certainly helped to create the calculating killer emerging decades later.

Smith's evolution as a master criminal lacked lightning and thunder. His way toward the gallows involved a plodding series of criminal acts that, in deepening shades of gray, led to the ultimate murders he committed. Only toward the end of his horrifying career did he truly earn the reputation given to him by one of his biographers as "the most atrocious English criminal since Palmer." (Dr. William Palmer of Rugeley, England, a 19th Century killer, who poisoned for profit at least a half dozen persons and was hanged in 1856.)

Released from Borstal Reformatory in 1888, Smith busied himself with small larcenies, being sentenced to a week in jail in 1890 for a petty theft. In 1891, he was given a six-month jail sentence for stealing a bicycle. He had stolen the bicycle for reasons of exercise, to build up his body. He reportedly worked as a gymnasium instructor in the early 1890s before enlisting in the army and seeing duty overseas. When mustered out in 1896, Smith had transformed his once undernourished bone-thin body into a muscular frame that boasted "unnaturally tough biceps." Also in that year, as he shed himself of a sickly, unimpressive body, Smith did away with George Joseph Smith as a person. He created aliases and invented a series of lives under these false names.

Smith became George Baker, taking a room in a cheap boarding house in a shabby section of London. He wore dark suits and a bowler hat, an umbrella hooked on his arm, projecting the image of any average government worker or a minion in private service. There was money in his pocket for the first time in his life, the source of these wondrous new riches being many women, who fell in love with him, even though George Joseph Smith hated women. Smith coated his hair with pomade, drenched his body with cheap cologne and affected the manners of a gentleman forced into an uncomfortable lifestyle. He easily drew the attention of young, unsophisticated women, mostly domestic servant girls working in the mansions of the rich, occupations that would be of service to the conniving Smith.

Smith had learned his etiquette and manners while briefly managing a boarding house, where he studied retired gentlemen in his care. Moreover, as he well knew, he was an imposing figure in the eyes of his gullible victims, seen as physically handsome in that square-jawed, keen-eyed Victorian image made famous by Sidney Paget, who had illustrated the first Sherlock Holmes stories for The Strand Magazine, only a few years before Smith's criminal career accelerated. Oddly enough, Smith bore a striking resemblance to Holmes, as Paget saw the great fictional detective, which may have subconsciously attracted Smith's female admirers.

George Joseph Smith, who bigamously married several women, drowning them in bathtubs for insurance money.

The modus operandi of Smith's enterprises was as prosaic as the man himself. Under his directions, these swooning housemaids dutifully made inventories of the furnishing in the mansions, where they worked. Smith would scrutinize these lists, which catalogued possessions down to the smallest bric-a-brac, then selected the items he thought he could quickly sell. The maids then stole the pieces, returning them to Smith, who, in turn, sold them to fences. It was during this period that Smith took up the habit of itemizing everything that occurred in his life, his miserly character emerging in exacting ledger books, where all income and expenses, down to the last farthing, were detailed, an avaricious trait that led to Smith's downfall years later.

Smith's lucrative operations came to an abrupt close in the form of jealousy. In 1896, one of his many working-girl lovers became enraged when he gave too much attention to another young woman. The jealous maid informed on Smith and, as Baker, he was arrested after police found large quantities of stolen goods in his rooms. Smith was sent to prison for a year. Upon his release in 1897, he avoided the London streets, thinking he might chance upon one of his former maid servant cronies. He moved to Leicester, where he opened a small sweetshop, catering to children.

During the day, Smith was the patient and kindly gentleman, peddling penny candies and biscuits to swarms of little ones, who had saved allowances for their Saturday spending sprees in his tiny shop. At night, the candy shop owner put on his finest linen suit and top hat before strolling through the streets in search of bigger commercial game—women. He sought middleclass females of some substance and property and on one of his nocturnal hunts, he encountered Caroline Thornhill. Learning that she had a small savings account, Smith proposed. The couple wedded in 1898, Smith using the symbolic alias of George Oliver Love. Either out of whimsy or irony, Smith listed his father's occupation as "detective" on his marriage certificate.

Smith moved with his new wife to the back room of his small candy store, which failed a little more each day, until Smith began using his wife's savings. When this meager amount was gone, Smith informed his wife that she was useless to him and that he intended to leave her. She begged Smith to stay with her, pleading that there must be a way by which the couple could survive together. He reluctantly agreed, hesitantly telling her that there was just such a method, but only if she agreed to do exactly as he directed. Anything, she agreed.

The couple then moved to London, where Smith's wife became a willing pawn in his old stolen goods racket. Smith meticulously wrote references for his wife with which she secured jobs as a servant in many handsome homes. Under Smith's cautious tutorship, she became an expert sneak thief, filling Smith's apartment with jewelry, furniture, paintings, anything he could quickly sell off. Through his wife's pilferings, Smith acquired enough money to live in comfort, often traveling to the English seaside resorts of Hove and Hastings and passing himself off as a wealthy antique dealer, searching for, as would an dedicated archaeologist for saleable artifacts, more gullible females to woo, win and rob.

It was never learned how many women Smith promised to marry or bigamously married at this time, in order to obtain their savings and dowries, but it is certain that in this time of his life he had decided on bigamy as a living. He did marry a boarding house owner at the time he was married to his wife, Caroline, who was still working as a thieving maid in London. He absconded with the landlady's savings, as well as her wardrobe. When Caroline returned home one day in 1900, her hands still clutching more items stolen from her employer, she discovered the clothing Smith had stolen from the boarding house victim. Smith explained these items as the result of an affair that meant only "business." The discovery so unnerved Smith's wife that she bungled her next theft, easily caught by her employer while attempting to smuggle a suitcase containing stolen candelabras from his house.

Caroline Thornhill Love was arrested and immediately identified her husband as the mastermind behind her thefts. Constables arrested Smith in his home, finding a treasure trove of stolen items. This time he received the maximum prison sentence of two years for receiving stolen goods.

When he emerged from prison in 1902, Smith sought out his meal ticket, Caroline, only to discover that she had fled to Canada two days before his prison release. He did not suffer her loss, concluding that there was thousands of rich spinsters available in London. He began marrying and deserting females in record numbers, spinster after spinster, draining them of their worldly goods and money, most of these hapless victims being citizens of the seaside resorts Smith had earlier visited and scouted.

Caroline Thornhill Smith, who married Smith and survived to testify against him.

In 1908, Smith obtained £90 from a spinster in Brighton. With this money (then equivalent of $1,200 in U.S. currency), coupled to the inventory of stolen items taken from previously abandoned wives, the bigamist opened a second-hand shop in Bristol, where he met and married Edith Mabel Pegler, who, like most of his other brides, was "a notch above him," according to Smith's later statements, referring to her social and educational standing. Pegler, who was soon drained of her savings by Smith, had the distinction of marrying the real George Joseph Smith, since he used, for whatever odd reason, his own name at the time.

Edith Pegler, another bigamous wife who remained loyal to the serial killer.

Using Pegler's assets, Smith purchased a house, his first home, with £240. He reveled at being a property owner, fondling each night his important papers—title deeds and certificates of transfer. This was at the heart of Smith's genuine ambitions, property and possessions. He loathed females in general, a hatred typical of women exploiters, and was inwardly repelled and disgusted by the sexual performances he was obligated, however briefly, to enact. But George Joseph Smith endured it all. His was a dogged hunt for money through the withered fields of middle-class, middle-aged British womanhood. He would have his possessions at any price, even murder.

The precise time of Smith's decision to commit homicide in his marrying and mulcting schemes has never been determined, but it probably occurred during the time of his marriage to Edith Pegler. He actually found himself developing affection for this wife, an emotion that undoubtedly troubled Smith, whose business it was to eliminate all emotions, all feelings, in order that he coldly perform his illicit business.

One summer day in 1910, Smith got rid of Edith Pegler in the same manner he rid himself of many other wives, deserting her in a public place. In this instance, he took her to the National Gallery, then excused himself to go to the men's room, leaving her as she sat staring at classics on canvas.

Two months later, in August 1910, while strolling along a street in Bristol, Smith met Beatrice Constance Annie ("Bessie") Mundy, a 33-year-old spinster. Not only was the lovesick Bessie Mundy easy prey for the much-marrying Smith, but she held the key to his future in that she was also an heiress to £2,500, left to her by her late father, a bank official. After getting Bessie to accept his hand in marriage, under the alias of Henry Williams, Smith's anxious dreams of quick riches were dashed by a hard-willed uncle, who controlled Bessie's fortune, and who allowed her only £8 a week to live on.

The conniving Smith tried wheedling Bessie's dowry from her protective executor. He wrote in his practiced groveling manner a plea to the coffer-clutching uncle from Weymouth, where he had married Bessie on August 29, 1910. He asked that the uncle send money orders, not checks, to Bessie and increase her weekly stipends to better afford her lifestyle as a married woman. After a month of such correspondence, Smith received £138 from the uncle.

Believing that this was all he would ever see of his wife's small fortune, Smith turned on the cultured woman, incredibly accusing her of infecting him with a venereal disease as a result of being promiscuous. Such a charge, of course, was absurd in that Bessie Mundy Williams was a withdrawn, highly moral woman of fine education and propriety, but this unfounded charge served as enough of an excuse for Smith to abandon her.

Smith then returned to Edith Pegler. What reason he gave her for earlier abandoning her is not known, but this docile woman not only welcomed him back, but agreeably accompanied him in his nomadic travels between Bristol and London. It was at this time that Smith resolved to add murder to his methods in marrying and bilking his victims.

On March 14, 1912, Bessie Mundy, who had been abandoned two years earlier by Smith, returned to her London boarding house to tell her landlady that she had accidentally met her one-time husband, Henry Williams (Smith). "He was looking over the sea," said Bessie. "He turned around, staring into my eyes, and said: 'Ah, Bessie, my dove, it's all been a terrible mistake." The lonely woman forgave and forgot all that Smith had said and done.

The reconciled couple made immediate plans to take up lodgings together, but money was needed, Smith pointed out. His business affairs had met with serious setbacks. With Bessie in tow, Smith arrived that day at Baker & Co., where Bessie Mundy, shown with Smith on their wedding day; she was the first to drown in a bathtub.

Bessie secured a loan of £150, signing a formal note that used the balance of her dowry as collateral for the loan.

The couple moved to Herne Bay, where Smith rented a small house. He busied himself with putting together a scheme in which he could obtain what remained of Bessie's dowry. On July 8, 1912, Smith and his wife met with a solicitor, lawyer and parson, the latter a witness to the mutual wills they both signed and in which either stood to inherit each other's wealth in the event of death. In Bessie's case, there was still considerable money left in her dowry. In Smith's case his riches consisted of little more than some stolen furniture.

Shortly after the couple moved into a small cottage, Smith appeared at a local shop where he ordered a new tub from an ironmonger. Then, on July 10, 1912, Smith and Bessie arrived at the office of a local doctor. Smith stated that his wife had had some sort of strange fit. The physician thought Smith was referring to epilepsy, asking a few questions about the symptoms of that malady. "Yes, epileptic fit, that sounds like it," said Smith." Bessie appeared to be in a drowsy state, saying: "I don't remember anything so serious. I've always been healthy, but if Mr. Williams says I have had a fit then it must have come and gone outside my consciousness. I do remember a headache."

The doctor gave Bessie a bromide and sent the couple home. Two days later, a little past midnight, the physician responded to loud knocking at the door of his clinic, which was also his residence. Smith stood before him, frantically waving his arms and excitedly saying: "My wife has had another fit. Please come at once!" When they reached the Smith cottage, the doctor found Bessie sitting up in bed. It had been a stifling day and the woman was hot and flushed. "Keep her quiet," the doctor told Smith. "I can only assume that the intense heat of the day provoked another epileptic fit." He promised to return later that day. At 3 p.m. the physician found Bessie in good health. She told him that she felt "wonderful," but was concerned "about these fits I don't seem to remember."

At 7 a.m. on July 13, 1912, Smith woke his wife to tell her that he had prepared a hot bath for her. The iron tub Smith had ordered lacked taps and fittings and had to be filled and emptied with a bucket. Bessie entered the room, shed her nightie and slipped into the tub filled with hot water. An hour later, the physician who been treating Bessie was handed a note by a schoolboy running an errand for Mr. Williams (Smith). The note, written in a hurried scrawl, read: "Can you come at once? I'm afraid my wife is dead."

Within minutes, the doctor was looking down at the naked, cold body of Bessie Mundy Williams. She was lying on her back in the bathtub, her head submerged, her long legs stretched out stiff, her feet over the end of the tub. In her rigid right hand she clutched a square piece of Castile soap. The doctor lifted the corpse from the tub, placing it on the floor, using artificial respiration to revive the woman. It was useless. Bessie was dead. "Where were you, Mr. Williams, when this dreadful thing happened? " the doctor asked Smith.

Smith, who had never shown emotion to anyone, suddenly burst into tears, explaining between sobs: "I went out ... to fetch some herrings ... for our breakfast ... When I returned ... I found my sweetheart ... dead!"

The doctor told Smith to sit in the next room, while he went for the coroner. The minute the physician left, Smith ran to the street and cornered a constable and a neighbor woman. He sobbingly led the pair into his house and upstairs, pointing at the naked body on the bathroom floor. The constable thought him temporarily deranged. The woman fainted.

When the coroner appeared, accompanied by the family doctor, the official asked only a few questions. He was informed by the physician that he had treated the poor Mrs. Williams for epilepsy. A hastily convened coroner's jury, acting on the doctor's statements, so carefully engineered by the plotting Smith, concluded that Bessie's demise had been accidental, an epileptic seizure causing her to drown in her bath. Mundy family members attempted to refute the claim that Bessie suffered from epilepsy, but the doctor's story was believed. Strangely enough, the jurors and officials did not for an instant ask themselves how such a tall woman could have drowned in such a small bathtub.

Smith haggled with an undertaker until he purchased the cheapest coffin available for his deceased spouse. He then ordered an inexpensive burial ceremony, sending a terse note to Bessie's relatives: "Words can not describe the great shock, and I am naturally too sad to write more." Two days after his wife's burial, Smith appeared at the ironmonger's shop, lugging the tub behind him. He had purchased the tub on credit and now refused to pay for it, saying: "This thing doesn't work. It killed my wife!" He left by slamming the door to the shop.

Next, Smith hired lawyers to combat members of the Mundy family, who contested Bessie's will. Their own family lawyer, however, pointed out the decision of the coroner's jury and Smith's roaring threats to file suit against the entire family. The Mundys gave in and Smith was awarded more than £2,000, a great fortune in those days. He promptly disappeared.

In late August 1912, Smith surfaced again in the life of Edith Pegler Smith, who believed he had, as a traveling salesman of rare antiques, been abroad for many months. In this instance, Smith explained that he had been in Canada. When she asked about the large amounts of money he was carrying, Smith replied that he had made a killing on the sale of a rare jade idol. These new riches were not squandered by Smith on his wife Edith. He gave her a small weekly pittance to cover expenses. Meanwhile, Smith purchased ten small houses in Bristol, thinking to retire on the rents. He busied himself with titles, deeds, certificates, ledgers and receipts, but within months he had lost more than £700 and greater losses loomed on the horizon.

Smith decided to return to his former occupation, bigamously marrying and bilking naive women. He spent Bessie's money carousing through the resort towns, looking for prey. In late October 1913, he found Alice Burnham, an overweight 26-year-old nurse, in Southsea. Though Alice had only £27 to her name, Smith learned that her father, Charles Burnham, a retired coal merchant, was holding another £100 in her name. He proposed marriage and Alice accepted, taking Smith to meet her parents, who did not like the looks of their future son-in-law. They ordered him from their house and forbade their daughter to marry Smith. The love-struck Alice, however, ran off with Smith, marrying him in Portsmouth on November 4, 1913.

Smith at the time, as he had with Edith Pegler, used his own name in signing the bigamous marriage certificate. On December 10, 1913, Smith and Alice arrived at Blackpool, a resort area, where they took a room with a bath at Mrs. Crossley's boarding house. By that time, Smith had insured his new wife's life in the amount of £500, naming himself as the sole beneficiary. Ever concerned about his wife's health, Smith asked Mrs. Crossley if she could recommend a doctor in Blackpool, who might treat his wife's nagging headaches. Mrs. Crossley suggested they see Dr. George Billing, who examined Alice Smith a short time later. The physician thought he detected slight heart murmurs. He prescribed a mixture of caffeine and heroin.

That night, Mrs. Smith asked Mrs. Crossley to prepare a bath for her. Two hours later, while the Crossleys sat at their kitchen table eating dinner, they looked up to see a huge stain of water on the ceiling , which was dripping onto their meals. "Go and tell Mrs. Smith not to fill the bath so much," said Mrs. Crossley to her eldest daughter. The girl started to leave the room, then stopped, saying: "Oh, mother, they will think we are grumbling already, and they are not two days in the house."

Alice Burnham, Smith's second bride to die in a bathtub; he collected £500 from her insurance policy.

Smith then suddenly appeared in the kitchen, holding a package. "I have brought these eggs for our breakfast," he told Mrs. Crossley. He had earlier asked the landlady to make meals for him and his wife since Mrs. Smith was "such a terrible cook." Mrs. Crossley then pointed to the ceiling and Smith raced upstairs. Within minutes he called frantically down to the Crossleys: "My wife will not speak to me! Get a doctor—get doctor Billing! He knows her! Hurry!"

Dr. Billing arrived a short time later to find Smith holding his wife's head above high water, which covered the rest of her body in the tub. Both men struggled to lift the heavy woman from the bath. Dr. Billing could not revive the woman and, within a few minutes, a coroner arrived. Conferring with Dr. Billing, the coroner signed his report that Mrs. Smith had accidentally drowned after "suffering heart failure."

A half hour later, Smith stood in the Crossley kitchen saying nothing. Mrs. Crossley was shocked at his apparently indifferent attitude. He showed no remorse at his wife's passing. Thinking he was in shock, she thought to jolt him back to reality by saying: "How dreadful! What an awful thing this is."

"I would not be surprised at anything that might happen now," Smith replied in a dull voice.

"What kind of remark is that with your wife lying dead upstairs?" asked Mrs. Crossley.

Smith merely shrugged. Mrs. Crossley ordered him from her house, saying that she would not tolerate having anyone so callous as he under her roof. Smith packed a battered brown suitcase and carried this to the front door of the rooming house. He turned to face Mrs. Crossley, stating matter-of-factly: "When they're dead, they're dead." He left without saying another word.

That night, Smith stayed in the boarding house next to Mrs. Crossley's building. Mrs. Crossley saw him at a lighted window in an upstairs room. He was writing. She could not see that Smith was at that time writing out his claim to the insurance company that had written a policy on his wife. Smith attended a coroner's jury a few days later to hear a verdict of "accidental death" in the drowning of Mrs. Alice Smith. He then received the £500 in insurance money and departed Blackpool, but not before he sent a card to Mrs. Crossley, which provided his new address, a bogus location. Mrs. Crossley kept the card, cryptically writing on it: "Wife died in bath. I shall see him again some day."

Once more, the world-weary traveling salesman returned to Edith Pegler Smith, taking up residence in his home in Bristol. Again, he explained his new riches as having made fortunate sales in Canada. In September 1914, with Europe going to war, Smith ventured to the town of Woolwich, where he encountered Alice Reavil, whom he hurriedly married, thinking she had a large dowry. When discovering that this spinster had no money and was in such ill health that she could not be insured, Smith simply stole the woman's entire wardrobe, leaving her only with the clothes on her back before he departed. He returned to Bristol and gave his victim's old clothes to his wife Edith as a not-too-welcomed gift.

Three months later, Smith was on the move again, this time surfacing in the resort town of Clifton where he encountered Margaret Elizabeth Lofty, the 38-year-old daughter of a clergyman, a companion to the elderly by profession. Once engaged, she was broken-hearted after learning that her previous lover was a married man. To the panther-like Smith, Lofty was a wounded gazelle. He introduced himself as John Lloyd, a real estate broker from Holloway.

In a whirlwind courtship, Smith won Margaret's heart and they were married at Bath, England, on December 17, 1914. Only days before, Smith had insured his wife's life for £700 with the Yorkshire Insurance Company in Bristol. Immediately following the wedding ceremony, Margaret Lofty Lloyd withdrew all of her savings, £20, from the Muswell Hill Bank and turned this money over to her new husband. He took her to London, where he concluded his "business" within forty-eight hours.

On December 17, 1914, Smith appeared at the London boarding house owned and operated by a Mrs. Lokker. He personally inspected the bath in the room he reserved, spreading out his long arms to determine the length of the tub. "I guess someone could lie down in it," he said. Returning to

Mrs. Lokker's small office, the landlady asked him for references. Smith grew indignant, throwing six shillings down on her desk. "Here are my references. I'll return shortly."

Mrs. Lokker, alarmed at the strange behavior of Smith, called the police. Detective Sergeant Dennison arrived and, after hearing of Smith's odd behavior, took action. When Smith arrived, Dennison pushed him gently back into the street, telling him that since he could provide no references, he would not be allowed to register at Mrs. Lokker's boarding house. Smith argued for a minute, then walked away. He and his wife appeared a short time later at Mrs. Blatch's rooming house at 14 Bismarck Road, taking a room with a bath.

Smith then went into his routine, asking Mrs. Blatch if she could recommend a good doctor to treat his wife, who was feeling "lethargic" and "feverish." A Dr. Bates was summoned and he prescribed a mild sedative for the ailing Mrs. Lloyd. At 7:30 p.m., on December 18, 1914, Mrs. Blatch drew a bath for Mrs. Lloyd. Minutes later, the landlady heard a faint splashing of water in the tub. Then she heard the sound of a melodeon in the living room and Mrs. Blatch thought that Smith was playing it. The front door bell then rang and Mrs. Blatch opened it to see Smith standing before her holding a brown bag and saying: "I've brought some tomatoes for Mrs. Lloyd's dinner." (With Bessie Mundy it had been herrings, with Alice Burnham it was eggs.)

Smith put down the bag and looked about the living room. "What? My wife isn't down from her bath yet?" he said. Mrs. Blatch told him that she had not seen her. Smith suggested that they both fetch her. Going into the bathroom, they found the room in darkness. Smith turned on the light. Mrs. Blatch screamed at the sight of Mrs. Lloyd's head submerged under the bath water. Smith yanked the woman out of the tub, making a great show in attempting to revive her. Of course, it was no use. Dr. Bates was summoned. He quickly concluded that his patient of one day had died "due to asphyxia from drowning. Influenza, together with a hot bath, might have caused an attack of syncope."

Again, missing no details, Smith called a constable from the street to view the dead body. The constable was shocked to see the woman's naked body exposed on the bathroom floor, saying to Smith: "In pity's name, get something and cover the poor creature. Don't leave her lying like this." Smith shrugged and retrieved a blanket, tossing this over the corpse. The constable later stated that he thought Smith's lack of grief strange and suspicious.

Following the cheap funeral Smith arranged for Lofty's body, he returned to Bristol, where he began to badger the York Insurance Company, demanding payment of £700 in the loss of his wife's life. The company thought Lofty's death by accidental drowning in a tub too odd to believe. They stalled the payment, causing Smith to use his attorney, W. T. Davies, to pressure the company to pay on the policy, negotiations that dragged through January 1915.

Meanwhile, Charles Burnham, the coal merchant, who never ceased to believe that Smith was the cause of his daughter Alice's death, spotted an item in the popular weekly, News of the World, which reported in detail the curious death of Margaret Lloyd (nee Lofty), describing her awkward drowning in a bathtub. Clipping this item to one about his daughter drowning in the same manner a year earlier, Burnham sent the notices to the police. Joseph Crossley, husband of the suspicious landlady in the Alice Burnham drowning, also noticed the item and sent police two reports of the similar drownings.

Scotland Yard received these reports and assigned their best man to investigate. Detective Inspector Arthur Fowler Neil, in Kentish Town, was at once on the case. He inspected the bathroom, where Margaret Lloyd had died. Measuring the small bathtub, he thought it impossible that a grown person could drown in such a container. He sent his men throughout the resort towns to piece together the Burnham and Lofty deaths. When he learned of Bessie Mundy's identical end in Herne Bay, and with the descriptions in hand of the three husbands in all the cases, Neil concluded that not only were Williams, Smith and Lloyd one and the same man, but that whoever this man might really be, he had committed three murders, perhaps more.

Neil learned through his manhunt that one of the husbands, Lloyd, was about to receive a payment from the Yorkshire Insurance Company in the drowning death of his wife, this payment to be made at the London offices of Lloyd's attorney, W. T. Davies, who cooperated with officers, but told them that he did not have the current address of his client. Neil knew Lloyd would appear at Davies' office and he assigned his men to keep the place under surveillance.

On February 1, 1915, Neil and two of his detectives, were at the site and spotted a meticulously dressed gentleman walking down the street toward the attorney's offices. The man hesitated twice, seeming to turn back. Finally, he walked up to the building and entered. When this darkly-dressed stranger emerged from Davies' offices an hour later, Neil and his men stopped the man.

Heiress Margaret Lofty, Smith's third bigamous wife, who died by drowning in a bathtub.

Neil looked the square-jawed man in the face, saying: "I'm Inspector Detective Neil. Are you John Lloyd?"

Smith's manner was nerveless. "Yes, I am."

"The same John Lloyd whose wife was drowned in a bath on the night of December 18, at Bismarck Road, Highgate?"

"Yes, that's me."

Neil was matter-of-fact, saying: "From my investigation, I have reason to believe you are identical with George Smith, whose wife was found drowned in a bath three weeks after marriage in 1913, at Blackpool."

Smith was unperturbed, giving Neil back his own stare. "Yes, that is so, but it doesn't prove that my name is Smith."

His normally sallow complexion then flushed red as anger rose within him and he uncontrollably shouted: "Smith! I don't know the name of Smith! My name is not Smith!"

By then Neil had concluded that Smith was a murderer several times over, but he had no evidence to prove this contention. He simply said: "Very well. I am going to detain you for making a false attestation to a Registrar."

This minor charge jarred Smith into blurting: "Oh, if that's what you're making all the fuss over, I may as well tell you, I am Smith."

"You admit that fact, then?" asked Neil.

"Certainly. My wife died at Blackpool in 1913. But that's only coincidence. It's a man's bad luck! It's the only charge you can prove against me." He then gave the detective a thin sneer, adding: "Clever as you think you are, Mr. Neil."

"Yes! And there may be charges of murder against you."

Smith exploded, shouting: "You're bloody well mad! You don't know what you're talking about!"

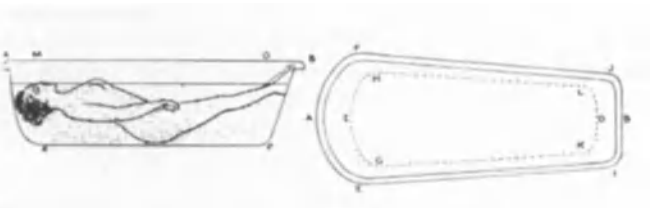
Neil ordered Smith arrested. He was jailed on charges of perjury in giving an alias at the time of his marriage to Margaret Lofty. A short time later, the more serious charge of bigamy was added. The charge of murder was withheld, until the sleuth could determine exactly how Smith had murdered his wives. Neil, with the help of the celebrated pathologist, Sir Bernard Spilsbury, attempted to discover how Smith had managed to drown at least three of his victims, making all these deaths appear as accidents. The bodies of Bessie Mundy, Alice Burnham and Margaret Lofty were exhumed and carefully examined by Spilsbury. He found no signs of violence on any of the corpses, and had to admit that they had all died by drowning.

Had Smith attempted to force any of the women's heads under water there would have been a violent struggle that would have left telltale marks on the bodies, Spilsbury concluded. Further, the tubs in which these women died were so small that any other method of murder was inconceivable. George Joseph Smith, it appeared, had baffled the forensic authorities and would be acquitted of murder for lack of evidence.

Then Neil had the idea of reenacting the bathtub scenes, using women who were professional swimmers. He positioned these women in several ways inside the very death tubs, employing females who were the same weight and height as the murder victims. Yet there seemed to be no way in which he could, without struggle, keep the women submerged. Then Neil was thunderstruck by the vision of Smith's simplistic murder method. He went to the foot of the tub and looked over the swimmer sitting in the water that filled the tub to three quarters. He suddenly grabbed the woman by the ankles, lifting her feet high into the air. She slipped beneath the water, her head wholly submerged. She had been made helpless. The quick lifting of her legs forced her arms, which would have normally gripped the sides of the tub, to slide backward and be rendered useless in any attempt to raise the head.

This demonstration almost resulted in tragedy. Though the woman had been under water for only a few seconds, when Neil released his hold, the swimmer remained under water, unconscious. He and Spilsbury quickly lifted her from the bath, and, for a terrible half hour, desperately worked to revive the swimmer with artificial respiration and restoratives. She finally came around, explaining to Neil and Spilsbury that when her legs were lifted into the air and her head slid beneath the water, her nostrils and mouth were immediately filled with water and she blacked out.

This, then, Neil and Spilsbury rightfully concluded was the method Smith had employed to kill his "Brides of the Bath," as the press later dubbed the victims. The sudden flow of water into mouth and nostrils, Spilsbury carefully explained at Smith's murder trial, caused shock and unconsciousness. How Smith stumbled upon this unique and bizarre murder method is not known to this day.



Scotland Yard diagrams showing the type of bathtub and the position in which three of Smith's wives were cleverly drowned.

Charged with the murders of Mundy, Burnham and Lofty (there were many others it was thought), Smith underwent a nine-day trial at the Old Bailey, June 22 to July 1, 1915. The case against him was circumstantial, but overwhelming. Neil and his detectives provided the prosecution with more than 2,000 statements on the case, more than any ever seen in a criminal case in England. Also placed on exhibit were the many careful ledgers Smith had maintained over the years, incriminating him in his stolen goods schemes.

The trial attracted thousands of curious spectators, mostly women who were obsessed with the bigamous wife-killer. One report describes how "they came by the hundreds—the lonely woman, the physically and mentally deprived, the woman hungering for love—women of the type Smith had chosen for his victims." Throughout, Smith stood aloof in the dock. Justice Scrutton presided, while Sir Archibald Bodkin prosecuted and Sir Edward Marshall Hall defended. When the judge cautioned the jury that it was about to hear a murder case, the defendant shouted that such a charge was "a disgrace to a Christian country!" He then added in a soft voice: "I may be a bit peculiar, but I am certainly no murderer."

The testimony of 112 witnesses damned Smith day after day, including the angry statements of the landladies in whose houses he had committed his murders. Smith's first wife, the reformed sneak thief, Caroline Thornhill, even returned from Canada to testify against him. His wife in Bristol, Edith Pegler Smith, also testified, feebly trying to help her errant husband, but her statements only further incriminated Smith, particularly when she recalled her husband's warnings in the use of bathtubs. "I should advise you to be careful of those things," Edith remembered Smith saying to her just before the murder of Margaret Lofty, "as it is known that women often lose their lives through weak hearts and fainting in a bath."

Smith said little on his own behalf, merely shaking his head and saying that the three known deaths were all "phenomenal coincidences." His defense counsel, headed by the brilliant Edward Marshall Hall, could offer only thin rebuttal and wild speculation. Hall reminded the jury of the statements of the doctors who had examined the three women before their deaths, that all had been in seemingly dazed conditions. His theory was that Smith never had to enter the bathrooms and that the brides drowned themselves as a result of being hypnotized by his client. Theories on drugs and poisonous vapors in the tub waters were also put forth.

Then Inspector Neil demonstrated before the jury the real method used by Smith to murder his wives by simply yanking their legs high into the air. At the end of the demonstration, the jury gasped open-mouthed. Smith clutched the wooden rail of the dock so tightly that his knuckles went white. He yelled in fury: "That man is a villain!" He shook his fist in Neil's direction. "He ought to be in the dock with me now!" The jury took twenty-three minutes to return a guilty verdict. Smith was sentenced to death and his appeals were denied.

In the early hours of August 13, 1915, Smith sat in his cell at Maidstone Jail, listening to a strange hum from human voices. A large crowd had assembled outside the walls, most of these visitors being women, and their chatter could be heard by Smith as he awaited execution that morning. He had refused to make any kind of confession and in his last minutes on earth this position did not change. At 8 a.m., Smith was taken from his cell. He staggered as he walked into the courtyard and toward the waiting gallows.

When Smith saw the scaffold, his legs failed and he had to be helped up the stairs. His arms were tied behind him and a black shroud was placed over his head, then a heavy rope lowered around his neck. A few seconds before the trap was sprung, George Joseph Smith experienced an emotion he had never allowed his "Brides of the Bath." His solemn, low words, heard at last by the executioner, came from beneath the dark hood: "I am in terror!"

"SHE'S TOO SMART FOR ME!"/1933

Ivan Poderjay, born in 1899, religiously maintained a mysterious past throughout his strange life. Even the country in which he was born is in question, but most likely he was a native of Hungary. He migrated to England at an early age, living by his wits in London, where he reportedly worked the same bigamous schemes so ardently practiced by the ubiquitous George Joseph Smith. As a teenager living from hand to mouth in London, Poderjay avidly followed the 1915 Smith trial, remarking to a friend: "That fellow Smith was pretty smart." When his friend reminded Poderjay that Smith "was not so smart as to get hanged," the street-wise teenager replied: "He used the same methods too many times. I wouldn't make that mistake."

In 1931, Poderjay met Marguerite Suzanne Ferrand, a French woman working in Paris. Older than Poderjay, she took him under her wing, tutoring him in the dark arts of fraud. One report related how Ferrand refined Poderjay's social manners and selected gullible females as likely prospects for his matrimonial scams. For two years, Poderjay allegedly married several women in bigamous swindles, taking their small savings before abandoning them, then sharing his ill-gotten gains with his mentor, Ferrand.

Ivan Poderjay, shown in handcuffs, en route to Sing Sing Prison in 1935, after his bigamy conviction.

Poderjay and Ferrand married in 1933 (also bigamous). It was a bizarre relationship wherein Ferrand's deep sadistic tendencies were willingly accepted by the masochistic Poderjay. Detectives investigating Poderjay's background a year later unearthed extensive correspondence written by Poderjay, these bizarre missives analyzed by several psychiatrists, who determined that the con artist was really four persons, as shown in Poderjay in 1938 (doffing hat), upon his prison release; he claimed that his missing wife was in hiding.

his writings to Ferrand: the masculine Poderjay, a feminine Poderjay who called himself Ivanita, and male and female slaves to Poderjay and Ferrand, calling themselves Vance and Vancette.

Most revealing to detectives were letters involving Ferrand's role in Poderjay's pursuit of a wealthy American woman, 43-year-old Agnes Tufverson. A corporate attorney with a sizeable fortune, Tufverson was staying in London when Poderjay (or Ferrand), received a tip from one of their contacts, a hotel employee, who provided a profile of the single woman.

Poderjay did not approach Tufverson until she boarded the French liner, Ile de France, on her return trip to the U.S. While en route to New York, Poderjay romanced Tufverson, proposing to her before the ship docked in Manhattan. In December 1933, within days of his proposal, Tufverson withdrew $25,000 from one of her bank accounts and gave the cash to Poderjay. They were then wedded (thought to be Poderjay's fifth or sixth such bigamous marriage) at the Little Church Around the Corner in New York City.

For three weeks, Poderjay refused to meet any of Tufverson's New York friends. At the end of this time, Poderjay made arrangements to sail with his new bride on the German liner Hamburg, saying that he and his wife would be moving to Austria, to live at his large estate (he had none). Some reported seeing Poderjay and Tufverson drive with suitcases and trunks to the dock where the Hamburg was moored, but the tickets were canceled at the last minute and Poderjay returned alone to the apartment, where the couple had been staying.

Two days later, Poderjay, with a new trunk, boarded another ship, the Olympic (sister ship of the ill-fated Titanic), for which he had a single stateroom ticket. Poderjay sent Tufverson's sisters a letter and later a telegram in which he stated that his wife had mysteriously disappeared. Olive and Selma Tufverson immediately alerted the police, who soon learned that Poderjay was still married to Ferrand. He was tracked to an apartment in Vienna, where Tufverson's clothes were found, but there was no trace of Agnes Tufverson. Although Austrian and American authorities believed that Poderjay had murdered Tufverson, there was not enough evidence to cause his extradition to the U.S. for murder.

Poderjay, however, was extradited on charges of bigamously marrying Tufverson. He was tried in New York and convicted of bigamy, then sentenced to five years in Sing Sing, although Judge George J. Donnellan declared that Poderjay "should be before the court on another charge." Upon his release from prison in 1938, Poderjay met with the press, telling newsmen that he had had no hand in Tufverson's supposed death, insisting that her disappearance was of her own doing. "That Agnes!," he said. "I have proof that she is still alive, but she's too smart for me! The police are not interested in finding her and never were." Ivan Poderjay returned to London, where he reunited with Ferrand. Both faded into obscurity.

"LOVER OF 1001 WOMEN"/1949

Sigmund Engel, born in 1874, was once asked why he had committed bigamy more than 200 times (undoubtedly the all-time worldwide record, far surpassing the estimated 50-100 bigamous marriages of wife-killer Johann Otto Hoch). He replied: "Womenania ... Surely they can't punish me for enjoying lovely women ... I go for the fifty-seven varieties." Engel was certainly the master of the bigamous confidence game. He practiced his matrimonial scams with amazing success across two continents and in many nations. By his own estimate, Engel married and bilked more than 200 women over a period of fifty years, gleaning more than $6 million from their savings and assets.

In the early years of the 20th Century, Engel lived in Europe, marrying for the first time in Vienna, Austria, and thereafter continuing his bigamous offenses through the capitals of Europe—Paris, Berlin, Rome, Madrid, Prague, Bucharest, Budapest, Warsaw—always in search of widows who possessed $5,000 or more. His name first appeared on police records in the U.S. in 1917. By the time of his final arrest in 1949, Engel had been arrested twenty-two times on charges of bigamy and fraud, serving four prison sentences. It was estimated by police officials in 1927 that he had bigamously married at least forty women in the U.S. up to that time.

Engel's approach to his victims was a practiced routine. With a glib line and persuasive charm, he would meet his prey in some public place and invariably say: "Why, you look just like my wife! I mean, my former wife, God bless her. She's dead these last four years." Most women, sensitive to his loss and the attention he heaped upon them were willing to go to lunch with Engel—he always took them to the best restaurants—and there he would impress them with his great social or financial standing by impersonating a famous person.

Sigmund Engel, at age 73, who wedded more than 200 women in bigamous marriages (the all-time record).

At one time or another, Engel passed himself off as Carl Arthur Laemmle, Jr., head of Universal Studios. He would, over lunch, call a waiter to the table with a telephone and pretend to call his studio in Hollywood, giving orders for upcoming film productions. He would then remark upon his companion's fine appearance and ask her to appear in his next film. Few were able to resist. On other occasions, he was an oil baron, a shipping magnate, Lord Beaverbrook, H. Paul Moore (attorney for millionaire Howard Hughes).

Engel always flashed a big bankroll to convince his mark that he was a man of means. Courtship and then marriage inevitably followed, after which he usually succeeded in convincing the bride to sign over her savings account to him "to avoid problems later." With the victim's money in hand, Engel would permanently depart with the explanation that he was off to buy new luggage for their honeymoon trip.

By 1949, Engel had gleaned a large, illegal fortune. One reason for his continued success was that he never stayed too long in any town. His violation of this principle proved his undoing. In early June 1949, he appeared in Chicago, where he met Reseda Corrigan, a 39-year-old woman who had just left a singing lesson. A whirlwind courtship followed during which Engel took Corrigan and her daughters to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, to see a grave he falsely claimed to be his mother's.

Champion bigamist Sigmund Engel (below, second from left) is shown in a Chicago courtroom in 1949; Reseda Corrigan (second from right) brought charges of bigamy and fraud against him.

Mrs. Irene Grimes, a rich widow and another of Engel's bigamous wives; she also testified against him.

Placing flowers next to the tombstone (the entombed person was the matron of a distinguished Milwaukee industrial family, background Engel had earlier researched), he said: "Mother, this is the little girl I'm going to marry."

After bilking Corrigan out of thousands of dollars, Engel set their wedding for June 7, 1949, but the day before the ceremony he sent his intended wife and her daughters to a beauty parlor, then vanished. A week later Corrigan received a phone call from Engel, asking her to take a train to New York and meet him at Manhattan's Grand Central Station. Alone, Corrigan went to New York, but Engel was not at the station. Broke, she lived in the station for eight days, sleeping in the washrooms and on public benches. She managed to return to Chicago and immediately filed a complaint against Engel for breach-of-promise and for swindling her out of her money with the Chicago Police Department. A photo of the wanted man was shortly published in a local newspaper.

By this time, Engel had moved on to his next victim, but he had made the mistake of not leaving Chicago. He stayed on to pitch his woo at 59-year-old Genevieve C. Parrot, a widow with six sons. She had met Engel at the posh Palm Grove Inn, where he had wined and dined her. Parrot knew him as "Paul Marshall," a wealthy, retired banker, who lived at the Blackstone Hotel on Michigan Avenue. Then Parrot saw the "wanted" photo of Engel in a newspaper and became alarmed. She called her sister-in-law, Marianne Hagen, a Chicago policewoman, for advice, and was told to play along with the swindler.

After agreeing to marry Engel, Parrot agreed to provide him with cash to purchase some new luggage for their honeymoon. Engel, on June 24, 1949, dutifully went to the Charles Wilt luggage store on Michigan Avenue, unaware that the sales clerks and customers were actually undercover police officers. As Engel attempted to leave the store with his luggage, police officers pounced upon him, taking him to the Town Hall Station, where he was booked on charges of bigamy and fraud. The 73-year-old Lothario quickly became a cause celebre. While he was in jail, a piano was provided for his amusement and police officers were delighted to escort him to dinner, allowing him to leave jail for short periods to dine at Chicago's better restaurants, where Engel paid the bill.

While he awaited trial, a number of Engel's swindled wives and girlfriends came forward to tell their stories. Many were present when Engel's trial opened before Judge George M. Fisher in October 1949. Reseda Corrigan gave the court an amusing inside look at Engel's technique. "I first met him on South Michigan Avenue," she said, "just after I had left a singing lesson. He came up to me and grabbed me by both hands. He said: 'It's amazing, amazing, amazing. You look so much like my dead wife I would have thought that she had walked out of her grave.' He was so gentlemanly, so refined. He told me he liked petite women and I'm only five feet one inch."

Engel, who was released on bail after the first day's hearing, was suddenly the center of attraction for hundreds of love-starved women. One woman broke through a police line at the courthouse to rush up to him and beg him to sign her autograph book. He gave her a wide smile and signed her book: "Sigmund S. Engel, Lover of 1001 Women." When reading of this event, Engel's defense attorney, J. Edward Jones, threw up his hands in frustration, saying to his client: "I'm trying to prove you're not that!"

Appearing in court to testify against Engel are two more wives: Mrs. Corrine Perry (second from left), of Los Angeles, and Mrs. Annette Kubiak (second from right), of South Bend.

As his trial progressed, the real Sigmund Engel began to emerge as a ruthless, bigamous swindler and not simply an elderly swain out to win the hearts of lonely widows. Some of the most damaging testimony was provided by Annette Kubiak of South Bend, Indiana, who had met Engel in October 1948 at the Oliver Hotel in her home town. At the time, Engel introduced himself as H. Paul Moore, a rich California attorney. A week later, they were married in Michigan City, Indiana.

Returning to South Bend with his new wife, Engel threw a lavish party at a posh country club, where he urged Kubiak to sell her home, saying that they would be moving to sunny California to live on his estate by the sea. Kubiak sold her home, valued at $22,000 for only $12,500. The buyer's $5,000 earnest money wound up in Engel's pocket. Kubiak never saw the money again. The couple then traveled to Chicago, where they checked into the Stevens Hotel. Engel left his new wife by saying he was going out to buy new luggage for their trip to California and never returned.

When these facts came to light at the trial, defense attorneys objected, stating that the law prohibited a wife from testifying against her husband. Judge Fisher agreed, but only to the letter of the law that applied to Engel's legal wife, and that Kubiak and many others testifying were not legal spouses, but victims of bigamous marriages. Judge Fisher pointed out that, to the best evidence available, Engel's legal wife was 64-year-old Corrine Perry of Los Angeles, who had surrendered her entire life savings of $2,673 to her swindling husband and who had married her under the name of Eugene Gordon.

Engel embraces Mrs. Pauline Langton of New York City, another bigamous wife, who was swindled by him, but who nevertheless succumbed to his charms and gave him loyal support during his 1949 trial in Chicago.

Despite the exposure of the swindler's shady past, Engel nevertheless had some dogged admirers. Wealthy Pauline Langton of New York City came forward to say that she forgave the scoundrel for stealing $50,000 in jewelry from her before he disappeared years earlier. Still smitten by the aging lover, Langton moved in with Engel at his Chicago hotel, paying the bills. Prosecuting attorneys objected to this arrangement, issuing an order banning Engel from living with Langton. As the couple left the courtroom arm-in-arm, Engel smiled at reporters and said: "You can take it from me—she's [Langton] is the only lady in the lot."

Engel's jocular attitude began to change as more and more women appeared on the stand to testify against him, essentially repeating the same story. Engel grew indignant, finally blurting to newsmen: "It's like playing the same record over and over, the way they say I made love to them." He said these women were merely parroting the stories others had told and had been publicized by the newspapers (he was by then national news, his case followed by almost every major newspaper in the nation). Complained Engel: "These women—who are all these women? I wouldn't be seen dead in a hotel with Engel's hidden bankroll: $7,400 in $100 bills found sewn into his shorts while the bigamist was in custody.

Engel is shown manhandling his attorney, J. Edward Jones, in a dispute over legal tactics in his case.

Sigmund Engel, before going to prison for bigamy, shows his favorite card, the Queen of Hearts, symbolizing his passion for womankind.

most of these women! They are all gold-diggers, who are trying to get my money! I'll show the state. I'll rip hell out of their case."

After eight days of deliberation, the jury returned a guilty verdict on charges of bigamy and fraud. On November 9, 1949, Engel was sentenced to prison from two to ten years. Before going behind bars, where he would die a short time later, Engel told press members that he had been inspired in his long and shady career by the exploits of Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil, king of the con men. Weil, who was then living in Chicago, bristled at the thought that Engel considered himself to be in his league. Weil called a press conference of his own in which he stated: "There isn't a day when someone doesn't abscond with a woman's money. Preying on the love of a woman for money is one of the most despicable ways of making a livelihood I ever heard of."

As he departed for prison from Union Station, Engel, the champion bigamist of all time, waved and smiled at reporters. Before he went through the gate to his train, handcuffed and escorted by police officers, Engel handed a reporter a piece of paper upon which (like Johann Otto Hoch before him) he had written his rules of advice on how to successfully romance any woman. It read:

1. Always look for the widows. Less complications.
2. Establish your own background as one of wealth and culture.
3. Make friends with the entire family.
4. Send a woman frequent bouquets. Roses, never orchids.
5. Don't ask for money. Make her suggest lending it to you.
6. Be attentive at all times.
7. Be gentle and ardent.
8. Always be a perfect gentleman. Subordinate sex.

THE LONELY HEARTS KILLERS/1951

Two persons—an overweight, 30-year-old woman and her bigamous co-killer, a thin, 37-year-old man—were put to death at New York's Sing Sing Prison on March 8, 1951, ending the heinous careers of the Lonely Hearts Killers, Martha Beck and Raymond Martinez Fernandez. They made up a strange couple, a union where the heavyset Beck ordered the dominated Fernandez to marry, bilk and murder many women. These slayings were not only for financial profit but, in Fernandez's case, served as a test in each instance to prove his undying love for Martha Beck.

Fernandez, born in Hawaii of Spanish parents, was an adventurous youth, who reportedly served with British intelligence during World War II, winning commendations. He was wounded in the head in 1945, an injury that allegedly altered his personality from sanguine to phlegmatic and propelled him into a criminal career, wherein he methodically bilked wealthy widows after proposing marriage. He was tall and thin, covering his almost bald head with a cheap black wig. The women enamored of his pedestrian romantic pitch thought of him as an irresistible Latin lover. In the words of one newsman who followed his career: "He was a rather seedy Charles Boyer."

The victims Fernandez selected were invariably members of the then popular lonely hearts clubs or through the lonely hearts columns in newspapers. He married several of his victims, having one wife in Spain, another in the U.S. and still others in Mexico and in Canada. One of the lovelorn ads Fernandez answered had been placed by Mrs. Martha Beck, a registered nurse, who operated a home for crippled children in Pensacola, Florida.

When the sleazy Lothario arrived at Mrs. Beck's front door in 1947, Fernandez was taken aback by the obese woman standing before him. She welcomed him with open arms and he, the dedicated confidence man, inexplicably fell in love with the unattractive Martha. Mrs. Beck, who had been divorced since 1944, lavished attention on Fernandez, who confessed his swindling ways to her. To his surprise, she not only approved of his crooked pursuits, but asked that she become a partner in his widow-bilking schemes. The couple then moved northward, stopping in cities along the way to answer lonely hearts advertisements, mulcting and often murdering their love-sick victims.

The usual procedure was for Fernandez to woo and win the lovelorn lady and, during the course of a brief courtship, introduce Beck as his sister. Following the wedding, Beck would move in with the newlyweds and the looting of the victim's savings and jewelry quickly ensued. Most of the victims, more than 100 of them during a three-year career of bigamous swindles, were women in their fifties and sixties. However, a problem quickly developed. Beck could not bear to be in the same house with Fernandez and a new wife, knowing that her man was making love to another woman. Her jealousy increased whenever the victim was young and attractive as was the case with Delphine Dowling of Grand Rapids, Michigan.

Mrs. Dowling was twenty-eight and had a 2-year-old daughter, Rainelle. She was apprehensive of Fernandez, allowing Bigamist Raymond Fernandez (left, wearing toupee) in custody at Grand Rapids, Michigan, charged with murdering Mrs. Delphine Dowling in 1949.

Fernandez is shown signing a confession which detailed his many murders of bigamous wives.

Bigamist Fernandez is shown with one of his victims, Mrs. Myrtle Young, whom he bilked and murdered in Chicago in 1948; he sarcastically stated she died from "over-exertion."

Mrs. Encarnaca Fernandez, a bigamous wife living in Spain, to whom the killer remained loyal; he married this woman at the time he was poisoning to death another wife, Jane Thompson.

him and his "sister" to move into her home, but delaying the nuptials with her new-found Latin lover, until she was convinced that her spouse-to-be was sincere. Beck found it impossible to sleep in the next room, while her lover was on the other side of the wall with a younger, more attractive woman. They would not wait for the nuptials, Beck told the docile Fernandez. Mrs. Dowling and her daughter had to go, she ordered. Both disappeared in January 1949.

Neighbors took sharp note of the absence of Mrs. Dowling and her young daughter and called police. When officers arrived at the Dowling residence, Beck and Fernandez, who surprisingly had remained at the Dowling home (overblown with false confidence in continuing their long criminal careers), calmly invited them inside. They said that they had no idea where Mrs. Dowling and her child had gone. Police thought the pair looked suspicious and insisted that the home be searched. Beck shrugged and Fernandez waved them into the parlor.

Investigators went to the basement where they found a fresh patch of cement on the floor. "It's the size of a grave," said one officer. After some digging, the police found the bodies of Mrs. Dowling and her child. The Lonely Hearts Killers, as Beck and Fernandez were quickly dubbed by the press, collapsed immediately, freely admitting the murders. They then bragged that there were as many as seventeen other such victims. Beck gloried in her publicity and was happy to explain in detail how she dosed Mrs. Dowling with sleeping pills.

Mrs. Dowling was strong enough to resist the drug, said Beck, so Fernandez shot her in the head. They said that they had not originally planned to murder the little girl. She cried for her mother, Beck said, and the killers tried to appease her by buying her a dog. When she continued to whine for her mother, however, Beck dragged her into the bathroom, filled the tub with water, and then held her beneath the water, drowning her.

Why had the murderous couple stayed long enough to be exposed, police wanted to know. Both told officers that they had been trying to sell off Mrs. Dowling's house, but they had had a difficult time getting the price they sought. Beck and Fernandez also reasoned that in the event they were discovered before concluding their business in Grand Rapids, they would not face execution.

Both killers knew that the state of Michigan had no death penalty, thinking they would be imprisoned and later paroled for their murders of Mrs. Dowling and her child. (This was the same tactic employed by Fred R. "Killer" Burke, one of the machine gun killers of the 1929 St. Valentine's Day Massacre in Chicago. When detectives were on his trail, Burke fled to Michigan and promptly shot and killed a policeman so that he would receive a life term in Michigan, instead of facing the electric chair in Illinois.)

Martha Beck, Fernandez' psychopathic lover, glumly reads her murder partner's confession, one which implicated her in most of his lethal bigamous schemes.

Below: The body of 66-year-old Janet Fay is removed from her New York home; she was hammered to death by Beck when showing too much affection for Fernandez.

Martha Beck (second from left) and her bigamist lover, Raymond Fernandez (at right) sit joking with a police officer during their trial in New York for murdering Janet Fay.

Convicted killer Martha Beck breaks down when learning that she is going to Sing Sing's electric chair.

Believing that they would receive long prison terms in Michigan, the killers confidently boasted of many other murders they had committed in their bigamous schemes. "I'm no average killer," Fernandez bragged. "I only got five hundred off the Dowling woman, but take Mrs. Jane Thompson. I took six thousand off of her." He explained how he married Mrs. Thompson and took her to Spain, where he murdered her, poisoning her with digitalis.

Fernandez then described how he had returned from Spain to tell Mrs. Thompson's relatives that his "poor wife" had been killed in a train wreck. He knew that the Thompson family would not check to see if there had been such a wreck. "They took my word for it," laughed Fernandez. "People will believe anything." He rattled on to say that he had been so convincing a liar that he was welcomed into the home of Mrs. Thompson's mother, Mrs. L. Wilson, and that he wooed and bilked her and then murdered her, too.

Throughout Fernandez's long confession, Beck was at her lover's side, chuckling perversely as he droned his litany of murder. She found it all amusing and was solicitous of her murderous partner. Fernandez began to sweat and removed his cheap wig. Beck reached over to pat his bald pate dry with her handkerchief, thickly scented with cheap perfume. Then she urged him to continue, as if she were a child begging for a tale to be completed. Fernandez recalled another victim, Mrs. Myrtle Young. He took her to Chicago on their honeymoon in 1948, he said. "Poor woman," he laughed. "She died of overexertion!"

Beck could no longer allow Fernandez to hog the limelight. She blurted out her own confessions rapidly, her heavy jowls jiggling as she rattled off murder after murder. One she vividly recalled—there were so many, she said, that her memory was taxed—involved Mrs. Janet Fay of Manhattan, New York. She and Fernandez had already taken Mrs. Fay's last cent, but she was murdered anyway, only because Beck's jealousy exploded when the 66-year-old woman cried out for Fernandez as the couple began to leave her apartment.

Incensed at Fay's display of affection for Fernandez, she grabbed a hammer, she said, smashing Fay's head, crushing her skull. Then Beck said, in a little voice imitating that of a child: "I turned to Raymond and said: 'Look what I've done' and then he strangled her with a scarf." Beck explained that although she had already murdered Fay, Fernandez, out of deep love for her, insisted on taking part in the killing by strangling the lifeless corpse.

The Fay story Beck so blithely told backfired on the killers. They soon learned in shock that the state of Michigan agreed to extradite them to New York, where they would stand trial for the murder of Janet Fay. If convicted, both would face the death penalty, execution in the electric chair. The defendants were tried in Manhattan before Judge Ferdinand Pecora, pleading not guilty by reasons of insanity. Court-assigned psychiatrists examined them, pronouncing Beck and Fernandez sane. The trial went forward. On one occasion, when Beck was being brought into court, she broke away from her female guards and lifted the startled Fernandez out of his chair, kissing him passionately on the mouth, neck and cheeks and shouting: "I love him! I do love him and I always will!"

A jury quickly convicted the Lonely Hearts Killers. Judge Pecora sentenced them to death, their executions to be held on August 22, 1949, at Sing Sing Prison. While awaiting the electric chair, the couple exchanged love letters, sent between the male and female cell blocks. When Beck heard that Fernandez was regaling his fellow prisoners on Death Row with tales of Beck's eccentric behavior, she exploded, sending him the following message:

"You are a double-crossing, two-timing skunk. I learn now that you have been doing quite a bit of talking to everyone. It's nice to know what a terrible, murderous person I am, while you are such a misunderstood, white-haired boy, caught in the clutches of a female vampire. It is also nice to know that all the love letters you wrote 'from the heart' were written with a hand shaking with laughter at me for being such a gullible fool as to believe them. Don't waste your time or energy to hide from view in church from now on, for I won't even look your way—the halo over your righteous head might blind me. May God have mercy on your soul. M. J. Beck."

Through appeals filed by their attorneys, Beck and Fernandez managed to postpone their date with the electric chair until March 8, 1951. On that day, the condemned killers ordered their last meals. Fernandez asked for a six-course meal, but, with his death only hours away, he could not eat it. He did, however, smoke a long Havana cigar down to the stub. Then he handed a note to one of the guards, saying that these words would be his last utterances on earth. The note, later widely publicized, stated: "People want to know if I still love Martha. But of course I do. I want to shout it out. I love Martha. What do the public know about love?"

Martha Beck, who was tired of being portrayed as a flabby, fat woman, told a female guard that she would show the world what kind of woman she really was. She would resist ordering a feast as her last meal. That said, she ordered fried chicken, fried potatoes and a salad—a double order of each. After packing away this meal, Martha Beck wiped her lips and announced to female guards that she still loved Raymond Fernandez.

There existed a long-standing tradition at Sing Sing that when two persons were to be executed on the same day, the weakest was to be sent to the chair first. This was Fernandez. He was half-carried to the electric chair by several guards and was in a state of nervous collapse when the switch was thrown. Martha Beck followed, walking without any support, confident, smiling at observers as she entered the Death Room. She looked at the chair and then threw her bulk onto it, her heavy frame squeezed between the armrests. Her smile was frozen to her face as the black hood was placed over her head.

FLORIDA'S BLACK WIDOW/1998

Judy (Judith) Buenoano (1944-1998) justly earned the sobriquet of Florida's "Black Widow," a killer who ruthlessly preyed upon and murdered those who loved her. Little is known of her early career, but it was learned that she bigamously married several men in Florida and elsewhere in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Some of her illegal husbands, along with sweethearts, met death at her hands, but this was not learned until 1983, when John Gentry's car exploded while he was driving in downtown Pensacola, Florida. Gentry survived the blast and later told police that his fiancee, Judy Buenoano had given him "vitamins" that had made him ill. The pills were examined and proved to contain arsenic.

Buenoano, who had taken out a $500,000 insurance policy on Gentry's life, was convicted of attempted murder and sent to prison for twelve years. The case did not end there. Detectives learned Buenoano was suspected of being involved in similar cases and they began to dig into her background. One of Buenoano's many boyfriends had died of a strange illness in Colorado in 1978, probably from poisoning, the investigators concluded. Further, Buenoano's former husband, Air Force Sergeant James Goodyear and his 19-year-old stepson, Michael Goodyear, had died under mysterious circumstances. In both instances, Buenoano had collected large amounts of insurance money, $240,000 in all.

Officers investigating the death of Michael Goodyear concluded that Buenoano had dosed the youth with arsenic over a prolonged period of time, causing him paralysis and requiring that he wear heavy arm and leg braces. She then took him boating in 1980, according to one report, and threw him out of a canoe in a river near Pensacola, watching him drown. (This scene was a duplication of the drowning murder depicted in the 1946 film, Leave Her to Heaven, one where a crippled teenager is allowed to sink to his watery death by a stepmother jealous of the attention her husband gives to the boy, a movie that may have inspired Buenoano to commit her killing of Michael Goodyear.)

Detectives were also convinced that Buenoano had murdered James Goodyear, her husband of nine years. Goodyear's body was exhumed and large amounts of arsenic were found in the remains. Buenoano was tried for this murder in 1985. She attempted to defend herself by stating that arsenic could be found in cigarettes and that her former husband had been a heavy smoker. She was nevertheless convicted of this murder and sentenced to death. After many appeals, Judy Buenoano was scheduled to die in Florida's electric chair on March 30, 1998.

The Black Widow spent her last day on earth watching a hunting and fishing show on TV as she ate chocolates. She met briefly with her children and a cousin, then consumed a final meal of steamed broccoli and asparagus, strawberries and hot tea. She finished reading a suspense novel only a few minutes before she was led to the electric chair at the state prison in Starke, Florida. Buenoano had said repeatedly that she had no fear of dying, but when she walked into the execution chamber her legs gave way and guards had to support her sagging body. She clenched the hands of the guards who placed her in the chair and shuddered as the electrode-studded skull cap was lowered on to her shaved heard. She was asked if she had anything to say. "No, sir," she whispered.

Her hands were still clenched when more than 2,000 volts of electricity shot through her quivering body, causing smoke to rise from her right leg, where an electrode had been attached. She was pronounced dead five minutes later. One of the detectives who worked on the Goodyear murder case and others reportedly committed by Buenoano, was one of the witnesses who viewed the serial killer's death. He was not sorry to see her pass, remarking: "Here you have a woman who killed her own—husband, boyfriends and son. This was a mean person. She needed to go."

Judy Buenoano, Florida's infamous "Black Widow," who was executed in 1998 for murdering her legal husband, James Goodyear.

Buenoano was the second woman to be executed in Florida's history, the first being a slave named Celia, who had murdered her elderly master, Jacob Bryan, a Jacksonville plantation owner. Celia was hanged on September 14, 1848. The execution of the Black Widow followed closely upon the execution of Karla Faye Tucker, who was convicted of using a pickax to murder two persons and had received a lethal injection in Texas in February 1998, despite widespread appeals to save her.

Both Buenoano and Tucker had become born-again Christians while awaiting their executions, which many thought was nothing more than a sham to save their lives, convinced to the end that these two women were vicious killers deserving of capital punishment. Eileen Carole Wuornos (1957-2002), was the third woman executed in Florida, a prostitute and drifter who was convicted of murdering seven men by her own account. She was put to death by lethal injection in the state prison at Starke, Florida, in 2002.

CHAPTER THREE: BURGLARY

The burglar by profession is, for the most part, a nocturnal criminal, illegally breaking and entering a building to commit a crime. He operates by stealth and his tools include master keys and metal picks by which to open locked doors. He often gains entrance by ladders to an open window on a second floor, ergo the sobriquet of the "Second Story Man," or by accessing fire escapes to apartments on higher floors.

Often enough, the burglar is also an accomplished safecracker (cracksman, safeblower), who, once entering a building, is able to open safes by means of dynamite or chemicals that will explode away doors. Legendary cracksmen like Jimmy Connors, immortalized as the infamous Jimmy Valentine by writer O. Henry (William Sydney Porter, 1862-1910) in his 1908 book, The Gentle Grafter, was adept at picking the combination locks of bank safes in the 1880s and 1890s. In the modern era, such bank burglars used stethoscopes and sophisticated electronic devices to listen to safe tumblers as they clicked to combination stops that allowed them to open safes without the use of explosives.

The professional burglar is invariably a cunning, crafty creature whose inventive techniques have baffled and confused law enforcement agencies for generations. Burglars have accessed buildings by myriad means, drilling through ceilings, breaking through the walls of adjacent structures, even tunneling into basement areas from sewers and underground passageways to gain entrance. Night is their ally, silence their accomplice.

In the hierarchy of crime, fellow criminals hold the professional burglar—especially the safecracker—in high esteem, ranking such miscreants near the top of criminal pursuits, after the confidence man (or woman), who accomplishes his criminal goals through wit and creative schemes and the bank robber as the boldest and most brazen of their criminal ilk. Through criminal history, the burglar has not normally resorted to violence and has wounded or even killed victims (such as master burglar Bernard Welch), only when discovered and cornered.

In more recent times, some of the most notorious burglars—William Heirens of Chicago and Richard Ramirez and Richard Allen Davis of California—consciously coupled murder to their burglarizing offenses and, in fact, their perverted bloodlust unreasonably overwhelmed their original purpose of burglary. These three burglars are best remembered as killers of children or women, and, as such, are held in hateful contempt by their criminal peers. (When jailed, such murderers are routinely held in separate prison areas, isolated from the general population of inmates, many being married men with children, who mark such prisoners for death.)

In deep historic times, burglary was considered a capital offense and convicted burglars routinely faced execution after being convicted of such crimes. In some modern-day burglaries, sentences for recidivist burglars have been severe. On January 15, 1986, Clyde Ashley burglarized two cans of sardines from a small grocery store in Osyka, Mississippi, and was sentenced to life in prison for this crime. This draconian sentence was inspired by Ashley's prolonged career as a burglar. The 41-year-old Ashley had been committing burglaries for most of his adult life, having spent twenty-three years behind bars for such offenses. His case was reviewed in 1989 by the Mississippi Supreme Court and his sentence reduced.

Many burglars will attempt to enter a building through any possible avenue of access, which has often led to their apprehension. Typical are two 1989 cases. On February 25 of that year, Chicago, Illinois, police officers arrested 25-year-old Cortez Dixon, for burglary after the owner of a restaurant he had burgled found him stuck and screaming for help in a barbecue vent. Although Dixon had squirmed his way into the restaurant, he was unable to escape through the same opening. On March 23, 1989, burglar James Edward Burgess, thirty-one, was apprehended after getting stuck in a chimney while trying to enter a doctor's office.

Often enough, especially in the cases of bank and jewelry firm invasions, burglars have "inside" accomplices, who aid them in accessing the buildings they target for burglaries. On rare occasions, police officers themselves have committed burglaries and blamed these crimes on others. One offbeat case involved 35-year-old Richard Makofski, who was arrested in Howard County, Maryland, on October 29, 1989 and charged with more than 1,000 burglaries in Florida, where he had made video tapes on burglary methods used in police training.

Employees of institutions, where large amounts of cash or gold is stored have been known to commit daring (or extremely stupid) burglaries, such as the 1893 burglarizing of the U.S. Mint in Philadelphia by chief weighing clerk Henry S. Cochrane. A more recent case involved Jesse Mormon, the janitor of a bank in Memphis, Tennessee, who was caught red-handed on May 9, 1990, while trying to drill holes from the women's restroom into the bank's vault.

The strangest burglars are those who invade the homes of the famous simply because they are obsessed with certain celebrities. John Hinckley, Jr., who attempted to assassinate President Ronald Reagan in 1981, to impress movie star Jodie Foster, had fantasies of invading the actress' home, but could not locate her address. This was not the case in the many home burglaries (where personal items were taken as keepsakes) committed by Margaret Ray, who was obsessed with TV host David Letterman and repeatedly broke into his Connecticut home.

One experienced burglar, 50-year-old John Leslie Hill, who had escaped from a Florida prison in 1988, broke into the mansion of the governor in Albany, New York on November 29, 1988, simply to see if he could challenge the authority that building represented. Ronald Scott Shamburger repeatedly broke into the apartment of Lori Ann Baker, a girl with whom he was obsessed, in College Station, Texas, burglarizing her personal items. On September 29, 1994, his last invasion, the young woman woke up to see him standing next to her bed. He shot her between the eyes, killing her. Shamburger was later sentenced to death.

THE INTELLECTUAL BURGLAR/1759

The most notable burglar of earlier times was a criminal unlike any other of his profession. British-born Eugene Aram (1704-1759), was an accomplished scholar and philologist. He was expert in the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Celtic languages. He was also a burglar, thief and a murderer. His case is all the more intriguing in that he was not tried for his capital crime until fourteen years after he committed it. Aram was born in Ramsgill in West Riding, Yorkshire. His father was a gardener on the Newby estate of Sir Edward Blackett.

Self-taught, with some help from the tutors of the Blacketts, Aram was able to rise to the position of schoolmaster at Knaresborough by 1734. He married Anna Spence in 1731 and the couple produced seven children, a family that kept the schoolmaster on the brink of bankruptcy from year to year. His frustration at making ends meet, some historians claim, soured Aram's otherwise poetic, gentle nature and caused him to be overly strict with his students. Some of his pupils later described him as a "stern disciplinarian."

Eugene Aram, teacher and philosopher, who was hanged for burglary and murder in 1759; he would be the subject of Thomas Hood's narrative poem, The Dream of Eugene Aram, and Edward Bulwer-Lytton's novel, Eugene Aram.

To pick up extra money, Aram enlisted the aid of a disreputable character, Richard Houseman, a sometimes weaver. The two of them practiced petty thievery at night by burglarizing homes. Aram also obtained stolen goods from several other thieves, including Henry Terry, a gamekeeper in the area, and Francis Iles, a receiver of stolen goods, who fenced these purloined items in areas as far away as Scotland. Another friend of Aram's at the time was a wealthy shoemaker, Daniel Clark, whose wife had inherited considerable wealth. Clark shared with Aram a deep interest in books, botany and gardening.

On the night of February 7, 1745, Clark disappeared, along with a considerable quantity of expensive goods—velvets, pewter and silver plate (burglarized from neighborhood households), and other rare items, and most of his wife's dowry of £200. A short time later Aram and his friends were arrested on suspicion of having some of Clark's stolen goods, but were released for lack of evidence. Aram, believing he would be rearrested for the burglary, grew desperate and fled to London, leaving his large family to fend for itself. He changed his name and took teaching positions, tutoring wealthy children in Latin. Aram then moved to Middlesex and still later to King's Lynn, Norfolk.

Had it not been for a strange quirk of fate, Eugene Aram's name might have been lost to criminal posterity. Workmen digging at Thistle Hill near Knaresborough found some human bones on August 1, 1758. These were presumed to be Clark's remains and a frenzied effort was made to locate all of the missing man's friends, including Houseman and Aram. Both had been seen with the victim on the night of his disappearance by a local innkeeper, William Triton. Houseman was located, but he denied having had anything to do with Clark. The bones found by the workmen later proved not to be the remains of Clark and Houseman was released.

Then some old plate that had been in Clark's possession was located and traced to Houseman who was arrested once again. This time Aram's old confederate confessed, but blamed Aram for Clark's murder, telling authorities that he and Aram had taken the shoemaker to St. Robert's Cave, where Aram struck Clark several times on the head and breast, killing him. Houseman then led officials to the cave, where skeletal remains were found and identified as that of Clark. Aram, however, was still at large.

Weeks later, the schoolteacher had the misfortune to meet a resident of Knaresborough, who was visiting King's Lynn and recognized him. The man, John Barker, was no ordinary traveler, but a constable living in Knaresborough, who had known both Aram and Clark. He arrested Aram and returned him to Knaresborough. En route, Aram denied ever having known Clark, a serious mistake in that his friendship with Clark was well known and Barker's testimony later in court about Aram's denial in having known Clark further damned the schoolteacher's cause.

When arriving in Knaresborough and appearing before Magistrate Thornton, Aram denied his guilt and tried to shift the blame for Clark's death onto Houseman and Henry Terry, but Houseman had already turned state's evidence for the Crown and his version of events was what the prosecution accepted and used against Aram. The schoolteacher, along with Terry and Houseman, was jailed at York Prison on August 21, 1758, and remained there pending trial, until the following year, when Aram was brought to the York Assizes on August 3, 1759, before Justice Noel. He was prosecuted by Fletcher Norton, K.C., a relentless advocate for the Crown. Aram conducted his own defense and he did a brilliant job of it.

Houseman again testified in detail how Aram murdered Clark, and other witnesses were systematically paraded before the court by the prosecution to prove that Aram had possessed, following Clark's disappearance, a considerable amount of money, which he used to pay outstanding bills, money, it was assumed, he had taken from Clark after beating him to death. Aram countered by stating that the bones found in St. Andrew's Cave could be those of anyone, that no one could positively identify these remains as that of Clark, Houseman's claims notwithstanding. He also cited many cases, where men who supposedly had vanished later returned.

Exhibiting his knowledge of history, Aram cited the many battles that had been fought over the centuries about St. Andrew's Cave and that the remains Houseman claimed to be that of Clark could have been those of a fallen warrior ages ago. He also claimed that on the night of Clark's disappearance, he was deathly ill. He stated that an illness at the time of the so-called murder had left him "so macerated, so enfeebled that I was reduced to crutches." He could not prove this, however, even through the testimony of his deserted wife, Anna, whose statements about him were ambiguous at best.

In this contemporary painting, school teacher Aram (left at window) is shown haunted by guilt as his students sing a hymn.

Aram depended upon his intellectual stature in presenting his case, portraying himself as a man of high intelligence and emotional sensibility. In an eloquent presentation of his own character he stated, "I concerted not schemes of fraud, projected not violence, injured no man's person or property. My days were honestly laborious and my nights intensely studious." No man living such a purposeful life could, he stated, "plunge into the very depth of profligacy, precipitately ... Mankind is never corrupted at once. Villainy is always progressive." (In uttering these lofty words, Aram could have been speaking for many a modern-day criminologist advocating social and economic environment as the chief causes of crime.)

He was no thief, no murderer, Aram insisted, but had been so labeled by burglars, thieves and murderers eager to save their own necks, chiefly Houseman and, to some degree, Terry, who testified against Aram, when Aram implicated him in Clark's disappearance. He was a victim of circumstance, the schoolteacher claimed with great passion and alliterative pleading. He left his case with the good conscience of the court.

The jury, however, had heard testimony from authorities who quoted Aram's many contradictory statements. No, he did not know Houseman, Terry, Clark. Well, yes, he knew them, but they were not his associates. Yes, he had some dealings with them, but only brief encounters of no importance. In the end, he was found guilty and was sentenced to be hanged. Aram stood in the dock listening to his death sentence with a calm attitude and a slight smile on his face. He made no comment as he was led off to prison to await the executioner.

The night before Aram was scheduled to hang, the schoolteacher somehow obtained a razor and attempted to cut his throat in his cell, but a warder interrupted him and saved him for the scaffold. On August 6, 1759, Eugene Aram ate a small breakfast and then received in his cell two clergymen, who attempted to spiritually console him. He reportedly confessed to the murder of Clark, according to one account, but still claimed that Houseman, who had escaped the gallows through his testimony, was equally guilty. Contradictory to the end, Aram then restated his old claim that the skeleton found was that of some person other than Clark. "What became of Clark's body?" he asked one of the clergymen.

"I'll tell you what became of it," the cleric reportedly replied. "You and Houseman dragged it into the cave, stripped and buried it there, brought away his clothes and burned them at your own house." Aram stood up and faced the cell wall, ordering the clergymen to leave him alone. A short time later he was publicly hanged outside the gates of York, going to his death with composure. His body was then taken to Knaresborough on August 7, 1759, where it was gibbeted in chains and the corpse left to rot and then mummify for many years so that thousands of travelers passing the hideous remains along the main road would be reminded of the sins of Eugene Aram.

One fanciful tale held that the schoolteacher's widow visited the hanging spot daily, picking up the bones of her once beloved spouse as they fell to earth one by one, burying these in a secret grave, and that it took her a decade to collect all the remains. A local doctor later went to the site and cut off the head, or what was left of it, and the skull was later exhibited in the Royal College of Surgeons in London.

This brilliant burglar and killer found his way into literature other than the criminous. Thomas Hood eulogized the errant schoolteacher in a lengthy poem entitled "The Dream of Eugene Aram," which was later quoted at great length by England's most infamous burglar of the 19th Century, Charles Peace. This master burglar would recite its seemingly endless stanzas when in his cups, astounding his fellow thieves who sat mesmerized in London pubs, listening to Peace rattle off Hood's fanciful portrait of Aram the burglar and equating Aram, in the sense of criminal history, to that of any distinguished historical figure. To Peace, Eugene Aram was as important as King Richard the Lionheart, an ancient criminal idol that spurred Peace on to his own heinous acts and led him to the same end, the gallows.

Aram is shown with accomplice Richard Houseman, hiding the body of Daniel Clark in St. Andrew's Cave.

LONDON'S MASTER BURGLARS/1772

John Adshead (1741-1772) and Benjamin Alsworth (1743-1772) were professional criminals who, for a short period of time, were also the most successful burglars in London. Of the pair, Adshead was the leader, born in Northamptonshire, England. Before he was twenty, Adshead moved to London where he became a footman, later a gunsmith. To support his expensive tastes, he took to housebreaking. His success at this enterprise also earned him a wide reputation among the fences through which he sold his stolen merchandise.

These underworld connections, however, caused him to become apprehensive, thinking he might be betrayed by these devious associates to the police for reward money. To avoid such possibilities, Adshead moved to Bristol, where he burglarized the home of a jeweler, realizing £150 from the looted gems. With the proceeds, Adshead opened a pub, but this enterprise failed. He went back to burglarizing homes, becoming rich.

Expensive clothes and fine living enthralled Adshead, though he continued to live in the poverty-stricken areas of London and did not seek the company of cultured people. He desired this lifestyle so that he could feed his ego on the ignorant admiration of his impoverished drinking companions. One of these was a former soldier, Benjamin Alsworth, who had a large family and was unemployed.

Alsworth asked Adshead how he could afford to dress in such sartorial style, and the older man told him that he had inherited money from a wealthy, recently deceased uncle. When the ex-soldier asked for a loan of four guineas, Adshead said he did not possess such a sum. Smiling, he told Alsworth that he could teach him how to "obtain a hundred pounds in an hour."

At first Alsworth thought his friend was joking, but Adshead spoke seriously and long about the rewards awaiting the cautious, accomplished burglar. He later took Alsworth to his rooms and there patiently taught him the methods of burglary. Soon the two were housebreaking throughout London and amassing a considerable fortune. They became so complacent that the burglars began to openly carry their loot from the houses they robbed.

On the night of May 18, 1772, Adshead and Alsworth burglarized the large house of Mrs. Bellamy on Newman Street and Oxford Road, shouldering huge bundles of stolen silk and other expensive prizes. A watchman called out to them and Adshead dropped his bundle, fleeing into the darkness. Alsworth, the greedier of the pair, held on to his package and was quickly overtaken and arrested. Adshead was arrested by another watchman a short time later and both men were taken before Justice Cox.

Adshead quietly told Cox that the goods they were carrying really belonged to him and his friend. When detained by the watchmen, they had been in the act of removing these items from their own lodgings so the landlord would not claim them for back rent, he explained. Justice Cox patiently listened to Adshead's story, but grew suspicious when the men would not give him the address of their lodgings. He had them detained.

When the Bellamy household awoke that morning, servants discovered the house had been burglarized. Handbills were immediately printed on orders of the family and these were sent throughout London, particularly to the police stations and magistrate courts. (This was the most effective method of detecting stolen property in that early day. A printed inventory of stolen items described in handbills was compared by watchmen and magistrates to goods found on suspicious persons being detained. A thief in custody and the items he had stolen could thus be identified.)

Burglars John Adshead (center) and Benjamin Alsworth are shown pleading with Justice Cox in London, 1772. Both were hanged.

After authorities realized that the Bellamy inventory of stolen household goods and those in the possession of Adshead and Alsworth were one and the same, the two men were arrested. In June 1772, both were tried at the Old Bailey and quickly convicted of burglary. Adshead begged the court to be lenient, pointing out that he was still a young man and was willing to change his ways. The dim-witted Alsworth said nothing.

In accordance with the draconian sentencing at that time for burglary, both men were condemned to be hanged. Adshead, while awaiting execution with Alsworth at Newgate Prison, was penitent to the point of being slavish. On July 8, 1772, both men were taken to Tyburn to be hanged. Before going through the trap, both burglars confessed their crimes openly and cautioned the thousands who had come to see them hang about the perils awaiting those who took up their evil professions.

THE REAL DR. JEKYLL AND MR. HYDE/1788

William Brodie (AKA: Deacon Brodie, Capt. John Dixon 1741-1788) was a man who led two industrious lives. By day, he was a leading citizen of Edinburgh, at night the mastermind of the town's most proficient burglars. The amazing double life of William Brodie later inspired Robert Louis Stevenson to use him as the role model for the leading character in his chilling novel, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.

A contemporary drawing shows master burglar William Brodie, a leading Edinburgh citizen, in his cell before going to trial.

Brodie was born in Edinburgh on September 28, 1741, the son of a prosperous cabinet maker. He was well-educated and by the time he was forty, Brodie was made Deacon of the Incorporation of Wrights, a title that referred to Brodie's status as a master carpenter and had no connection with organized religion, as popularly thought by later generations unfamiliar with the details of his life. He also became a City Councilman and he lived well in a resplendent house in Lawnmarket, Edinburgh.

A small, dark-haired man with large brown eyes, Brodie's shoulders were broad and he was nimble of foot. According to one of his contemporaries, he was thought to be "a kind and goodly man, one of the noblest souls one could meet." He wore white attire during the day and was often seen to carry a Bible, which he read assiduously, usually in public places where his study of the Scriptures would be noted.

Brodie was a member of the exclusive Cape Club, which counted the poet Robert Burns as a member, an organization that often gave receptions for such esteemed literary lights as Samuel Johnson. A confirmed bachelor, Brodie told friends that his only ambition in life was to be "the best cabinetmaker in Edinburgh, even better than my father." Such ambitions, he sadly admitted, left no room for marriage or romance, let alone a family. The was the portrait Brodie etched for the public image.

The other side of Brodie's double life was sinister, profligate and criminal. At night, Brodie dressed all in black, drinking and gambling to excess in all the worst dens located in an area called the Fleshmarket. He secretly supported two mistresses, Jane Watt and Anne Grant, with whom he fathered five illegitimate children. Along with the considerable expense of supporting these households, as well as his daytime residence, Brodie's mounting gambling debts soon made financial demands on him that he could never hope to meet. He had long earlier squandered the £10,000 inheritance left to him by his wealthy father upon death of the senior Brodie.

The wastrel decided to pay off his debts by burglarizing Edinburgh's government and banking houses, as well as the homes of the wealthy, where he and his carpenter employees worked each day. To that end, Brodie made skeleton keys for the doors of buildings to which he had easy daytime access. After determining the absence of the occupants, he simply let himself into the buildings.

Brodie began by burglarizing the banking house of Johnston and Smith in 1768, taking £800. He would continue his burglarizing for another twenty years, looting gold, silver, laces, jewels and any available cash, later fencing the stolen goods through his underworld connections. On two occasions, Brodie was almost caught by two acquaintances, who thought they recognized him wearing a mask and wielding a pistol. In both instances, the witnesses quickly abandoned the notion that the daring burglar could have been the distinguished and upstanding William Brodie.

These close calls, as well as increasing demands for cash to support his lavish lifestyle, caused Brodie to enlist accomplices in his burglaries. He carefully assembled a gang of professional burglars that included George Smith, Andrew Ainsle and John Brown. With these men following his detailed instructions, Brodie began the wholesale looting of government and bank buildings.

The Edinburgh Jail (large structure at left) was only a few blocks from Brodie's mansion and would be his final home before he was taken to the scaffold.

Edinburgh's sheriff and his 120 guardsmen appeared helpless to stem these rampant burglaries, particularly since Brodie, a member of the government, had complete schedules of the rounds made by the watchmen and he and his men could therefore easily avoid detection. All this changed on the night of March 5, 1788, when Brodie and his men entered Scotland's General Excise Office,which Brodie thought would be bulging with recently collected tax monies. He expected to take away more than £1,500.

The gang entered the main building near High Street with a skeleton key made by Brodie and then walked quietly to the cashier's door, which they forced open with a pair of curling irons. Another door inside this office had to be broken open with an iron crowbar. Once inside the revenue rooms, Brodie and his men were astounded to find only a pittance of the tax monies they expected.

George Smith, a Brodie accomplice; he also went to the gallows.

Ransacking the place, the burglars discovered only £16. Officials, alarmed at the recent burglaries committed in Edinburgh, had instituted new measures in the counting rooms. The money had been hidden in a secret drawer as a precaution against just such a burglary. At 8:30 p.m., at the time Brodie and his men were desperately tearing the revenue rooms apart, James Bonar, deputy solicitor for the Excise Office, returned unexpectedly to retrieve some business papers. Hearing his approach, the burglars panicked, clambering down a rope ladder from a window, all fleeing in different directions.

When the gang met the next night to divide the paltry loot, Brown was openly critical of Brodie, ridiculing his abilities as a master burglar. Brown then came to believe that he would be well paid by the authorities if he informed on his leader and the others. A few days later he went to the sheriff and admitted that he had been a part of the burglary gang that had broken into the Excise Office and that he and others had committed dozens of similar burglaries in the past. He named Ainsle, Smith and Brodie.

When hearing that Ainsle and Smith had been arrested, Brodie immediately fled the city, going to Amsterdam. A reward of £150 was placed on his head and, through the statements of Brown and Ainsle, the double life of their chief was revealed to a shocked public. In Holland, Brodie made plans to escape to America, hoping to sail to Charleston, South Carolina, where he would begin a new life. To that end, he made the mistake of contacting one of his mistresses, Anne Grant, sending a letter to her in care of a Scottish tobacconist named Geddes.

The tobacconist opened the letter and once he recognized Brodie's signature, he informed authorities in Edinburgh, who sent guardsmen to the address shown on Brodie's letter. Arriving at the house, they found no one present. They returned a short time later and began a thorough search, finding Deacon Brodie hiding in a small cupboard. He was taken back to Edinburgh and placed in Tolbooth Jail. Warders took unusual precautions in preventing the elusive Brodie from escaping, chaining him to a stone floor in his cell.

The calculating Brodie admitted to nothing, remaining calm. He insisted that he was innocent of the crimes for which he stood accused, claiming that a "double" had committed these spectacular burglaries over the years and that the double was now using him as a convenient and famous scapegoat. (The concept of using a "double" as an alibi undoubtedly stemmed from Brodie's perception of himself and the double life he had actually been leading for twenty years.) He would cling to this fantastic story when his trial began on August 27, 1788 in Edinburgh's Judiciary Court.

Brodie was ordered not to wear his traditional daytime white clothes in court. The ever sartorial Brodie obliged, wearing a cocked hat, a lace shirt, black satin breeches and a dark blue coat. He nodded ceremoniously to the judges and then sat down in the dock, exuding confidence and projecting what he thought was an "innocent look" to the presiding judge, Lord Braxfield.

The burglar's posturing facade impressed no one. More than two dozen witnesses came forward to detail Brodie's double life, including members of his own gang. After a fifteen-man jury returned a guilty verdict, Lord Braxfield sentenced the criminal mastermind to death, burglary then being a capital offense.

Scheduled for execution on September 30, 1788, the ever resourceful Brodie thought to cheat the hangman. Dr. Pierre Degravers, a French physician attending Brodie in prison, assured the master burglar that he could bring him back to life following his execution. Dr. Degravers, who was well paid by Brodie for such secret services, gave the burglar a silver tube to insert in his throat to prevent strangulation. He also provided "wires" that were to be hidden beneath Brodie's clothes and to which the rope would be secretly affixed by the reportedly bribed hangman, these wires supporting his weight once he dropped through the trapdoor, instead of breaking his neck.

Degravers also assured Brodie that the hangman would use a rope with just the right length so that he would not be jerked about in his fall. He would take a sedative before the execution and appear to be dead, said the physician, but Degravers promised he could easily revive him. So heartened by the prospect of cheating the executioner was Brodie that he made plans to begin a new life in America. In the last few weeks of his life, he studied several styles of handwriting, preparing himself to become a master forger in the New World. A lover of music, Brodie could be heard loudly singing in his cell, particularly a tune from The Beggar's Opera called "Let Us Take to the Road."

William Brodie did not fear death. He would outsmart the officials of Edinburgh, survive his own execution, and go on to a third life in America. On the day of his execution, Brodie confidently mounted the stairs of the high scaffold and pompously strode about the platform, elegantly attired and oblivious to the 40,000 spectators who had come to see him hang.

Brodie waved away a chaplain who tried to give him spiritual comfort and insisted that the trapdoor be tested. When satisfied that it worked, Brodie looked over the ropes supplied by the hangman. He rejected several as too short or too long and finally gave approval for one rope which he apparently thought was the proper length suited to his secret life-saving scheme.

FROM M-G-M's HALL OF FAME
IT CHILLS YOU! HALF-MAN! HALF-MONSTER!
SPENCER TRACY
INGRID BERGMAN
LANA TURNER
VICTOR FLEMING'S production of
Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde
M-G-M'S ALL-TIME GREAT with DONALD CRISP
Screen Play by JOHN LEE MAHIN
BASED ON THE NOVEL BY ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON
Directed by VICTOR FLEMING

An advertisement for the 1942 film, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, shows Spencer Tracy in the leading role as a man tormented by a split personality; role model Brodie was not tortured by his double life, reveling in his ability to hoodwink his fellow Edinburgh citizens.

The hangman, however, made no sign to Brodie that he was involved in a conspiracy to save his life. He affixed the rope about the Deacon's neck and did not bother with the wires hidden under his collar. Brodie went through the trap and was officially declared dead within minutes. He was cut down and rushed to the home of Dr. Degravers, who desperately bled Brodie and tried all manner of resuscitation, but after an hour gave up. William Brodie, master burglar, was finally and permanently dead.

A similar attempt to secretly revive a hanged felon occurred in Chicago in the early 1920s, when madcap newsmen Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur promised Frankie Piano, a condemned gangster, that they could secretly have him revived after he was hanged. They explained that they would claim his body after the hanging and rush it to their friend, a "genius" doctor, who insisted he could revive the man with injections of adrenaline.

So confident in the Hecht-MacArthur scheme was Piano that when he mounted the scaffold and stood upon the trapdoor with the rope around his neck, he burst into hysterical laughter, shocking the executioner by shouting: "You're in for a big surprise!" Minutes after Piano was hanged, the newsmen took the body to the doctor, who injected adrenaline into the corpse, but he failed to revive the dead Piano, whose neck had been broken. The frustrated newsmen salvaged their bizarre scheme by then exposing the oddball doctor as a quack. (This macabre exploit was humorously portrayed in the 1969 film, Gaily, Gaily, based upon Ben Hecht's memoirs.)

Opposite page: Fredric March is shown in the 1931 film, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, physically transforming from one personality (good) to another (evil), a concept based upon Brodie's double life.

AMERICA'S FIRST PUBLIC ENEMY/1822

"He was not the type of person a traveler would want to meet in a lonely spot," wrote one early-day crime historian of Samuel Green (d.1822), who became the terror of New England and one of America's first arch criminals. Heavyset and muscular, Green stood five-foot-eight-inches. He showed the world a savage-looking face and burning dark eyes. The strange fires raging inside of him were more fierce and threatening than his physical appearance. He was a product of the whip, that cherished item of discipline in early 19th Century America. To say that this inhuman burglar and killer was created by the stern-minded adults who ruled his childhood is an understatement in the annals of crime.

Born in Meredith, New Hampshire, Green was routinely thrashed by his parents, who employed switches to beat him into obedience, particularly when he was truant from school. He was apprenticed to a blacksmith at an early age and, when caught stealing, was horsewhipped. He was sent home, where he was again severely whipped. He retaliated by throwing the family dog down a well, its dead body turning the water bad and causing the family considerable expense in digging a new well. Again, Green was whipped.

Green then stabbed farm animals and destroyed more property, his frustrated parents finally sending him to live with a stern family friend, Albert Dunne. His conduct did not improve. He killed Dunne's farm animals and destroyed his property, for which he was routinely whipped. On one occasion, Dunne whipped the boy so severely that a layer of flesh on his back was peeled back.

New England burglar and killer Samuel Green, shown in 1821; he was hanged the following year.

At one point, Green tried to kill Dunne, arranging a large ax to fall upon his guardian when he entered his workshop. In the event that this lethal device failed to achieve its intended end, the boy had also placed a pitchfork, points aimed downward, at the top of the barn door that was positioned to fall downward and pierce Dunne's skull when he opened the door. When Dunne entered his workshop, the ax fell, but only sliced away part of the guardian's coat sleeve. As he raced into the barn in search of the youth, the pitchfork shot downward, giving Dunne only a minor wound in the foot.

For these clumsy attempts to kill his guardian, Green was tied to a barn door and whipped until his back was a welted, bloody mass of flesh. Green finally gave up his plans to murder Dunne and departed, roaming the small New Hampshire towns where he met another embittered and battered youth, William Ash. Both traveled together to Newhampton, where they encountered a traveling salesman named Franklin Loomis, who sold household goods, but whose real livelihood came from illegal activities. Loomis took Green and Ash under his wing, becoming their criminal mentor, teaching them the techniques of forging false bank notes and, especially, how to burglarize the homes of the rich, as well as business and banking institutions.

Branching out, Green began his criminal career as a lone burglar. He was not concerned if the occupants were present or not when he broke into homes. Any person unlucky enough to awake while he was at work was quickly clubbed senseless by the invader. Green looted vast amounts of silverware, jewels, cash and other valuable items, selling his stolen goods to fences his mentor had provided. He burglarized business offices in Guilford, New Hampshire and then rode to Burlington, Vermont, where he continued his burglaries, amassing a small fortune.

The bold Green was not foolhardy and took precautions to avoid arrest by roaming watchmen. After one burglary, he was spotted by a constable as he was leaving the house. Thinking he might have been identified, Green escaped detection by enlisting in the army. He rebelled at orders and army discipline and soon deserted, returning to his home in Meredith, where he bought his mother a cow, the only sign of love he ever manifested in his short life.

Green then met up once more with Loomis, who spent weeks showing him how to pick locks and duplicate keys to enhance his methods of burglary. He teamed up again with Ash and both men went on a burglarizing spree, entering and looting hundreds of homes and offices. While traveling to Bath, New Hampshire, both young men encountered a jewelry salesman, who imprudently showed them some of his gems. Green clubbed him to death and both made off with the jewels.

Green sold off the jewels and pocketed thousands of dollars. He left Ash and went off on his own. He was arrested and jailed several times on suspicion, but evidence was lacking to indict him and he was routinely released. After looting a jewelry store in Montreal, Canada, Green was pursued by a posse. He fought his way out of a trap, shooting several men, but he was later apprehended and jailed. He was tried, convicted and sentenced to death, but his friend Ash helped him to escape.

Returning to the remote mountains of New Hampshire, Green hid for some months. He then went on another crime spree, burglarizing stores and homes in Albany, New York and New York City. Although he was chiefly a burglar, Green did not hesitate to commit armed robbery. In Middlebury, Vermont, he robbed and shot to death a wealthy French traveler. By this time, nothing was beyond the ambitions of Samuel Green. He left a trail of burglary, rape, horse-stealing, counterfeiting and murder from Montpelier, Vermont, to Schenectady, New York; from Saco, Maine, to Barre, Vermont. He became America's first Public Enemy Number One. Half the country was looking for him and the bounties offered for his capture were large.

The great fugitive's end began when he was arrested in Danvers, Massachusetts, for burglarizing $30 worth of goods from a store while blind drunk. Convicted of this burglary, Green was sent to prison in Boston to serve a four-year term. He attempted to escape so many times that his jailers fitted him with special shackles with weighted clogs to slow his movements. He was sentenced to several more years in prison for his escape attempts.

One of Green's escape attempts had been thwarted by another inmate, a black prisoner named Billy Williams, who had informed prison officials of Green's plans. The always volatile Green vowed revenge on Williams. He at first tried to poison the informer's food, but the wary Williams did not eat it. Green finally cornered Williams alone in a prison shop on the morning of November 8, 1821, where he beat him to death with an iron bar.

Convicted of murdering Williams, Green was sentenced to death, mounting the gallows on April 24, 1822. Before Green dropped through the trapdoor, he told a priest who was praying at his side that he had no words for the hundreds of spectators who had gathered about the gallows to witness his execution. "They shall not know my fate," he said cryptically. "I have written out my confession in full."

"Are you penitent, my son?" asked the priest.

Samuel Green, with the rope around his neck, gave the priest a long stare and then a thin smile curled upward as he replied: "If you wish it."

ENGLAND'S MASTER BURGLAR/1879

While Samuel Green made his blood-stained mark as America's most notorious felon in the first quarter of the 19th Century, his burglarizing counterpart, Charles Frederick Peace (AKA: George Parker, Thompson, John Ward, 1832-1879), became the most notorious criminal in England in the third quarter of that century. Born in Angel Court, Sheffield, England, the son of an animal trainer, Charles Peace was deformed from infancy, having a large head with a lantern jaw that gave him an ape-like appearance. An early accident left him with a permanently crippled hand, but he was able to cup this hand in such a way as to make climbing ropes or shinnying down drainpipes easy. Moreover, his fingers were webbed, which gave Peace even greater ability in performing his innumerable burglaries.

Charles Peace, the gargoyle-faced British burglar, who invaded and looted hundreds of England's best homes over his long career.

Peace had little formal education and began working with his father at an early age, helping to train animals. He studied these creatures closely and adopted many of their movements. As a child, Peace realized he was ugly and took much abuse from other children because of his appearance. He also realized that he could contort his features so radically that his appearance seemed to be altered.

In addition to these physical transformations, Peace became an expert at disguises in clothing and with fake beards, hairpieces, and mustaches. During his twenty-year career as England's foremost burglar and arch criminal, Peace also became a master at makeup, using coloring agents to give his complexion different hues. He added to his appearance all manner of creative scars, birthmarks, warts, and moles.

When beginning his career as a burglar, Peace relied upon his great upper body strength, which permitted him to swing, tumble, and pull himself upward to second and third-story windows with amazing agility. The gargoyle-faced Peace was swift and silent as he moved over the rooftops of London in search of loot in rooms on upper floors. Fearlessly, he crept into bedrooms, where his victims slept and, without making the slightest noise, rifled drawers, closets, and cabinets, stuffing into a bag he wore over his shoulder all manner of items, from jewelry to fine lace and tailored clothing. He usually emptied a room of its valuables in less than two or three minutes and then would be gone, out the window, scaling the wall to the roof or sliding down a rope, a drainpipe, or scurrying down lattice work or the laddered cornerstone of a building to the street.

This notorious cat-burglar was inventive with the tools of his trade. He built a collapsible or folding ladder, which he carried on a hook at his side. His metal wedges, screwdrivers, and other apparatus he made by hand. It was known by police that the elusive Peace had a maimed hand, but he covered this by expertly fashioning a false arm with a hook, wearing this over the crippled hand. Peace always kept jobs for short periods in order to explain his income, and he, at one time or another, was a mill hand, a picture-framer, and a woolweaver.

Peace, at the various places where he worked, advocated an ardent pacifism and spoke in a sanctimonious manner, reciting a curious blend of scripture and literary monologues that amounted to little more than gibberish. It was later thought that such uttered gobbledygook was intentional on Peace's part so that he would look the fool, instead of the cunning, Charles Peace is shown fatally shooting Nicholas Cock when the constable interrupted one of his 1876 burglaries; another man was convicted and sentenced to death for this killing, but Peace later confessed to the murder and went to the gallows for this murder.

Peace (shown as a prisoner at right), is correctly identified as England's most wanted burglar; he had been jailed under the alias of John Ward.

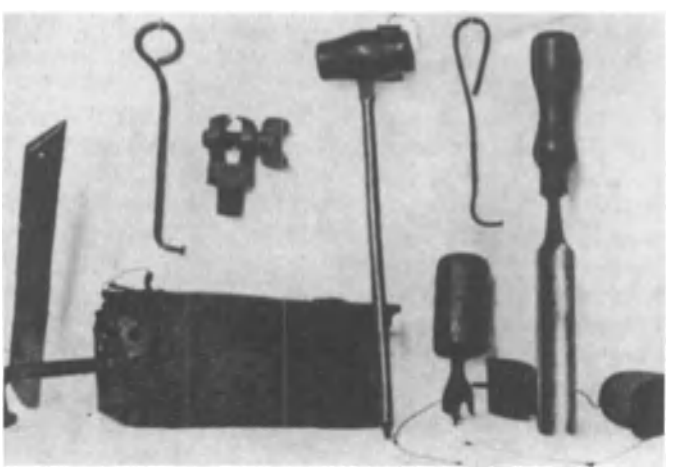
clever burglar who confounded police for more than two decades. Another ruse, used constantly by the burglar, was Peace's devotion to music. He played the violin badly, but nevertheless strolled about the streets of London, fiddling his maddeningly off-key tunes and posing as a wandering musician while he was surveying the very buildings he intended to later burglarize. At these times his violin case served as the perfect container for his burglary tools.

In 1851, at the age of nineteen, Peace was caught while leaving a house he had looted and was imprisoned for a month. This brief stay behind bars only strengthened Peace's resolve to continue his criminal career and, upon his release, he burglarized scores of houses and buildings. He was convicted of burglary again in 1854 and this time drew a four-year term. In 1866, Peace was again arrested for burglary, convicted under the name of George Parker, and sent to prison for six years. He was released in 1872 and three years later was living in a suburb of Sheffield.

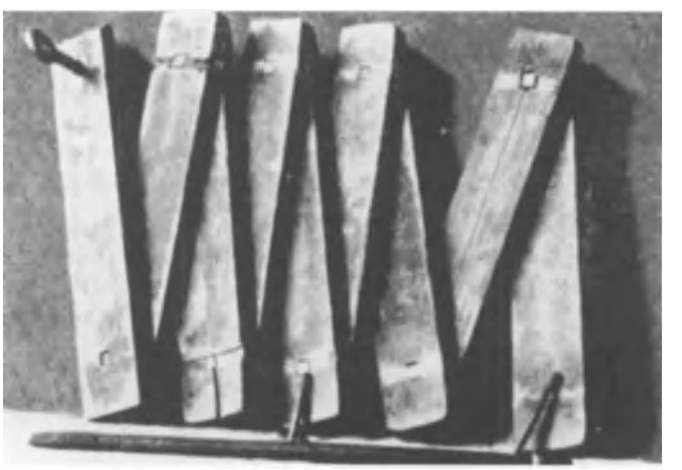
On the night of August 1, 1876, Constable Nicholas Cock spotted a man hiding in the shadows of a house near Whalley Range outside of Manchester. When he went to investigate, the man shot and mortally wounded him. Constable Cock, with his dying breath, told fellow officers that he believed his assailant was William Habron, who had once threatened him. William and John Habron were arrested and William was convicted of Cock's murder, mostly on circumstantial evidence and the dying man's statement. Habron was sent to prison for life, but Peace was the real culprit.

Three years later, while waiting to be executed, Peace, who was never known to perform a kind act, confessed to the Cock murder, saying that Habron was innocent. Habron, at that time, was released and given £500 as compensation for his wrongful imprisonment. Ironically, Peace had attended the trial of Habron, sitting through its endless hours of testimony and presentations of evidence. He said nothing, as Habron was convicted of the crime that he himself had committed.

For some months prior to the shooting death of Constable Cock, Peace had been seeing Katherine Dyson, an attractive, well-endowed brunette, his next-door-neighbor in Sheffield. Her husband, Arthur Dyson, was a railway engineer and was often away. On these occasions, the dwarfish Peace made love to the tall woman next door, but when Arthur Dyson was reassigned to local duty and stayed at home, Mrs. Dyson suddenly turned cool toward the little gargoyle. She told her runty lover that she no longer wished to see him. Peace was not a man to be rejected. He began writing Mrs. Dyson threatening letters, saying that if she did not continue her sexual relationship with him, great harm might befall her.



The burglary tools of Charles Peace, displayed at Scotland Yard's Black Museum.



The folding ladder Peace constructed and used in many of his nocturnal burglaries.

Mrs. Dyson ignored these threats and Peace, some weeks later, hid in some bushes, leaping out on the sidewalk as Mrs. Dyson passed, and tripping her so that she sprawled in the gutter. He laughed in his hoarse voice and hopped about like some wood elf over her prone body, wagging his finger at her and telling her that she had "better mend" her ways or face serious injury. When he was rebuffed again, Peace went to the Dyson house and confronted the woman with a revolver, waving it in her face and telling her that the next time he called for her, she had better be ready to service his sexual needs. Badly frightened, the Dysons moved to a new address in Sheffield at Banner Cross.

Still the banty burglar pursued the woman, telling his cronies in neighborhood pubs: "No woman deserts me. I will shoot her and her miserable husband if she don't come 'round." Having bragged of his intent to kill the Dysons and being constantly rebuffed by Mrs. Dyson, Peace brooded long hours before going to the backyard of the Dyson house on the night of November 29, 1876, only four days after Peace had watched William Habron being sentenced for his own killing of Constable Cock.

Peace stood in the dark and called out for Mrs. Dyson, uttering a string of obscenities. Instead of seeing his one-time lover, he saw Arthur Dyson, a retiring sort, brave the darkness and step into the yard, sleeves rolled up, ready to do battle for his much-abused wife. A low, sinister-sounding laugh greeted him and then a bullet whizzed by Dyson's head. A second bullet found its mark, ploughing into Arthur Dyson's skull, killing him on the spot.

Police knew this murder had been committed by Peace, but before they could apprehend the lethal cat burglar, Peace had fled to London. Here he lived, under the alias of Thompson, on Evelina Road in Peckham. He kept his wife in the basement apartment of the house and on the upper floors he lived with a seedy mistress, Susan Grey, who was drunk most of the time and chewed snuff and smoked cigars. Peace stayed in the house during the day, playing his fiddle and running between his wife and mistress to conduct relentless sexual marathons.

At night he packed his burglary tools into his violin case and drove off on a small cart pulled by his horse, Tommy, going to work as a burglar as one might go to the office. For two years, he successfully burglarized dozens of South London houses. His criminal career came to an end on the night of October 10, 1878, when Peace was confronted by Constable Edward Robinson, while he was leaving a house in Blackheath with loot tucked beneath his good arm.

Robinson ordered Peace to halt, but he continued walking away from the constable, who pursued him. Peace suddenly wheeled about and fired his revolver several times at Robinson, hitting the constable in the arm. The burly Robinson, however, was not easily downed. He charged the retreating Peace, tackled him and threw him to the ground. He then leaped upon him and subdued the prince of burglars, manacling his hands and dragging him down the street to be greeted by more constables, who came on the run when they heard Robinson blowing his whistle.

Charles Frederick Peace (center), standing on the scaffold as his legs are tied and a priest consoles him; the burglar was hanged on February 25, 1879.

At the police station, the much-wanted Peace identified himself as John Ward. Charged with the attempted murder of Robinson, Peace was sent to the Old Bailey for trial, appearing before Justice Henry Hawkins, who sentenced him to life imprisonment. It was then that John Ward was identified as the notorious Charles Peace.

Peace was then charged with the murder of Arthur Dyson and taken by train to Sheffield to stand trial there. En route, the master burglar asked a guard to open a train window so he could "get some fresh air." As soon as the window was opened, Peace hurled himself through it, landed safely on the railway embankment and scurried away into a nearby woods. A massive manhunt saw him quickly recaptured. He was then tried at the Sheffield Assizes before Justice Lopes, where he was found guilty of murdering Arthur Dyson. Peace was sentenced to death and imprisoned at Armley Prison.

While awaiting execution, Peace called a clergyman to his cell and confessed to the killing of Constable Nicholas Cock. William Habron was then released from prison. Charles Peace spent his last days writing religious doggerel and even his own memorial card that read: "In memory of Charles Peace, who was executed in Armley Prison, Tuesday, February 25, 1879. Aged 47. For that I done but never intended." On the morning of his execution, Peace lectured the warden about displaying Christian charity toward prisoners. He then sat down to his last breakfast and snarled: "This is bloody rotten bacon." Minutes later he was led to the scaffold and hanged.

The only known photo of the international arch-burglar of the 19th Century, Adam Worth, taken at the end of his spectacular career; he was aptly called "the Napoleon of crime."

THE NAPOLEON OF CRIME/1902

Adam Worth (AKA: Harry Raymond, Henry Jarvis Raymond, 1844-1902) was beyond a doubt the greatest criminal mastermind of the 19th Century. Sir Robert Anderson, chief of the Criminal Investigation Department at Scotland Yard, said of him: "He was the Napoleon of the criminal world. None other could hold a candle to him." Allan Pinkerton, founder of the famed Pinkerton Detective Agency in the U.S., echoed such recognition by stating: "He was the Napoleon of crime, the greatest mastermind of them all." These comments were not lost on British author Arthur Conan Doyle, creator of Sherlock Holmes.

In creating a criminal mind that would match his supersleuth, Doyle patterned the cunning Professor James Moriarty after Adam Worth. At one point, Holmes tells his loyal associate: "He is the Napoleon of crime, Watson. He is the organizer of half that is evil and nearly all that is undetected in this great city. He is a genius, a philosopher, an abstract thinker. He has a brain of the first order. He sits motionless, like a spider in the center of its web, but that web has a thousand radiations, and he knows well every quiver of each of them."

The Moriarty Doyle created had much in common with his role model. Like the devastatingly clever professor, Worth headed and directed an enormous international network of thieves, planning burglaries no other person in his day would dare commit and traveling about the globe while living in splendor in the finest hotels or on the high seas aboard his private yacht. He, like Moriarty, enjoyed Oriental decor and was fascinated by the mysticism of the Far East. Also, like the professor, Worth confounded the efforts of police on three continents, evading arrest and escaping prison, except in two instances. But wholly unlike Doyle's fiendish mastermind, Worth abhorred violence and never went armed. He gave strict instructions that none of his men were ever to resort to violence and any man who betrayed this edict was sent from his organization into permanent exile.

Worth lived like a rajah, and directed the careers and lives of scores of the world's super thieves, yet he died almost broke, and, as a noble gesture to enrich the lives of his two children, who never knew of his criminal past, returned the greatest treasure of his fifty-year criminal career to its rightful owners. The mastermind could have easily sold this treasure, which one detective tracked him around the world to recapture, adding a fortune to the estimated $3-$5 million he gleaned during his long criminal career. But Worth had a deep-rooted sense of honor that compelled him, as it had throughout his life, to perform a final beau geste.

The beginnings of this strange and unpredictable man were humble. Worth was born to Jewish parents in New York City and received a good education. He was intelligent and liked reading good books. He began working as a clerk before the outbreak of the Civil War and, in 1861, he accepted a $500 bounty the Union army was paying to recruits. In fact, he took advantage of this mercenary payment several times as a bounty jumper. Worth enlisted, collected his $500, marched off to a training camp, then deserted. He returned to New York and enlisted again under a different name. After collecting several thousand dollars, which he banked, Worth stayed in the army and served with distinction, until he was mustered out of the service in 1864.

Unable to find work, Worth resorted to theft, taking a package from an Adams Express truck. He was caught and sent to Sing Sing for three years, his only arrest, conviction and prison term in the U.S. At Sing Sing, Worth was put to work with quarry gangs. He was assigned the lethal task of warming up frozen nitroglycerine, used in blasting quarry rock. Worth later told William Pinkerton, one of the detectives who pursued him over the years: "I was a rather stupid young fellow. I never questioned the guard and I always wondered why he left when I put the brittle chunks (of nitro) in the stove. When one of the older inmates told me I could be blown to bits, I decided I had had enough of prison."

With the kind of meticulous care he would take in his later burglaries, Worth planned his escape from Sing Sing with split-second timing. He noted that a tug appeared on the Hudson River at a certain hour and then noted the regular times when the guards at the quarry relieved each other. During one of these changings of the guards, Worth, a small man (five feet, seven inches, never weighing more than 130 pounds), slipped into a culvert that led to the river. He crawled past guards and lowered himself into the Hudson, swimming out to the tugboat that had just pulled away from the dock. He climbed aboard the boat and hid himself among cargo boxes. When the tug approached New York City, Worth slipped over the side and swam to shore.

Henry Jarvis Raymond, founder of the New York Times; Worth, who bore a resemblance to the journalist, used Raymond's name as an alias.

By 1866, the cautious Worth had decided upon a life of crime. He summoned his brother, John, from Boston. Worth planned to burgle $30,000 from the Atlantic Transportation Company in New York, but his brother proved to be so inept that the two were almost caught entering the building. Worth abandoned this plan and sent his bumbling brother home. He traveled to Cambridge, Massachusetts, and after scouting about, learned that an insurance firm in that city kept large amounts of cash on hand.

Working alone, Worth disguised himself as a constable and gained admittance to the insurance building, telling a night watchman that he had been tipped that the vault was to be burglarized that night. When the watchman made his rounds, Worth used nitroglycerine, which he had become familiar with in Sing Sing, to blow open a small hole in the door of the vault. Slipping his arm through the hole, he was able to unlock and open the vault door from the inside by pulling back the bolt. He looted the vault of $30,000 and was on his way before the watchman returned.

Using this money to establish his front, Worth took elegant rooms in the Astor House, the finest hotel in New York at the time. He had his clothes custom-made by the most distinguished tailors in the city and then, looking the dandy, began to make the rounds of underworld hangouts, seeking intelligent criminals with his own bent for details and creative crime. He disdained hellholes such as Geohegan's, the Strand, and Allen's, going instead to Shang Draper's elegant saloon. There he spent long hours sipping champagne and playing the gentleman scoundrel. He met and bedded many show girls at this time, but his actual purpose was clear. He wanted to assemble a super gang of intellectual criminals who could put his inventive schemes into action.

Worth's quest was rewarded when he encountered Charles Bullard, son of a high society New York family, who could trace their ancestors back to an officer on the staff of General George Washington. Bullard came into an inheritance when his father died, but he squandered this money on wine and women and was soon looking for ways to make quick cash. He met an apprentice burglar named Ike Marsh and the pair concocted a daring train robbery.

On May 4, 1868, Bullard and Marsh, traveling on the Hudson River Railroad Express, slipped into the baggage car and knocked out the guard, John Putnam, then helped themselves to $100,000 in cash and negotiable securities. The Pinkertons were called in on the case, but Bullard and Marsh had left no clues and the guard was of little help. He stated he had been asleep in the baggage car when he was attacked and knocked out and could not give a description of his assailants. Putnam had been found with froth on his lips, as if in a coma from the attack, yet he bore nothing more than a slight bruise to the right temple. The Pinkertons suspected Putnam of collusion but could prove nothing.

Robert Pinkerton and his chief of the Philadelphia office, Robert Linden, were assigned to the case. They went over every inch of the baggage car, where Linden found a piece of soap. When Putnam was brought in for more questioning, Linden showed him the soap and bluntly told the guard that it had made the froth on his lips and that he, Putnam, was in league with the robbers. Putnam, under relentless interrogation, signed a confession two days later, implicating Marsh and Bullard.

The two thieves by then had fled to Canada. Bullard's rooms in New York were searched and some of the stolen securities were found. After a lengthy legal battle, Bullard and Marsh were returned to New York and housed in a White Plains Jail. Bullard and Marsh escaped, however, when their friends dug a hole through the jail wall and freed them before their trial.

Charles "Piano Charley" Bullard, Worth's partner in many spectacular burglaries.

Bullard's adventures caused him to be the toast of New York's underworld. He intrigued the scheming Adam Worth, who admired Bullard's daring. They were introduced to each other in a back room of Draper's saloon and became fast friends. Bullard was by then called "Piano Charley" because he played the instrument well. Worth and Bullard had similar tastes. Both enjoyed high living and preferred the company of elegant people, rather than criminal riffraff. They enjoyed good clothes, food and wine, and the company of beautiful women. They also disdained violence and never went armed. They, like the fictional character Raffles, lived by their wits, not by the gun.

In a few days, Worth suggested to Bullard and Marsh that they join him in burglarizing the Boylston National Bank of Boston. He had recently scouted the bank, Worth told them, and knew that hundreds of thousands of dollars were in its vault. They would rent the house next to the bank and gain access to the bank, Worth explained, by breaking through a common wall and entering the bank at night. Worth had made detailed drawings of the bank, and the shops on either side of it.

Bullard and Marsh quickly agreed to take part in the theft. Once in Boston, the thieves encountered a problem. The house next to the bank on Boylston and Washington streets had been rented. The barbershop, which was located on the other side of the bank, however, was another matter. Worth simply bought the shop for $500 and he and his men moved in, changing the store to Judson and Company, Dealers in Wine Bitters. Bullard was the ostensible owner of the shop, using the name William A. Judson. Worth had carpenters construct a partition that prevented passersby from looking into the shop and in the window he lined up many bottles with dark-looking contents. He was a stickler for fronts and facades and insisted upon having a convincing cover.

Marsh was assigned to keep regular office hours, ready to write an order for bitters if a customer appeared. But none arrived, as Worth expected, since buyers of bitters generally went to available general liquor dealers. Joining the gang were Adam Worth's brother, John, who relieved Marsh in the store clerk role, and Bob Cochran, who was brought into the caper because of his brawny back and powerful arms. Cochran did most of the work, breaking down thick walls of the buildings housing the barbershop and the bank. The thieves took their time, coming and going from the shop as would regular businessmen. They lived in the best hotels and frequented the finer Boston restaurants. While the digging went on, Worth and Bullard attended the theater and the opera. They always had lovely ladies on their arms as they strolled to and from the theater with top hats, silk-lined capes, and gold-knobbed walking sticks.

On the night of November 20, 1869, Cochran sent word to Worth that he was about to break through the bank wall. Worth, Bullard, Marsh, John Worth, and Cochran gathered in the dark store around midnight and then punched through the wall of the bank. In minutes, Worth was able to blow off the tumblers and handles of vault doors and the gang entered the spacious vault with large carpetbags, filling these with more than $450,000 in cash and negotiable securities, an enormous haul for those days, equivalent to several million dollars in today's inflated currency.

Returning to New York, the gang stayed in suites at the Astor House, the last place police might think to look for desperate bank burglars. The newspaper accounts of the great burglary filled the front pages for days. When Bullard read Singer Kitty Flynn, to whom Worth lost his heart; he also lost Kitty to "Piano Charley" Bullard.

Gainsborough's famous painting, "Duchess of Devonshire," burgled by Worth in 1876; he would keep the priceless painting for decades.

that the Pinkertons—the very agency that had exposed his railway robbery—had been hired to track down the burglars, he grew nervous and urged Worth to leave for Europe. "Those damned detectives will be on to us within a week," Bullard told Worth. "I don't want to be playing a piano in the Ludlow Street Jail."

Worth and Bullard sailed for Liverpool the next day, taking their fabulous spoils with them. Once in Liverpool, the pair rented spacious suites in the American Hotel. In the pub of this hotel, Worth and Bullard were both captivated by a local singer, beautiful, 17-year-old Kitty Flynn. Worth was deeply in love with Kitty, but lost her to Bullard, whom she married. The trio then went on to London, where Bullard used the alias Charles Wells. Worth, with his customary wit, used the name Henry J. Raymond, the name of the founder of the New York Times. This was the name Worth used in his marriage and the one he handed down to his two children. Both Worth and Bullard posed as wealthy New York merchants and they lived like visiting royalty.

Writer Arthur Conan Doyle, creator of Sherlock Holmes; Doyle used Adam Worth as the role model for the evil Professor Moriarty.

Traveling to Paris, Worth and Bullard opened up an elegant café, the American Bar, which offered gambling in its back rooms. The place became the center for U.S. expatriates in Paris and it catered to high society customers. The cream of American criminals also gathered here and came under the direction of Worth. Max Shinburn, who later bought a title and retired as Baron Shindell, enlisted in Worth's company of thieves, as did Walter Sheridan, George McDonald, and Austin and George Bidwell, who were all later to swindle a great fortune from the Bank of England in an elaborate forgery scheme attributed to the ingenious Worth.

The mastermind planned many bank burglaries and security frauds, sending at one time some of his men to Turkey, where they passed fraudulent bank drafts for more than $400,000. Worth received a quarter of all the profits from the crimes he planned and he was soon a millionaire. He returned to London and lived in the best part of the city, occupying a townhouse replete with servants. Next he bought a yacht and christened it the Shamrock, a name given to it by Kitty Flynn Bullard. Sailing between European ports, Worth continued planning one spectacular burglary after another, sending his talented lieutenants to Belgium, Holland, Germany, France, and Italy to perform the crimes he planned.

Though fabulously wealthy, Worth sometimes committed crimes alone, purely to "keep my hand in," as he later stated. On one occasion, Worth purchased some items from a London pawnbroker and noticed that the man's safe was brimming with money. He stole the pawnbroker's keys and had copies made, returning the keys unseen some hours later. That night Worth entered the shop and removed $20,000 from the safe. He spent the money in a month on lavish parties. Bored with polite London society, Worth decided to sail the Shamrock to South Africa. He had read about the fabulous diamonds coming from the Kimberley mines.

Once in Cape Town, Worth posed as a retired businessman from the U.S. He took pains to befriend the postmaster of Cape Town after learning that all of the Kimberley diamonds were shipped to the post office and from there to London diamond merchants. Some weeks later, Worth mailed three parcels to himself from a distant town and then called for them at the Cape Town Post Office, just as the place was about to close. The postmaster explained that he would have to return the next day, but the charming Worth prevailed upon the man. As the postmaster went to retrieve the parcels in the absence of departed clerks, Worth quickly made a wax impression of the keys to the building and safe that the postmaster kept on the ring he absentmindedly left at the counter. A few nights later, Worth entered the building, opened the safe and removed between $500,000 and $1 million in diamonds.

A few weeks later, Worth returned to London where, using front men, he sold the diamonds for $300,000. In an ironic twist, the diamonds were purchased by the very merchants to whom they had been originally assigned by the Kimberley mine owners. With his coffers brimming, little Adam Worth sailed for New York. Here he married a respectable young woman and moved into a mansion. The couple had two children. Worth's attractive wife knew him only as Henry J. Raymond. He spent six months a year with his family in New York and the other six months roaming around Europe, planning and executing, through his syndicate of crooks, one incredible caper after another. His most celebrated crime had nothing to do with either cash or gems.

George Zucco, shown in disguise as the sinister Professor Moriarty in the 1939 film, The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes, in which he attempts to steal the British crown jewels.

Laurence Olivier plays an aging Professor Moriarty in the 1976 Sherlock Holmes film, The Seven-Per-Cent-Solution; in this revisionist film Moriarty is wrongly persecuted by Holmes.

On the balmy afternoon of May 27, 1876, Worth, lost in thought, walked along Bond Street in London. At his side was an enormous American thief, Jack "Junka" Phillips. A curiosity even among the underworld, Phillips was a one-time wrestler, who stood nearly seven feet tall. He sometimes actually carried away safes too difficult to open with jimmies or crowbars. As he walked with Worth, whom he dwarfed, Phillips chattered about his idiotic plans to commit several burglaries, saying that he was going to strike out on his own and that he was "tired of being used like a horse." This unlikely pair paused at Agnew and Company, one of the world's most famous private art galleries.

A big crowd had gathered to buy tickets to see Gainsborough's The Duchess of Devonshire, which Christie's had just sold to Agnew's for $50,000, the largest amount ever paid for a work of art to that time. The painting was of the wife of the fifth duke, the lovely Georgiana Spencer. Worth seemed to give the crowd little note. The pair moved down the street, but after walking a block, Worth stopped and said: "Junka. I'm going to steal that painting in Agnew's tonight. I'll need your help."

"What? A painting? What for?"

"Because I want it. That's reason enough. Don't ask questions, Junka. Do as you're told."

Following Worth's instructions, Phillips returned to Agnew's and bought two tickets to the exhibit. Worth stood for a long time, admiring the new Gainsborough exhibition on the second floor. Returning to his comfortable town house, Worth summoned Joseph "Little Joe" Elliott, then his right-hand man. He told him that he and Phillips were going to burglarize Agnew's that night and that he wanted Elliott to stand lookout at the gallery.

"I don't understand, boss," Elliott said. "There's dozens of banks waiting to be taken and you want to steal a painting."

Worth did not explain that he intended to use the painting to bargain for the release of his brother, John, who had again bungled a burglary assignment and was being held without bail, pending trial. (As it turned out, John Worth was acquitted and his brother Adam kept the painting.) That night, while Elliott stood watch, Worth climbed atop Junka Phillips' shoulders and pried open a second-floor window of Agnew's Gallery. He went to the Gainsborough, cut it from its frame, but left one corner of the painting so that the original would match the torn portion and no copy could replace it. Rolling up the Gainsborough, Worth let himself down onto Junka Phillips' shoulders and made off with one of the most priceless art treasures in the world.

Robert Pinkerton, who was in London to help the police obtain evidence against Worth (and was failing to do so), attributed the crime to the American mastermind as soon as he heard of the painting's theft. "There's only one man who would have the nerve to commit such a crime," he told a Scotland Yard official. "That man is Adam Worth. But what puzzles me is that Worth is smart enough to know that no fence in the world will handle such an item as the Gainsborough."

Worth merely hid the painting. Junka Phillips began dunning Worth for his share of the loot, so Worth gave him £50, saying that he had to sell the painting for a small amount. Phillips was dissatisfied and began to extort more money from Worth, who ordered Phillips to keep away from him. Phillips followed Worth to the Criterion Bar one night and loudly began to accuse him of holding out on him and complaining that Worth had made him an accessory in the theft of the painting.

Worth saw the tall figure of Inspector Greenham of Scotland Yard in the bar mirror. He realized that Phillips had turned informer and was trying to force an admission of guilt from Worth in earshot of the detective. Without arguing with Phillips, Worth ordered a bottle of champagne. When it arrived, he suddenly crashed the heavy bottle down on Phillips' head, sending the giant unconscious to the floor. Worth brushed the tiny shards of glass from his expensive frock coat, stepped over the fallen Phillips, and left the Criterion. He was not bothered again by the greedy giant.

Worth held on to the priceless Gainsborough for the next twenty-six years. He carried it with him inside an umbrella, in false-bottom trunks, even down his trouser leg. All the while, assigned by Agnew's to recover the painting whatever the cost, Robert Pinkerton, and later his brother, William Pinkerton, dogged the footsteps of mastermind Worth, waiting for him to slip. For ten years Adam Worth evaded arrest while continuing to manage a network of crooks and thieves in a dozen countries. Then, in Liege, Belgium, Worth, on a whim, decided to rob a mail wagon. As he was about to take a cash shipment, he was caught red-handed and sent to prison for seven years. When he was released, most of Worth's money had vanished, siphoned off by confederates. His yacht and London house had been sold by aides to finance burglaries that failed miserably for lack of Worth's planning and direction.

Adam Worth was a broken man, no longer a mastermind of arch criminals. His associates, Bullard, Shinburn, Sheridan, the Bidwell Brothers, were either dead or in prison. He drifted back to the U.S., and following the death of his wife, wound up in a cheap Chicago rooming house. He nevertheless possessed the Gainsborough. He learned that his son and daughter were in financial distress, and though he vowed he would never give up the painting, he wrote to William Pinkerton. (Robert Pinkerton, the man who had tracked him halfway across the world, was dead by then.) Worth explained that he knew of the painting's whereabouts, although he was not responsible for its theft. He wanted to claim the reward Agnew's had posted for the painting and have this money sent to his son and daughter.

American detective Allan Pinkerton, who at one time captured then lost the elusive Worth, calling the criminal mastermind "The Napoleon of Crime."

Pinkerton wrote to Agnew's and the deal was made. The Gainsborough was sent to Pinkerton, who returned it to Agnew's. The reward was paid to the Worth children and the mastermind then wrote a letter to William Pinkerton thanking him for his kindness. The detective proved as noble as the criminal he and his brother had long sought to jail. After Worth's death, William Pinkerton wrote several letters to Worth's young son, sending him hundreds of dollars, stating that he had obtained this money from "a man who owed your father these sums." The money came from Pinkerton's own wallet.

Shortly before his death, Worth had returned to London, taking an apartment in Regent Park. His return to this city was obviously permitted by the authorities as part of the deal made with Agnew's. He lived in seclusion until he suddenly grew ill and died on January 2, 1902. The greatest criminal of the Victorian era passed on without notice from the press. Five years earlier, his fictional counterpart had met a more spectacular end. Professor Moriarty had died while struggling with the indefatigable Sherlock Holmes, these eternal adversaries crashing to oblivion over the Reichenbach Falls.

KING OF THE BANK BURGLARS/1915

Where Adam Worth had no peers in masterminding the most spectacular burglaries of his era, his brilliant contemporary, Max Shinburn (AKA: Maximilian Schoenbein, Baron Shindell, Henry Edward Moebus, Max Shinborn, Mark Shinburn, Walker Watterson, c.1838-1915) was held in high underworld esteem, even by Worth, as the king of bank burglars in the U.S. Shinburn was German-born and was well-educated, speaking five languages. He arrived in New York in 1861, just about the time the Civil War began, staying at the Metropolitan and other first-class hotels, immediately befriending the city's most celebrated gamblers and sporting men, which brought him under police surveillance.

Shinburn never had the slightest notion of making an honest living, even though his sharp wit and shrewd perceptions would have enabled him to achieve success in legitimate pursuits. He took his first and only job for the purpose of learning how to burglarize America's biggest banks, going to work for the Lilly Safe Company.

Making a thorough study of bank vaults and safe locks at the Lilly firm, he invented a mechanism that he could leave, unseen, beneath a combination dial and it would record, over several days, the combination of any safe or bank vault. Retrieving this device, he then broke into a bank at night and quickly burglarized its safe. Since the Lilly firm provided the safes for most of the major banks and companies in the U.S., Shinburn, after a long and diligent service with that firm, was ready to go into the bank burglary business with fellow thieves George White, alias Bliss, and David Cummings.

Only two weeks after Lee's surrender at Appomattox, which ended the Civil War, Shinburn, Bliss and Cummings traveled to Walpole, New Hampshire. There, on the night of April 21, 1865, they broke into the Walpole Savings Bank, where Shinburn easily opened the safe, using his device that had recorded the combination of the safe before it had been shipped by Lilly to the bank. The burglars stuffed more than $86,000 in cash and government bonds into carpet bags and fled.

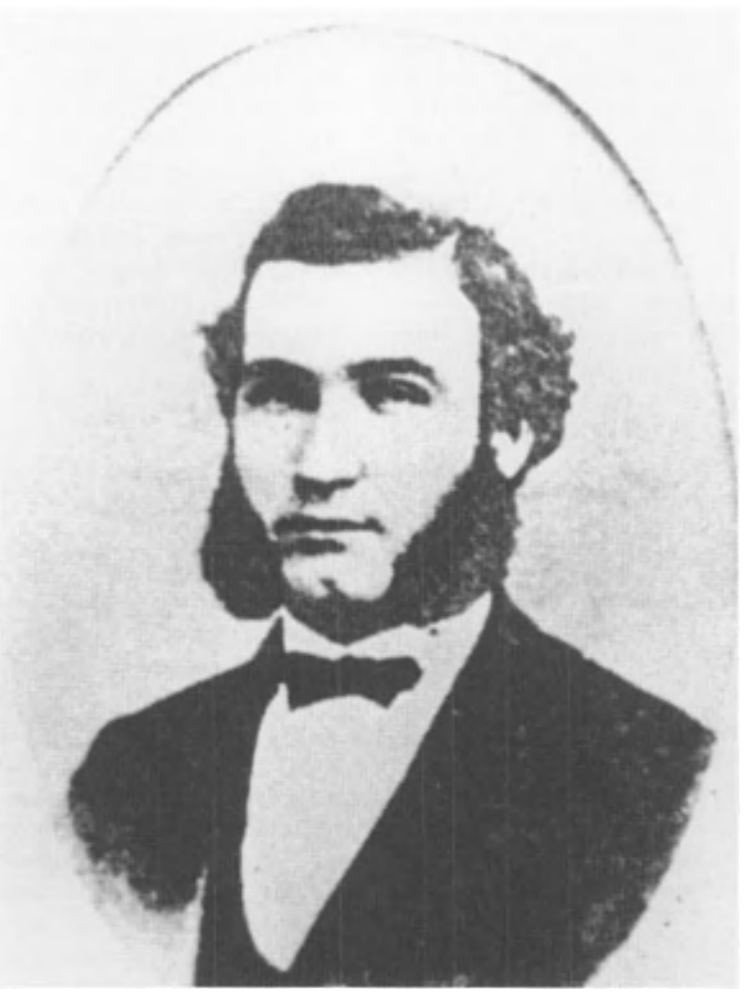
An intensive manhunt for the burglars ensued. Shinburn, who was already at the top of the list of police suspects, was tracked to a hotel in Saratoga, New York, on July 26, 1865. Seven $1,000 bonds were found in Shinburn's suite, all of which were quickly identified as part of the proceeds from the Walpole burglary. Tried and convicted in Keene, New Hampshire, Shinburn was sentenced by Judge Porter to ten years hard labor at the state prison in Concord.

Shinburn did not remain in custody for long. One night after his sentencing, November 2, 1865, his associates, Bliss and Cummings bribed guards at the Keene jail, who allowed Shinburn to escape. He was not heard from again until May 1866, when Shinburn, Bliss and Cummings attempted to burglarize the bank at St. Albans, Vermont. Shinburn had studied this bank and had been impressed by a daring Civil War raid conducted by Confederate soldiers, who had robbed this bank on October 19, 1864, taking away $96,000 in cash and bonds. To prevent another such occurrence, the Lilly Safe Company had shipped a large new safe to this bank, as Shinburn knew, one for which he already had the combination.



Max Shinburn, who engineered million-dollar burglaries in America, and became a baron in Europe; he died penniless and forgotten.

In early May 1866, Shinburn and his two associates arrived in St. Albans and a few nights later broke into the bank, but before they could open the safe, a night watchman unexpectedly appeared and fired a shot at them. The three burglars fled in separate directions. Shinburn spotted a slow-moving train that had just left the St. Albans station and, running after it, hopped on board. He paid for a passenger seat and pretended to fall asleep.

It was Shinburn's ironic fate to be reunited with an old acquaintance. The man sitting next to him on the train had been a juror at Shinburn's trial in Keene, New Hampshire. Recognizing the escaped felon, he got off the train at the next station and notified officers that the celebrated bank burglar was on the train. Shinburn was arrested and, under heavy guard, was sent to the Concord State Prison to serve out his ten-year sentence for the Keene burglary.

Again Bliss and Cummings came to his aid. After serving nine months, Shinburn escaped from the Concord State Prison. Again, guards were bribed to leave certain doors open through which Shinburn scurried to freedom. The following year, Shinburn arrived in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania, where, alone, he broke into the offices of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Hudson Canal Company, taking from its safe $33,000.

The burglar attempted to leave town by train, but heavy snows prevented any trains from running. Waiting in the station, he drew suspicious attention from a police detective, who arrested him, but did not take him to jail. Instead, thinking he would receive the substantial reward posted by the company for the apprehension of the burglar that had looted its safe, the detective decided to personally deliver Shinburn to that company's headquarters, which was located in another town.

Since the trains were not operating that night, the detective resolved to take Shinburn to a small hotel and escort him to the company the next day when the trains would be running. Shinburn proved to be an affable companion that night, buying the detective a large dinner (from the proceeds of his burglary), but the sleuth took no chances with the wily thief. When they went to their room, the detective handcuffed Shinburn to his own hand before they fell asleep on the same bed.

When the detective awoke, he found himself alone in the room. Shinburn, according to his comments years later, had picked the lock of the handcuffs with a small piece of steel that he had concealed in his mouth, under a false tooth. He had not only escaped, but had taken the loot from the burglary with him, or, at least, this was the tale the embarrassed detective later told.

Another detective, the most famous in America at that time, Allan Pinkerton, who headed the celebrated Pinkerton Agency, then became involved in the hunt for the elusive bank burglar after the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company at White Haven, Pennsylvania, was burglarized by Shinburn on July 9, 1868. Pinkerton himself caught Shinburn and tried without success to learn the burglar's secrets, but Shinburn escaped from Pinkerton's clutches and fled to Belgium.

Impressed by the European aristocracy, Shinburn decided he would join this leisure class by buying a title, an expensive proposition that caused him to plan the greatest burglary of his career, that of the Ocean National Bank of New York. To that end, Shinburn returned to the U.S., where he enlisted the aid of America's top burglars, including Edward "Ned" Lyons, George Leonidas Leslie, Sam "Worcester Sam" Perris, Jimmy (or Jimmie) Hope, George White (Bliss) and others.

The Ocean National Bank, one of the largest financial institutions in America, was located on the corner of Fulton and Greenwich streets in Manhattan, a solid brick structure with a heavy stone floor. A basement office beneath the bank, Shinburn had learned, was available for rental and, disguising himself as an investment broker, he hired this space, ostensibly to operate a stock exchange business. Heavy tools were carted into the basement, where the burglars built a partition, behind which they could operated undetected by any chance customer entering the front office. Perris stood behind the customer counter discouraging any potential investor from doing any business with this bogus firm by heaping ridicule and abuse upon him.

Sam "Worchester Sam" Perris, who aided Shinburn in the spectacular burglary of the Ocean National Bank in Manhattan in 1869; the thieves took away more than $1,200,000 in cash and securities.

Shinburn, meanwhile, directed operations behind the partition, where he, Lyons, Bliss and others worked night and day cutting upward through the stone floor of the bank. When learning that the night janitor had left the building, they broke through the floor late on Saturday, June 27-28, 1869, lugging tools into the bank to attack the mammoth vault, the doors for which Shinburn did not have the combination. Using drills and explosives, however, the burglars worked for hours until opening the huge vault, stuffing dozens of valises with more than $1,200,000, the largest bank burglary in U.S. history. The thieves left behind more than $1 million in bonds, which they knew were useless to them, as well as gold coin in the amount of a half million dollars, this being too heavy to carry.

The haul engineered by Max Shinburn staggered even these bold bank burglars. All were rich beyond their expectations and they went their separate ways to enjoy lavish lifestyles, but most of them, when their money ran out, returned to their old profession and ended up in prison. Shinburn, however, who received the lion's share of the loot for masterminding the burglary, immediately sailed for Europe with more than $500,000 in cash.

Upon his return to Belgium, he became "Baron Shindell," a baronetcy he purchased for $25,000. He bought a small castle in Belgium, a villa outside of Paris and a mansion in Switzerland. He lavished on himself tailor-made clothes, jewelry and beautiful mistresses. Shinburn purchased expensive paintings and kept dozens of servants at hand to do his bidding.

To maintain his lavish lifestyle, Shinburn occasionally returned to the U.S., where, on one burglary excursion, he reportedly masterminded with George Leonidas Leslie, the largest bank burglary in the U.S. in the 19th Century, that of The Manhattan Savings Institution, located at the corner of Broadway and Bleeker streets in New York City. He, Leslie and many others spent months tunneling into the bank to break into it on Sunday, October 27, 1878, blowing away its massive vault doors and retrieving $2,747,700 in securities, only about $250,000 being negotiable. Shinburn received less than ten percent of the proceeds, which hardly sustained his excessive living expenses in Europe.

Fifteen years of high-society living, however, forced him to eventually return to his earlier profession, but he was soon caught and sentenced to seventeen years in prison in 1883 for his previous convictions. Less than nine years later he was back in New York, burglarizing banks, landing in jail, and escaping. Eventually, Shinburn went to a home for reformed convicts in Boston. There he died, as he preferred, under an alias, Henry E. Moebus, in 1915. His obituary was brief, describing him simply as a "one-time safemaker," the writer of that day not knowing he was profiling America's most infamous bank burglar of the 19th Century.

THE MAN WHO BURGLED THE MONA LISA/1911

Vincenzo Peruggia (or Perruggia, AKA: Vincenzo Leonardo, 1881-1927) was a man obsessed with the image of only one woman in the world, a face painted on canvas almost four hundred years before he was born, Leonardo da Vinci's mysterious and captivating Mona Lisa (1503-06, portrait of Lisa del Gioconda). Day after day he stared longingly at this masterpiece of art, until he could no longer tolerate sharing the painting with the rest of the world. He resolved to steal it, to possess this image as his alone.

On the morning of August 22, 1911, Louis Beroud, a French painter, arrived in the Salon Carr of the Paris Louvre intending to make a sketch of a model standing before the famed Mona Lisa and using the newly installed glass covering on the painting as a mirror in which to adjust her make-up. This painting and many others in the museum had been without the controversial glass covering until the preceding year when concerns about vandalism and theft encouraged museum officials to institute this protective policy.

The policy was unpopular with the art viewing public, who claimed that it was impossible to properly view the painting through the glass. When Beroud arrived and looked up to the position where the Mona Lisa had hung, between Titian's Allegory of Alfonso d'Avalos and Correggio's Mystical Marriage of St. Catherine, there was nothing on the wall but the iron posts that had supported the painting. The surprised painter asked a museum guard about the painting and was told that it was probably in the photography annex, where legal copies of it were made for postcards and the like.

However, when the painting had not been returned to its place by noon, Beroud inquired again. This time, when it was discovered that the painting was not where the first guard had supposed, a frenzied search began. Police swarmed through the building. Museum visitors were thoroughly searched before they were permitted to leave and every inch of the Louvre was carefully inspected. Finally, a policeman investigating a staircase leading to a courtyard on the river found the glass and frame from the painting stashed behind the staircase.

The news of the burglary shocked the world. Not since master burglar Adam Worth had stolen the famous Duchess of Devonshire in England in 1876, had such an art theft been committed. Because France was dangerously near war with Germany at the time, Germans in the city were arrested and held as suspects on little or no evidence. L'illustration, a popular French magazine was the first of several journals to offer a sizable reward for the safe return of the treasure. The 40,000-franc offering was bested by the Paris Journal, offering 50,000 francs.

Le Matin joined in the effort with a plea to psychics for help in locating the painting. The official investigation continued without success. People walking in the streets of Paris carrying large rectangular packages were stopped and their parcels searched. Artists including Pablo Picasso and Guillaume Apollinaire came under suspicion and were detained and questioned. Despite all the frenzied activity, no solid clues were determined or likely suspects located.

Two years after the painting disappeared, in the fall of 1913, an art dealer in Florence, Italy, Alfredo Geri, received a curious response to an ad he had run soliciting work to display in an upcoming exhibition. The letter, dated November 29, 1913, from Paris, came from someone who identified himself only as "Leonardo." The writer claimed that he had the Mona Lisa in his possession and would return it to Italy for a price. It was evident from the tone of the letter that Leonardo considered Napoleon Bonaparte's removal of Leonardo Da Vinci's masterpiece from Italy a wrong that needed remedy.

Although doubtful that the letter could have come from anyone other than a crackpot or a con artist, Geri replied, saying that he was unable to travel to Paris, but if Leonardo wished to come to Florence and bring the painting with him, he would gladly look at it, and, if it were the true masterpiece, he would pay any price Leonardo demanded. Leonardo wired that he would come to Geri's office on December 10, 1913. Geri asked the director of the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, Giovanni Poggi, to be on hand to help in the identification of the painting. Leonardo appeared at the appointed time and when the two men asked to see the painting, he took them to his hotel, the Tripoli-Italia.

Police photos of housepainter Vincenzo Peruggia, taken in 1913, two years after he had burglarized the priceless Mona Lisa from the Paris Louvre.

After locking the door, Leonardo pulled a large white trunk from beneath the bed. When opened, it revealed a strange conglomeration of apparently worthless items: A beat-up hat, old shoes, plastering tools and some paint brushes. Leonardo removed all of these things from the trunk to reveal a false bottom, which he also removed. He drew out a large rectangular object wrapped in red silk. When the silk was removed, the two visitors were shocked into momentary silence. The painting before them certainly appeared to be the real Mona Lisa.

After carefully examining the painting in the light from the window, Geri and Poggi concurred that it was the actual da Vinci painting. They convinced Leonardo to let them take the painting back to the Uffizi, where it would undergo further examination and Leonardo would get his requested reward of approximately $100,000. Leonardo was instructed to remain at his hotel and wait to be contacted regarding his reward. Geri and Poggi carefully carried the masterpiece to the Uffizi. After an army of experts had determined with certainty that they had the genuine item, the police were notified. Officers went to Leonardo's hotel and arrested him.

Although he had registered at the hotel under the name of Vincenzo Leonardo, police discovered that the man's real name was Vincenzo Peruggia and that he was a house painter from Dumenza in northern Italy. When interrogated by police, Peruggia stuck to his story about stealing the painting "for the glory of Italy and in vengeance against the sins of Napoleon Bonaparte." He firmly insisted that he was a patriot rather than a burglar. The painting, which had suffered only two minor scratches while in Peruggia's possession, was displayed at the Uffizi to huge, exuberant crowds.

Peruggia, charged with burglary, went to trial on June 14, 1914. He told the court that he had first seen the painting in 1908 and then again 1909, when he worked at the Louvre and found himself mesmerized by it. To the embarrassment of those in charge of security at the Louvre, Peruggia then revealed that he had been part of the work crew that had put the painting under glass in January 1911. He had been investigated at the time of the theft and authorities even searched his room. They did not find the painting, which was hidden in the false bottom of a trunk all the while. When no evidence was found to cause his arrest, the Paris police dismissed Peruggia as a suspect, remarking at that time that he was not the type of person that would steal any kind of art work.

The defendant was not a national hero of Italy, the prosecution insisted. He was nothing more than a petty criminal. Prosecutors attacked Peruggia's claims that his motives were purely patriotic by detailing his criminal record, showing that he had been arrested in Macon, France, for attempted robbery on June 24, 1908, and again in Paris on February 9, 1909, for illegal possession of firearms, and had served short prison terms in both cases.

Despite Peruggia's eloquent testimony in his own behalf, he was sentenced to a year and fifteen days in prison, a reduction of the three years sought by the prosecution. His sentence was eventually shortened to seven months. When released, Peruggia returned to his home town and married. He later served with distinction in the Italian army during World War I. After the war he moved to Paris with his wife, where he opened a hardware store. Peruggia died in Paris in 1927. The Mona Lisa had long earlier been restored to the Louvre. Guards were posted near to it around-the-clock.

A contemporary cartoon shows a swarm of French policemen carrying the recovered Mona Lisa back to the Louvre in 1913; the caption read: "She will smile once more for France."

Before his death, Peruggia was several times allowed to visit the painting he had stolen years earlier, with two cautious guards standing on either side of him. He wistfully stared upward to that portrait and its enigmatic smile. On one such occasion, he told the guards how he had kept the painting beneath his bed in a small room in Paris, waiting until midnight to take it from its secret hiding place, resting it against a wall and sitting before it to behold its hypnotic image. "For two years, she was mine," he murmured. "All mine."

THREE DIVERGENT BRITISH BURGLARS/ 1942/1952

Henry Edward Vicars (AKA: Flannelfoot, Henry Williams, 1888-1942), thought to be England's most prolific second-story man in the first half of the 20th Century, reportedly committed more than a thousand burglaries. He never used violence or did damage to the houses he was burglarizing. He was a meticulous and highly skilled craftsman, who did not associate with known criminals.

British burglar Henry Edward "Flannelfoot" Vicars, who committed more than 1,000 burglaries before his arrest in 1937.

Although Vicars was first arrested in 1911, he did not fully start his career in burglary until after World War I. He developed a technique of targeting neighborhoods and homes on the outskirts of London. Usually on weekends, he would travel by bicycle, tram, or subway to and from his destinations. He would enter a number of different homes in one neighborhood, never leaving fingerprints. Sometimes Vicars wore heavy socks or cloth over his shoes so as to leave no tracks and to muffle his footsteps. This practice earned him the nickname of "Flannelfoot."

The loot Vicars took from homes was invariably silverware, small, expensive picture frames and any loose cash lying about, carefully collecting these items and stowing them in briefcases. Upon departing each home, he appeared to be nothing more than a businessman carrying his work papers from an office. He sold off these stolen items piecemeal to pawnshops, but was careful to never visit these pawnbrokers more than once or twice. He thus prevented pawnbrokers from identifying him to inquiring police as one who made numerous transactions. He lived simply, having pedestrian tastes. He was neither a womanizer or a drinker, keeping to himself.

Scotland Yard worked for years trying to track Vicars down. Finally on a tip concerning a woman he was living with (he was using the alias Henry Williams at the time), inspectors determined that he was their man. Using an elaborate plan of constant surveillance, the police were finally able to apprehend him in 1937 as he left the scene of what was to be his last burglary. He pleaded guilty to a number of specific burglaries and was sentenced to five years in prison. He died shortly after his release in 1942.

Compared to the retiring and gentlemanly Vicars, burglars Christopher Craig (b.1936) and Derek Bentley (1933-1953), who came into prominence a decade after Vicars' death, were brutal thugs. They thrived on violence and thought that murder was nothing more than a necessary step in committing their burglaries. Craig grew up in comfortable surroundings in the suburb of Croydon. His father was a bank cashier, and by all accounts Christopher and his brother, Niven Scott Craig, were never in want.

Christopher Craig, according to his father's later statements, was an intelligent youth, who suffered from "word blindness," and how, in childhood, his favorite stories were those of Enid Blyton, these fairy tales read to him by family members. He attended Bible classes, but it was clear that he had a decided interest in firearms at a young age. His father owned a revolver and often took his sons to shooting ranges, where they fired off air-guns and air-pistols. In school, Craig proved to be a poor student, one of his teachers stating in a report: "Chris makes no effort at all. I offered to teach him to read—at my home of an evening. This offer was rejected as he had more important things to do."

British burglar Christopher Craig, injured in his leap from a rooftop, is wheeled into court to face a 1952 murder charge.

Despite his obvious advantages Craig's "more important things" involved a life of crime, a pursuit also embraced by his brother, who was sent to prison for armed robbery in 1952. Craig, at age sixteen, got a job working in a Camberwell garage. He then fell in with another, older teenager, Derek Bentley, then nineteen. Bentley, a slow-witted youth who had ideas of becoming a strong man, had been committing burglaries for some time and taught Craig how to break into homes, offices and warehouses, routinely looting furs and clothing.

Meanwhile, Niven Scott Craig, who had been living in Kensington, and had been fencing many of the items stolen by his younger brother, as well as committing several robberies, was cornered by police on September 14, 1952. After a violent struggle, Niven Scott Craig and an accomplice were arrested and charged with armed robbery. Niven Scott Craig was convicted at the Old Bailey and sentenced to twelve years in prison. The police, however, were not through with the Craigs.

On the night of November 2, 1952, Christopher Craig and Bentley entered a warehouse on Tamworth Road, Croydon, Surrey. A witness seeing the two teenagers climbing over the gates that fronted the warehouse summoned the Croydon police. Officers arrived on the scene minutes later, attempting to reason with the youthful felons, who were by then on the roof of the warehouse. Bentley was seized by Detective-Constable Frederick Fairfax, but Craig, who was holding a revolver, hid behind an elevator shaft and refused to surrender.

Burglar Derek Bentley poses as a strongman; he was executed in 1953 for encouraging Craig to shoot a constable.

Bentley, according to later police statements, then called out to his partner: "Let him have it, Chris!"

Craig responded immediately by firing several shots at Fairfax, wounding him in the shoulder. More policemen climbed on to the roof to hold Bentley, but as they tried to advance toward Craig, the youth kept firing at them. "Bentley then boasted to officers: "He's got a Colt '45, and plenty of bloody ammunition, too." As Constable Miles climbed on to the roof, Craig fired at him, hitting him square in the head and killing him. "I'm Craig!" shouted the defiant gunman. "You've just given my brother twelve years! Come on, you coppers! I'm only sixteen!"

Traditionally to that time, police officers in England were not armed and revolvers had to be sent for. When the weapons arrived, a constable shouted out to Craig that the policemen were now armed and would fire back, unless the youth surrendered. "So you're going to make a shooting match of it, are you?" he replied. "It's just what I like! Come on, brave coppers, think of your wives!" Instead of battling it out, Craig desperately sought escape, diving off the roof, injuring his spine in the fall. Constables reached him while he was half conscious to hear him snarl: "I hope I killed the bloody lot!"

Craig was taken to a hospital and Bentley to a police station. There Bentley stated that he knew Craig had a gun, but said he did not believe he would ever use it, this remark contradicting his cry to Craig to "let him have it, Chris!" This cry would send Derek Bentley to the gallows, one which he later, desperately denied. Both teenagers were charged with the murder of Constable Miles, their trial held at the Old Bailey on December 9, 1952 before Chief Justice Goddard. Christmas Humphreys and J. T. Bass prosecuted. Craig was defended by E. J. Parris and Bentley's attorney was F. H. Cassels.

Parris argued that his client was not guilty of murder, but of manslaughter, accidentally causing the death of Constable Miles, while attempting to escape. Cassels defended Bentley against the murder charge by pointing out that his client was already in custody when Craig shot and killed Miles. Prosecutors then pointed out that Bentley was armed at the time, a knife and brass knuckles found on his person.

Justice Goddard asked Bentley what he was doing in Croydon on the night of the shooting.

"Just to go to Croydon for a ride, sir, an ordinary ride. Just to walk around." Bentley then went on to insist that he never called out to Craig to fire on Constable Fairfax or any other constables trying to subdue them.

Justice Goddard considered the testimony of the police when summing up, stating to attorneys: "Are you going to say that they [the police] are conspicuous liars? Because if their evidence is untrue, that Bentley called out 'Let him have it, Chris,' those officers are doing their best to swear away the life of that boy. If it is true, it is, of course, the most deadly piece of evidence against him."

Craig and Bentley were found guilty of the murder of Constable Miles. Because of his age, however, British law did not permit Craig's execution. He was sent to prison. Bentley, the older boy, was a different matter. He was of legal age to hang and was condemned to death, even though the jury recommended mercy. A storm of public protest ensued over the moral inequity of Bentley's decreed fate, and even up to the moment of his scheduled execution, it was widely believed that Bentley would be reprieved. This was not to be. He was hanged at Wandsworth Prison on January 28, 1953. Craig reportedly became a model inmate, his rehabilitation later warranting his release.

"CATCH ME BEFORE I KILL MORE"/ 1945-1946

William George Heirens (1929-), was unlike any burglar Chicago, Illinois, had ever experienced. He burglarized homes to steal, but he was also driven to commit these nocturnal crimes, because such home intrusions gave him sexual gratification, or so he insisted at his trial. "If I got a thrill," he stated, "I didn't take anything." The very fact that he could secretly enter someone else's apartment and invade their private living space was often enough to satisfy Heirens' psychotic cravings. He would later add murder to heighten his perverse appetite.

Raised in the upper middle-class environment of Lincolnwood, a Chicago suburb, Heirens had more advantages than most. He and his lawyers later claimed that his sexual perspectives were warped at an early age by a puritanical mother who harped that "all sex is dirty," and that "if you touch anyone, you get a disease." He grew up harboring weird sexual fantasies. Secretly obtaining his mother's female clothing, he would don this apparel when alone. In his teens, he began to assemble a strange scrapbook into which he pasted pictures of Nazi leaders Adolf Hitler, Paul Joseph Goebbels and Heinrich Himmler, his secret idols.

In 1942, at the age of thirteen, just before graduating from eighth grade at Chicago's St. Mary's of the Lake parochial school, Heirens was arrested for carrying a concealed weapon. Investigating officers went to his home and found several weapons hidden behind a refrigerator. Atop the roof of the boy's home they found automatic weapons and ammunition.

Burglar-killer William Heirens, at the time he was a student at the University of Chicago.

Heirens admitted to police at that time that he had committed eleven burglaries and had set fire to six houses in only a few months prior to his arrest. His father and mother were dumbfounded and could give no reasons why their son had committed these crimes or how he had accumulated such a large arsenal. George Heirens, a reputable steel company employee, had no explanation for his son's conduct and his mother could only say that she had given her son everything he desired.

The couple, who later changed their name to avoid the stigma their son would heap upon it, promised to keep Heirens out of further trouble if the court would allow them to send their son to a private correctional institution in Indiana. Heirens himself showed remorse and promised to reform. The court allowed probation to the Indiana school.

Heirens appeared to adjust to the discipline of the Gibault Correctional Institution at Terre Haute, Indiana, and was allowed to later transfer to St. Bede's Academy in Peru, Illinois. He showed himself to be a brilliant student, and, when graduating from this school, he entered the University of Chicago, skipping the freshman year and entering as a sophomore. Although he proved himself to be a model student, Heirens had not reformed at all. He continued his burglaries, becoming a skillful thief. While attending the University of Chicago, Heirens routinely burglarized apartments on the posh North Side of Chicago.

The burglaries Heirens committed in increased numbers escalated to murder, when the occupants of the apartments he invaded either discovered the burglar prowling around in the darkness or resisted his attempt to rob them. All of the murder victims were females. The first of these was Mrs. Josephine Alice Ross, an attractive 43-year-old widow, who lived on North Kenmore Avenue. Her body was found on June 3, 1945.

In his later statements, Heirens admitted that Mrs. Ross caught him burglarizing his apartment early in the morning. He stabbed her repeatedly in the face and neck, severing her jugular vein. She bled to death, but Heirens did not immediately flee. For inexplicable reasons, he remained in the Ross apartment for almost two hours. He washed the blood away from the victim and placed bandages on her lethal wounds.

The gaping wound in Mrs. Ross' neck so upset Heirens that he obtained a red evening gown and wrapped this around her neck to cover the brutal slash. He then walked about the apartment, going slowly from room to room, reaching a sexual climax, he later stated. He then took $12 from Mrs. Ross' purse and left. As he was departing down some stairs, Heirens brushed past Jacqueline Miller, Mrs. Ross' daughter, who was just then returning from work.

Heirens' next attack occurred on October 1, 1945. Veronica Hudzinski, nineteen, was at her desk in her apartment on North Winthrop Avenue, when she heard a tapping at her window. As she drew up the shade, two bullets ploughed through the glass window, one wounding the woman in her shoulder. She called police, who found a revolver outside the window on a fire escape, but it bore no fingerprints.

On October 5, 1945, Evelyn Peterson, a former army nurse, awoke to noises in her apartment on Drexel Avenue, which was on the South Side of Chicago and near the University of Chicago area. Just as she began to get out of bed, a heavy metal bar was slammed against her head, knocking Peterson unconscious. She revived to find herself bound by a lamp cord. She managed to free her arms and soon discovered that $150 had been taken from her purse. She was later taken to a hospital, where it was learned that her head had been fractured. Police found no clues at the Peterson apartment, except for a partial thumbprint. The intruder had taken pains to wipe away his fingerprints.

The so-called "lipstick" burglary-murder occurred next. On December 10, 1945, 33-year-old Frances Brown, an ex-Wave living in a stylish sixth-floor apartment at the Pine Crest Hotel on Pine Grove Avenue, stepped from her bathroom to find Heirens ransacking her apartment. He had entered through a window facing a fire escape. She screamed and Heirens, drawing a revolver, fired two shots at her almost point blank.

The note Heirens reportedly wrote with lipstick on the wall of one of his murder victims, Frances Brown, who interrupted him while he was burglarizing her apartment in 1945.

Brown was killed instantly, but, as in the case of Josephine Ross, Heirens did not flee. He ran to the kitchen, grabbed a butcher knife and plunged the blade several times into the already dead woman, leaving the knife jutting from one wound. The blood from his victim bothered Heirens, he later claimed, so he dragged the body into the bathroom, where he washed the wounds, leaving the corpse draped over the bathtub. The burglar then rifled his victim's purse and prepared to leave. Impulsively, he grabbed a lipstick from the purse and use it to write the following on a wall:

For heavens sake catch me
Before I kill more
I cannot control myself

Again, Heirens attempted to wipe away his fingerprints, but he overlooked one, a bloody print of his right index finger, which police discovered on the jamb of the dressing room door between the bathroom and the living room. This print and the thumbprint taken from the Ross slaying, still produced no identification. Detective Chief Storms concluded that he was dealing with a pathological killer, a burglar who would continue to murder as a matter of compulsion. "He's killed twice and he will keep on killing until we catch him," Storms stated. "We're working against time."

Six-year-old Suzanne Degnan, kidnapped and murdered by Heirens from her Chicago apartment in 1946.

On the night of January 7, 1946, 6-year-old Suzanne Degnan was awakened in her room in a North Side apartment. An upstairs neighbor, Ethel Hargrove, later told police that she heard a noise outside and then the child's voice saying: "I don't want to get up. I'm sleepy." Heirens, like kidnapper Bruno Richard Hauptmann a generation earlier, had constructed his own crude ladder by which to climb into second-story apartments and he employed this device to gain access to the little girl's room.

Heirens gagged and bound the child and then carried the girl down the ladder and disappeared with her into the night, enacting a kidnaping plan that he had prepared long in advance. A note he left behind was found some hours later. It read: "Get $20,000 ready & Waite for Word. Do Not Notify FBI or Police. Bills in 5s and 10s. BURN THIS FOR HER SAFETY." (This last sentence appeared on the opposite side of the note.)

Heirens is shown in custody after losing a wild fight with Chicago police officers attempting to subdue him on the night of June 26, 1946.

Heirens never had any intention of freeing the child. He took the girl to a basement near her home and murdered her, then dissected her body. Wrapping the dismembered pieces of the child's body in her bedclothes, the burglar-turned-killer walked about the streets early that morning, dropping the remains of Suzanne Degnan in one sewer after another, forcing these gruesome remains through the gratings. He was seen about 1 a.m. as he moved slowly along side streets, pausing at sewers, first by an ex-soldier, then a janitor in the neighborhood, both of these men reporting later that they had seen Heirens walking about with a large shopping bag (which police later assumed contained the remains of the slaughtered girl).

William Heirens' mother and father, who changed their last name after their son's infamous crimes were exposed.

The mother and father of the murdered Suzanne Degnan, Mr. and Mrs. James E. Degnan (mother is at center, father at right) with relatives. "Tell the kind people there is nothing they can do for us now but pray for us," said James Degnan at the time of this 1946 photo.

No ransom was ever paid for the return of the Degnan child since Heirens never bothered to contact the family with instructions on how to deliver the money. It was later theorized that he might have become too frightened to carry out his plan. He had also become careless. While kidnaping Suzanne Degnan, Heirens left his fingerprints everywhere in the child's room. Over the next few days, Chicago was shocked to learn that the remains of the kidnaped girl were found in pieces all over the city.

Though the Chicago Police had searched its own files and sent copies of the prints taken at the Degnan apartment to the FBI, no identity had turned up. Then, on June 25, 1946, Richard Russell Thomas, a house painter and male nurse living in Phoenix, Arizona, confessed to murdering the Degnan child, providing authorities a number of details involved in the kidnaping-murder.

Chicago detectives flew to Phoenix, but after interviewing Thomas, they realized that his claim was false. Thomas was about to be convicted on a morals charge in Phoenix and to avoid this, he decided to confess to the Degnan murder. He believed that he would be taken to Chicago, charged with the crime, and then prove himself innocent, thus evading a conviction in Phoenix.

A day after Thomas made his phony claim, the janitor of the Wayne Manor Apartments on Chicago's North Side, called police, saying that there was a prowler in the building. Police Detectives Tiffin P. Constant and William Owens responded to the call. When they arrived, the officers were told that the prowler was armed and on the back porch of one of the apartments in the building. Constant ran to the rear of the building and looked up. Seven feet away, a young man was leaning over a railing, pointing a revolver at him. He squeezed the trigger twice, but the gun misfired twice. The dodging Constant fired three shots at the young man, William Heirens, but all missed their mark. Constant then ran up the stairs after the youth.

Heirens threw his revolver at the detective, who ducked out of its path. He then dove at the officer, knocking him down and forcing the gun out of his hand. He fought to get the detective's weapon, wildly flailing his arms and hands. Constant later described Heirens' face as having "a maniacal look. He was showing his teeth and grimacing. The expression on his mouth kept changing." An off-duty policeman, Abner Cunningham, who lived in the area and had run to the scene barefooted, raced up the stairs to see Constant struggling with a youth whose eyes "gleamed like a panther's."

Heirens is shown at his 1946 trial; he insisted that a friend committed his awful crimes.

Heirens is shown behind bars, beginning to serve out three life sentences; he has continued to state that an alter-ego was responsible for his burglaries and murders, a mysterious man he calls "George Murman" (Mur*der*man--author's italics).

Heirens (left), is shown in 1967 as a prisoner, counseling another inmate about college courses; alive at this writing, Heirens has persistently applied for parole.

Cunningham, who had grabbed a few small flower pots along the railing of the porch, looked down at the two struggling men, asking Constant: "Is this the man?"

"That's him," Constant gasped as he tried to pin Heirens' arms.

With that, Cunningham crashed the flower pots down on Heirens' head. Heirens threw up his hands, then rolled over and lay still.

"That's enough," Constant told Cunningham. The officers then dragged the youth off the porch and took him to police headquarters, where Heirens gave his home address as being on Touhy Avenue in Lincolnwood, where his mother, father and younger brother resided. He also said that he had a room at Gates Hall on the University of Chicago campus.

Captain Michael Ahern of the Rogers Park Police Station remembered Heirens as the teenage burglar he had booked in 1942. Heirens was no longer the skinny little boy Ahern had arrested, but seventeen, five feet ten inches tall and very muscular. When police searched Heirens' room at Gates Hall, they found pistols, ammunition, jewelry and $1,800 in war bonds he had burglarized. Many of the items found in this room had been looted from the Ross and Brown apartments and police now realized that they had in custody the pathological killer they had been seeking for more than a year. Heirens' fingerprints were then taken and compared with those found in the Degnan home. They matched.

Charged with murder, Heirens blamed someone else for all his crimes, a man named George Murman. He even possessed letters from Murman, but these missives, like the ransom note he had written to the Degnan family, were proved to have been written by himself. The lipstick message on the wall of the Brown apartment was also identified as having been written by the youthful burglar. Heirens had invented Murman (Mur*der*man) as an alter ego, someone who lived only in his own mind, someone other than himself, who would be responsible for the horrible crimes committed by William Heirens. Heirens knew all about the burglaries and killings, he said, but George Murman had done all those terrible things, not him.

Quickly convicted, Heirens was sentenced to three consecutive life terms, never to be paroled. His age was a mitigating factor against his being executed. At this writing, Heirens resides in the Illinois State Prison. He has filed endless appeals, pleading to be paroled, only to have his requests rejected. He also still believes that George Murman is alive somewhere. "To me, he is very real," Heirens said some years ago. "He exists. You can accept George as being me, but, well—it's hard to explain. A couple of times I had talks with him. I suppose I was really talking to myself. I wrote a lot of notes to him, which I kept." At that time, Heirens failed to state that George Murman also wrote to him and that these letters were written by the same person, the same burglar, the same killer, William George Heirens.

THE PLAYBOY BURGLAR/1961

Canadian Georges Lemay (AKA: Rene Roy, Robert G. Palmer, b. 1926) was, like William Heirens, the offspring of well-to-do parents and received a parochial education. Unlike Heirens, he was an outgoing pleasure-seeker who turned to burglary to support a playboy lifestyle. A real estate agent for his mother's realty firm, Lemay had once thought to become a Catholic priest. He apparently changed his mind after studying at a parochial college, opting to become a playboy and an outdoorsman. On week nights, he frequented a number of Montreal nightspots. At one club, the Montmartre, he repeatedly tried to pick up other men's dates. One columnist who covered the night club scene said of the charming Lemay, "Even if this guy had been the biggest bum going, you couldn't help but like him."

FBI photo of Canadian burglar Georges Lemay, who engineered the spectacular 1961 burglary of the Bank of Nova Scotia in Montreal, his gang taking away more than $630,000.

FBI photo of Lise Lemieux, who outwitted authorities to become the burglar's second wife.

On weekends, Lemay left Montreal for an island cottage he had built in the Laurentian Mountains, north of the city. Despite his attraction to nightlife, Lemay smoked and drank only in moderation, and although he frequently visited the gambling meccas of Las Vegas and Cuba, he rarely gambled. His indulgences were fast vehicles of all kinds—sports cars, small planes, and motorized sail boats.

The occasional encounters Lemay had with the police prior to 1961 were not serious, although a mysterious event occurred in his life a decade earlier. Lemay's first wife, Huguette Daoust, disappeared while the couple visited Florida for a second honeymoon in 1952. They had been married on May 19, 1951, against the wishes of Daoust's mother, and her brother, Raymond Daoust, a noted criminal attorney. Prior to this marriage, Lemay had generally engaged in only short-term relationships with women, but in Huguette's case, he expressed deep love, promising a long life together. It was not a happy life. Lemay apparently had a violent temper and the couple often argued. They returned to Florida, the location of their first honeymoon, shortly after Christmas 1951.

On January 4, 1952, the couple left their hotel for a day of fishing. That evening, Lemay returned alone, greatly upset, claiming that his wife had gone to get warmer clothes from their parked car and had failed to return. The story of the disappearance was widely covered by both the U.S. and Canadian papers. When a search failed to locate Huguette Daoust, a Florida inquest jury presumed she was dead, "and, if so, death was caused by an act of violence."

Lemay claimed throughout the search that he was blameless in the matter and was not charged with Huguette Daoust's presumed death. U.S. immigration authorities, however, served him with a summons to a hearing on whether he would be permitted entry the next time he tried to enter the U.S. Lemay failed to appear for the scheduled inquiry, and his U.S. entry privileges were officially revoked.

During the next nine years, Lemay's name occasionally turned up in police reports, but never in any truly incriminating context. In 1954, a former girlfriend charged Lemay with intimidation. The woman told police that Lemay repeatedly threatened her after she had broken up with him. She later refused to testify against him and Lemay was acquitted. Several years later, on July 15, 1957, Lemay was charged with illegal possession of a revolver that police found while searching his home. Police at the time expressed interest Lemay's photo transmitted on television via a police satellite, which led to his identification and capture, a "first" in law enforcement procedures.

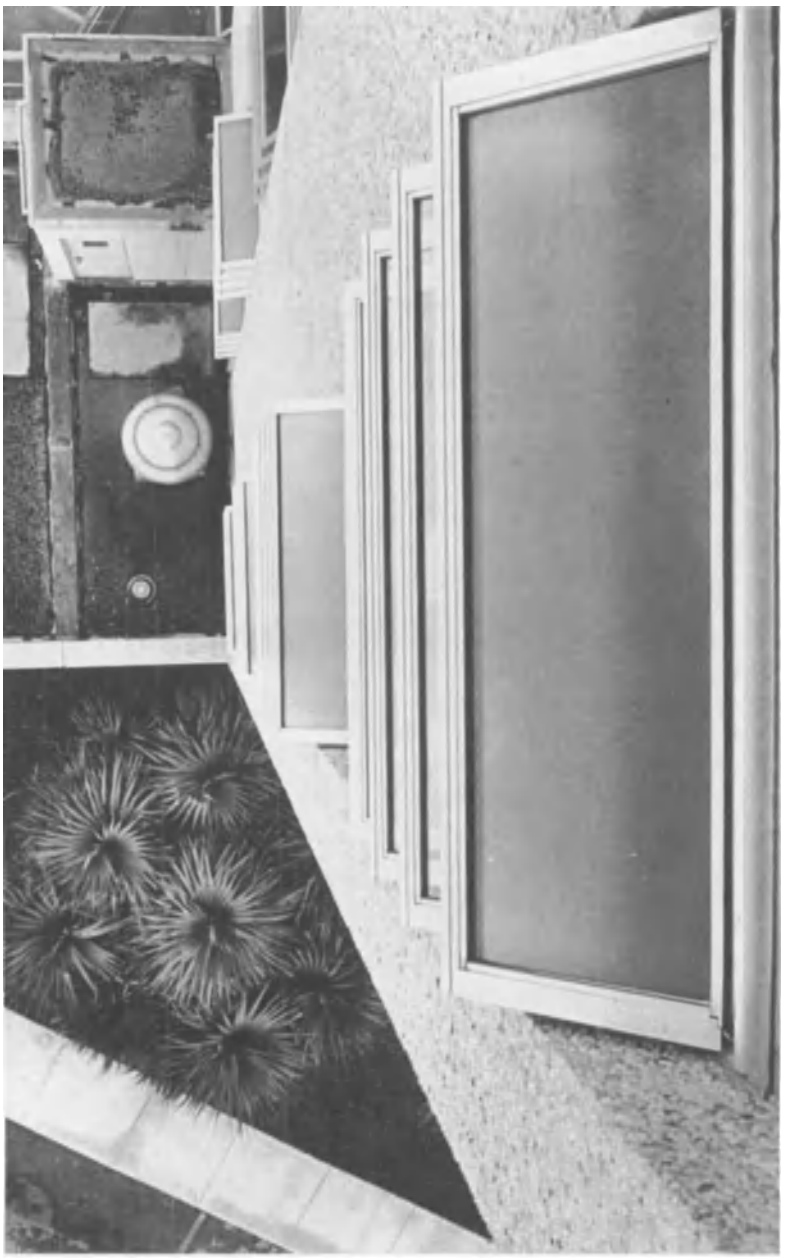
Burglar Lemay in police custody, taken off his 43-foot yacht at a marina in Fort Lauderdale, Florida.

Lise Lemieux Lemay is shown after she married Lemay in a lightning ceremony conducted in French while the burglar was in custody.



This sideways-downward view shows the seven-story route Lemay took in his spectacular escape from the Dade County Jail in Miami, Florida, on September 21, 1965.

in questioning Lemay regarding Larry Petrov, a Romanian house painter, who had been murdered while awaiting trial on narcotics charges. No charges were filed against Lemay in the Petrov murder. He pleaded guilty to the firearms charge and was fined $25.

Then, on July 1, 1961, Lemay, at the age of thirty-five, committed an astounding burglary. He and a group of accomplices broke into a branch of the Bank of Nova Scotia in Montreal by drilling through the concrete ceiling and walls of the bank. Lemay masterminded the operation and directed his burglary "crew" via walkie-talkie across the street from the bank. The gang rifled 377 safe deposit boxes in the bank vault, taking cash, jewels, and negotiable securities. Lemay's gang got away with $633,605, one of the most spectacular burglaries in Canadian history.

Police were baffled by the crime, conducting a nationwide manhunt for the burglars over the next six months. Although Lemay's name had surfaced in connection with the burglary, no evidence linking him to the crime was discovered until January 1962. Police staged a dawn raid on his Laurentian cottage. They did not find Lemay, but they discovered a false panel in a bedroom closet that held $2,000 in U.S. currency. Three days later, on January 8, 1962, the Montreal police announced that a warrant for Georges Lemay had been issued on charges of breaking and entering, and theft of at least $300,000 from the Bank of Nova Scotia.

Montreal police knew of Lemay's penchant for tropical climates and had a number of wanted posters printed, some in Spanish, distributing these flyers in South America and other locales. Within two weeks, Montreal detectives found a 42-foot ocean cruiser at a dock in Miami, a boat they suspected Lemay had used to travel the 2,400 miles from Montreal to Miami. At the same time, the first arrests in the case were made. Police apprehended and charged 37-year-old Jacques LaJoie, 35-year-old Roland Primeau, 27-year-old Andre Lemieux, 19-year-old Yvon Lemieux, and Lise Lemieux, who later became Lemay's second wife. Primeau, Lemay, recaptured by FBI agents in Las Vegas, Nevada, is shown in custody in Montreal, Canada in 1966, where he was convicted and sent to prison for the Nova Scotia bank burglary.

LaJoie, and the Lemieux brothers were convicted of the Nova Scotia burglary and sentenced to prison. Lise Lemieux, after pleading guilty to being an accessory, was released for time already served. The mastermind of the great burglary, however, was nowhere to be found.

The search for Lemay intensified, dragging on until May 1965, when police used recently-developed technology to locate him. The Royal Mounted Police transmitted pictures of Lemay and other wanted criminals on a satellite television program. A boat repairman in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, saw the transmission and recognized a man he knew as Rene Roy. This man had been living for six months on a forty-three-foot yacht anchored in the Bahia Mar basin. Alerted by the repairman, police surrounded the yacht and captured Lemay without a struggle.

Lemay was held in the Dade County, Florida, jail where he outsmarted authorities one more time. Police officials suspected that Lemay would want to marry Lise Lemieux to prevent her from testifying against him. They prohibited her from visiting him. They also made sure that Lemay was placed in an interior cell so that Lemieux could not yell her vows up to him from the street. However, on June 1, 1965, Lemay was taken to the immigration office for a hearing. As he waited there, Lise Lemieux suddenly appeared with a judge and the two exchanged vows in French before authorities could intervene. Georges Lemay was officially married and had thus prevented authorities from compelling his new wife to testify against him.

Lemay remained in the Dade County jail, fighting extradition to Canada. On September 21, 1965, he somehow escaped from his maximum security-cell on the jail's first floor. He then took an elevator to the seventh floor of the building, where he crashed through a window and dropped ninety feet down to the ground while holding on to an electric cable affixed to the side of the building. A waiting car picked him up and drove off. Police conjectured that the only way Lemay could have accomplished his spectacular escape was with inside help.

Lemay was at large until August 19, 1966, when he was recaptured by FBI agents at the Golden Nugget Casino in Las Vegas, Nevada. Lise Lemieux Lemay, sought on charges of unlawful interstate flight to avoid prosecution for conspiracy to bribe, was arrested at a nearby residence. When agents approached him, Lemay at first gave his name as Robert G. Palmer. The Lemays had almost $10,000 in U.S. and Canadian currency in their possession.

Lemay was eventually sent back to Montreal, where he was put on trial for the 1961 bank burglary. The trial dragged on for a year as Lemay and his attorneys filed numerous motions for mistrials. The trial finally came to a conclusion on October 8, 1968, when the defense announced that no witnesses would be called. Lemay was convicted on January 17, 1969, of conspiracy and burglary, and sentenced to eight years in prison. A subsequent appeal failed.

In January 1970, his wife announced that she was filing for divorce, saying her husband "no longer wished to live with her." Lemay was released from prison in 1975. He was picked up by police a short time later in a Montreal apartment. The police also found tools in the apartment and took Lemay in for questioning. No charges were pressed and he was released. The only part of the loot stolen from the Nova Scotia bank that police ever recovered were several pairs of earrings that one of Lemay's former girlfriends claimed he had given her.

THE WOLF WHO BURGLED 60 MILLION FRANCS/1976

The mastermind of "le fric-frac-du siecle" (the heist of the century) was a fast-living adventurer named Albert Spaggiari (b. 1932), who, by his own claim, loved women and animals. "All kinds of animals," Spaggiari explained, "but mostly the ones that are hunted, because we share the same fate." Albert Spaggiari had served as a paratrooper in French Indochina, then later as a hired gun for the outlawed Organisation Armee Secrete (OAS), a right-wing cabal composed of former military officers dedicated to preserving Algeria as a French colony. "I couldn't help it because I'm a wolf," Spaggiari wrote. "I got fed up with all those Communists and their crybaby demonstrations." He was firmly to the right in his political thinking.

In early 1976, Spaggiari was operating a photo supply store in Nice and was trying to decide what avenues to pursue in life. "I travel and I dream," he said, "I've spent my life dreaming. For me a dream is the reality you have just before the big problems start." In this case the attainable dream seemed to be the Societe Generale Bank, situated on the Rue Deloye and the Rue L'Hotel-des-Postes in Nice, France. It was an imposing structure enclosed by heavy grillwork and stone masonry. The vault, as Spaggiari soon learned, was ancient. It had been constructed in the early 1900s.

Spaggiari spent weeks drawing maps and floor plans based on his visits to the teller windows and anteroom of the bank. He devised a foolproof plan to gain after-hour admittance to the vault, which housed millions of francs in gold ingots, negotiable securities, and cash, tucked neatly into safe deposit boxes. Much of this wealth was reportedly hidden from tax officials and therefore uninsured. It was a rich plum for an enterprising burglar.

During one of his many reconnaissance trips to the bank Spaggiari took note of a city work crew entering a sewer manhole on the Rue Deloye. "My heart skipped a beat," he recalled. "According to the maps—I knew them by heart—the vault was located right in line with the manhole." If he could tunnel through the underground masonry of the bank building, he thought, it stood to reason that the safe deposit boxes could be looted with relative ease and escape would be a certainty.

The job could not be completed alone, so Spaggiari recruited a number of his former associates, men living on the fringe. One recruit was Gaby Anglade, who had attempted to assassinate Charles DeGaulle in 1962. Jean Kay was another Spaggiari henchman lured into the plot. Kay was wanted by the police for bilking Marcel Dassault, an aerospace industrialist, out of eight million francs.

In May 1976, the thieves entered the manhole to begin tunneling operations. For the next two months they labored tirelessly to construct a twenty-five-foot tunnel leading from an adjacent parking garage to the bank. A half-mile section of cable connected to a fluorescent light illuminated their way. While this was going on, the bank burglars were plied with generous amount of food by Spaggiari–catered into the tunnel.

The enterprising burglar Albert Spaggiari, who masterminded the underground burglary of the Societe Generale Bank in Nice, France, in 1976, looting 60 million francs from safe deposit boxes.

The operation was brought off faultlessly on July 20, 1976. The gang entered the vault and removed assets totaling sixty million francs from the locked boxes. The total haul far exceeded the notorious 1974 Purolator Robbery in Chicago, still fresh in everyone's mind. It was Europe's biggest burglary to date, and the thieves were careful to cover their tracks. They welded the vaults shut, leaving behind a cryptic message, "Without weapons, without hate, and without violence." The theft was discovered the following Monday. Bank officials spent the next few weeks tallying their losses and placating anxious depositors whose uninsured fortunes were lost overnight. Spaggiari and his associates then burglarized the Paris branch of the Societe Generale just a few weeks later.

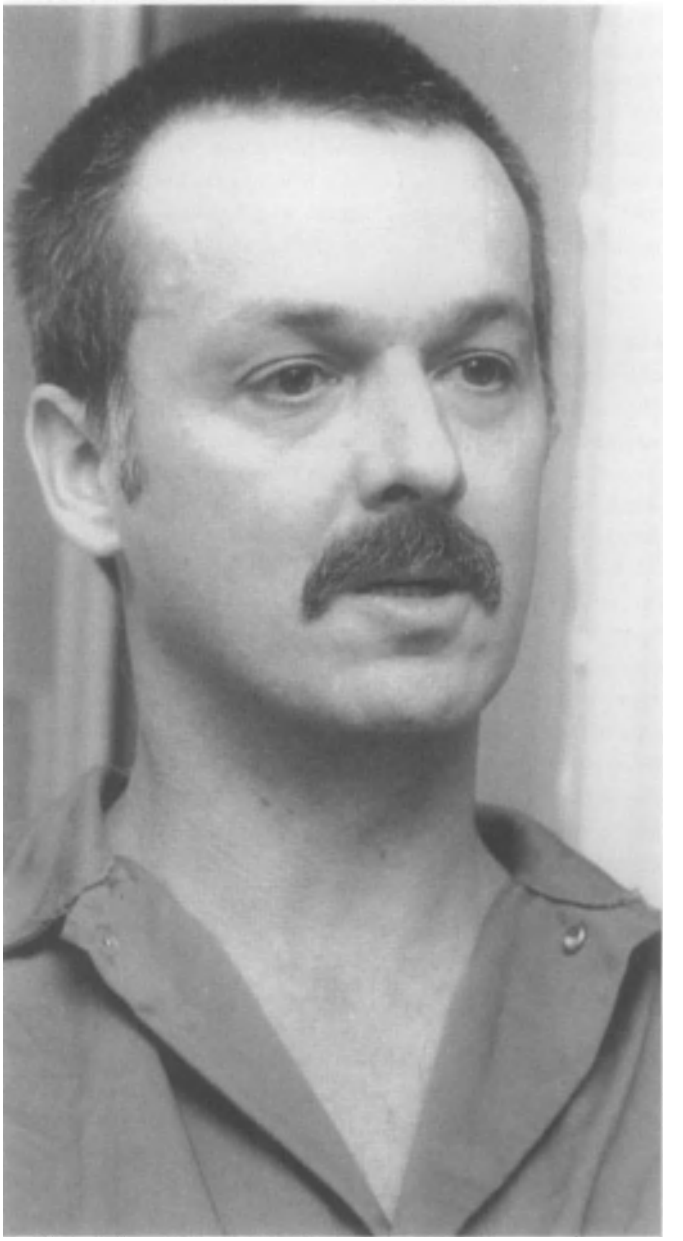
In October 1976, French police received their first clue. A garage owner was apprehended for selling bonds traced to the Nice burglary. The investigation plodded along until October 1976 when eleven suspects were arrested and charged with complicity in the burglary. Albert Spaggiari was picked up on October 27, 1976, after making the "grand tour" of New York, Hong Kong, and Bangkok. "Rule number one for the critical situations: rise to the occasion," the burglar wrote in his memoir. "Don't allow circumstances to alter your plans, your appearance, or your habits." Unfortunately for Spaggiari his best-laid plans backfired. He was arrested on the Rue de Marseille three days after landing at the Nice Cote d'Azur Airport.

Spaggiari remained a prisoner exactly four months. Facing a likely fifteen to twenty-year sentence, he set his dreams aside and formulated a spectacular plan of escape. The courtroom in which he was tried overlooked the street. A large window fastened to the sill with just one little clip was all that stood between him and freedom.

On March 10, 1977, Spaggiari leaped to his feet, unfastened the window, and climbed out on the ledge. "No, not that!" screamed his lawyer, Jacques Peyrat, but it was already too late. The prisoner jumped from the ledge, bouncing harmlessly off the roof of a parked Renault automobile, and then jumped into the back seat of an awaiting motorbike, whose rider had come to pick him up. He gestured obscenely to the gaping attorneys and police officers, who could only stand at the window and watch, and then roared off to freedom.

In 1978, two reporters from Paris Match, Hubert Lassier and Arnaud Hamelin, located Spaggiari in Madrid, Spain. Their interview with the fugitive (who continued on to Argentina and other South American countries, where he lived among the right-wing exiles of the Hitler era) formed the basis of Spaggiari's book, appropriately titled Fric-Frac. "Farewell native land," he said. "I'll be back in twenty years or twenty centuries."



Bernard Charles Welch, Jr., who burglarized more than 3,500 upscale homes for fifteen years, becoming a millionaire, until he was cornered and captured in 1980.

THE STANDARD TIME BURGLAR/1980

The fifteen-year crime career of master burglar Bernard Charles Welch, Jr. (b. 1940) ended in 1980 with his arrest and murder conviction in the death of Washington, D.C., resident, Dr. Michael J. Halberstam. Welch became a burglar at an early age, an insatiable collector, an acquisitive shark feeding ravenously from high society homes. He began burglarizing luxury homes in 1965 at the age of twenty-five, specializing in the theft of furs, silverware, art objects, and rare coins. His frenzied burglaries, committed usually between November and April, when nights were longer and darker, could at first be likened to pure gluttony. Police dubbed him the Standard Time Burglar, since he invariably invaded Washington area homes between 6 p.m. and 10 p.m.

This vexing master burglar not only robbed thousands of homes with alacrity, but terrified dozens of residents in the process, hog-tying them and threatening them with a handgun, even raping three female victims, one being a woman of seventy-four. Police knew that the elusive burglar they sought was dangerous and detectives had all but given up hope of ever capturing him.

"We became fatalistic," said Maryland Detective Sergeant James King, "that we'd ever catch Welch by known investigative techniques ... This guy was better than any fictional character. He was hitting three or four houses every night. But his claim to fame was not how much stuff he stole, it was how he lived after stealing. He wasn't your typical junkie. He took his money and invested it. The guy had imagination."

Welch was also imaginative in converting his stolen goods to cash. Another police official, when referring to Welch's modus operandi, stated: "The smart burglar lives in one jurisdiction, burglarizes a different jurisdiction, and fences his loot in yet a third." Welch fit this mold exactly. He burglarized the wealthy bedroom communities of Washington, D.C. He lived in Virginia, and he fenced his loot in the Midwest, traveling with his family to Duluth, Minnesota, to spend his summers in a luxury split-level home, which, like his luxury home in Great Falls, Virginia, was equipped with sophisticated security systems and sirens.

At this time, Welch lived under the name of Norman Hamilton, with his wife, Linda Susan Hamilton and their three children. Welch's sprawling home in Great Falls, Virginia, purchased in 1978 for $245,000 (he paid cash), boasted an indoor swimming pool, an environmental room providing varying degrees of heat and humidity that simulated both Saharan and Arctic conditions, and a three-car garage housing three expensive sports cars, including a $40,000 Mercedes-Benz.

Welch's security system for the Great Falls home—he took incredible steps to prevent his own house from ever being burglarized—included a battery of remote-control closed-circuit television cameras capable of sweeping the lawn areas in every direction. Microphones had been implanted in the outside walls of the house and weight sensors had been imbedded throughout the lawns. Floodlights that could expose the entire estate had been secretly planted in trees and shrubbery and could be controlled from within the house. All of this electronic equipment created an enormous power-drain, but Welch was never worried about a blackout that might shut down his security system. He had installed a powerful auxiliary generator for just such an emergency.

Because Welch worked alone, law enforcement officials could not rely upon informants or associates to capture him. They could not trace the thousands of items he stole that consisted of gold or silver, since he melted down most of the precious metals he stole, reselling these as gold or silver bars to sophisticated fences in the Midwest. However, Welch was arrested twenty-five times, mostly on suspicion of being a burglar, but he always managed to avoid imprisonment either by jumping bail or escaping from prison. It was estimated that between 1965 and 1980, Welch netted between $10 and $20 million through his non-stop burglaries.

In 1974, Welch escaped from the Clinton Correctional facility in Dannemora, New York by hiding out on the grounds after a softball game, then scaling a twenty-five-foot-high fence. He became one of the FBI's most-sought-after criminals, and 15,000 circulars with his description and modus operandi were distributed to police. After his 1974 escape, Welch bought his house in Great Falls, Virginia, making $750,000 in improvements on the home, mostly expenses for his elaborate security systems. He told neighbors he was a successful stockbroker, and frequently invited them over to see his private art collection, indoor swimming pool, and environment room.

Welch's grand lifestyle and his spectacular career as a burglar ended in December 1980. After burglarizing four homes in the evening of December 5, 1980, Welch broke into Dr. Halberstam's home. Halberstam, a well-known cardiologist and author, surprised the burglar, who had entered his Washington house overlooking the Potomac, at 2806 Battery Place. Halberstam and his wife had returned home from a cocktail party at 8:45 p.m. Halberstam entered the house alone, his wife waiting on the porch. He was going to let out his two dogs so that his wife could walk them.

Dr. Michael J. Halberstam, one of Washington's most esteemed physicians, interrupted Welch's burglary at his home and, though fatally shot, ran down the fleeing thief with his car.

The moment Halberstam switched on the house lights, he saw a man dressed in black coming out of his living room. Instead of fleeing, Halberstam advanced upon the burglar, Welch, grappling with him. Welch suddenly produced a handgun and fired five quick shots, two of which struck the physician in the chest. Welch fled, but moments later, Halberstam ran after him, blood on his shirt. The 48-year-old doctor did not appear to be seriously injured. He and his wife hurried to their car and Halberstam slid behind the wheel, his wife getting into the front passenger seat.

As they drove toward Sibley Hospital a few blocks distant, Halberstam saw a figure crouching on the sidewalk. "There he is!" he shouted to his wife. Halberstam drove straight at Welch, who began to run, driving his car onto the sidewalk and aiming it like a weapon at the fleeing burglar. The car struck Welch and sent him flying into a brick wall. Halberstam then drove toward the hospital, his head now bobbing downward.

"Only then," Mrs. Halberstam later said, "did I realize how seriously he had been shot. I told him, almost irritatingly, to back up, but then I saw him slumping. He lost control and we crashed into a tree."

Passersby summoned an ambulance, which rushed Halberstam to a hospital. He died minutes after arrival. Welch, meanwhile, lay injured on the sidewalk and was picked up by police. He was treated for minor cuts and bruises, but would tell officers nothing. His pockets were empty and he had no identification whatsoever. As officers took his fingerprints, the six-foot-one-inch, 170-pound burglar suddenly blurted: "You're going to be surprised."

Police, indeed, were surprised that they had in custody a much-wanted escaped felon. When they investigated his home in Great Falls, Virginia, and began to identify thousands of items he had stolen, they then realized that they had captured the Standard Time Burglar. Found in Welch's home were fifty-one boxes of loot, estimated by investigators to be worth more than $3 million and representing about 3,500 burglaries committed by the industrious Welch. This Smithsonian-like collection of more than 13,000 items was later exhibited in an enormous hall to which flocked more than 4,000 burglary victims in hopes of identifying their property, which required 20,000 pages to catalog.

Everything and anything was found in the basement of Welch's Virginia home—dozens of mink and sable coats; expensive jewelry; silver flatware; antique brooches, pins and necklaces; watches; Oriental ivory, porcelain and jade; vases; candelabras; and antique dolls. Hundreds of rare coins were found, along with many gold ingots worth $10,000 apiece that had been created by Welch himself in melting pots he had installed. He also possessed an enormous and expensive collection of weapons, chiefly handguns. The very Smith & Wesson revolver Welch had used to shoot Michael Halberstam had been stolen by the super burglar from an FBI agent, when Welch burglarized the agent's Washington, D.C. apartment.

Ironically, Halberstam—Welch's only known murder victim—had been a dedicated foe of firearms and had made many TV appearances on behalf of a drive for enactment of federal legislation to control handguns. He had appeared on TV only a month before his death to state: "Let's put some of the same energy and urgency into controlling handguns as we put into controlling muscular dystrophy. Start now. Don't wait until someone you love and someone you respect has been murdered by a psychopath with a grudge against society and a .32 special in his pocket."

Welch was no psychopath, but simply a trapped burglar who attempted to escape the clutches of his victim by shooting him. Once identified, Welch told police nothing. He would not discuss his countless burglaries, let along his killing of Dr. Michael Halberstam. "He'll never tell us," complained one detective, who grilled Welch for hours. "His attitude has been: 'You've got me and you're probably going to put me away, but I'm not going to do or say one thing to help you.'"

On April 10, 1981, Welch was found guilty of murdering Halberstam by a jury of nine women and three men, who took only two hours to decide on their verdict. He was sentenced on May 22, 1981, to life imprisonment. Under the terms of his sentence, Welch was eligible for parole in 143 years. Throughout his trial and sentencing, Welch maintained a quiet composure. He said not a word. As the "one-man crime wave" was led from court en route to prison, he had no remarks for reporters.

THE NIGHT STALKER/1984-1985

A Satanist, rapist and savage killer, burglar Richard Leyva Ramirez (b. 1960) terrorized California communities for more than a year, looting homes and leaving injured and dead victims in a bloody wake which, until he was identified, was attributed only to "The Night Stalker." After his trial and 1989 conviction, chief prosecutor P. Philip Halpin, a deputy district attorney, said that he regretted not learning more about how Ramirez's mind worked. Describing Ramirez as "a twisted man, but an intelligent fellow," Halpin said, "It's a tragedy not to see how all this happened."

An 1861 print showing the devil to whom witches prayed with a pentagram implanted in this horned figure's head, the symbol that devil-worshipper Ramirez left behind in many of his burglary murders.

"All this" was a crime spree that terrorized Los Angeles County (and other areas) in 1984-1985. In a little more than a year, Ramirez committed a series of home invasions in which thirteen people were killed and several more beaten, raped, and robbed. Ramirez was also suspected of other murders in Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Orange County.

Born in 1960 in El Paso, Texas, Ramirez was a petty thief in his adolescence, becoming a drifter, ending up in California in the early 1980s. There he took up burglary, but lacked finesse. Convicted burglar Sandra Hotchkiss, testifying under immunity at Ramirez's trial, said she tried to teach him the ropes, but after more than thirty burglaries together, she found him too amateurish and sloppy to continue working with him.

The first Night Stalker killing occurred on June 27 or 28, 1984, when Ramirez entered the first-floor apartment of 79-year-old Jennie Vincow, in Glassell Park. He burglarized the apartment, slashed the woman's throat, and stabbed her several times after she died. He left three identifiable fingerprints on a screen frame and a window pane while letting himself into the apartment. Nine months later, the Night Stalker struck again. This time he committed two attacks in one night. On March 17, 1985, Ramirez, while burglarizing a home, shot Dale Okazaki, 34, of suburban Rosemead in the head with a .22 caliber bullet, killing her, and wounded her roommate, Maria Hernandez. Hernandez was one of the first to identify Ramirez, when he was apprehended. Later that morning, using the same gun, Ramirez shot Veronica Tsai-Lian Yu to death in her car on a street in Monterey Park.

Eleven days later, Ramirez committed two murders, details of which were repeated in his later attacks. Breaking into the Whittier home of Vincent and Maxine Zazzara, he shot the husband to death as he slept, then handcuffed, beat, and raped the wife. In the course of burglarizing the house, Ramirez demanded Maxine's help in finding money. When she refused, he stabbed her repeatedly and gouged out her eyes (taking these grisly trophies with him). The bodies of the Zazzara couple were found on March 29, and at the scene of this crime, Ramirez had left another essential clue, a distinctive footprint of an Avia-brand athletic shoe.

After the May 14, 1985 murder of William Doi, sixty-five, of Monterey Park, police found the same Avia shoeprint and other procedural similarities to the previous burglary-killings, including severed telephone wires and the use of thumbcuffs as restraints. Doi, before he succumbed to a gunshot wound in the head fired by Ramirez, had staggered to a phone, calling police. Seeing this, Ramirez cut the phone line, but too late, causing him to flee before officers arrived. Doi's desperate act undoubtedly saved the life of his wife, who was present in the house and survived.

Despite some progress in the investigation, the series of gruesome assaults took their toll on the citizens of Los Angeles. Sales of home security systems and firearms boomed. The level of terror increased two weeks later as the Night Stalker invaded the Monrovia home of 84-year-old Mabel Bell and her invalided sister, 81-year-old Florence Lang on May 30-31, 1985. Ramirez savagely beat both women, drawing in ink a Satanic symbol on Bell's body and drawing more of these symbols on the walls of the house before he looted the place and departed.

The Avia shoeprint was found at the scene and stolen property was later recovered. Bell died from her injuries on July 15, 1985, but Lang survived to testify about the beating Ramirez gave her, and how he beat Bell with a hammer. But the most distinctive detail of this attack was the first appearance of a pentagram—a five-pointed star that, when drawn with two points up and one point down, represents the symbol of devil-worshipers. The pentagrams were drawn on a bedroom wall, and also onto Mabel Bell's thigh.

Ramirez murdered 77-year-old Mary Louise Cannon, while burglarizing her Arcadia home on July 2, 1985. He beat, stabbed, and strangled her. Five days later, he beat and strangled 61-year-old Joyce Nelson of Monterey Park. In both burglaries, Ramirez left several Avia shoeprints in the house, including one on the left side of Joyce Nelson's face.

On July 20, 1985, Ramirez invaded a Glendale home, where he killed Maxon and Lela Kneiding, shooting and stabbing them both and cutting Maxon's throat so severely that the victim was almost decapitated. Survivors and the crime scenes attested to the pentagrams, the cut telephone wires, the use of handcuffs and ligatures to restrain victims, the procedure of shooting the men in the head before raping their wives, and of macabre obsessions.

According to survivors, Ramirez repeated many of the same phrases when demanding money and used the same obscenities when assaulting the women. He also forced some of his victims to swear allegiance to Satan, sometimes just before killing them. Of his methods of killing, he seemed particularly drawn to cutting throats, and seemed attracted to yellow houses near freeways. (Veronica Yu was driving a yellow car when Ramirez attacked her, the only known non-home invasion killing during the burglar's rampage.)

On July 20, the same day Ramirez burglarized the Kneiding home and killed its two occupants, he invaded the Sun Valley home of 32-year-old Chainarong Khovananth, killing him and then beating and raping his wife, before departing with more than $30,000 in jewelry and cash. On August 6, 1985, Ramirez broke into the Northridge home of 38-year-old Christopher Peterson, beating Peterson and his 27-year-old wife, Virginia, before burglarizing the place and fleeing. Two days later, on August 8, 1985, 35-year-old Elyas Abowath was killed in Diamond Bar.

Opposite page: An ancient print depicts the many tortures inflicted upon devil-worshippers in Germany in 1527; the murdering Ramirez practiced almost all of these brutal tortures—trussing, stabbing, strangling, gouging out of eyes--in his many murderous burglaries.

The wives of Peterson and Abowath survived and identified Ramirez after his capture. He had raped each one near the bodies of their husbands. Ramirez then allegedly left the area, going to San Francisco for a brief stay, where, on August 17, 1985, he invaded the San Francisco home of 66-year-old Peter Pan, shooting him and his wife, before looting and fleeing their home. The woman survived to later identify Ramirez as the burglar.

In his final attack on August 25, 1985, in Mission Viejo, Ramirez shot and wounded 29-year-old Bill Carns, then raped his fiancee, before taking his victim's car. When the vehicle was recovered on August 28, 1985, police discovered that the attacker had left a partial fingerprint on the stolen car, allowing police to finally identify him. Reward money acted as an added inducement for terrified city dwellers to provide information for the Night Stalker's capture.

One man led police to one of the four guns Ramirez used in his shootings, and a woman recognized Ramirez as the man she had seen outside a victim's house. The sister of a former roommate of Ramirez recognized his face from a police composite, and several other citizens came forward with other pieces of the puzzle. Police were handed the clue ultimately responsible for solving the puzzle when, as Ramirez left the scene of the August 8 attack, he ran a stoplight. His fingerprints were taken as a matter of course in the misdemeanor traffic offense, allowing police to link him to the Vincow killing.

Police published Ramirez' photograph on August 30, 1985. Detectives staked out the Greyhound bus depot, suspecting that he might try to leave the city. Ramirez, however, who had been visiting a brother in Arizona that week, arrived on one of the incoming buses and slipped past the waiting police. However, on August 31, 1985, twelve hours after his photo appeared in the newspapers, Ramirez was recognized by angry citizens in East Los Angeles. Attempting to escape them, Ramirez tried to hijack a car in a parking lot. The frightened woman driver screamed to bystanders as Ramirez tried to throw her from the car, "Esta el matador!" ("It's the killer!") Eight men threw themselves on Ramirez and beat him senseless until police arrived.

Ramirez faced sixty-eight felony charges, including fourteen counts of murder and twenty-two counts of sexual assault. Under California law, a special circumstance must accompany the charge in order for it to quality as a capital crime. Such circumstances include premeditation, commission of murder during a burglary, and torture, rape, or mutilation of a murder victim. Among the crimes police believe Ramirez committed for which they had insufficient evidence to charge him were the murder of Patty Higgins, whose throat was cut in Arcadia on June 27, 1985, and the abduction and sodomization of up to twelve children, the youngest being six years old.

Ramirez gloried in his sinister reputation. At a preliminary hearing, he waved to reporters, grinning, waving and shouting: "Hail, Satan!" When placed in a cell, he told a fellow prisoner: "I've killed twenty people, man. I love all that blood!"

Jury selection started on July 22, 1988, but this process went on for almost a year. Impaneling a jury was an arduous task, because the case was so widely publicized that only one of 2,400 prospective jurors had not heard of Ramirez. As an extra measure against the possibility of a mistrial, Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Michael A. Tynan took the unusual step of swearing in twelve alternate jurors along with the original twelve. The controversial jury selection took over six months to complete, ending with twenty-four people. Due to the diverse ethnic makeup of Los Angeles County—Latinos, Asians, blacks, and Caucasians, with no one group in the majority—the prosecution and defense accused each other of ethnic bias.

The crimes of which Ramirez, a Latino, was accused were committed against Asians and whites; none of his victims were black or Latino. The defense accused the prosecution of trying to exclude blacks and Latinos from the jury, and the prosecution accused the defense of trying to exclude whites and Asians. The original twelve jurors were made up of six blacks and six Latinos.

One of these twelve jurors, a black man, was dismissed when two other jurors, both black women, told the judge they had overheard this juror say in the hall that if Ramirez was convicted he, the juror, would not send another minority person to Death Row unless the legal system started putting more whites there, too. These delays were costly; by the time counsel began presenting evidence in January 1989, the case of the Night Stalker had already cost Los Angeles County taxpayers $1,120,000.

The formal trial began in late 1989, with the defense under a cloud. Four days before presentation of evidence began, a state Court of Appeal ruled that defense attorney Daniel Hernandez was professionally inadequate in both preparation and legal research in a murder case he had tried in 1985, but that the representation he offered was not sufficiently adequate to grant his client a new trial. Such criticism of Hernandez became a recurring motif in Ramirez's trial. The defense tried to stall by requesting a change of venue, asking Judge Tynan to excuse himself, moving to suppress evidence, and pleading to have all charges dropped. The tactics annoyed the prosecution and antagonized the judge. Ramirez's defense was also hampered on several other fronts. Besides a strong case for the prosecution, perhaps the greatest impediment to Ramirez's defense was the defendant himself.

Ramirez refused to present evidence in his own favor, and showed his arrogant contempt for the judge, prosecutors and jurors by wearing sun glasses in court throughout his trial. At one point he drew a pentagram on the palm of his hand, flashed it at the spectators and the jury, and shouted, "Hail Satan!" as he was being led from court. He also called one of the witnesses a liar, used a mirror to flash light in the eyes of another witness, and once even screamed obscenities at the judge.

Once the trial got underway, the jurors heard numerous horror stories. A 63-year-old woman from Monterey Park told the court of how Ramirez bound her hands behind her before raping and sodomizing her. A woman from Burbank said that he robbed, beat, raped, and sodomized her, then said to her,

The arrogant Richard Ramirez, shown during his trial, flashes the palm of his hand to show the sign of devil-worshippers, the pentagram. He was sentenced to death, presently awaiting execution.

"I don't know why I'm letting you live. I've killed people before." Whitney Bennett, sixteen at the time of the attack, described how she survived after Ramirez beat her in the face with a tire iron.

Midway through the trial, Daniel Hernandez's request to be excused from the case due to "nervous exhaustion" was denied by Judge Tynan. However, Judge Tynan appointed a new defense attorney to work with Hernandez's team. Ray Clark, while technically subordinate to Hernandez, was a far more experienced trial attorney and was regarded by courtroom observers as a valuable addition to a team clearly fighting an uphill battle.

Ramirez's counsel built their case around mistaken identity, arguing that it was not necessary to prove their client's innocence, but only to instill reasonable doubt in the jurors' minds. The closest they came to disproving one of the charges was when the defendant's father, Julian Ramirez Tapia, claimed Ramirez was visiting the family in El Paso at the time two of the attacks took place.

The prosecution disproved the father's testimony by introducing Dr. Peter Leung, a Los Angeles dentist, whose records showed that Ramirez was in Los Angeles receiving dental treatment at the time his father claimed he was in Texas. Coincidentally, Dr. Leung figured prominently once again in solving the case. On June 15, 1989, a child was assaulted in Highland Park—an attack that police believe was committed by the Night Stalker. That same night, a police officer pulled a car over for running a stop sign. The driver, whom police deduced was Ramirez, jumped from the car and escaped. In the abandoned car, police found Dr. Leung's business card.

In all, more than 165 witnesses testified, thirty-eight of them for the defense. Six-hundred fifty-eight exhibits were introduced, including photographs of the crime scenes. The evidence—eyewitness identifications, fingerprints, footprints, pentagrams, 375 pieces of victims' jewelry recovered by police—was overwhelming. After fourteen months of preliminaries, testimony, and deliberations, on September 20, 1989, the jury returned a verdict of guilty on all charges of thirteen murders and thirty other felonies. Judge Tynan allowed Ramirez, at his own request, to hear the verdict alone in a holding cell over a sound system. Each count was read separately. The ritual took almost forty-five minutes, with the court clerk asking to be relieved of the duty of reading the verdicts after the first ten. Judge Tynan finished the task of reading the counts himself.

The punishment phase of the trial was as surprising as the rest of it, in that the defense called no witnesses to present mitigating evidence to forestall the death penalty. Clark, an opponent of the death penalty, made perhaps the most unconsciously revealing comment of the entire procedure when he said afterward, "I could not condone taking even Hitler's life." When asked if Ramirez was guilty, Clark said simply, "I didn't ask."

The jury agreed with all nineteen of the prosecution's "special circumstances." They recommended the death penalty, which prompted Ramirez to say, "Big deal. Death always went with the territory. See you in Disneyland." Judge Tynan, citing the "cruelty, callousness, and viciousness beyond any human understanding" of the Night Stalker's crimes, sentenced Ramirez on November 7, 1989, to death in the gas chamber.

Ramirez agreed with the judge. He told the court after sentencing, "You maggots make me sick! You don't understand me. You are not expected to. You are not capable of it. I am beyond your experience." After chanting Satanic musings, he said, "I am beyond good and evil. I will be avenged. Lucifer dwells within us all. That's it." He was jailed in Los Angeles and then moved to a maximum security cell at San Quentin in September 1993, where, at this writing he awaits execution.

A HUMAN MONSTER/1993

Richard Allen Davis (b. 1954), a burglar by criminal trade, proved to be one of the most repulsive predatory child killers in America. When cornered by overwhelming evidence, Davis sneered contempt at the court that sentenced him to death, flashed obscene gestures to members of the press, and, as a final vile gesture, attempted to make the father of his victim share his monstrous crime. Judged a sociopath, Davis was a career burglar who spent sixteen years behind bars, including eight years at the California Men's Colony at San Luis Obispo. He had been convicted of kidnaping, assault with a deadly weapon, armed robbery and, most often, burglary. And yet, this dangerous recidivist was released by California authorities and, ten months later, kidnaped, sexually molested and brutally murdered 12-year-old Polly Klaas on October 1, 1993.

Born in San Francisco, Davis was the third of five children. His father was a truck driver and his mother was reportedly a brutal disciplinarian, holding Davis' hand over a flaming stove burner until it blistered when she caught him lying or smoking. His parents separated when he was six and a short time later, Davis took to carrying a knife and threatening his classmates. He began stealing from mailboxes and burglarizing homes by the time he was twelve.

Moving to La Honda, south of San Francisco, with his father, Davis proved to be incorrigible. After many arrests, he was told by a judge that he would either be placed in a reform school or he could join the army. Davis joined the army, but was dishonorably discharged within thirteen months. He returned to La Honda and committed a string of burglaries before he was arrested and sent to jail for six months. He moved to San Francisco and was caught burglarizing a high school. He was sent to prison for between six months and fifteen years, being released in 1976.

Two months later, Davis abducted Frances Mays, a 26-year-old legal secretary, dragging her into his car after she alighted from a Bay Area Rapid Transit train, and driving to a remote area, threatening her with a kitchen knife. He tried to rape Mays, but she fought him off, slipped from the car and ran to the roadway, where she flagged down the first car to appear, one fortunately driven by off-duty police officer Jim Wentz, who drew his gun and handcuffed Davis on the spot.

Following this arrest, Davis began relating a tale that he would use as an excuse for every heinous crime he would thereafter commit, that he heard a voice ordering him to rape Mays. While awaiting trial in the Mays abduction, Davis reportedly tried to hang himself, but this was seen as a ploy to have himself adjudged insane. It apparently worked, since Davis, a crafty, cunning criminal, was next sent to the Napa State Hospital for psychiatric examination. This is exactly what Davis wanted, to be incarcerated in a minimum security area; he promptly escaped on December 16, 1976.

Davis immediately went on a crime spree. He broke through a window of a Napa, California, home and found 32-year-old Margerie Arlington asleep in bed. He tried to kill her by smashing a poker down on her head, but she screamed and he fled. Two days later, he drove into a Napa parking lot and abducted a woman by pointing a shotgun at her. She managed to escape when Davis stopped to make a phone call. Davis then drove to San Mateo, where he broke into a house and was tying up the occupants, when police arrived and arrested him. He plea-bargained a six-year sentence, serving every day of it.

Released in 1982, Davis took up with barfly Susan Edwards, a married mother of two children, after meeting her in a La Honda saloon. The two embarked upon a crime spree that took them from Northern California through the Pacific Northwest. They held up stores, restaurants and banks as they went along. In Redwood City, the pair abducted Selina Varich, a former roommate of Edwards' sister. Holding a gun on her, the pair forced Varich to withdraw $6,000 from her bank account. They fled and remained on the run until they were stopped by a traffic cop in Modesto, California, four months later for having a defective taillight on their pickup truck. Charged with kidnaping Varich, Edwards served a six-month sentence and Davis was sentenced to sixteen years. Because of good behavior, he served only half of that, released after eight years.

On the street in July 1993, Davis lived in San Mateo, at a homeless shelter called Turning Point. On September 23, 1993, he asked and got permission to visit his sister Darlene's family in Ukiah, California, about 100 miles north of San Francisco. A week later, on October 1, 1993, Davis made his way to Petaluma, a quiet town of 45,000 persons where his mother lived. Somehow, he found the home of Polly Klaas.

At about 10:30 p.m., the heavily bearded Davis slipped through a window of the Klaas home. Polly and two friends were inside the room having a slumber party. Her mother, Eve Nichol, and younger half-sister, Annie, were sleeping in another room. Davis asked which girl lived in the house and, learning that it was Polly, tied up the other two girls and forced Polly through the window. The girl was missing for almost two months while a desperate search ensued. Her parents appeared on television and pleaded with her abductor to return the 12-year-old safely home.

Davis, if he heard those pleas, was unconcerned. He had already savagely attacked the girl and then murdered her. Wanted for parole violation, Davis was picked up at his sister's home in Ukiah on November 29, 1993. During routine questioning, he suddenly confessed to the kidnaping and murder of Polly Klaas. But once he appeared in court the cunning Davis changed his story. He pleaded innocent to the charges of murder, kidnaping, burglary, robbery and performing a lewd act upon a child. He knew that a murder conviction coupled with any of the other charges would make him eligible for the death penalty. It was because of Davis' killing of Polly Klaas that California passed the Three Strikes law, to prevent felons like Davis from being released back into society, three-time convicted felons receiving mandatory twenty-five years to life. Fourteen other states would follow suit.

At his trial in San Jose, California, Davis played to the gallery, smirking, smiling, laughing as the gory details of his crime were revealed. He swaggered and strutted in and out of the courtroom and made it apparent that he wanted to strike the pose of evil incarnate. He succeeded. Perhaps no other vicious felon so captured the public's loathing than Richard Allen Davis. "Despicable scum ... dregs of the earth ... a slithering, slathering poisonous snake," were some of the descriptions given to him.

Richard Allen Davis, recidivist California burglar who kidnapped and murdered 12-year-old Polly Klaas in 1993; the repulsive child-killer slandered his victim's father when being sentenced to death.

Davis did not take the stand on his own behalf, but his lawyer argued that he was high on drugs when he abducted Polly and that he drove around blindly with her in the front seat, deciding to kill her only to avoid going back to prison. He admitted to strangling the little girl. A videotape of his confession was played for jurors, one that showed him blandly admitting his guilt and showing no remorse, no compassion for his victim.

On June 18, 1996, six men and six women found him guilty on all counts, which made him eligible for the death penalty. Upon hearing the verdict, Davis defiantly lifted the middle fingers of both hands, and later the index and end fingers of both hands—typical obscene gestures from this moral imbecile and dedicated degenerate.

On September 26, 1996, Davis was brought before Santa Clara County Superior Court Judge Thomas Hastings for sentencing. The arrogant Davis was asked if he had anything to say. He said the reason he had not sexually assaulted the girl was because of "a statement the young girl made to me while [I was] walking her up the embankment: "Just don't do me like my Dad.'" Those in the courtroom collectively gasped. Then one of Marc Klaas' friends shouted at the defendant, "Burn in hell, Davis!"

Marc Klaas leaped forward, trying to get at Davis, but he was restrained. There had never been one remark made by the defense or prosecution, nor any history whatsoever, that Marc Klaas ever abused his daughter. Davis' slanderous remark was undoubtedly planned long in advance with snakelike guile. He knew from his many years in prison that child molesters do not do well in prison populations; that many married convicts with children attack such inmates, even kill them. In attempting to shift the accusation of assaulting his victim to the victim's father, he would appear to be innocent of such a reprehensible crime and avoid the wrath of other convicts.

Judge Hastings then sentenced Davis to death, later commenting that the convicted murderer's statements had made his decision "easy." Marc Klaas, who had set up a foundation for children in 1994, and who was the driving force in seeking the death penalty for Davis, stated that if he had had a gun at the time he was seated in the courtroom behind the arrogant Davis, he would have shot his child's killer to death. "I can't even tell you the depth of my hatred for that individual," Klaas said. "It's as deep as my love for my child ... The last thing Polly saw before she died was Richard Allen Davis' eyes. The last thing Richard Allen Davis will see is my eyes, I hope."

OTHER NOTABLE 20TH CENTURY BURGLARIES AND BURGLARS

American burglar "Chicago May" Churchill, who looted the American Express office in Paris of $100,000 in 1901.

April 26, 1901: American thieves "Chicago May" Churchill, Eddie Guerin and accomplices burglarized the offices of the American Express in Paris, France, taking away more than $100,000 in cash and checks. Churchill and Guerin, who were lovers and notorious burglars, were apprehended and, on June 14, 1902, Guerin was sentenced to life imprisonment. May Churchill received a five-year prison sentence. Following her release, she was deported from France.

June 23, 1906: Henry S. Cochrane, who had been the chief weighing clerk at the U.S. Mint in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and who had, in 1893, burglarized between $50,000 and $130,000 in gold bars from the mint by carrying the bars in specially made pockets of his coat (he later melted down the bars and sold off ingots) died in Philadelphia at age eighty. When apprehended by A. L. Drummond, head of the then Secret Service, the elderly Cochrane, who was sent to prison for seven years, explained that he had stolen the gold bars in order "to buy gifts for some pretty shopgirls."

May 25, 1908: Invaluable church relics were burglarized from the Limoges Cathedral in Paris, France, and were never retrieved.

November 11, 1909: William Butler, a notorious British burglar, who had looted countless homes, hammered to death elderly Charles Thomas and his wife Mary, while burglarizing their home in Bassaleg, near Newport, Monmouthshire, England, taking only £3. Butler overlooked the couple's life savings of £150, for which he had been searching. He was arrested and convicted for this burglary-murder and later executed by hanging in February 1910.

August 21, 1911: Charles Arthur, thirty-one, who was described in the London press as an "English desperado," and who had reportedly committed countless burglaries of mansions in London, was sentenced to life imprisonment. He had been apprehended after constables interrupted him during a burglary. Arthur, who foolishly conducted his own defense in court, had fired two shots at officers running toward him, injuring no one since his aim was deflected by a woman beating him with her handbag.

January 29, 1918: Charles "The Ox" Reiser, the most notorious safecracker in the American Midwest, broke into Chicago's Western Dairy Company with burglars (later notorious bootleg gangsters) Charles Dion O'Banion, George "Bugs" Moran, and Earl "Hymie" Weiss, blowing up the safe and taking more than $2,000 in cash. Reiser had, according to police estimates, burglarized more than 1,000 business offices since 1903. In 1921, Reiser, recovering in a hospital from wounds received in a shootout with police following a botched Chicago burglary, was shot ten times in his hospital bed, allegedly by his estranged wife, but his death was inexplicably ruled a suicide. Reiser, while hospitalized, had a broken right arm and a broken left hand, as a result of his fracas with the police in his failed burglary, injuries that made it impossible for him to fire ten bullets into his own body. His widow, however received his $100,000 estate.

Harvey Bailey, who later known as the "King of the Bankrobbers," was arrested for bank burglary on March 23, 1920.

January 18, 1919: The infamous La Villette burglary gang broke into the Bank of Blache & Gravereau, in Paris, France, blowing open the safe to find only 510 francs. Bank officials, who had been tipped that there might be just such a burglary, had recently removed almost all of the institution's cash to another location.

March 23, 1920: Harvey Bailey, who had been burglarizing small banks throughout the U.S. Southwest for a decade (and who later became known as the "King of the Bankrobbers"), was arrested for burglarizing a bank in Omaha, Nebraska. He received a short prison sentence and, upon his release, later joined many notorious bank-robbing gangs, including the infamous Barker gang.

November 26, 1924: Joseph "Doc" Stacher, who would rise to prominence in the U.S. crime syndicate two decades later, was arrested for burglarizing a store in Manhattan, New York. Through his already powerful political connections, Stacher was released when charges were promptly dropped.

July 28, 1928: Pochetti Attilie and Suput Branco burglarized the Vanderbilt home in Paris, France, taking jewelry valued at more than 1,000,000 francs. These two master burglars would loot the Paris mansion of the Heidelbach family of jewels valued at 300,000 francs on September 14, 1928.

October 28, 1930: Willie "The Actor" Sutton, who would become one of America's most notorious bank robbers, burglarized with Marcus Bassett more than $30,000 in gems from M. Rosenthal & Sons Jewelers in Manhattan, New York. Bassett was later caught and imprisoned, but the elusive Sutton remained at large.

October 17, 1938: Burglars thwarted by a safe's tear-gas device in a Calder, Wisconsin, office, stole gas masks from a nearby firehouse, then returned to finish blowing up the safe, retrieving $400 in cash and $2,800 in nontransferable stock.

August 5, 1940: Greenfield Tap & Die Corp., in New York City, was burglarized of $75,000 worth of drills used in the manufacture of airplanes.

January 26, 1942: Charles Beverly Grayson, a porter working in the FBI headquarters in New York City, reportedly burglarized the offices, taking expensive camera equipment used for surveillance by Bureau agents.

October 19, 1944: Joseph Stepka and Stanley Patrek were indicted for burglarizing a huge safe and the $9,000 it contained (they could not open the safe so they dragged it to a truck to open it later at their hideout) from the Whitestone Savings and Loan Association in Flushing (Queens), New York.

February 10, 1947: Jewelry worth an estimated $435,000 was reportedly burglarized from the Paris hotel room of Lucienne Benitez Rexach.

October 20, 1951: Burglars took more than $230,000 in jewels and furs from the Jewel and Fur Shop in Chicago's Congress Hotel, a concern owned and operated by Mrs. Pearl Lowenberg Robinson. The valuables were never retrieved.

May 18, 1953: Clyde B. Hamblin and Frederick Hamblin, prisoners at the jail in Burlington, Vermont, were charged with several burglary offenses committed while they were still behind bars. They reportedly escaped from their cells on repeated occasions to burglarize dozens of local stores before returning unseen to their cells by morning.

August 10, 1958: Burglars smashed display windows (thought to be shatterproof) at Tiffany's on Fifth Avenue in New York City, taking with them more than $163,000 in insured jewels. The gems were never recovered.

September 21, 1963: French police broke into the Paris home of Nikola Franusic, and recovered more than $2 million in rare books that Franusic, a Yugoslavian house painter, had burglarized more than thirty years earlier.

December 31, 1971: The uppercrust Hotel Pierre in New York City, was burglarized of gems held in its safe that were reportedly worth $5 million. The burglars were not apprehended.

December 2, 1973: Carl Dixon, Louis Mathis and Anthony B. Vaglica burglarized Harvard University's Fogg Museum, making off with antique coins valued at $5 million. The burglars were apprehended later while attempting to fence the coins.

April 26, 1974: Bridget Rose Dugdale and four others burglarized nineteen paintings worth a total of $19.2 million from the London home of millionaire, Sir Alfred Beit. Dugdale was apprehended and imprisoned for nine years. The paintings were recovered intact.

October 20, 1974: Six burglars blew through a wall of Chicago's Purolator Company and burglarized $4.3 million in cash. They were caught while trying to escape to Latin America and most of the money was recovered.

Actor Donald Sutherland is shown in a scene from the 1976 film, Fellini's Casanova; burglars stole the negative of this film on August 14, 1975.

August 14, 1975: The negatives of Federico Fellini's Casanova and other films in production were burglarized from the refrigerated vaults of the Technicolor Company in Rome, Italy.

January 28, 1976: Burglarizing terrorists blew open vaults in the British Bank of the Middle East in Bab Idriss, Lebanon, taking between $20 million and $50 million. The money was never recovered.

April 14, 1976: Burglars involved in the largest hotel theft to date, in which approximately $6 million worth of gems were taken from safe deposit boxes in the Palm Towers Hotel, Palm Beach, Florida, have never been caught.

May 27, 1977: Approximately 7,000 watches worth a total of $1 million were burglarized from a warehouse in Queens, New York.

September 6, 1980: Gerald Shallow, a former Chicago police sergeant, received a fifteen-year prison sentence, for burglarizing $2 million worth of gold and jewelry from the Donald Bruce Company of Chicago, Illinois.

July 9, 1982: Michael Fagan attempted to burglarize Buckingham Palace in London, England. He broke into Queen Elizabeth's bedroom and encountered Elizabeth II, who talked with him until guards arrived to take Fagan into custody. He was sent to an insane asylum for life.

April 29, 1984: Burglars escaped with $3 million in jewelry from a vault in the Diamond Tower Exchange in Manhattan, New York.

August 14, 1987: Judy Amar, who burgled a string of Florida mansions, taking between $3 million and $6 million in property over five years, was convicted and sentenced to prison.

February 24, 1989: Margaret Ray, thirty-six, an obsessed fan of TV host David Letterman, was arrested for a fourth time in New Canaan, Connecticut, for breaking into Letterman's home, charged with burglary. She was ordered to seek psychiatric care.

July 6, 1989: The London mansion of Prince Jefri, the brother of the world's then richest man, the Sultan of Brunei, was reportedly burgled of $6 million in cash and jewelry.

January 7, 1990: Howard Prink shot and killed Billy Yahnson, an unarmed 15-year-old boy, who was burglarizing his Portland, Oregon home. Over a storm of public protest, Prink was not charged under Oregon law, which allowed the use of deadly force against an intruder in certain circumstances.

January 12, 1990: Burglars stole five paintings estimated to be worth £1,000,000 from 13th Century Dunsany Castle in Ireland.

April 14, 1991: Burglars stole twenty paintings estimated to be worth $500 million (£280 million) from the Van Gogh Museum in Amsterdam, Netherlands. The paintings were found intact inside of an abandoned car near the museum only thirty-five minutes later. This short-lived burglary was considered to be the largest art theft on record to date.

May 6, 1993: Three young burglars broke into the home of Phillip Huber, chief of police for Miami Beach, Florida. They were driven off (and later apprehended) by shots fired by Chief Huber, who had been awakened by the noise the burglars created. Burglars had recently plagued homes of influential citizens in the Miami area. Burglars had invaded the home of Jeb Bush, son of U.S. President George Bush and brother of later U.S. President George W. Bush, who himself later became the governor of Florida. Also targeted by burglars at this time was the home of Miami Mayor Xavier Suarez, whose house had been invaded several times.

September 24, 1993: Long-time fugitive Katherine Ann Power, who had pleaded guilty to bank robbery and manslaughter in a 1970 bank robbery in which a police officer was killed, pleaded guilty in a Boston, Massachusetts, court to the burglary of a National Guard armory from which she took automatic weapons to be employed in the crimes she committed.

Pablo Picasso (shown shortly before his death in 1973); his painting "Tete," valued at $650,000, was burglarized from a Chicago art gallery and later recovered.

January 3, 1994: A painting by Pablo Picasso entitled "Tete" and valued at $650,000 was burglarized from the Richard Gray Gallery in Chicago, Illinois. The painting was later recovered intact in the back seat of a car. Two men were later charged with the burglary.

November 14, 1994: A burglar breaking into a home in Combined Locks, Wisconsin, was interrupted by the owner, who chased the overweight invader to his car, tackling him and holding him for police. The intruder was 54-year-old David E. Spanbauer, who had been burglarizing homes in northern Wisconsin since 1960, and had served several prison sentences for burglary and rape. He later confessed to the murders of three young girls and was given three life terms.

August 3, 1997: Long-time burglar Larry Harris, who had invaded and looted the same tavern in Aurora, Illinois, three times earlier in one month, ignored warning signs from the owner, who had newly installed a 220-volt security system, breaking once more into the place and being electrocuted to death.

July 30, 1998: A 10-year-old girl, who had earlier been arrested several times on charge of burglary, was again arrested and charged with burglarizing two homes on the same night in Mt. Clemens, Michigan. "You just look at her," said a local police officer. "She seems like a cute, adorable little girl, but she has been a terror around here for the past couple of months."

September 28, 1998: Yehudi Mishali, a 46-year-old Israeli citizen, was charged with burglarizing a safe deposit box at a Michigan Avenue bank in Chicago, Illinois, taking more than $500,000 in diamonds.

CHAPTER FOUR: CANNIBALISM

Since the beginning of recorded time, man has been a flesh-eater. The belief that in the earliest times he preyed upon and killed his own species and consumed such remains was supported by the 1927 discovery of Pekin Man, near Choukoutien, China. Anthropologists examining this 500,000-year relic, also found other humanoid skulls that had been split open and the brains extracted, leading them to conclude that earliest man was, indeed, a cannibal. Evidence exists to also prove that such homo sapiens as the Neanderthal Man and the Cro-Magnon Man, commonly practiced cannibalism, hunting tribal enemies as they would any other animal, killing and eating them to survive.

As civilization developed, tribes in remote areas of the world remained primitive. Isolated tribes on the myriad islands of the South Pacific and in Africa continued to practice cannibalism into the 20th Century. These unenlightened people killed and ate their enemies not only for food, but—in keeping with their dark myths and superstitions—consumed, digested and excreted such "food" to display and exalt in their victory over an enemy, as well as absorb that enemy's power, talents and skills. Some cannibal tribes routinely ate their elders, instead of burying them at death, believing that by physically consuming the remains they would themselves gain the wisdom and knowledge stored in the bodies of their aged tribal members.

The Aztecs and Incas of South and Latin America, to propitiate their gods, offered human sacrifices, coupling cannibalism to these gruesome rites. Aztec priests consumed portions of the human body, such as the heart, to enhance their own communicative powers with their blood-lusting deities, or so they believed. More than 15,000 such victims were slain and eaten each year. Cannibalism was practiced in Ireland, according to Greek historian Strabo and, as late as the 4th Century, St. Jerome recorded widespread cannibalism in Scotland and ten centuries later another Scot, the notorious Sawney Bean, along with his enormous family, continued the practice.

An Aztec priest performs a human sacrifice to his ancient gods; the heart was removed and eaten to appease blood-lusting deities.

When Australia was first colonized, the dregs of England, convicted felons, were often sent to this remote British dominion to serve out their lives at hard labor. Penal colonies were established along the Australian coast and on many neighboring islands. Alexander Pierce, one of the convicts serving a life sentence at an island penal colony, escaped in a small boat with five other prisoners. Arriving at the mainland, the escaped felons hid in the hills, but soon ran out of food. One of the convicts killed another to obtain food and the rest of his companions joined with him in feasting on the slain man. The five remaining convicts turned to murder and cannibalism to survive, killing and consuming each other, until only Pierce remained alive.

Pierce was recaptured and returned to prison, but escaped once again, this time with another prisoner named Cox. Tracking lawmen found Cox's body a short time later. It had been dismembered and parts of the body were missing. A few days later the constables captured Pierce and found him carrying human flesh, which he had been consuming. Oddly, they also found animal meat and fish that Pierce had obtained, but had not eaten. Before being sent back to prison to serve out his time, he admitted that he preferred the taste of human flesh to any other kind of food. He was by then a confirmed cannibal and had to be prevented from attacking other prisoners to obtain their flesh.

In 1837, nine bushrangers living near Port Phillip, got lost in the wilds and, starving, turned to cannibalism. Seven of the men were killed and eaten by the two survivors named Cornerford and Dignum. When Cornerford realized that Dignum was about to turn him into his next meal, he fled to Melbourne, where he informed on Dignum, detailing the murders committed by his fellow flesh-eaters. Dignum was soon captured and both men were tried, Cornerford being hanged and Dignum sent to prison for life.

In the American pioneer days of the 19th Century, stranded travelers near starvation compelled those desperate to survive to resort to cannibalism. This was the case with the California-bound Donner Party of 1846, trapped in the snowbound Sierras. One of their members, Lewis Keseberg, forever damned in the eyes of his peers, preserved his life by eating the bodies of those who had perished. This was the same reason why pioneer guide Alferd Packer cannibalized persons in his care in 1874, or so he later said, but it was suspected that Packer preferred to devour human flesh, even when other game was available.

Another mountain man of that era, John Johnson (or Johnston), known to his peers as "Liver-eating Johnson," conducted a personal war with the Crow Indian tribe throughout the 1870s, killing his avowed enemies, scalping them and then cutting out their livers and eating them, but his cannibalism was sustained by vengeance, not hunger. In that same decade in Corsica, Carlotta Lopez, a midwife, who was barren herself, sought vengeance for her inability to give birth by delivering the babies of others, which she secretly suffocated upon delivery, then claimed the child was stillborn, later removing these little corpses, which she reportedly butchered and ate. She was executed as a witch in 1879.

As late as 1972, cannibalism was practiced by a group of desperate survivors stranded in the Andes Mountains. A Uruguayan passenger plane carrying 45 persons en route to Chile crashed into the side of a snow-capped mountain. A search for the missing plane was conducted and then called off, leaving twenty-seven survivors to find a way back to civilization. As starvation set in, they reluctantly began to cannibalize the frozen dead among the wreckage.

Salvaging human remains, two of the passengers, Nando Parrado and Roberto Canessa, decided to locate a distant village they thought might be over several mountain ranges. They plodded over the snow-covered peaks for ten days, using plane cushions for snowshoes, eating human flesh to sustain them. On December 10, 1972, they reached a small village, where they were given a normal meal. A Chilean helicopter was then directed to the site of the crash and picked up the survivors. Only sixteen persons remained alive, all shamefacedly admitting that they had survived the terrible ordeal by feeding on the dead flesh of their fellow passengers.

Joyous survivors of plane crash in the Andes Mountains in 1972, arrive at a village; sixteen out of forty-five persons stayed alive by cannibalizing the dead.

Desperation had nothing to do with three German cannibals of the early 1920s. These heinous criminals—Fritz Haarmann, George Grossmann and Karl Denke—sought to enrich themselves during Germany's great depression, when food, especially meat, was scarce. They murdered scores of persons, butchered their bodies and sold the remains as animal meat, partaking in the purloined flesh themselves. A decade earlier, in Barcelona, Spain, a self-styled witch named Marti Enriqueta, abducted, murdered and cannibalized several small children, boiling what was left of their remains to make "love potions," which, according to one report, she sold at exorbitant prices to wealthy, lovesick matrons. Enriqueta was executed in 1912.

Later in the 20th Century, isolated but chilling cases of cannibalism emerged, depicting the savage careers of Hamilton Albert Fish, Ed Gein, Edmund Emil Kemper III, Joachim Kroll and perhaps the worst of the lot, Jeffrey Lionel Dahmer in America and Andrei Romanovich Chikatilo of the Soviet Union, both degenerative products of the profligate 1980s. All of these were demented if not insane killers who took a perverted sexual pleasure in their murders that climaxed with the consumption of human flesh (anthropophagy, necrophagia, parthenophagy).

For the most part, the aberrant behavior of these murderous cannibals could be traced to unnatural events in their childhoods or early adolescence. A single or several traumatic experiences may have altered their personalities, transforming them into human monsters feeding on their own species (or symbolically on themselves). German killer Alfred Kaser was tried in Munich, Germany in 1965 and given a life sentence for slaying 9-year-old Arthur Konig, wherein he drank his victim's blood and nibbled on his flesh. Kaser claimed that his miserable childhood had twisted his mind and prompted his horrible acts.

A long-haired, bearded California hippie was another such person. On July 13, 1970, a patrolman stopped 23-year-old Stanley Dean Baker next to a damaged sports car near Lucia, California, cuffing him. The car, a 1969 Opel Kadett, had been reported stolen at Yellowstone National Park in Montana. En route to the Monterey Police Station, Baker remarked to the policeman: "I have a problem. I am a cannibal." He withdrew some bones from his pocket, showing them to the officer and saying: "These aren't chicken bones. They're human fingers." He went on to say that he had developed an insatiable craving to eat human flesh ever since he had undergone electric shock treatment for a nervous disorder when he was seventeen.

Baker had bummed a ride with trusting Peter Schlosser, a 22-year-old employee of the Mussel Shell County Welfare Department at Roundup. Schlosser planned to camp at Yellowstone, but found all available sites taken, so he drove to the Yellowstone River, camping that night with Baker. When Schlosser fell asleep, Baker shot him dead, firing two bullets into his head. He then repeatedly stabbed him with a hunting knife, using this to cut up the body into six parts. He severed the head, arms and legs, then cut out the heart, he admitted later, and ate. He cut off the fingers and pocketed these grisly items to "munch on later."

Baker then drove off with Schlosser's car. When arrested, he was found to be carrying a handbook for devil-worshipers entitled The Satanic Bible. The murdering cannibal, who claimed to have taken 65 doses of LSD before killing and slaughtering Schlosser, stated at his trial that he was not responsible for his gruesome crime, because he had endured a tortured childhood and was "high on acid," at the time of his crime. He was sentenced to life imprisonment in Montana, but was paroled in 1985.

Baker was not merely a symptom of his despicable breed but its grim epitome.

Like his predecessors centuries earlier, Baker had turned away from human society, placing a gap between himself and the rest of humanity. This same grim perspective was held and nurtured by the worst cannibal in early Western culture, Sawney Bean of Scotland, who carnivorously viewed other human beings as a separate species, the way a butcher looks upon his chickens and pigs, simply as food.

SCOTLAND'S MAN-EATER/1435

Sawney Bean (or Beane; AKA: Cunningham, Sandy) was born in East Lothian, near Edinburgh, to poor parents. He grew up despising the hard work his father performed as a ditch-digger. A petty thief by the time he was a teenager, Bean seduced a young girl, but refused to marry her. The girl's parents brought charges and Bean fled with the girl to the wilds of the Scottish coast, settling in an enormous cave near Galloway. He fathered eight sons and six daughters and they, in incestuous turn, fathered eighteen grandsons and fourteen granddaughters, forty-eight of the clan living in the caverns along the rocky coastline.

The Bean clan preyed on strangers traveling the roads for decades, killing them for their belongings. These crimes did not come to the attention of the authorities since Bean family members dragged away the corpses of their victims and cannibalized them, leaving no evidence. Though scores of travelers vanished, search parties found no trace of the missing people.

Then, in 1435, Bean and several of his family members attacked a man and woman traveling on the main road toward Edinburgh. They overtook the couple's cart and attacked the pair, knocking them senseless with clubs. Just as they were disemboweling the woman, a large group of cavalrymen thundered down the road and interrupted the blood-soaked cannibals. (The woman was dead and already butchered, but her husband was rescued by the troopers.)

There was a pitched battle and the Beans were finally driven off, but not pursued. The captain of the king's guard feared that he and his men would be overwhelmed by the sheer numbers of the cannibals, who were growing in number on a distant hill and preparing a counterattack. The cavalrymen dashed off to make a shocking report to King James I. The king was told in detail how the cavalrymen had come upon the savages, who had already butchered the woman and were feeding on her bloody entrails as wolves might feed upon a fallen doe.

Scottish cannibal Sawney Bean is shown an an old print; at left is the body of a recent victim and in the background Bean's wife is carrying dismembered human parts into the clan's cave.

King James, hearing that the flesh-eating clan numbered in the dozens, mustered an army of more than 400 men, infantry and cavalry. The king personally led this contingent into the foul-smelling Galloway caverns, where his troops, men dressed in heavy armor and wielding broad swords, subdued the fierce Bean family, but only at the cost of twenty soldiers.

Edinburgh's Tolbooth Prison, where Bean family members were confined in chains, until the cannibals were horribly executed.

The caverns were huge and stretched on for some distance, offering their own fresh water supply in the form of small pools. In each cavern the soldiers found more members of the clan—half-naked, crouching human beings, who fought like wild animals before they were bound and dragged from the caverns. Also found were mounds of clothing, jewelry, implements, parts of carts and carriages—the loot of many lifetimes—taken from the Bean victims.

To their horror, the soldiers also found scores of bodies, or pieces of bodies, cured like hams or strung up like sides of beef, male and female, adult and child. The main cave was a giant butcher shop where human cadavers had been dismembered, smoked, salted, and hung out to dry in preparation for the next meal. There was no exact way of learning the number of victims claimed by the Bean family. The remains found and buried by the king's troops amounted to scores of victims, but since the clan had been operating for several decades, various estimates of its victims soared into the hundreds if not thousands.

King James ordered the entire clan brought back to Tolbooth Prison in Edinburgh in chains. They were then removed to Leith. Once there, Bean and his family members were summarily sentenced to death for their countless murders and cannibalism. There was no need of a trial, according to one contemporary account: "It being thought needless to try creatures, who were even professed enemies to mankind."

Thousands watched as the Bean family members were led into the main square. Here the males were butchered as they had butchered, having their genitals, hands, and feet cut off. They were allowed to bleed to death in front of their women. Then three great fires were started and the women were thrown alive into the roaring blazes to perish in screaming agony. "They all, in general, died without the least sign of repentance," wrote one chronicler of that day, "but continued cursing and vending the most dreadful imprecations to the very last gasp of life."

"THERE WERE PLENTY OF CORPSES"/ 1846-1847

Lewis Keseberg was one of ninety settlers who joined the Donner Party in its cross-country trek to California. A phlegmatic, reserved man, Keseberg would later be seen as an inhuman monster, who fed upon the flesh of his fellow travelers to survive a brutal winter that starved half of the party to death. Other survivors resorted like Keseberg to cannibalism, but they dutifully waited for their companions to die before butchering and consuming their remains. Keseberg went beyond such measures, later accused and tried for murdering his fellow settlers to acquire their bodies for food.

On April 14, 1846, between eighty to ninety immigrant settlers departed Springfield, Illinois, believing that happiness awaited them in California. They entrusted their well-being to wagon-train leaders George and Jacob Donner and James Reed. The California Gold Rush was three years away. It was the lure of rich, fertile land as far as the eye could see, not gold, that motivated these intrepid farmers to risk everything in seeking a new life in a promised land.

Luck was at first with the pioneers. The Donner party safely negotiated its way through Indian territory. Except for one instance of thieving, and a skirmish near Scott's Bluff, Utah, the Sioux, Pawnee, and Snake Indians generally left them alone. Near the Humboldt River in Nevada, however, James Reed murdered John Snyder over a dispute concerning the mistreatment of a team of oxen. Reed was banished from the expedition and told to make his way to California on his own. He was one of the lucky ones.

Members of the Donner Party are shown struggling through the snow-bound regions of the Sierra Mountains en route to California in 1846-1847; dozens died of starvation, their bodies eaten by survivors.

By the time the Donner party arrived at Truckee Lake in the High Sierras, on October 28, 1846, the winter snows had set in, blocking the passes. Provisions were low, game was scarce, and 62-year-old George Donner feared what he saw in the skies. The party appropriated a few abandoned shacks and settled in for the winter, hoping for a miracle. But the hunting parties returned empty-handed, forcing the men to slaughter the cattle, the horses, and finally the dogs to survive.

On December 16, 1846, C.T. Stanton, a poet and expert woodsman, and sixteen others left camp to cross the summit, with the hope of bringing relief to the party. On the third day out, however, Stanton, gone snowblind, collapsed in a drift. Without food for days, he lit his pipe, wrote a poem to his mother, and died. On December 27, 1846, the surviving members of the scouting party, engulfed by a tornado of snow and, half-delirious from having starved for days, were forced to eat their companions' remains. Four men in the scouting party had died and their bodies now offered the living the only means of survival.

"With averted eyes and trembling hand, pieces of flesh were severed from the inanimate forms and laid upon the coals," an eyewitness wrote. "It was the very refinement of torture to taste such food, yet those who tasted lived. Each of the four bodies was divested of its flesh, and the flesh was dried. Although no person partook of kindred flesh, sights were often witnessed that were blood-curdling." Sarah Foster watched horrified as the heart of her dead brother, Lemuel, was cut out and "thrust through a stick and broiled upon the coals."

The party had two Indian guides, Lewis and Salvador. Both refused to eat human remains. They moved off a bit from those cannibalizing the dead, camping at a distance from the others, vigilant with watchful eyes. They ate their moccasins, then fled before dawn, thinking they would be the next victims. They were.

Starving and staggering after the Indians were the members of the dwindling scouting party. They came upon the exhausted Indians, who had fallen with bloody feet in the snow. Two men and five women were staring down at them. William Foster, who had earlier eaten Jay Fosdick's flesh to stay alive, leaned over the barely breathing Indians, who had stayed alive without food for nine days, and apologized.

"I am compelled to take your lives," he was later quoted as saying to the fallen Indians. "Forgive me." He then shot both young men in the head, stripped their flesh and moved off with the rest of the party. Thirty-two days after leaving the Donner camp at Truckee Lake, seven surviving members of the scouting party staggered into an Indian camp, where they were reunited with the exiled James Reed.

The five female survivors implored Reed to return to Truckee Lake (now Donner's Pass) with provisions. On February 19, 1847, Reed and a rescue party led by Captain John A. Sutter broke through the pass to find skeletons strewn about the camp, the party having cannibalized the remains of their fallen comrades. By the time a second rescue party had arrived, suspicion of murder fell upon Lewis Keseberg, a German immigrant from Westphalia who had joined the Donner party at Alder Creek. His wife and children had left with the party Stanton led, but Keseberg remained behind.

One by one the remaining members of the party at Truckee Lake died. Keseberg and forty-one others were found alive at the main camp. Tamsen Donner, having stayed behind to care for her dying husband, one of the leaders of the expedition, had also died and Keseberg was accused of murdering her. "Before my God, I swear this is untrue!" he said in 1879. "Do you think a man would be such a miscreant, such a damnable fiend, such a caricature on humanity as to kill this lone woman? There were plenty of corpses lying around ... "

Keseberg, it was later learned, had become a sort of storekeeper for the unburied dead. Five corpses were housed with him in a small cabin. "Their stark and ghastly bodies lay there day and night," said Keseberg, "seemingly gazing at me with their glazed and staring eyes. I was too weak to move them had I tried ... I endured a thousand deaths. To have one's suffering prolonged inch by inch, to be deserted, forsaken, hopeless; to see that loathsome food ever before my eyes, was almost too much for human endurance."

Lewis Keseberg, the only member of the Donner Party who was accused of murdering those he cannibalized in order to stay alive; he was acquitted and released, but was forever stimatized.

Overcoming his revulsion at cannibalizing his companions, Keseberg had remained inside his cabin, living off the flesh of his comrades. "It was either that or death," he testified at his later trial. During those long nights when the wolves scratched at his door, he considered suicide, he later claimed.

When rescued, Keseberg was accused of robbery and murder by other survivors. He had not only murdered living members of the party to obtain and eat their flesh, survivors insisted, but had robbed the dead of their valuables and belongings. Captain W. O. Fallon, who led one of the rescue parties, later testified that he found such valuables on Keseberg's person and demanded that he turn over the money he had allegedly taken from the dead.

Bound by ropes and treated as a murdering cannibal, Keseberg was led over the mountains and was tried in a small California hamlet. Fallon testified that when he entered Keseberg's cabin he found "two kettles of human blood, in all supposed to be one gallon." Fallon said that Keseberg had been eating the blood as soup.

Had he been found guilty of the charges leveled against him, Keseberg would have been hanged. He nevertheless passionately pleaded for his life, saying he had murdered no one and stolen nothing, that before dying many of the settlers asked him to hold their valuables and give them to their surviving relatives, which he said he had promised to do. He fully admitted at having turned cannibal to survive, but this conduct almost drove him to suicide. "Many times I had the muzzle of my pistol in my mouth and my finger on the trigger," he said, "but the faces of my helpless, dependent wife and child, would rise up before me, and my hand would fall powerless."

Mrs. Keseberg and one of her three daughters had accompanied the disaster-bound scouting party and had died and were cannibalized during the trek of the survivors to reach civilization. Keseberg's two surviving daughters had been reduced to babbling idiots, living out their pathetic lives in insane asylums, becoming permanently unbalanced after their own participation in eating human flesh at the main camp. Weighing all the evidence, a court ruled that Keseberg was innocent of murder and robbery and he was released. The horrible images connected to the grim fate of the Donner Party remained with him throughout his miserable life. Everywhere he went, little boys shouted: "Stone him! Stone him!" as they showered him with rocks.

Of the original Donner party, forty-eight survived, and forty-two had died. The skeletal remains of the deceased—picked clean to the bone—were gathered up by rescue parties, comingled and placed in boxes, then buried in a common grave, near Lake Truckee, which is now a rather posh resort town, where the rich and famous frolic and cavort.

LIVER-EATING JOHNSON/1840s-1870S

John Johnson (or Johnston; AKA: Liver-Eating Johnson, Crow-Killer, 1820-1900) was a trapper and hunter who roamed the Rocky Mountains at a time when few white men dared enter these Indian-dominated regions. Moving from Missouri to Montana as early as 1843, he hunted deer, bear and buffalo and was considered by his lonely peers—the mountain men—to be the greatest hunter of his day.

Early in his trapping career, Johnson married an Indian woman (tribe unknown) and had a child. He built a cabin in the high mountains where he lived with his little family. Returning from a hunt one day, he found his wife and small son killed and scalped, finding evidence that the culprits had been Crow Indians. From that day forward, Johnson became an ardent foe of not only the Crows, but every Indian in the West.

John Johnson (shown in old age), who waged war against Indians, killing them by the scores and eating their livers.

Johnson, in his hunting expeditions, went out of his way to kill every Indian, particularly Crows, he could track down. He reportedly killed more than 300 warriors of this tribe, but reportedly killed many Blackfeet, Cheyenne, Nez Perce, Sioux and Utes. One Easterner who hired Johnson to take him into the hills to hunt bear witnessed Johnson creep up on a Crow camp and attack it single-handedly, wounding several Indians and killing two. He then casually butchered the two corpses and ate their livers, thus earning the sobriquet "Liver-Eating Johnson."

At the beginning of the Civil War, Johnson volunteered for service with the Union army, but he was later dismissed, according to one report, for murdering Indians allied with the Yankees. Moving from Missouri to Montana in 1870, Johnson resumed his career as a mountain man. He maintained a cabin near Rock Creek, near Red Lodge, Montana, a site used by William "Buffalo Bill" Cody as a camp for his buffalo hunting expeditions. Cody grew rich guiding European royalty and wealthy businessmen from the East to this land of plentiful game, but the actual guide for most of these hunting expeditions was Johnson, who knew every high mountain meadow, where deer, bear and buffalo were to be found and shot for "sport."

Johnson nevertheless maintained his private war with the Crows and other Indians. He hunted them as he would a furtive stag and would spend days tracking Indians to their camps, waiting more days for them to leave in small numbers so that he could attack and kill them, usually one by one. He dismembered the bodies and always ate the livers, leaving these mutilated corpses for their horrified companions to find as a sign of his continued victories over his sworn enemies and to send fear into their hearts.

The Crows came to fear and respect Johnson. He became for them a fierce symbol to be overcome and about their campfires they related legends of his bloody feats. For almost forty years, Johnson stalked this tribe and others, and the Crows, in turn, stalked him. To have killed Johnson would have elevated any Crow warrior to chiefdom. The Crows hunted him in pairs and in small groups—no more than four or five in order to uphold their Indian code of fairness.

Their quarry was too wise and wary for them. He was always waiting, entrapping and killing them. On one occasion, he reportedly took on a band of six Crows, all top warriors, killing all in hand-to-hand combat, then cannibalizing their bodies and stringing up the remains from tree branches so that their tribesmen (and their ancient gods) could see them humiliated and disgraced in death. He had been wounded by the Crows in this fight, as he had on many such earlier occasions, but he mended his injuries and nurtured his strength so that he could attack again and again.

A large man who stood more than six feet tall and weighed 200 pounds, Johnson was a keen-eyed marksman and an agile runner. He was also an expert knife-thrower, and he served for some years as an Indian scout for the U.S. Cavalry under General Nelson Miles. In 1880, he left the high mountains, going to Coulson, Montana, a rough-and-tumble town of mountain men and miners, where he was appointed the local sheriff. Johnson carried a rifle around town, never a six-gun. He always settled disputes with his fists and he later proudly stated that he never had to shoot a man to keep the peace. His firmly entrenched image as the Great Crow Killer was often enough to keep law and order.

Robert Redford plays a fierce mountain man in the 1972 film, Jeremiah Johnson, depicting the life of Johnson's savage revenge upon the Crow Indians, but gave no hint of the real Johnson's cannibalism.

Offered princely sums to appear in Buffalo Bill Cody's Wild West shows, Johnson refused to travel to the East, stating that "civilization will kill you faster than God's great outdoors." Johnson maintained law and order for several years in Coulson before moving back into the high mountains. Liver-eating Johnson, according to one report, died of natural causes on January 21, 1900. His incredible and violent life, greatly sanitized for the viewing audience, was profiled in the 1972 film, Jeremiah Johnson, starring Robert Redford.

"I HAD GROWN FOND OF HUMAN FLESH"/ 1873-1874

Like Lewis Keseberg thirty years earlier, Alferd G. Packer (Alfred; AKA: John Schwartze, 1847-1907) became notorious for turning cannibal when an expedition he was guiding became lost and the food ran out. To survive, Packer and others killed their fellow travelers to survive on their flesh, until only Packer remained alive. It took ten years to bring him to trial on charges of murder and cannibalism. One other charge should have been added to the indictments, that of fraud, for Alferd Packer was no pioneering pathfinder at all. In fact, he had been hired as an experienced guide, but he had no idea how and where to take the novice miners to their desired destination.

Packer was born in rural Colorado and received minor education as a child. He grew up crude and rough-hewn, with no thought of humanity and very little inclination toward civilized behavior. As a prospector, he lived in the hills, surviving on the meat of animals and, at one point, survived on the meat of men.

In the early 1870s, a prospector struck it rich in the wilderness of the San Juan Mountains outside of Salt Lake City, Utah. A horde of silver-seeking novices flooded Salt Lake City, all bent on digging their fortunes out of the mountains. Few of them knew how to construct a mine, let alone locate veins of silver once the mining had begun. Hardly any of these eastern "greenhorns" even knew which part of the mountain range to prospect.

Nineteen of these flabby-armed, clean-shaven tenderfeet set off toward the San Juan Mountains with a single guide, Alferd Packer, in fall 1873. While encountering this group in a Salt Lake City boarding house, Packer, his face bearded and his body clothed in buckskin, convinced these naive silver-seekers that he was one of the most experienced guides in the West. He boasted that he knew every crag and cranny of the San Juan range that stretched into Colorado, and, most importantly, he knew where the thick veins of silver glinted in the sun—or so he bragged. The miners gladly gave him a large sum of money to guide them to their expected riches.

When entering the Colorado mountains, the expedition became lost. Worse, the miners were beset with an early winter that brought freezing weather and heavy snowstorms. This proved to be one of the worst and coldest winters in Colorado. Game went to ground, and other than what the prospectors carried on their backs, there was nothing to eat. Packer, who had claimed to be a hunter, found no game, and when the food ran out, the prospecting party grew desperate, deciding to return to Salt Lake City before they either froze or starved to death.

Packer promised his clients that he would lead them back to civilization, but he had no idea where he was or where he should take his party. He was lucky enough to stumble into the camp of a friendly Indian tribe led by Chief Ouray. The chief fed the party and kept them warm for days in his lodgings, but he warned the prospectors that if they did not return to Salt Lake City, all of them would perish in the desolate white wilderness. After a council meeting, ten men in the party elected to return to civilization.

Alferd Packer, shown in 1873 when he posed as a pioneer guide and shortly before he began cannibalizing his clients.

Alferd Packer was not one of them. A loud-mouth and braggart, Packer laughed at the men quitting the expedition, saying that they were giving up a fortune that was not far away, that silver in gleaming chunks could be found along the Gunnison River. He was adamant in not leading the ten men back to Salt Lake City. They must push on to fortune, he cried out. He made no mention that he was broke and that the grubstake the prospectors had given him was all that he possessed. Nothing in Salt Lake City awaited him but a bevy of angry creditors.

Chief Ouray argued with Packer, but the kindly Indian finally gave in and agreed to supply the guide and the ten men still determined to plunge forward into the icy wilderness. Ouray cautioned the party to stay close to the Gunnison River, telling them that if they went into the mountains, the only thing they would find would be frozen death. Packer poohpoohed these dire statements saying that, if need be, the party could always take refuge in the Los Pinos Indian Agency, located near the river.

Actually, Alferd G. Packer had heard about the Los Pinos Indian Agency, but he had no idea where the agency could be found. Following Packer, the party marched out into a blinding snowstorm and within a few weeks provisions had run out. The group fell to arguing, and four men said they would strike out for the Indian agency. Packer refused to guide them, saying that they were fools, that silver was waiting for them just over the next range of mountains.

The four men left, and after days of stumbling about in the high snow drifts and through severe storms, two of the men finally staggered into the agency. Packer led the other five men—Miller, Noon, Humphreys, Swan, and Bell by name—into the frozen regions where they found a deserted trapper's cabin. Here the men cooked and ate their last meal, then went to sleep. They realized they were about to die of starvation and cold. When the party was asleep, Packer stood up and reached for his rifle. Quickly, he went from one sleeping form to the other, firing a single shot into each man's head.

Miller, hearing the shots, according to later evidence, jumped up and tried to defend himself, but Packer was on him in an instant, smashing the butt of his rifle down so hard on Miller's head that he split his victim's skull and broke the stock of his weapon. He rifled the pockets of the dead prospectors and collected several thousand dollars. Packer apparently intended to carry out the crime first, but now he was faced with death by starvation. He contemplated his problem for hours, or so he later claimed, and then he decided that his victims would serve to keep him alive.

He fell upon the dead men with a large hunting knife, slicing away the flesh about the breast and stripping the flesh from the rib cages. He took these gory pieces of human remains to a snowbank and froze them. The next day, he packed the flesh in his shoulder packs and departed. For two weeks, Packer struggled against the deep snow, eating the human remains to keep up his strength. He reached the Los Pinos Agency in February 1874 and still had some strips of "human beef jerkey," as it was later described.

The cannibal, once he spotted the buildings of the agency, grew nervous at carrying about the remains of his victims. He later stated: "When I espied the agency from the top of the hill, I threw away the strips of flesh I had left, and I confess that I did so reluctantly, as I had grown fond of human flesh, especially that portion around the breast."

Once inside a warm cabin at the agency, Packer sat down among startled residents, who gaped at his mottled flesh, his popped eyes, his bloated face. His clothes hung on him in rags and his limbs were blue from the intense cold. Warm food was brought to him, but Packer could not swallow it. He drank only liquor and remained drunk for some time.

General Adams, the commander at the agency, knew Packer had led an expedition into the mountains to look for silver. He asked the so-called guide where his party was located. Packer gave him evasive answers, saying that the men wandered off and froze to death. When Packer began spending lavishly, buying expensive items at the agency, getting drunk, and tipping extravagantly, the general grew suspicious and ordered Packer's arrest.

On April 4, 1874, two of Chief Ouray's Indians found the strips of human flesh Packer had discarded near the agency. Packer was charged with murdering the very men he had been hired to protect, but the crafty Packer claimed innocence. He told General Adams that he only participated in the cannibalism begun by others to stay alive. He told a fantastic story of how he came upon four of the men after they had killed Swan, the oldest in their ranks, and were carving his body for food. They also split Swan's money, which was how Packer came to have his pockets full of cash, or so he claimed.

Alferd Packer in 1883, when he was convicted of murder and cannibalism.

The four then attacked each other, killing and eating the flesh of the victims until, Packer insisted, he and Bell were the only survivors. When Bell attacked him, he defended himself and was forced to kill Bell. He was then forced to use Bell's corpse for food. This was the tale told by Alferd Packer. General Adams ordered Packer to take lawman H. Lauter and a small party to the cabin where the murders and cannibalism had taken place.

Packer quickly agreed, but after the party groped about in the wilderness for several weeks, it was evident to Lauter that Packer had no intention of taking him to the murder cabin. When Packer tried to lose the small party in a woods, Lauter arrested him and sent him back to the agency. Lauter and others went on, and two weeks later, discovered the cabin and the mutilated corpses. When Lauter found that each man had been shot in the head, he realized Packer's tale was a complete fabrication and that the guide was not only a cannibal but a mass murderer.

When he returned to the agency with his discoveries, however, Lauter found that Packer had been allowed freedom within the agency and had simply walked away, escaping. For almost ten years, authorities searched for the missing Packer who seemed to have utterly vanished. Then, on March 12, 1883, one of the men who had been part of the original prospecting group spotted a man on a Salt Lake City street and walked up to him. "You're Alferd Packer," the man gasped.

"I am not," Packer said angrily. "I am John Schwartze. Who is Alferd Packer?"

As Packer began to walk away, the man called a policeman standing nearby and Packer was arrested and taken to Lake City, Colorado, where, on April 3, 1883, he was placed on trial for cannibalism and murder. Packer sat in the witness chair and cried out that he was innocent, that he had killed only in self-defense and that to stay alive he had eaten the human flesh of the man who had tried to murder him. He asked jury members that, if in his position, would they not do the same? The jury did not agree, and Packer was found guilty and sentenced to be executed.

Packer appealed while lawyers unearthed a loophole in the law. The newly-created Colorado constitution had no provision for the fate of convicted murderers. After many legal delays, Packer was granted a new trial in 1885. His lawyers got the charge reduced to manslaughter. He was again found guilty, but he received a forty-year sentence instead of death. (Added to the gruesome Packer legend passed down over the years was an unforgettable remark from Judge Melville Gerry, who colorfully admonished Packer at his sentencing: "They was sivvin Demmycrats in Hinsdale County, and ye et five of 'em, God damn ye!")

A model inmate in the state prison, Packer was released in 1901 after serving sixteen years. He moved to a ranch near Denver, Colorado, where he worked as a cowboy. He died in the bunkhouse on April 24, 1907, after having consumed a large amount of chicken, eating mostly the white meat from the breast, or so it was jocularly related.

THREE GERMAN CANNIBALS/1918-1925

Following World War I, defeated Germany was in economic ruin. Its business and industry had come to a near halt. Joblessness and poverty were rampant and the rates of inflation soared so high that a wheelbarrow of banknotes barely bought a loaf of bread. Meat, when it was available, sold well, nonetheless. Accessing fresh meat, however, was difficult to impossible. Herds of cattle and other farm animals had been slaughtered in record numbers to feed Germany's troops and following the war, only rural areas where farmers hoarded their dwindling stock, could fresh meat be obtained.

The demand for fresh meat, particularly in large cities, was widespread and riots often broke out at markets, where fresh meat was in short supply. In a Berlin neighborhood, however, fresh meat was routinely provided by a butcher named George Grossmann, his delicious wares avidly sought by satisfied customers. Grossmann, unlike his competitors, seemed to have no difficulty in obtaining meat for his patrons, who were willing to pay almost any price for his fresh cuts.

The source of Grossmann's product, however, was learned in shock and horror by tenants in his Berlin rooming house one night in late 1921. Hearing sounds of a struggle coming from one of the rooms, boarders called police. Officers entered Grossmann's room to find the butcher standing over the body of a plump young woman. He did not resist arrest. Police inspecting his kitchen found the remains of several bodies in various stages of being cured and dressed.

In jail, Grossmann quickly confessed to having picked up many young women, preferably plump, at Berlin's railroad station. He took them back to his room, he said, offering to shelter these homeless females and promising them work. Some of his victims—perhaps as many as fifty over a three-year period (1918-1921)—were prostitutes. After taking a victim to his room, he gave the unwitting victim a large meal of human flesh.

Grossmann then killed and dismembered his guest, slicing the body "into pleasing cuts of meat," which he then sold to his neighbors. He admitted that his own meals were made up of such horrid fare. The killer-cannibal was sentenced to death, but cheated the headsman (beheading was the then form of execution in Germany) by committing suicide in his cell.

In the same famine-stricken year, 1918, when Grossmann embarked upon his gruesome meat business, another fellow German greedily duplicated his grisly acts. Carl Denke, the landlord of a public house in Munsterberg, Silesia was, like Cannibal and butcher George Grossmann selected his victims among these homeless women shown sleeping in Berlin's train station after World War I.

Carl Denke cannibalized more than thirty persons in the early 1920s, he preyed upon German streetwalkers like those shown in this photo.

Grossmann, unaffected by the economic turmoil all around him. Also like Grossmann. Denke often provided free shelter for an army of homeless tramps, who passed through the city. By all appearances, he was a God-fearing, law-abiding man who played the organ in the local church on Sundays. Denke, like Grossmann, was also a cannibal.

Denke was accused of murdering at least thirty people between 1921 and 1924, and devouring parts of the corpses. He preserved some of the remains in a tub of brine, and kept a ledger of names and the dates the vagrants checked into his rooming house. The ghastly nature of his crimes was discovered on December 21, 1924, when a coachman, who lived one floor above heard pitiful cries. He rushed downstairs and found a robust young man bleeding profusely from the scalp.

The young man, one of Denke's boarders, had been struck with a hatchet. Before he lapsed into unconsciousness, he gasped that Denke had assaulted him from behind. Police were summoned and during a search of the premises the vats of bones and pickled flesh were discovered. Denke was taken to the jail, but he, like Grossmann before him in 1921, evaded the headsman, using his suspenders to hang himself.

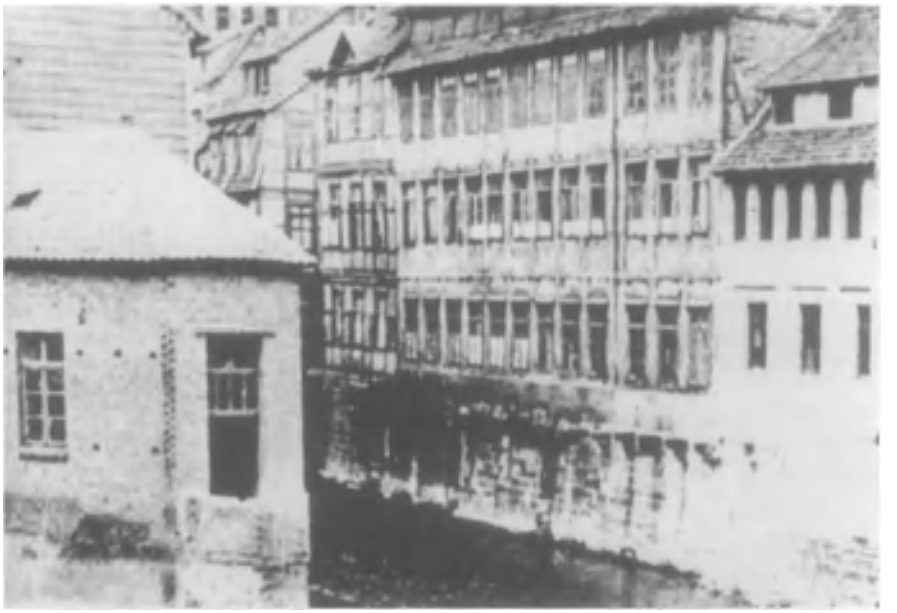
Fritz Haarmann (AKA: Ogre of Hanover, 1879-1925), the third and most enterprising cannibal in Germany during this grim era, was, unlike Grossmann and Denke, a hardened criminal. He did not prey upon women as had Grossmann, or young men as had Denke, but stalked innocent young boys to sexually molest and then murder them, cannibalizing parts of their bodies. Like Grossmann, he made money by selling off human body parts he himself did not consume as fresh meat to unsuspecting customers.

Haarmann was born in Hanover, Germany, on October 25, 1879. As a child he eschewed active games in favor of playing with dolls and dressing in his sisters' clothing. He spent some time as a teenager at a military school, but was discharged when he showed signs of epilepsy. After a brief stint working in his father's cigar factory, Haarmann was arrested for sexually assaulting small children and was sent to a mental institution. He escaped from the institution and joined the army, but was eventually released as an undesirable.

Returning to Hanover, Haarmann was repeatedly arrested on charges of burglary and fraud. He nevertheless secured a position as a police informer, a job which gave him a small salary and a police badge. At the end of World War I, large numbers of young boys poured into Hanover, hunting for work. They slept wherever they could, many camping out in the train station. It was here that Haarmann found most of his victims. Beginning in 1918, Haarmann, often with the help of his homosexual lover, Hans Grans, started the chain of rapes, cannibalism, and murder that earned him the title of the "Ogre of Hanover" or "Vampire of Hanover."

Often using his police badge to intimidate the young boys, Haarmann took them to his apartment at 27 Cellarstrasse, in Hanover's Jewish ghetto, where he sexually assaulted and then killed them, as he later testified at his trial, by biting their throats. His atrocities did not stop with the rapes and murders. After murdering a victim, he took the body to an attic room

Fritz Haarmann killed, butchered and ate scores of young street boys in the early 1920s, also selling their flesh as meat at Hanover's black markets.



Haarmann's home in Hanover (far bank, third building from right); he occupied the top floor and attic, and from these windows he routinely threw into the River Leine the bones and other remains of his victims that he could not sell in the city's open meat markets.

where he butchered it. Any clothing or belongings of the victim were sold. Bones, skulls, and other unusable portions were thrown into the nearby river Leine.

Haarmann then transported the "edible" portions of the butchered flesh in buckets to the open market in Hanover where he sold it as "horse meat" to Hanover's starving citizens. Haarmann, with his corrupt police contacts, easily sold these human remains in the many black markets thriving in Hanover (as they did throughout Germany in the early postwar years).

So confident was Haarmann that his position as a paid police informer would protect any of his blatant crimes, that he enticed the son of a neighbor to his apartment. The parents knew that their son, 17-year-old Friedel Rothe—had befriended "detective" Haarmann and directed officers to Haarmann's apartment to search for the boy. Police lamely searched Haarmann's room and quickly left after finding nothing. Rothe, however, had already been killed and dismembered by Haarmann, who later grimly joked at his trial that the boy's decapitated head was wrapped in newspaper and hidden behind his stove at the time police were searching his place.

On one occasion, Haarmann made the mistake of bringing a boy back to his room without knowing that the youth had parents living nearby. When the boy was discovered missing, the parents notified police, who trailed the boy to Haarmann's room. They interrupted Haarmann as he was sexually assaulting the boy and, at the insistence of the boy's parents, reluctantly arrested their paid informer. Haarmann received a nine-month prison sentence, but this did not alter his perverse course when he was released.

When released in September 1919, Haarmann took up a new residence in a third-floor apartment on the Neuestrasse in Hanover. The heavyset Haarmann, whose coarse moon face was usually unshaven, was not attractive to other homosexuals, other than his elegantly-dressed young lover, Hans Grans, a homosexual queen. Grans was a pimp and petty thief, who first met Haarmann at the Café Kropcke, a meeting place for homosexuals and perverts of all kinds, as well as professional criminals.

Grans, it was later learned, encouraged Haarmann to seduce young boys and even rob and murder them, but, by his own later claim, did not participate in the actual crimes, but merely and perversely observed these offenses. He had no knowledge of Haarmann's cannibalism or the selling of human flesh—or so he insisted at his trial—these acts committed by his lover when he was not present. One boy was murdered by Haarmann simply because Grans, who received half of anything Haarmann took from his victims, wanted the youth's trousers.

The murders committed by Haarmann, as well as his eating the flesh of his victims, was enacted in paroxysms of erotic frenzy, as gruesome extensions to his sexual perversion. This, at least, is what Haarmann himself later explained. He had not killed out of greed, although he kept and sold whatever meager belongings he gleaned from the pockets of his victims, he said. He had been driven to his crimes by his own compelling sexual urgings, he claimed.

Haarmann's long career as a killer and cannibal was nearly interrupted several times. On one occasion, some of Haarmann's blackmarket meat was taken to the police by a buyer, who told officers that it was the flesh from a human being. An analyst examined the meat and announced that it was pork. On another occasion, a man who boarded in the same house as Haarmann passed him on the stairs to see a cover fall from a pot he was carrying, revealing blood. Since Haarmann was known to be peddling blackmarket meat, however, the discovery of this gore was forgotten.

On May 17, 1924, some boys fishing in the Leine River found several human skulls and police investigated. The next month, on June 22, 1924, a homeless boy who had been sleeping at the train station told police that Haarmann had taken indecent liberties with him. He pointed out to officers a man who was at that moment prowling among rows of sleeping boys. Haarmann was taken to a police station and while being questioned, police searched his apartment and found incontrovertible evidence of his guilt, a blood-stained attic room he used to butcher his victims. Haarmann confessed to the murders and implicated his lover, Hans Grans, as his accomplice. (In a fit of homosexual pique, Haarmann had years earlier reported Grans as a child molester and killer of boys to police, but his claim was dismissed when investigators learned that Grans was at the time in jail for petty theft.)

The skeletal remains dredged from the river and surrounding area accounted for twenty-seven victims. When asked how many boys he had killed, Haarmann cavalierly responded, "It might have been thirty. It might have been forty. I don't remember." Estimates ranged as high as one hundred. Haarmann and Grans were tried at the Hanover Assizes, beginning on December 4, 1924.

While Grans remained quiet and withdrawn throughout the fourteen-day trial, Haarmann smoked cigars, complained that too many women were in the courtroom, and acted bored. Of the twenty-seven murders with which he was charged, Haarmann denied only three, in one case disdainfully claiming that one of the boys was not sufficiently attractive to have merited his interest.

The father of a missing youngster came forward in court to show a photo of his missing son, Hermann Wolf, claiming that Haarmann had murdered the boy. The cannibal killer grew indignant when looking at the boy's photo, saying to the court that he had been "selective" in choosing his victims, that he would never have picked up just anyone.

"I have my tastes, after all," carped Haarmaan to the father. "Such an ugly creature as, according to his photographs, your son must have been, I would never have taken to. You say that your boy had not even a shirt to his name, and his socks were tied on his feet with a string. Pfui Deibel! You ought to have been ashamed to have let him go about like that! Poor stuff like him there's plenty. Just think what you are saying. Such a youngster was much beneath my notice."

Haarmann was finally convicted of the murders of twenty-four boys and young men ranging in age from thirteen to twenty, and he was sentenced to death by decapitation. The announcement of his impending death excited the cannibal. Newsmen covering his sensational trial noted how his body quivered at the news of his own death and his blurting response: "I want to be executed on the market place [where he had illegally sold his human flesh] On my tombstone must be put this inscription: 'Here lies mass-murderer Haarmann.' On my birthday, Hans Grans must come and lay a wreath on it." Grans was unmoved by this remark. He was also convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment, a sentence later reduced to twelve years (he disappeared upon his release).

Before his execution, Haarmann told guards that he wanted to "pass one merry evening in the condemned cell" with his lover Grans, this request denied. His last meal consisted, at his request, of nothing more than coffee, hard cheese and a cigar. Before going to the headsman, Haarmann told the prison warden that he would curse his father with his last breath and regard his execution "as my wedding."

Haarmann, under heavy guard, is shown en route to his 1925 execution; he was beheaded.

Haarmann was beheaded in Hanover Prison on April 15, 1925. Writer William Bolitho aptly profiled this monster in writing that: "His is the sum of all their guilt [referencing serial killers]. This man was the chief murderer, the worst man, the last of the human race."

"IT WILL BE THE SUPREME THRILL"/1936

Everything bizarre, perverse and degenerate captured and doomed the being of Hamilton Albert Howard Fish (AKA: Robert Hayden, Frank Howard, John W. Pell, Thomas A. Sprague, 1870-1936). He was a self-admitted child molester, murderer and cannibal. Fish preyed upon children, seeking, some said, murderous revenge for his own tormented childhood. He later claimed to have molested more than 400 children in a span of twenty years. He was a sneaky child killer who, according to a psychiatrist examining him before his execution, "lived a life of unparalleled perversity. There was no known perversion that he did not practice and practice frequently."

Albert Fish, who had been a murderous cannibal for most of his adult life, is shown at the time of his apprehension in 1936.

Born to respectable parents, Fish's mother placed him in a Washington, D.C., orphanage at the age of five, after his father died. Fish blamed his later heinous crimes on his years in the orphanage, where sadistic cruelty was inflicted upon children. "Misery leads to crime," Fish later stated. "I saw so many boys whipped it ruined my mind." His disturbed mind, as studied introspectively by Dr. Frederick Wertham and other noted psychiatrists, may have been developed through a hereditary warp. Several of Fish's relatives had suffered mental problems and two judged hopelessly aberrant, being confined for life in insane asylums.

Until he was eleven, Fish routinely wet his bed in the orphanage and, every Saturday night, fled the institution, only to be caught the next day. He graduated high school at age fifteen, but nothing in that experience gladdened him. He was a thin and frail child, ridiculed for his emaciated looks and his grandiose first name of Hamilton, causing his peers to call him "Ham and Eggs," a sobriquet that caused him to abandon that name, using the name of Albert thereafter.

Fish married in 1898 and the union produced three children (some accounts report six offspring). For many years he lived a normal life, working hard as a house decorator and painter. But Fish's mind seemed to snap in 1917, when his wife, who was nine years his junior, ran away with a half-witted lover, John Straube. Fish had taken his children to a movie and, upon returning home, he found the place stripped of the furniture and his wife gone.

Grace Budd, shown at right with her mother, older sister and little brother, was abducted, murdered and cannibalized by Albert Fish in 1928.

The brazen Mrs. Fish returned with Straube in tow some time later, asking to stay with Fish. He told her she could return to the family, but Straube had to depart. Mrs. Fish ordered her bumbling lover to leave. Then Fish later found Straube hiding in the attic of the Fish house weeks later. Mrs. Fish had smuggled him into the attic during the night. Straube stayed in the attic for weeks while Mrs. Fish smuggled him food and visited him nocturnally for sexual bouts. When Fish discovered Straube in the attic he forever banished his wife and her dim-witted lover from the house.

The family never saw Mrs. Fish again. Fish himself began to act strangely a short time later. He took his family to a small cottage in Westchester County, New York, and there practiced bizarre rites, climbing to the top of a hill at night and baying at the moon: "I am Christ! I am Christ!" He made meals that consisted of raw meat, serving this to his children and saying: "That's the way I like my meat and you'll have to eat it that way, too." He ran around at night naked and howled at the moon, antics that later earned him the press sobriquet, "The Moon Maniac."

Fish's cottage in White Plains, New York, where he killed 12-year-old Grace Budd and several other victims.

Fish took to beating himself and then encouraged his own children and their friends to paddle his bare buttocks until his flesh bled. Fish made a paddle studded with inch-and-a-half nails. His perplexed son, Albert Fish, Jr., discovered this device and asked his father why he had constructed such an instrument. "I use them on myself," Fish blurted to the boy. "I get certain feelings over me. When I do, I've got to torture myself." He burned himself with white hot pokers, needles, and irons. He married three more times, but these unions quickly dissolved when these spouses learned that Fish was a masochist, who demanded that they whip and beat him.

For many years Fish collected articles on cannibalism and became obsessed with flesh-eating, carrying these writings with him until the clippings yellowed and finally crumbled to dust. During this time, Fish was involved in several postal swindles and spent three months in jail for practicing a confidence game in the mails. He was then examined by psychiatrists but released as a "harmless" old man suffering from a "severe guilt conscience."

White Plains police and neighbors inspect items found on Fish's property that later led to the identification of several victims.

Fish was later examined at Bellevue Asylum in New York but was again released as a nonviolent masochist. He was known by authorities to practice self-flagellation, burning of his own flesh, coprophilia, and other self-punishing acts such as inserting small needles beneath his flesh.

An avid reader of the lovelorn columns, Fish answered scores of ads from lonely widows. Forty-six of these letters were later recovered and submitted as evidence at Fish's murder trial, but the prosecution refused to read from them, so filled with vile obscenities were they. Fish informed these lonely women that he was not at all interested in marriage. He merely wanted them to paddle and punish him. He got no offers. It is not certain when Albert Fish embarked on murder as a way of satisfying his dark inner longings. He later confessed to murdering a man in Wilmington, Delaware, in 1910. He also said that he had murdered and mutilated a boy in New York in 1919 and that same year he murdered another boy on a houseboat in the Georgetown area of Washington, D.C.

By the late 1920s, Fish avidly sought children to attack and, by his own later admission, he molested and murdered 4-year-old William Gaffney on February 11, 1927. On March 3, 1928, Fish abducted and murdered 12-year-old Grace Budd, the crime for which he paid with his life in Sing Sing's electric chair. Using the name Frank Howard, the killer had ingratiated himself to the Budd family.

After several visits to the Budds in Manhattan, Fish convinced the naive Budd family members that he was a kindly old gentleman, who merely enjoyed brief visits with their several children, bringing them small bags of candy. Fish also brought presents for the children—inexpensive toys—and when he suggested that he take 12-year-old Grace to a children's party, Mrs. Budd allowed Fish to take the girl. It was the last time the Budds saw their little girl alive.

The trusting Grace Budd left her home with Fish on June 3, 1928, taking a train with him to White Plains, New York. Between them on the seat was a box in which Fish kept what he later described as his "instruments of hell." The box contained a butcher knife, a cleaver, and a saw. The old man and Grace got off the train, but Grace quickly went back aboard and then returned with the box that Fish had forgotten.

The pair walked the long distance to the Fish cottage where Fish took all his clothes off. The girl screamed: "I'll tell Mama!" Fish jumped forward and strangled Grace. He then decapitated her and sawed her body in half. In a later confession, so grisly and gruesome in detail that it caused listeners to retch, Fish happily recounted how he carved up the girl's body and made a stew out of her remains, which he ate, living on this human flesh for several days.

The Budds reported their daughter's disappearance, but she was nowhere to be found and nor was Fish, the kindly old man who had taken her away. For six years, the agonizing Budd family continued to believe that Grace had somehow survived and was alive. Then, in 1934, for inexplicable reasons, Fish sat down and wrote a letter to the Budds, telling them that he had murdered their daughter. He took great pains to point out that he had not sexually molested her before killing her. It was about this time that Fish, walking down a street in Fort Richmond, Long Island, spotted 5-year-old Francis McDonnell playing outside his home. He picked up the boy and carried him away, taking him to his home, which he called Wisteria (or Wistaria) Cottage in White Plains, where he strangled the boy.

By then detectives had traced the letter Fish had sent to the Budd family and they found the old man shortly after he had killed the McDonnell boy. One puzzled detective asked Fish why he had risked revealing himself by writing the letter. The killer became defensive. He told detectives that he had kept Albert Fish at the time he went to trial for the murder of Grace Budd; he denied nothing, struggling to remember all of his victims.

Fish is shown covering his face as he is escorted from a courtroom after hearing that he will be executed for murdering Grace Budd; he killed fifteen persons, mostly children, in twenty years.

Albert Fish (second from left, handcuffed to another prisoner) enters New York's Sing Sing Prison, where he looked forward to his 1936 electrocution, saying that it "will be the supreme thrill."

track of police activity on "the case in the papers. If they had accused someone else I would have come forward. My best days are over." Fish was brought before the Budds and they identified him as the man who called himself Frank Howard and who had taken their daughter away with him. The area around Fish's Wisteria Cottage was then dug up and Grace Budd's skeletal remains were found.

Placed on trial, Fish's attorneys pled the cannibal killer not guilty by reason of insanity, but the prosecution provided a small army of psychiatrists who testified that he was sane. After a prolonged trial, Fish was found guilty and sentenced to death for the cannibal killing of Grace Budd (The total number of killings attributed to Fish varies, from four to fifteen.)

Fish was sent to Sing Sing, handcuffed to another killer named Stone. Ironically, both Fish and Stone had had forefathers who had fought in the American Revolution. While awaiting execution, Fish delightedly told newsmen and prison officials that he was ecstatic at the prospect of being electrocuted in Sing Sing's electric chair. "What a thrill that will be if I have to die in the electric chair," Fish said with a broad smile. "It will be the supreme thrill. The only one I haven't tried."

On January 16, 1936, Fish walked without help into Sing Sing's execution room and sat down almost eagerly in the electric chair. He eagerly helped the executioner affix the electrodes on his legs. The enthusiasm Fish displayed toward his own painful death shocked the reporters who were present to witness his execution. Fish, the oldest prisoner ever to be electrocuted in Sing Sing, smiled happily as the electrodes were applied to his head.

When the switch was pulled, a massive jolt of 3,000 volts coursed through Fish's body. A blue cloud of smoke rose from the top of the old man's head as he let out a guttural laugh. He did not die. Thanks to the hundreds of tiny needles he had inserted in his body over the years, the metal in the old man's abused body reportedly short-circuited the electric chair. Another prolonged charge of electricity had to be sent through his body before Albert Fish was finally pronounced dead.

The cannibal's last statement had been given to one of his defense attorneys only an hour before Albert Fish encountered his "supreme thrill." Reporters begged the attorney to release the statement, but the lawyer grimly shook his head, saying: "I shall never show it to anyone. It was the most filthy string of obscenities that I have ever read."

THE CANNIBAL IN THE FARMHOUSE/1950s

One of the most horrendous killer-cannibals in American history, a ghastly ghoul who hunted through the stark and remote countrysides of Wisconsin for victims in the 1950s, was Edward Theodore Gein (1906-1984). He was a strange little man, who lived in an isolated farmhouse in central Wisconsin and was the grisly role model for Alfred Hitchcock's classic horror movie, Psycho and its movie sequels. The contents of that back county farmhouse, when revealed by authorities in 1957, would shock America to its social roots.

Born on August 8, 1906, at La Crosse, Wisconsin, Gein moved with his family to a small farm near Plainfield when he was but an infant. His father worked the farm and also held several jobs to support the family as a tanner and carpenter. He was a taciturn man who said little and listened always to the dictates of his wife. Gein and his brother Henry were wholly dominated by their mother, a strong-willed matriarch, who repeatedly warned her sons against the wiles and ways of scheming women. She warned them—with dire descriptions of venereal diseases—that "free and easy sex" would bring prolonged physical pain and premature death.

Gein's father died in 1940, reportedly from exhaustion from overworking his 160-acre farm. Henry Gein died in 1944, while waging a battle with a raging forest fire. Mrs. Gein suffered a stroke when hearing the news of Henry's death, but she recovered. The following year, 1945, another stroke claimed her life. Ed Gein was left alone at the age of forty-one.

A short time after his mother's death, Gein's mind reportedly began to take strange twists. He sealed off his mother's upstairs bedroom by nailing the door and windows shut, as well as the parlor where Mrs. Gein had regularly sat by a large window, crocheting. Apparently, Gein was driven to rid himself of any memories of his mother. He confined himself to a single bedroom and the kitchen of the farmhouse on the main floor. By shutting himself off from the two rooms most often occupied by his mother, Gein sought to obscure if not eliminate any haunting visions of her stern image.

The farm was no longer productive, but this was the very reason why Gein received enough income and time to indulge his dark fantasies. He had little work to do, living from the considerable funds he received through the federal soil conservation program. He occasionally picked up side money by performing handyman jobs for farm neighbors and the residents of nearby Plainfield, a town of no more than 700 souls.

Gein visited the local public library in Plainfield and began to take out books and periodicals dealing with human anatomy, studying these tracts in his kitchen farmhouse for hours. He had little recreation and no friends, except for a dim-witted farming neighbor named Gus, who visited Gein periodically, sitting with him in his kitchen—a blank expression glued to his face and saying nothing for hours.

Some time in 1947, Ed Gein began to visit three of the local cemeteries in the area, nocturnal visits wherein he dug up graves and removed recently interned female corpses. He took these decomposed bodies to his farmhouse. On some occasions he merely severed limbs and heads and removed these grim artifacts to his home. In two or more instances, he actually brought back bodies to their graves and reburied them, or what was left of them after he had conducted his "experiments."

Gein's friend, Gus, accompanied him on some of these early graveyard raids and helped the ghoul to cart bodies back to the Gein farm. It is uncertain if this simpleminded man ever knew the purpose of these night excursions or Gein's use of the bodies once they were stored in a shed behind Gein's farm. Gus, however, was removed to a retirement home, where he died a short time later, leaving Gein to continue his laborious cemetery chores alone.

When the shed was fairly packed with cadavers, Gein began to remove one body after another. He would study each for hours, then carefully dissect the corpse, following the notes and illustrations from the anatomical books he had obtained. These crude operations, however, had nothing to do with the advancement of medical science. They led, instead, to wild aberrant behavior, where Gein would skin the corpses and wear the skins about as though they were shawls or scarves. He fondled female organs for hours and later admitted that wearing and caressing these gruesome remains gave him inexplicable thrills.

The little farmer butchered the cadavers with care, keeping several heads, sex organs, livers, hearts and intestines, before discarding human parts that held no interest for him. It was also later reported that to while away his time, Gein boiled down human skulls to use them as decorations, mounting some on his bedposts and using skull caps as bowls. He allegedly employed noses, lips and labia to fashion mobiles he positioned about the kitchen and even used human skin to fashion lampshades, wastecans and coverlets for chairs.

Wisconsin graveyard ghoul and cannibal, Ed Gein (at right), in custody, charged with murder in 1957; the film Psycho was based on his life.

Gein's remote farmhouse outside of Plainfield, Wisconsin; dismembered bodies and human remains were found in the shed, kitchen and bedroom.

Mrs. Bernice Worden, Gein's last victim; he shot her, then dismembered her body and cannibalized the remains at his farmhouse.

Gein grew tired of having to dig up graves alone and quit this pursuit, deciding it was much easier and less physically demanding to murder women and take their bodies to his farmhouse for more "experiments." His first victim was 51-year-old Mary Hogan, who operated a tavern in Pine Grove, Wisconsin. On the night of December 8, 1954, Gein, according to his later statements, waited until all of Hogan's patrons left the remote bar. He then walked calmly inside to hear Hogan tell him that she was closing.

Gein said nothing as he walked around the bar to Hogan's side. He withdrew a .32-caliber pistol from his pocket, placed this close to Hogan's head and fired a single bullet into her skull, killing her. He then dragged her body from the bar to a sled he had placed outdoors. It took the diminutive Gein several hours to drag the corpse back to his farm, his way made more difficult by a blinding snowstorm.

The next day officers found some overturned furniture in the tavern and a pool of blood behind the bar. Close by they found a single spent cartridge for a .32-caliber pistol. Not until three years later would police identify the killer, finding a .32-caliber pistol in Gein's home, one that matched the shell casing. Plainfield police were dumbfounded by Hogan's disappearance—they had found no body and did not declare her case a murder.

Gein's next known victim was Bernice Worden, the 58-year-old operator of a hardware store in Plainfield. In November 1957, Gein, a reserved and almost shy person, worked up enough nerve to strike up a conversation with Worden, even engaging her son Frank in small talk as he hung about the store. When Frank Worden, a deputy sheriff, told Gein that he would going hunting on a certain Saturday, the Plainfield farmer knew that his mother would be left alone in the store.

On November 16, 1957, Gein entered the hardware store just before Mrs. Worden was about to close up. Unseen, he locked the front door of the shop and then went to a gun rack and took a .22-caliber rifle from the wall, inserting a single bullet into the chamber, one that he had brought with him. Gein then turned on the startled woman and fired a shot , which struck her in the head, killing her. He then dragged the body out the back door of the store and dumped it into his old car. He returned to the store and took its cash register, which contained $41. Gein then drove to his farmhouse.

Both of Gein's known murder victims, Mary Hogan and Mrs. Worden resembled to some extent, Edward Gein's long-departed mother. When Frank Worden returned to his mother's store he found it locked and, getting no response, he broke into the shop, finding his mother and the cash register missing. He spotted a small pool of blood behind the counter. A sales slip, half written out in his mother's handwriting, was on the counter. It was for antifreeze. Worden remembered that in his conversation with Gein the farmer had said he would be stopping by the store later to buy this item.

Worden immediately went to the sheriff and told him that Gein was most probably behind his mother's disappearance. While the sheriff drove toward Gein's farmhouse, Worden went to a West Plainfield store, where he thought Gein would be visiting friends. He found the meek, little farmer in a small coffeeshop, just finishing dinner. He confronted Gein with his mother's disappearance.

"I didn't have anything to do with it," Gein told Worden in a calm voice. Worden nevertheless placed Gein in custody, taking him to a local jail, where he locked him in a cell. The sheriff arrived at the jail just as Worden was putting Gein into the cell. He had gone to the Gein farmhouse and appeared to be in shock. For some time, he was unable to describe what he had seen there. Then he began to make a verbal inventory of the gruesome "trophies" he had found.

He found four human noses in a cup on the kitchen table. He also found a bracelet made of human skin, a crude tom-tom made from an empty coffee can with human skin stretched over the top and bottom. He found a pair of human lips, which hung on a string attached to a window sill. Bracing four chairs were strips of human skin. Two human shin bones propped up a damaged table, he noted. Skin from female bodies had been made into a crude vest, leggings and purse handles.

On the kitchen walls the sheriff had found nine death masks, the skinned faces or skulls of women. There were ten heads from female corpses, all sawed off just above the eyebrows. One skull had been made into a soup bowl. The refrigerator contained human organs, all frozen and seemingly prepared for later consumption. In a pan on the stove lay a human heart. (This was later believed to be the heart of the slain Mrs. Worden.)

When the sheriff entered the basement, he reeled in sickening horror. The place looked like a slaughterhouse. Pieces of human bodies dangled from hooks along the walls and the floor was coated with dried human gore. From what the sheriff was able to determine, the human remains he discovered in Gein's farmhouse represented the bodies of fifteen women. Inside the shed behind Gein's house, the sheriff discovered Mrs. Worden's headless body, hanging from a rafter. It had been gutted.

Confronted with all this horrible evidence, Gein denied nothing. He readily admitted murdering Mary Hogan and Mrs. Worden. He may have murdered several more women, he said, but he could not remember. Later evidence pointed to but did not conclude that he had murdered and cannibalized two other women, including Evelyn Hartley, who had years earlier disappeared on the very night when Gein was visiting relatives only two blocks from her home in La Crosse, Wisconsin. A short time after Hartley vanished, Mary Weckler, of nearby Jefferson, Wisconsin disappeared and it was believed that Gein murdered and cannibalized her, too. Gein talked freely about eating the dead flesh of the bodies he had robbed from graves and those he had killed.

The cannibal even described in detail how he had adorned himself in the crude garments made of skin and how, if the mood suited him, he would dance naked throughout his kitchen and bedroom as he played fitfully with his gruesome trophies. He talked matter-of-factly about these nightmare gyrations, as if talking about normal conduct. Psychiatrists later concluded that Gein had been at such devilish work for so many years that he had grown used to such abnormal practices. Gein's composure only cracked when he was accused of stealing the cash register and its money from the Worden store. "I'm no robber," he said indignantly. "I took the money and the cash register to see how it worked."

On January 16, 1958, Gein was examined and pronounced incompetent to stand trial. He was sent to the Central State Hospital at Waupun, Wisconsin, which also housed the state prison complex. In November 1958, he was tried for murder and found innocent by reason of insanity (a misnomer in American jurisprudence in that the verdict should have followed the British stipulation of "guilty, but insane"). Judge Robert Gollmar ordered Gein back to the hospital in Waupun, where he was to remain for life.

Ed Gein (seated at right) is shown in 1974, while making another appeal for parole and ignoring reporters.

Gein never fully accepted his acts as being criminal and thought he should have been released from Waupun. He repeatedly applied for parole over the years and was always surprised to see his appeals denied. This ghoulish and unrepentant killer-cannibal died in the psychiatric ward at Waupun of respiratory failure on July 26, 1984, a death mourned by no one living in Plainfield, Wisconsin.

THE FLESH-EATING CO-ED KILLER/1960s

Edmund Emil Kemper III (AKA: Big Ed, The Coed Killer, 1948-) became a murderous cannibal, some later said, in violent response to his mother's severe punishment for his trivial wrongs and minor misconduct. Although he was the product of a dominating mother and a broken marriage, these factors do not wholly explain and certainly does not excuse his many slayings, mutilations and cannibalism. Kemper was not brutalized in his childhood as was Hamilton Albert Fish, the notorious killer cannibal of the American 1930s. In fact, he was, especially in his adolescence, excessively spoiled by a then over-indulgent mother.

It is a fact that Clarnell Kemper sometimes locked her young son in the basement of their home when he disobeyed her or broke the rules she set for him, but he was never beaten, whipped or tortured, as was Fish, except in the dark fantasies he envisioned on his own. As a child, Kemper was an overgrown, chubby boy, the subject of ridicule from peers who thought him oafish and clumsy—a dull-witted giant (he would grow to be almost seven feet tall), who towered over their heads and silently nodded at their jeers and catcalls.

At an early age, Kemper became obsessed with executions, playing a game in which he encouraged his sisters to participate, one in which he was sent to the electric chair, the girls throwing the switch. He would send his sisters into rollicking laughter by simulating a quivering response, as if the current was actually coursing through his huge body. An unexplained penchant for all things dead developed (necrophilia). At one point, Kemper expressed his secret affection for his attractive grade school teacher to his sister, who asked him why he did not give the woman a kiss.

"If I kiss her," he was quoted as saying, "I would have to kill her first."

A streak of sadism was also present in the boy, one manifested at an early age. Soon after mutilating a sister's doll, he tortured the family cat by burying it alive in sand. It survived, but he later caught it and killed the animal, decapitating it and displaying the gruesome head in his bedroom as a trophy. His mother replaced the cat with another one, but Kemper hacked this animal to pieces with a machete and hid the remains in a closet, later discovered by his much-alarmed mother.

The oversized youngster caused his divorced mother so much trouble that she sent him to live with her former husband. He ran away and, at age fourteen, he was sent to live with his paternal grandparents, who lived on a distant California ranch. The next year, on August 27, 1963, Kemper shot his grandmother in the back of the head with a .22-caliber rifle and then fired two more shots into her as she lay on the floor. He then retrieved a butcher knife and repeatedly stabbed the dead body.

Minutes later, Kemper shot and killed his grandfather when he returned, and locked his body in the garage. Kemper then called his mother and told her what he had done, explaining, "I just wondered how it would feel to shoot Grandma." His mother told him to call the police, which he did, and waited for them on the porch of his grandparents' home. When authorities arrived to take him into custody, he gave them the same comment he had ruthlessly uttered to his mother.

Kemper was committed to the Atascadero State Hospital, where he was held in maximum security. The California Youth Authority's file on Kemper contained a psychiatric recommendation that he never be released into his mother's custody, but in 1969 the Authority did exactly that. The 21-year-old Kemper was by then six feet, nine inches tall and weighed 280 pounds. State psychiatrists wrote formal objections to Kemper's release, but these professional protests were inexplicably ignored.

Clarnell Kemper worked as a secretary at the University of California in Santa Cruz. When Edmund moved in with her, she got him a university parking sticker so he could park on campus. This would later prove a valuable tool with which to lure coeds into his car. Kemper learned every back road of the local highway system and rigged his car so that the door on the passenger side could not be opened from the inside. In 1971, he left his mother's home and moved to San Francisco, where he began "practicing" getting victims into his car.

On May 7, 1972, Kemper picked up two 18-year-old hitchhikers from Fresno State College, roommates Anita Luchese and Mary Anne Pesce. He assaulted them with a knife, but was surprised to discover that real killing was different from the television or movie versions. He panicked and found himself standing outside the locked car. Incredibly, Pesce let him back inside. After Kemper had killed both girls, he disposed of the torsos in the Santa Cruz Mountains, but kept their heads in his room as a souvenir.

Edmund Emil Kemper III, a towering killer who murdered and cannibalized several hitch-hiking girls in northern California in the early 1970s.

Kemper methodically searched for new victims, finding 15-year-old Aiko Koo on a lonely road on September 14, 1972. She was hitchhiking to her dance class in San Francisco. He suffocated her with his huge hands and then raped her corpse, before putting the body in the trunk of his car.

The killer then drove home and cut off the girl's head, another "trophy" he intended to keep. The next day, he placed the head in his trunk and drove to a meeting where he was interviewed by state psychiatrists. He calmly answered all their questions and at the interview his dossier was labeled "safe." The psychiatrists recommended that Kemper's juvenile record be sealed for his future protection. Later that day, Kemper took Koo's remains to a remote mountain area and buried the corpse, retaining the head.

The act of decapitation excited Kemper sexually. Sometimes he had sex with the headless bodies he brought back to his apartment, but soon disposed of the torsos, often after eating part of the flesh. He kept the heads of his victims, however, and even buried one in his yard, facing his bedroom, so he could talk to it at night.

This was the head of student Cindy Schall, picked up by Kemper on January 9, 1973. He had forced her into his trunk where he shot her to death. Taking Schall's body back to his mother's house, he had sex with the corpse, then dragged it into a bathroom, where he severed its head and dismembered the rest of the body. He buried the head in the backyard before driving to a remote area and tossing the remains, which he had placed into heavy garbage bags, into the sea.

From the television show Police Story, Kemper picked up useful tips on how to avoid detection. Sometimes he met and chatted with homicide detectives at their favorite haunts to check on the progress of their investigations into the murders he himself had committed and continued to commit. He perversely delighted in knowing that the "Coed Killer," as the press had dubbed him, had stumped a small army of detectives searching for him.

Kemper struck again on February 5, 1973, picking up two more hitchhikers, 23-year-old Rosalind Thorpe and Alice Lin. No sooner had these nomadic hippies entered his car than he shot them to death, putting their bodies in the trunk before driving home to have dinner with his mother. When his mother retired, Kemper went to his car and cut the heads from both bodies. He dragged Lin's headless corpse into his mother's home and raped it on the kitchen floor before returning it to the trunk of his car, whimsically chopping off Lin's hands before he bagged her remains and that of Thorpe's for later disposal.

Kemper began to fear that he would commit a murder so blatant that he would be caught. On Easter Sunday 1973, he entered his mother's bedroom as she slept and bludgeoned her to death with a hammer. He then decapitated her, raped her corpse and removed her larynx, which he jammed into a garbage disposal. He then mounted his mother's head on a mantle in the living room and used it as a dartboard.

Next, he called his mother's best friend, Sally Hallet, and invited her for dinner. When she arrived, Kemper strangled her and, again, cut off the head of his victim. He then rented a car and drove to Pueblo, Colorado, to await the massive manhunt he was sure would follow. When his crime was still undetected three days later, he called Santa Cruz police and confessed, having to repeat his story several times before he was believed. Kemper was arrested, returned to California and, in April 1973, arraigned on eight counts of first-degree murder. Though he asked for the death penalty, he was sentenced to life, imprisoned at Vacaville.

The giant cannibal joined a prison volunteer group that recorded books for the blind and, by 1987, had made more than 5,000 such recordings, more than any other produced by prisoners. Kemper remained a model prisoner and has repeatedly attempted to use his "good conduct" to gain a parole, but all such appeals have been emphatically denied.

Kemper is shown in 1985 at the Vacaville prison, where he helped to record books for the blind, but persistently applied for parole without success.

GERMANY'S "RUHR HUNTER"/1955-1976

West German murderer-rapist Joachim Kroll (AKA: The Ruhr Hunter, 1933-) began acting out his murderous sexual fantasies in 1955, although his crimes did not specifically distinguish themselves to police until 1959. When arrested in 1976, Kroll, called a mental defective by authorities, told police that he committed his first rape-murder in February 1955 near the village of Walstedde. He attacked 19-year-old Irmgard Strehl and raped her apparently after knocking her unconscious, killing her and hiding her body in a barn.

Joachim Kroll, who murdered, raped and cannibalized at least fourteen girls in Germany's Ruhr district for more than twenty years.

Kroll murdered and raped 12-year-old Erika Schuletter in February 1955, near Kirchhellen. If his memory is to be trusted, he remained dormant for three years, until murdering and raping Klara Jesmer on June 17, 1959 in a forest outside Rheinhausen, a short distance from where Kroll's first victim had been found, but still within the Ruhr area where all of his horrendous crimes were committed.

Kroll continued raping and killing girls and women. Beginning in 1959, however, he began adding another gruesome detail to his crimes—cannibalism. In July 1959, police found the body of 16-year-old Manuela Knodt, strangled and then raped. Her murderer—Kroll, as it turned out—had also taken slices from her buttocks and thighs, cuts made in such a way that police concluded they were intended to be eaten.

Kroll continued to rape, murder, and butcher. His victims included 13-year-old Petra Giese in the village of Rees on April 23, 1962, and 13-year-old Monika Tafel in nearby Walsum on June 4, 1962. He cut and later consumed strips of flesh from the girls' backs and thighs. He also murdered 12-year-old Barbara Bruder near Burscheid in 1962, but did not mutilate the corpse.

Kroll was nearly caught on a number of occasions. In August 1965, he became sexually excited while watching a young couple having sex in the front seat of a car, parked on a lover's lane outside of Grossenbaum. When he punctured the car's front tire with a knife, the man, Hermann Schmitz, began to drive away, but when Kroll flagged him down, Schmitz stopped and got out of the car. Kroll stabbed him, but was driven off when the woman tried to run him down with the car. Schmitz died several days later of the stab wounds.

Hitler Youth members demonstrating in the Ruhr district at the time Kroll was born in that area; the motto on the banner reads: "The Fuehrer orders, We follow."

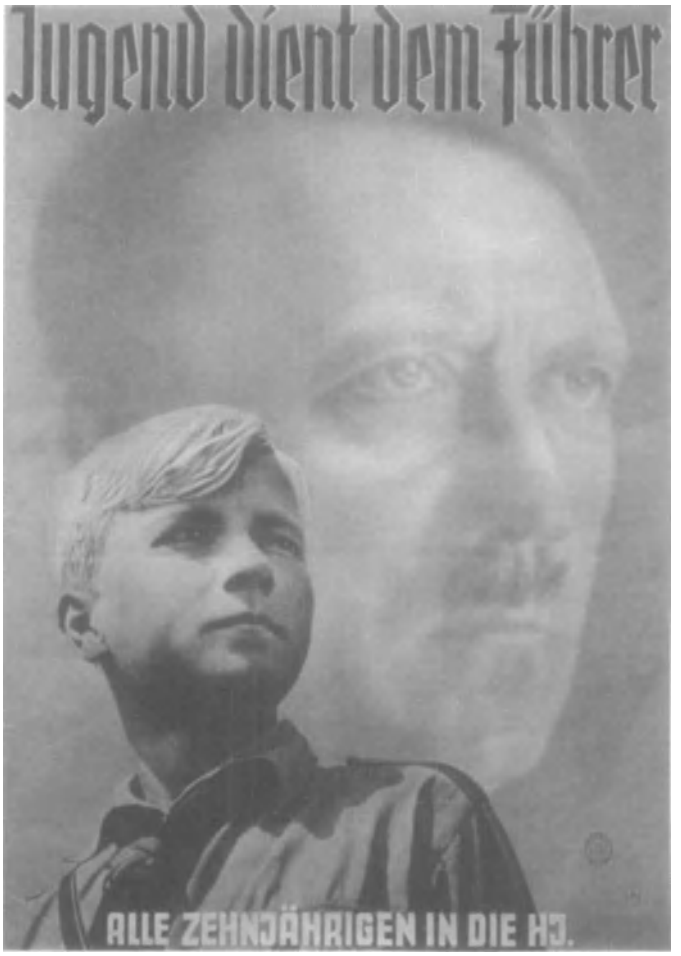
This near miss did not deter the obsessed Kroll, who raped and murdered Ursula Rolling on September 13, 1966. Three months later, on December 22, 1966, Kroll appeared in Wuppertal, where he strangled and raped 5-year-old Ilona Harke, and cut flesh from her shoulders and buttocks, before he fled the area.

In 1967, Kroll was again almost identified and caught. He lured a 10-year-old girl into a meadow outside Grafenhausen, where he was then living. He showed the girl a book of pornographic photographs. The child recoiled in horror and ran away before Kroll could strangle her. Kroll thought the girl would identify him to authorities, so he quickly moved to another town. Nine years later when Kroll named this girl in his lengthy confessions, police located her and the girl, by then a young woman, confirmed the story although she had never reported it at the time.

By the late 1960s, German police were conducting a widespread search and conducting intensive investigations for the maniac who was then known as "The Ruhr Hunter." Knowing that police were searching for him did not prevent Kroll from his cannibal murders. On July 12, 1969, Kroll entered the town of Hueckeswagen, entering a house, where he strangled to death 61-year-old Maria Hettgen. He raped her corpse and cut away some of the parts of her body, which he later admitted consuming as he continued his nightmare travels.

The Hettgen slaying was unusual in that Kroll most often selected children as his victims. He reverted to his traditional modus operandi when killing and raping 13-year-old Jutta Ranh in Breitscheid on May 21, 1970. Again, there was a long hiatus in the gruesome career of Joachim Kroll, for he recalled no murders for more than five years, but he struck again in 1976, when he murdered and raped 10-year-old Karen Toepfer while she was on her way to school in Dinslaken Voerde.

In July 1976, Kroll killed again, but this time he made the mistake of selecting a victim of his own neighborhood in Laat, a suburb of Duisburg. He abducted 4-year-old Marion Ketter from a playground, murdering and raping the child, then butchering her. Police made door-to-door inquiries to find the missing child and were told by one resident of the area that his neighbor, Joachim Kroll, a lavatory attendant, had just told him not to use a particular lavatory in their building because it was stopped up with "guts."



A Nazi promotion poster reading: "Youth serve their Fuehrer. All ten-year-olds in the Hitler Youth." Kroll, at age ten, was reportedly enrolled in the Hitler Youth in 1943, indoctrinated with vicious Nazi traits he would ruthlessly employ through his long career as a murderer and cannibal.

Upon inspection, it was learned in horror that the toilet was in fact blocked with the internal organs of a child. Police went to Kroll's apartment, finding plastic bags of human flesh in the freezer and, cooking on the stove, a "stew" that contained a child's hand, the dismembered hand of little Marion Ketter.

Once apprehended, Kroll readily confessed. His memory was poor, but he was able to recall fourteen victims over his twenty-two-year career as one of Germany's worst serial killers, whose repulsive offenses including necrophiliac rape, body dismemberment and cannibalism. He also talked freely to police about his sexual habits. As a young man he was too self-conscious to have sex with a conscious woman, which explained his habit of rendering his victims either unconscious or dead before raping them.

In his rambling confession, Kroll related how he had strangled plastic blowup dolls while masturbating, before he graduated to living victims. He claimed that he had taken flesh from the most tender-looking victims to save money on meat. He complained that "good chicken and beef" in Germany had always been "too expensive for the lowly working man." Though a popular outcry demanded Kroll's execution (there were countless death threats from enraged fathers), Germany had abolished capital punishment following World War II. The "Ruhr Hunter" was sent to prison for life, his guards instructed to keep him in a maximum security cell, where he resides at this writing.

THE MILWAUKEE CANNIBAL/1978-1991

Few other American killers in the 20th century exceeded the gruesome deeds of Jeffrey Lionel Dahmer (1960-1994). He enticed innumerable young men—mostly black gays—into his Milwaukee, Wisconsin, apartment, where he murdered them, had sex with their corpses, then cut them up and ate them piecemeal. He was, indeed, like Albert Fish and Ed Gein before him, a monstrous cannibal, whose nightmare deeds embraced and enlarged the worst of human behavior, the vilest of human conduct.

Even when his slaughterhouse murders came to light, few believed that Dahmer, or anyone else, was capable of such bestial acts. Dahmer's savage bloodletting and cannibalism was incomprehensible even to the police who thoroughly investigated the case, and the officers of the court, who tried the cannibal and who were most exposed to the undeniable facts and gruesome evidence before them. Without reasonable doubt, police officers invariably grant suspects the right of presumed innocence. Such was the case of the police officers encountering Dahmer in May 1991.

On the night of May 27, 1991, a naked and bleeding Laotian immigrant, Konerak Sinthasomphone, ran down a Milwaukee alley screaming for help. Two 18-year-old girls called police and three officers responded. They found the boy almost incoherent, babbling in his native tongue and in broken English. They also found Jeffrey Dahmer, who rushed up to them to explain that the youth was his "house guest" and that "he had too much to drink."

The officers, John A. Balcerzak, Richard Porubcan, and Joseph P. Gabrish spoke briefly with Dahmer and then, inexplicably, returned the youth to Dahmer's custody, believing that it was merely an argument between two homosexuals. They made some jokes about needing to be "deloused" after touching Sinthasomphone. Less than ten minutes after the youth was left with Dahmer, he was murdered, dismembered and eaten by his host.

The routine manner in which this victim was delivered into Dahmer's murderous care undoubtedly encouraged him to act more boldly in attacking more young men. Murder, by then, was routine for Dahmer. Born and raised in rural Bath Township, Ohio, he was a loner most of his life. When his parents' marriage began to erode, Dahmer became deeply troubled. His mother, Joyce A. Flint, was later reported to be mentally unstable. Following her divorce from Dahmer's father, she moved to Fresno, California, where she went to work as a case manager for the Central Valley AIDS Team.

Dahmer's high school classmates thought him peculiar. His actions were unconventional and he mostly kept to himself. Bridget Geiger, who attended a high school prom with him, later described Dahmer as a likely candidate for self-destruction. "We always saw him as the type to commit suicide," she later remarked, "not harm somebody else."

Profile and front photos of Jeffrey Dahmer, who was arrested on suspicion of sexual attack and sodomy on August 8, 1982, by the Milwaukee Sheriff's Department; he was released.

Moody and unpredictable, Dahmer's behavior caused his parents to urge him to enter the military, thinking that regimen and regulations would soon put order and reason into his otherwise unruly life. He joined the U.S. Army in 1978 and was trained as a medic (which may have given him the rudimentary skills of basic surgery, which he later employed when dissecting his murder victims).

Sent to Baumholder, West Germany, where heavy U.S. armored units were stationed, Dahmer did not serve with distinction. He remained in this remote, barren area from July 1979 until his discharge in March 1981, mostly in an alcoholic state. David J. Rodriguez, one of Dahmer's former barracks mates, recalled how Dahmer would "drink until he passed out. Beginning Friday afternoon, he'd drink all day, pass out, wake up, and start drinking again. He'd have his headphones on and he'd be in his own little world."

That little world remained secret to Dahmer's army buddies. On many weekends, he simply disappeared from the base, going to small towns and villages nearby. When he returned he would not speak about his exploits or personal contacts outside the base. Upon his discharge, Dahmer went to Florida, staying briefly in Miami, before returning to Bath Township. In October 1981, local police arrested him for being drunk and disorderly at a Ramada Inn when he was found with an open bottle of alcohol. This was the first time Dahmer got into trouble with the law.

Dahmer then visited his grandmother, Catherine Dahmer, in West Allis, Wisconsin, staying with her briefly before deciding to move permanently to neighboring Milwaukee. He got a job at the Ambrosia Chocolate Company as a night laborer. He was not a diligent worker, being reprimanded several times for frequent absenteeism and sleeping in the lunchroom.

Never befriending his fellow workers, Dahmer kept his private life secret. He was seen on occasion to visit parks and other places of recreation, where he would watch children at play. In early 1987, he was arrested for lewd and lascivious behavior after publicly urinating in front of groups of startled children. He was convicted of the charges on March 10, 1987, and given one-year probation. His name came before Milwaukee police the following year, when a young man from Illinois complained that Dahmer had stolen his money and jewelry after drugging him. The case was dropped when the man could not produce any evidence.

In that same year, Dahmer went further into the unreality of his own nightmares. On September 26, 1988, he lured a 13-year-old boy to his apartment, promising him $50 if he would pose naked for a photography session. He drugged the boy and then sexually attacked him. The boy managed to escape and inform police. Dahmer was again arrested, this time charged with second-degree sexual assault and enticement of a child for immoral purposes.

Assistant District Attorney Gail Shelton urged the court to imprison Dahmer with a five-to-six-year sentence, stating that, in light of his former offenses, "it is absolutely crystal clear that the prognosis for treatment of Mr. Dahmer within the community is extremely bleak ... and is just plain not going to work." Milwaukee County Circuit Judge William D. Gardener, however, refused to send Dahmer to prison, where no psychiatric services were available. He believed that Dahmer could be reformed by staying out of prison to attend a special rehabilitation program for sex offenders.

This was the worst mistake Gardener or any other authority in Milwaukee ever made. Dahmer himself pleaded to remain free, blaming his behavior on drinking, imploring, "I can't stress it enough that I desperately want to change my conduct for the rest of my life." The terrible irony in this case was that the very boy whom he had molested was the brother of Konerak Sinthasomphone, the youth Dahmer would murder and cannibalize less than three years later.

On May 24, 1989, Dahmer was sentenced to a one-year work release program in the Franklin House of Corrections, where he received psychiatric treatment. He was allowed to go free during the day to work at the Ambrosia Chocolate firm. But two months before entering the program and awaiting his sentence, Dahmer had already embarked on his killing spree. He had, on March 25, 1989, murdered Anthony Sears, 24, a Milwaukee restaurant manager. Like most of his other known eleven victims (he later confessed to murdering seventeen), Sears had been picked up in a gay bar by Dahmer.

In his hunt for victims, Dahmer, like serial killer John Wayne Gacy of Chicago, haunted gay bars, Turkish baths, and shopping malls. He also traveled to Chicago to frequently visit the New Town district on the city's north side, a notorious gay area, reportedly selecting his victims from the hordes of hustlers available. On May 29, 1990, Dahmer murdered 33-year-old Raymond Lamont Smith (AKA: Ricky Beeks), an ex-convict living in Milwaukee.

Next came Ernest Miller, 24, who had fled Chicago to relocate in Milwaukee to escape "all the violence" of the bigger city. Other victims followed, including Curtis Straughter, 18, of Milwaukee; Errol Lindsey, 19, who vanished from his Milwaukee home on April 7, 1990; 31-year-old Tony Hughes, a deaf-mute from Madison, Wisconsin, whom Dahmer killed on May 24, 1991, three days before he murdered the Sinthasomphone boy.

On June 30, 1991, 20-year-old Matt Turner of Chicago disappeared, drugged and killed by Dahmer in his apartment, then sexually attacked, then cannibalized. David C. Thomas, 23, was next, his photo later found in Dahmer's home. Dahmer next lured Jeremiah Weinberger, 23, from Chicago to Milwaukee by promising him money to pose for photos and watch gay porno films. Oliver Lacy, 23, of Milwaukee was murdered by the maniac and his chopped-up carcass stuffed into Dahmer's freezer. Joseph Bradehoft, 25, married and the father of three children, was murdered next. Then Eddie Smith, 28.

On July 22, 1991, Dahmer's bloodbath came to an end. Police officers that night saw a black man in handcuffs running wildly down the 2500 block of Kilbourn Avenue in the heart of the city's tenement district. He spotted the squad car and raced toward it, waving his cuffed hands frantically, telling officers that his name was Tracy Edwards and that he had just escaped from the apartment of Jeffrey Dahmer, insisting that the 31-year-old factory worker had held him captive for five terrifying hours, threatening to kill him and then "eat his heart out."

"He underestimated me," said the 32-year-old Edwards. "God sent me there to take care of the situation." Edwards, who pointedly told the policemen that he was not a homosexual, then led the officers to Dahmer's one-room apartment (apartment 213) at 924 N. 25th Street, the Oxford Apartments. The officers reeled in shock at the sight of the place, which, an inventory revealed, had four male torsos stuffed into a barrel, two human heads in a refrigerator, two more heads in a freezer, and seven other heads boiled clean. In a kettle, officers found severed genitalia. Photographs of dead men were strewn everywhere. The photos explicitly showed dismembered bodies.

Medical examiner Jeffrey Jentzen inspected the apartment and the remains, then reported that the conditions in which he found the body parts "were not inconsistent with cannibalism." The news of Dahmer's arrest and a recitation of his grisly crimes sent a shock through the nation. "This guy is really an aberration even of the abnormal," said a Milwaukee psychiatrist. "His behavior goes one step beyond ... Each element of the case takes you one step further into the bizarre."

Dahmer did not deny his murders. In fact, he confessed to murdering seventeen young men and boys, including killings he had committed in Bath Township, Ohio, and in Germany.

Below: Police experts are shown searching the grounds of Dahmer's boyhood home in Bath Township, Ohio, directed to the area by the cannibal himself in September 1991. They found the remains of 19-year-old hitchhiker Steven Hicks, killed by Dahmer in 1978.

Jeffrey Dahmer, shown in court when being tried on fifteen charges of murder (he may have killed and cannibalized twice that number). He was convicted in February 1992 and sent to prison to serve fifteen life terms, forshortened when he himself was murdered by a fellow inmate in 1994.

When the news of Dahmer's crimes reached Germany, authorities there began an extensive investigation and later placed nine murders at Dahmer's doorstep. The killer talked freely, openly, almost proudly of his horrendous murders. He cleared up several disappearances, such as that of Richard Guerrero, 22, whom he had killed in 1989 at the time he murdered Anthony Sears.

Police learned from Dahmer that in almost all instances, he had lured his victims to his apartment, drugged them into unconsciousness, then strangled and dismembered them. On at least one occasion, he had sex with the corpse of one of his victims. The stench of the rotting flesh had caused the neighbors to bitterly complain over the years, but Dahmer explained that some meat had gone bad and created the smell.

Pamela Bass, who lived across the hall from Dahmer, later stated that "he even bought a bunch of Pine Sol once like he was really going to get rid of it [the stench] this time, but it didn't help."

The Milwaukee Police Department came under close scrutiny when the incident involving the Sinthasomphone boy was reported. Police Chief Philip Arreola and Mayor John O. Norquist launched an internal investigation that resulted in the firing of officers Balcerzak and Gabrish on September 6, 1991. Porubcan was kept on the force, but under close observation. Of the two men kicked off the force (the first ever to be so fired by the Milwaukee Police Department), Chief Arreola said, "I have concluded the officers failed to properly perform their duties." This action was undoubtedly brought about by the press and through public pressure.

Dahmer went on confessing to murders. He was returned to Bath Township, where he directed police to dig up the back yard of his home. Human bones were found. Dahmer calmly explained that these were the remains of 19-year-old Steven Hicks, a hitchhiker he had picked up only a few days after his high school graduation in 1978. Dahmer said that he was afraid the body would be found so he had dug it up and smashed the bones with a sledgehammer and then reburied the parts throughout the 1.7-acre area. The remains were positively identified as Hicks' on September 13, 1991, by Summit County Coroner William Cox.

Appearing before Judge Laurence C. Gram, Jr., Dahmer pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity. He was later judged sane enough to stand trial and, at that time in early 1992, Dahmer pleaded not guilty to fifteen murder charges, even though he had confessed to each and every one of those murders. If convicted of murder, Dahmer said he would then plead insanity.

Dahmer's attorney, Gerald Boyle, emphasized that the gruesomeness of his client's slayings was part of a strategy, arguing that only a lunatic could commit such unspeakable killings. He was already presenting an insanity plea, despite the fact that his client had not pleaded otherwise. Prosecutors argued that Dahmer was cold-bloodedly sane, that only a sane person who was reasonably afraid of being caught and punished would be as clever as Dahmer in avoiding detection over the many years in which he committed his murders.

Dahmer was convicted in February 1992 and sent to prison to serve fifteen life terms. He had begged to be executed but Wisconsin, having abolished capital punishment decades earlier, denied his request. In prison, Dahmer embraced religion and was baptized in a cramped prison whirlpool in May 1994. Held in solitary confinement, Dahmer asked that he be released into the general prison population so he could "see more of the world."

Seven months later, on November 28, 1994, while cleaning a men's room at the Columbia Correctional Institution at Portage, Wisconsin, he and another white inmate, Jesse Anderson, were bludgeoned to death with a 20-inch metal bar from an exercise machine by a berserk black prisoner, Christopher Scarver, who ostensibly sought revenge for the mostly black victims claimed by Dahmer.

Scarver, who claimed to be "the million-year-old Son of God," attempted to plead innocent by reason of insanity. He was serving a fifty-year sentence for a 1990 robbery-murder in Milwaukee, and had unsuccessfully tried to feign insanity at his first trial. Scarver later changed his insanity plea to no contest and, on May 15, 1995, was sentenced by Judge Richard Reim to two consecutive life terms, plus thirty years, for the murders of Dahmer and Anderson.

Even in death, the remains of Jeffrey Dahmer experienced conflict. His divorced parents argued over the disposition of his body and his brain. First Lionel Dahmer and Joyce Flint disagreed about what was to be done with their son's brain. His mother wanted it preserved for study, but Lionel Dahmer objected, saying that he wanted his son's actions put behind him.

"I am trying to prepare a way for something useful to come of this nightmare," said Joyce Flint. The couple finally agreed to cremate the serial killer and they each took a portion of his ashes. Lionel Dahmer later wrote a book about his son, promising that a part of the proceeds would go to the families of his son's victims, but, according to one report, the disbursement of those proceeds was never determined.

THE "ROSTOV RIPPER"/1978-1990

From 1984 to 1990, a vast area known as Rostov-on-Don in Soviet Russia was plagued by a serial killer or killers, who committed 150 murders, one third of these being mutilation cases where a cannibal removed the organs of his victims and presumably ate these grisly remains. Investigators were baffled at these horrible crimes, which they viewed as endemic to the open societies of Western culture. The U.S.S.R., was, at that time, undergoing traumatic political changes that saw the rigid control of the Communist regime teetering toward collapse.

Andrei Chikatilo, who murdered and cannibalized more than fifty persons in Soviet Russia's Rostov-on-Don district, protected by Communist officials, who pointed out that Chikatilo was a good party member.

Compounding police problems in finding the killer(s) was Soviet censorship that prohibited any public announcements that such crimes were even being committed. To do so would have been an admission that Soviet Russia suffered from the same kind of social disorder seen in decadent democracies. Police officials could not therefore alert citizens of the dangers posed by the killer(s), let alone seek the cooperation of residents who might possess information that would lead them to the murderer(s).

Police could not broadcast over the state-operated radio/TV channels, nor distribute flyers describing suspects. They were left to hunt the criminal through covert operations, as if searching for a counter-revolutionary or a foreign espionage agent. Military and political police (KGB) attempted to aid local law enforcement officials, but their feeble forensic science and creaky methods of detection offered little help.

The killer they were searching for—Andrei Chikatilo, a Communist party member in good standing—knew this well and took advantage of his inept pursuers by continuing his murderous odyssey as a mobile cannibal killer who left few clues in his bloody wake. Born in the Ukraine on October 16, 1936, Chikatilo and his family had suffered greatly under Stalin's repressive regime. Poverty and hunger was always at their door and when famine in their region spread, they saw frantic neighbors resort to murder and cannibalism to obtain food.

At an early age, Chikatilo reportedly watched as his older brother was seized by a mob of famished citizens, killed and then cannibalized in a bloody feeding frenzy. That precedent image (a nagging nightmare endlessly retold by his mother) would remain with Chikatilo for the rest of his murderous life, one that showed how easily human beings could abandon civilized conduct in the name of self-preservation. He, too, would embrace such unconscionable savagery, but his motive was never to fill an empty stomach. He murdered, tortured, mutilated and cannibalized his victims, fifty-five in all, to satisfy a perverse bloodlust he could not suppress, one that eventually drove him into the arms of his pursuers.

Chikatilo's grim career closely paralleled that of American cannibal-killer Jeffrey Dahmer. He began murdering in 1978, the same year in which Dahmer claimed his first victim. As was the case with Dahmer, Chikatilo's many murders (which far exceeded Dahmer's) occurred throughout the 1980s, concluding in the early 1990s. He was executed in 1994, the same year in which Dahmer was killed. Yet there was a marked difference between these two serial slaying cannibals. Dahmer chiefly sought his victims among the homosexual community, where Chikatilo hunted small children.

That sinister hunt did not begin until late in life for Chikatilo. Possessing an alert mind, he proved to be a good student and received a university degree. He married and the union produced two children. He was appointed a supervisor for a school dormitory and appeared to be a dependable administrator, a dutiful family man and, most important to the regime, a reliable member of the Communist party.

The fragile fabric of Chikatilo's government position began to unravel when he was accused of molesting some of his male students, these boys claiming that he had either seduced them in washrooms or tried to inveigle them into his office for sexual assignations. He was fired, humiliated by being demoted to a menial job, becoming a factory supply clerk in Rostov-on-Don. Authorities, however, in decreeing this demotion, unwittingly provided Chikatilo with the means by which to carry out his future murders. His new position allowed him to travel extensively throughout the region. He was required to visit towns by bus and train to check inventories and verify officially-sanctioned supply orders.

Along his routes, Chikatilo saw the opportunity to molest innumerable children at bus stations and train depots. On December 22, 1978, while visiting the small town of Shakhty, he waylaid a 9-year-old girl, taking her into some woods where he raped and then strangled her to death. He repeatedly stabbed the corpse and then dragged it to the Grushevka River, tossing it into the churning waters. The body was found washed ashore a short time later.

Remembering the molestation charges earlier brought against Chikatilo, officials summoned the supply clerk to an interrogation room. He calmly answered all their questions, but was uncertain as to the period of time involved with his visit to Shakhty, which caused one investigator to become suspicious. Police, at the same time, however, produced another suspect, one that convinced them that they had apprehended the girl's actual killer, Alexander Kravchenko. This man was an ex-convict, who had been imprisoned for rape and murder.

Beaten for days by interrogators, Kravchenko confessed to murdering the girl. He was quickly sentenced to death and shot by a firing squad. Chikatilo's narrow escape unnerved him to the point where he restrained his urge to murder again. He suppressed this raging compulsion for three years, until his bloodlust erupted in September 1981, when he again killed, raped and mutilated a child, taking some of the organs and reportedly eating them. His murder spree went unabated for the next nine years.

Bodies by the dozen—mostly small girls and boys—were found throughout the region in wooded areas close to bus stations or train depots. From the way the victims had been sexually abused and murdered, then often dismembered, officials concluded that the "Rostov Ripper," as they called him, was not only a maniac slayer, but a confirmed cannibal. Chikatilo's incessant murders peaked in August 1984, when in that month alone, he murdered and cannibalized eight persons.

Police investigators again marked him as a suspect at this time, bringing him in for questioning. He was grilled intensively, but not subjected to the typical "third degree." The fact that he was not beaten was solely due to his position as a loyal party member. In fact, a Communist official objected to the detaining of Chikatilo, complaining that he was being "persecuted" because of "unsupported" allegations made earlier at the school where he had once worked. He was a good Communist, it was pointed out, and always followed party rules and regulations, supporting every measure taken by the Soviet regime. He had been proven to be an efficient and cost-conscious supply clerk.

Chikatilo was released for "lack of evidence," according to his police dossier. Now confident that he would no longer be a suspect, the cannibal-killer resumed his murderous ways. He was aided in his devilish chores by a number of other predators who were at the time murdering and raping (but not cannibalizing) dozens of other young children in the area. Frustrated police investigators were thus distracted from Chikatilo's movements by their preoccupation with other killers.

In early November 1990, Chikatilo was seen at a Rostov train station, wiping bloodstains from his face and hands as he stepped from some woods. He was not detained, but a detective stopped him and wrote down his name and address, one accurately provided by the confident murderer. On November 20, 1990, the body of a mutilated and cannibalized child was found near the station where Chikatilo had been stopped.

The investigator who had momentarily detained Chikatilo at the time remembered seeing the man wipe blood from his lips and fingertips. He and others went to Chikatilo's office building and waited for the supply clerk to arrive at work. He punctually appeared at dawn and was hustled into a police car and taken to a detaining area. For eight days, interrogators worked on the cool and collected Chikatilo. He at first denied everything, but when he came to believe the authorities already had enough evidence to convict him, he confessed.

Chikatilo's confession was long and explicit. He detailed fifty-five murders he had committed, providing gruesome details about his disemboweling and eating the organs of his victims. Hardened detectives found his statements hard to believe. He convinced them of his atrocities by demonstrating on mannequins the savage dismemberments and mutilations he had conducted on his victims. He had an amazing memory, recalling the time and location of each murder, describing in detail, as if recollecting cherished memories, the faces and bodies of those he killed.

Russian President Boris Yeltsin reviewed Chikatilo's case and rejected the condemned man's appeal for commutation. That same day, February 15, 1994, the killer-cannibal was shot to death.

In June 1992, with the Soviet Union dissolved, Chikatilo went on trial, charged with fifty-three counts of murder. His prosecutors took pains to point out that the cannibal-killer's long and successful career was due to an inept and irresponsible Communist regime that protected wrongdoers who supported that regime. They strongly suggested that the only way in which the "Rostov Ripper" was eventually apprehended was through the overthrowing of the Soviet dictatorship. Stalin himself was indirectly indicted in Chikatilo's crimes by prosecutors who pointed out that only such a savage and relentless killer could have been created and nurtured in a Stalinist state.

Chikatilo was convicted four months later on October 15, 1992, on fifty-two counts of murder, including the 1978 slaying for which Alexander Kravchenko had been wrongly executed. (Kravchenko was posthumously exonerated and pardoned in an official statement.) He was then sentenced to death, but he appealed for clemency through his attorneys.

After reviewing Chikatilo's ghastly murders, Russian President Boris Yeltsin rejected the condemned man's appeal. On February 15, 1994, the very day Yeltsin made his decision, Chikatilo was escorted from his cell and taken to a basement room of the prison. He was ordered to turn his back on a guard holding a pistol, which he silently did. The next moment, a bullet was fired into Chikatilo's head, instantly killing him. A superior 1995 made-for-cable film, Citizen X, was faithfully based on this chilling case.

CHAPTER FIVE: DRUGS

Earliest records show that drug trafficking and abuse were widespread throughout the ancient kingdoms. The use of cannabis occurred for the first time on an island in what is now Taiwan in 10000 B.C. According to one report, drawn from an ancient Egyptian papyrus, drug prescriptions produced considerable business as early as 3700 B.C. Records show that seven hundred years later Sumerians and Assyrians used opium in religious rituals and in 2800 B.C. a form of marijuana was used as a curative drug by Chinese emperor Shen-Nung. Drugs were widely used and distributed among the tribes of Mexico, chiefly the Oaxacas as early as 1000 B.C., but not until 600 B.C., were drugs illegally trafficked. Greek merchants at that time thrived on transporting cannabis from Asia Minor to Greece.

The Greeks and Romans used opium and cannabis to induce hypnotic states, as an analgesic, and as poison to eliminate political enemies. So widespread was Egyptian cannabis in 300 B.C., that the Romans levied taxes on such sales in open markets. Muslim doctors brought opium into central Europe for medicinal purposes, but the drug soon saw widespread use as a hallucinogen.

The misuse soon plagued the populations of India and the Middle East. Hashish was so widely used in Cairo in 1253 that the governor ordered the area's entire supply thrown onto a massive pyre. More than a century later, Egyptian authorities outlawed the use of hashish, sending troops throughout the countryside to destroy such crops and arrest those growing them.

In the Middle Ages, all manner of exotic drugs were used in Satanic masses conducted by witches and as late as 1484 Pope Innocent VIII condemned the use of cannabis in such outlawed rites. Jean Weir, a demonologist, later stated that at such rites where cannabis was employed, members lost their speech, burst into uncontrollable laughter and claimed to see marvelous visions.

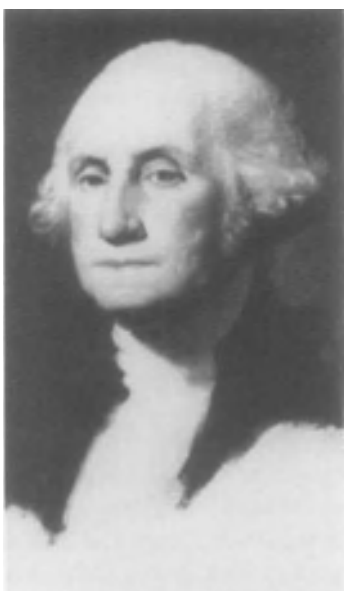
With the discovery of the New World, Spanish explorers quickly learned of the widespread use of drugs among native tribes. Francisco Pizarro, conqueror of Peru, established a lucrative trade by importing coca to Spain and its colonies in 1532. Less than fifteen years later, Spanish colonists introduced cannabis smoking to the natives of South America.

Portuguese doctor Garcia Da Orta was the first to compile and describe the misuse of drugs in Asia, publishing Colloquies on the Simples and Drugs of India (1563) in which he described cannabis and other hallucinogenics. Another Portuguese physician, Cristobal Acosta, provided a detailed analysis of cannabis in his published report, On the Drugs and Medicines of the East Indies (1578).

The new settlements in North America also saw proliferation of drugs. In 1585, Thomas Heriot reported to Sir Walter Raleigh that cannabis grew in abundance in what was to become the Virginia colony and that there was widespread use of the drug as a hallucinogen by English settlers. British authorities at that time saw profit in such drugs and in 1619, colonists in Jamestown, Virginia, were asked by the directors of the Virginia Company to grow hemp. Twenty years later, colonists in Connecticut, at the direction of their leaders, began to grow large crops of hemp.

Cannabis was one of the first crops planted by the Pilgrims at the Plymouth Colony, who used the hemp for clothes. By the mid-17th Century, Indian tribes in North and South America were reported to be routinely using cannabis and opium. By the early 1700s, white settlers began using such drugs. Cannabis and opium were openly smoked in "drugging houses" in New Orleans. Such drugs were thought to prevent all manner of ailments. George Washington planted cannabis or hemp on his estate, duly recording in his diary the agricultural methods he applied in raising these crops.

In his diary for May 12-13, 1765, Washington wrote: "Sowed hemp by Muddy Hole by swamp." On August 7, 1765, he wrote the following entry: "Began to seperate [sic] the Male from the Female hemp at Do—rather too late." (The potency of the female plant decreases after having been fertilized by the male plants, thus Washington's regret at having separated the male from the female plant too late—after fertilization—clearly indicates that he was cultivating the plant for smoking.)



George Washington, who grew hemp for purposes of smoking.

Throughout the 18th Century, reports from physicians around the world described the terrible effects of drug-taking. John Freyer, a physician with the East India Company, wrote in detail of the effects of cannabis and opium and Englishman John Jones wrote a book depicting the agony of opium withdrawal. Carsten Niebuhr, a Danish mathematician, described how hashish intoxicated users in a revealing book published in 1772.

French conqueror Napoleon I, soon realized the bad effects drugs had on his troops when invading Egypt in 1800. He banned the use of hashish and administered severe punishments upon soldiers who continued to use the drug. Another Frenchmen, Silvestre de Sacy, an accomplished scholar, stated in 1809 that the name of the Assassins (members of the 11th Century criminal society opposing the leaders of the Third Crusade) was derived from the word "hashish." Austrian baron and writer Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall established the link between hashish and the Assassins in his 1818 book, History of the Assassins.

Both Sacy and Hammer-Purgstall described how the assassins were sedated or "entranced" by doses of hashish by their leaders before they were sent on their murder assignments in U.S. troops in Vietnam used large quantities of morphine in an attritional war that later caused widespread drug addiction among these veterans.

killing the leaders of the Third Crusade. Zulu warriors widely used cannabis to inspire their actions on the battlefield. (Such tactics were enacted in a chilling opening scene in the 1939 film, The Real Glory. A Muslim Moro in the Philippines during the late 1890s, a member of a fanatical sect not unlike the Al Qaeda (al-Qaida) terrorists of today, is sent on a murder assignment—he is to kill the commander of an American force occupying the area with a machete. This he does, despite the fact that he is repeatedly shot before hacking his victim to death. The assassin is portrayed as being in a trance or a drugged condition, the only method by which he can accomplish his suicidal mission. The fierce resistance of the drug-taking Moros to the .38-caliber bullets then used by American occupational forces following the Spanish-American War led to the development of the .45-caliber automatic, a pistol designed to stop any man in his tracks.)

The bodies of Chinese troops litter a fort near Taku, following the attack of British troops in 1860 in the last stages of the Second Opium War.

Despite governmental campaigns against the use of drugs, many physicians around the world accepted and promoted drugs as curatives and pain-relievers. Morphine, isolated as an element of opium, became a staple drug for family use in easing pain and would be used thereafter on wounded soldiers in one war after another. During the American Civil War, morphine was administered to more than 500,000 wounded soldiers, causing widespread addiction thereafter, an addiction commonly referred to as the "soldier's disease."

Morphine was used to ease the wounds of soldiers in World War I, World War II, and the Korean War, but, for the most part, controlled by battlefield medics and doctors, who administered the drug with some regulation, confining it to those with serious injuries. This was not the case in the Vietnam War, where morphine saw unrestricted distribution, the drug provided to any soldier, who often used it to calm nerves and bolster courage in facing battlefield conditions.

The liberal use and easy access to morphine in the Vietnam War not only brought about widespread addiction among American troops, but, when these soldiers were mustered out, tens of thousands of these veterans began using cocaine and heroin. These addicted legions became part of America's "drug culture" during the 1960s and 1970s, joining the unsophisticated youths who coupled political activism against the Vietnam War with the use of drugs in defiance of the federal government.

Drugs, chiefly opium, caused England and China to go to war in 1839. Known as the Opium Wars, several open conflicts were based upon England's introduction of opium into China, using the drug in exchange for tea. Opium at that time was the most lucrative commodity exported from India by the powerful East Indian Company, which acted with the full authority of the British government. The company needed to buy tea (which became a British monopoly) at Canton, China, for re-export to other parts of the world, but Chinese authorities balked. In fact, China's Imperial government had banned the importation of opium as early as 1800. Yet, widespread smuggling of opium into China, at the direction of the East Indian Company, took place.

In 1838, Commissioner Lin took drastic measures to suppress opium smuggling and distribution, ordering smugglers and traffickers summarily executed. The British government responded with naked aggression, sending a large naval and land expedition to China, where Chinese forces were destroyed, and, under the resulting Treaty of Nanking, Britain received Hong Kong, as well as being allowed to trade at four other Chinese mainland ports. In all these ports, including the main port of Shanghai, British subjects were exempt from the jurisdiction of China.

The Peking government became ineffective and powerless, subject to countless claims and land seizures by other foreign powers that forced one concession after another from the Imperial government. From that point onward and for a century, China came under the domination of foreign powers. The Chinese vainly attempted to rid themselves of the opium trade, which resulted in the Second Opium War, beginning in 1856 and ending in 1860, when British forces decimated Chinese troops positioned in a series of forts at Taku, at the mouth of the Hai River which guarded the approach to Tientsin. On August 21, 1860, following a heavy naval bombardment, a British-French force of 17,000 troops stormed and captured the forts. These troops then marched to Tientsin, which resulted in the opening of all major interior cities in China to trade, a commerce based upon the exchange of opium for tea.

The Opium Wars made of China a drug country that brought about importation of opium to America through dense Chinese immigration. Only eight years after the last Opium War in China, the drug had taken root in large American cities, chiefly in the Chinatown districts of New York and San Francisco. In 1868, one researcher estimated that between 80,000 and 100,000 Americans were opium addicts, most of these patronizing Chinatown opium dens. In 1882, Dr. Leslie Keeley, originator of addiction cures, estimated that 500,000 Americans had become opium addicts. Five years earlier, in 1877, British writer Sir William Laird-Clowes stated emphatically that no professional Englishman had fallen prey to the ravages of drugs, chiefly hashish, an injudicious declaration in that Great Britain was largely responsible for the proliferation of opium and its derivatives in Western countries.

While government officials denounced the use of drugs, some medical authorities continued to openly support the use of various narcotics by describing drug use as therapeutic, as did Irish physician, Dr. William O'Shaughnessy, who published several articles that endorsed the use of cannabis in various medical treatments. Dr. Jacques-Joseph Moreau, a noted French physician, published his Hashish and Mental Illness in 1846, a work in which he analyzed the drug's interaction with sensory processes.

Only a few months earlier, in late 1845, the hypodermic syringe was invented, allowing injection of drugs. Seven years later, Dr. John Grigor, an English physician, pioneered the obstetrical use of cannabis as a means of reducing pain during childbirth. Drugs nevertheless posed considerable dangers in their widespread abuse. By the early 1850s, millions of Chinese men had become addicted to smoking and eating opium, thought to be an aphrodisiac and suffered from what was described as "the stomach habit."

In 1856, Dr. K. Niemann isolated cocaine from coca, this new narcotic touted as a cure for morphine addiction. (In 1898, heroin first appeared and was also mistakenly thought to be a cure for morphine addiction.) A British report of that year stated that more than 400 million persons were using opium and between 200 and 300 million used cannabis, but the report added that the threat of either drug to the British Isles was nonexistent.

The use of drugs for criminal purposes evolved in the late 1860s, when chloral hydrate, more commonly known as "knockout drops," was developed. This drug was thereafter used for decades in low dives and saloons in New York, Chicago and San Francisco, where thieves and prostitutes routinely dosed victims with such "Mickey Finns," causing them to black out so that their pockets could be picked and valuables could be more easily stolen.

By the 1870s, many governments took drastic actions to suppress the widespread selling and use of drugs. The financial secretary of India urged a ban on cannabis, attributing widespread crime and insanity to its use. At about the same time, a Japanese anti-drug law decreed decapitation by samurai sword as the punishment for drug trafficking. In South Africa, the sale, possession or use of cannabis was outlawed, but this applied only to Indian "coolies." San Francisco authorities issued a ban on the smoking and possession of opium and in Turkey, the sultan, who also ruled Egypt at that time, ordered all hashish confiscated and destroyed, outlawing the importation of the drug.

New York prostitutes in the late 1860s are shown feeding drinks laced with knockout drops (chloral hydrate, better known as a "Mickey Finn") to an unsuspecting patron; once unconscious, the victim's pockets were emptied and he was carried to a nearby alley.

Throughout the 20th Century and to the present, every nation in the world was plagued by the trafficking and use of harmful drugs, affecting untold millions of addicts. The European countries, as well as America, established drug enforcement agencies, spending billions of dollars to combat the illegal distribution of drugs in a losing battle against crime cartels that gleaned billions of dollars from the trade. Though many drug lords, especially those in Latin and South America, were tracked down and either jailed or killed, their replacements expanded the international drug trade, often with the collusion of high-placed government officials in such countries as Colombia and Mexico. That terrible and seemingly endless war goes on, ruining and often ending the lives of countless victims.

VISIONS OF THE RED MEN/1400s-1800s

The Indians of the New World experimented with the drugs introduced to them by white conquerors, but were partial to their own crude homegrown drugs, which they had been cultivating for centuries. The earliest known drug-taking Indians in the Americas were the Oaxacas of Mexico, who used mushrooms as hallucinogens a thousand years before Christ. The drug was employed for healing, divination and mystical experiences. The drug of the mushroom, known as teonanactl, was also used extensively by the Aztecs, particularly in religious rites such as divination and human sacrifice on part of both priests and victims. The tribe used it en masse in the coronation of Montezuma. The drug was also used to kill Montezuma's political foes, one of these being Tozon, who was murdered with an overdose of the mushroom drug.

At a later time, the Mazatecs, distant Aztec kin, used teonanactl for black magic and it was through this usage that the notion of the "evil eye" was given birth. The "toadstool habit," as it was later known, was taken up by many remote Central American and Mexican tribes. Among the ancient Inca and Chibchas of South America, datura (Jimsonweed, or thorn apple), a hallucinogen, was widely used. The Chibchas gave the drug to slaves to increase their productivity and to women who were to be buried alive with their dead masters (a form of Indian suttee), an act considered humane in that the drug provided a fear-deadening reaction, or, at least, the Chibchas thought so.

Datura was known as tooache to the early tribes living along the California coast. These natives used the drug for puberty rites that lasted several months. It was also used as a painkiller. Children were given this drug to produce visions of a personal spirit who, according to tribal beliefs, would become the child's protector. Braves took datura for endurance trials and to strengthen their resolve for battle.

Coca, a drug stimulant, had been extensively cultivated in Peru by the ancient Incas, who considered it a sacred emblem of endurance and fertility. At first, the drug was used exclusively by the high placed members of the Inca court, but use of coca eventually became universally used throughout the kingdom. With the Spanish conquest of the Incas, the invaders paid off their enslaved laborers with the coca plant to which the natives had long been addicted. Catholic prelates visiting these colonies attempted to stop such barbarous methods, one stating that: "The plant is only idolatry and the work of the devil ... it shortens the life of many Indians ... they should therefore not be compelled to labour and their health and lives should be preserved." The Spanish conquerors, however, ignored such pleas, continuing the slavery and plant payment. (Pope Leo XIII, three centuries later, approved of coca after using it to "support his ascetic retirement.")

The cactus peyote (Lophophora Williamsii) was used extensively for centuries by southwestern American Indian tribes, such as the Navajos and Zunis. The hallucinogen was used by Zuni priests, who applied peyote buttons to their eyes to induce the gods to bring rain. The Navajos, at first, used peyote solely for ceremonial healing rites, but then became cultists of the drug, making it integral with their lifestyle and placing it at the center of their religious-magical ceremonies. By the mid-1800s, the practice and use of peyote spread to the American Plains Indians and they used it as freely as whites later

In this 19th Century painting by A. J. Miller, pioneers are shown coming upon a camp of Plains Indians; these tribes introduced peyote to the frontiersmen.

Sioux medicine man Sitting Bull, who not only smoked hemp but wrote an account about its use.

used aspirin. To this day, the drug is still employed in rituals practiced by the (Indian) Native American Church.

Many Comanche and Kiowa tribesmen of the Plains Indian nations used peyote. The Comanche chief Quanah Parker consumed peyote in liquid form prepared for him by a Mexican woman, a descendant of the Yaquis, when he grew ill in Texas in 1909. Cured, he all but venerated the drug and spread its use to his people. A century earlier, explorer Meriwether Lewis, when encountering the Shoshone and Chinook tribes of the American far West, learned of the widespread use of cannabis among these natives. They told Lewis that the Indian hemp was "silk grass," a description the explorer noted in his detailed diaries.

Cannabis was known and used by the mighty Sioux, including chief Black Elk and the medicine man, Sitting Bull. Both smoked Indian hemp at religious rites and wrote detailed accounts of their experiences while under the influence of cannabis. The death of the celebrated George Armstrong Custer and the destruction of his famous 7th Cavalry in 1876, at the battle of the Little Big Horn were, in a large way, attributable to cannabis. Unknown to Custer, he led his troops into the valley of the Rosebud along a ridge of sacred ritual to the Sioux.

On this ridge, the Indians had planted their hemp, which, when fully grown, would be used to produce the colorful puberty dreams of their apprentice braves. Some Indian tales relate how the Sioux became incensed at Custer's invasion of their sacred ridge when he and his troopers unwittingly and cavalierly violated the place by trampling their carefully planted hemp. In retaliation, the tales claim, Custer and his men were killed to the last man, not only scalped, but their bodies mutilated.

Such savage mutilation was not part of the rites of battle practiced by the Sioux, but in this instance was exercised by warriors taking special vengeance for the violation of their sacred drug rituals. (Only Custer himself was spared such mutilation as he was regarded by the Sioux to be a great warrior. Other than the fatal wounds he received, his body, cleaned by Indian women so that he could properly enter the spirit world, was the only corpse of his decimated command that remained intact. His companions were found decapitated, dismembered, eyes gouged out, such mutilations designed to prevent these soldiers, the Sioux believed, from joining their ancestors in the hereafter.)

Indian fighter George Armstrong Custer; he and his entire command were massacred at the Little Big Horn in 1876, a fate some Indian tales state was decreed by his violation of a "sacred" ridge, where the Sioux had planted their hemp.

THE BLACK MAN'S CURSE/1700s-Present

Slaves shown aboard a ship en route to the New World; they consumed cannabis to desensitize their horrible treatment.

The use of drugs, particularly cannabis, by American Negroes is consistent with the historical social oppression exercised against them by whites, particularly its rampant development from the days of the Slave Trade to and through the antebellum South. Centuries earlier, drugs had already affected most African tribes. Simba warriors had long used hemp to rouse themselves for battle and magically guarantee immunity from harm.

In the 17th Century, West African tribesmen traded slaves among themselves, then with the Arabs, and were, in turn, themselves enslaved and traded. To endure the impossible hardships of the journey to the New World—first Brazil and the West Indies, then the North American Colonies—slaves consumed great quantities of cannabis. The drug desensitized the hapless slaves against disease, starvation, beatings, torture and mutilation.

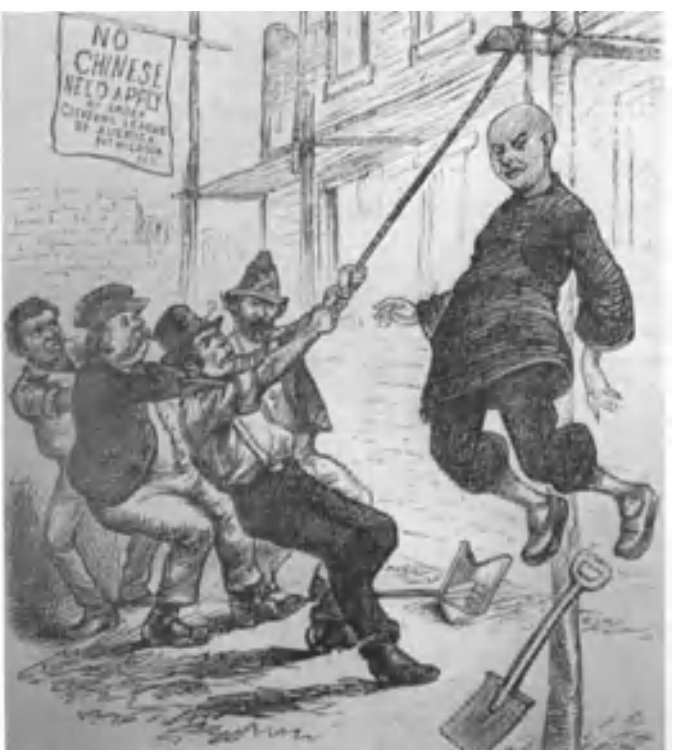
Some American writers profiled drugs as dangerous narcotics used by those in desperate circumstances by the slaves of the Old South. The enslaved blacks of the South had for decades used drugs to dull and desensitize the brutality and hopelessness of their miserable existence. In 1854, these conditions were emphasized by poet John Greenleaf Whittier, who wrote about hallucinations caused by hashish in his Anti-Slavery Poems.

Plantation slaves at this time clandestinely grew small plots of hemp which went undetected by their white masters. It became a family ritual, even to the smallest of children, to smoke hemp in the evening as a synthetic escape from their awful plight. Even after the Civil War, when freedom became a black reality, the widespread use of such drugs was continued by Negroes, embracing the practice as a warped heritage from an impoverished past. To this day, American blacks (as well as their subculture counterparts, the Hispanics) rely largely upon illegal traffic in drugs as the chief method by which to attain the kind of substantial wealth whites have accumulated through legitimate pursuits.

In the 1920s, cannabis became a pennant advertising belief in the black national movement, especially among the followers of Marcus Garvey's Back-to-Africa movement. It is still used as a ploy by those Negroes involved in Black Muslim, Afro-American and Black Power movements that seek to segregate and disassociate blacks from mainstream America.

AMERICA'S DREAMY CHINATOWNS/ 1850s-Present

With the development of Western lands, drugs and their hard use by frontiersmen became widespread. Mexicans introduced marijuana to early settlers in the southwestern territories, showing how Mexican peasants rubbed marijuana on their sore joints as a healing agent, but they also smoked it to produce euphoric visions and such practices were taken up by many a pioneer. In 1853, opium appeared in large quantities with the arrival of Chinese coolies, who had been imported to work as cheap laborers in the construction of the transcontinental railroads.



A coolie is lynched by workers believing that Chinese coming to the U.S. would take their jobs; Chinese immigrants introduced widespread use of opium in San Francisco and New York.

White patrons in a Chinatown opium den in San Francisco during the 1870s; more than 200 such dens then operated.

Opium flourished in San Francisco's Chinatown and the lusty white citizens of that rowdy town more than sampled the easily available drugs in the Chinese opium dens. This practice created, according to one account, a population of "degenerate, drug-sodden, sex-craved dope fiends." The patrons of such opium dens were described as artists looking for new experiences, distraught widows "for whom alcohol was taboo," as well as gamblers, miners, prostitutes and soldiers of fortune.

The use of opium in the United States, then called "The Mongolian Curse," afflicted the Chinese inhabitants of America first, before finding widespread use among whites. By the time of the Chinese migration to the United States, chiefly to San Francisco and New York, most adult Chinese males were reportedly addicted to opium. Up to 1937, in a futile attempt to curb the habit, the Chinese government meted out for centuries the death penalty for addicts who failed to be cured. Though thousands were executed in China, the opium party, akin to the cocktail party, continued to flourish in China as well as in the United States.

White females are shown in drugged states in a New York City opium den in the 1870s.

To many wealthy Americans, drugs provided stimulation for their idle or vacuous lifestyles (as it does to this day). In the 1870s, San Francisco's Chinatown flourished as the hub of opium eating and smoking, with more than 200 dens operating 24 hours a day. Many high society matrons and their daughters became addicted in these dens, which were lavishly decorated and were run exclusively for wealthy white patrons. The same condition existed in New York, but,

A contemporary tableau of illustrations shows white women and children enticed into a New York opium den on Mott Street.

Tom Lee, leader of the On Leong tong that battled with the Hip Sings in New York over the control of Chinatown's opium dens and other rackets.

An opium den operating about 1905 in New York's Chinatown. At the time this photo was taken, the On Leong and Hip Sing tongs were battling to the death for control of these cheap drug cribs which produced thousands of dollars each week and saw little or no interference from the police.

for the most part, the wealthy members of High Society, not only in America but throughout the world, generally disdained drugs as an affliction associated with "the lower classes."

In 1885, a special committee for San Francisco's Board of Supervisors found twenty-six opium dens in Chinatown that were exclusively patronized by whites. Committee members personally counted 320 silk-encased bunks upon which the white womanhood of San Francisco eased opium into their lungs. By that time, the city was awash with opium addicts. White male and female addicts down on their luck after years of opium smoking gathered by the hundreds at a dive near Chinatown called The Slaughterhouse (later rechristened The Morgue). From this seedy headquarters, the "hoppies," as such addicts were then called, served as a small army of cheap workers, who ran errands for bordello keepers and prostitutes. They also collected wood and old boxes for Chinese merchants, any hardscrabble labor that might produce enough money to support their addictions.

When tourists wandered into this area, known as "The Devil's Acre," a host of hoppies would surround them, and for a few pennies, proudly show the startled visitors the holes in their arms. These pathetic addicts, who could no longer afford the pleasures of opium, were reduced to using cheaper cocaine and morphine. Addicts who could not afford a hypodermic needle employed an ordinary medicine dropper, filling it with cocaine or morphine and forcing the point into their flesh. In 1885, an all-night drugstore on Grant Avenue supplied close to one thousand hoppies with cocaine and morphine. The cost of a full injection of either drug was from ten to fifteen cents. The same hypodermic needle was repeatedly used on the addicts queuing before the drugstore counter.

In New York City, dozens of opium dens began to flourish in the late 1850s in that city's Chinatown, centered at Pell and Doyer Streets. The opium traffic was conducted by two powerful Chinese tongs which fought a long and violent war over the control of this lucrative business. City officials took little pains to suppress the trafficking and use of drugs in Chinatown, receiving payoffs to ignore the increasing drug trade. Police all but ignored the many killings that resulted from the tong wars. Police commanders in New York City thought the Chinese social pariahs and their Chinatown domains were considered outside of their jurisdiction, leaving Chinese tong leaders to administer law and order.

Knowing this, one enterprising white man, a towering New York thug named Michael "Big Mike" Abrams, easily preyed upon legitimate Chinese merchants, as well as the operators of opium dens. He terrorized New York's Chinatown through the 1890s. Abrams had operated opium dens on Pell Street and later became a "loggygow" or guide for whites slumming through Chinatown. Big Mike also served as a stall or steerer for a vicious gang of white pickpockets, who routinely robbed wealthy Chinese merchants.

Abrams would accost a rich Chinese businessman on the street, attracting his attention while his confederates picked the pockets of the jostled victim. If any of these hapless merchants complained or cast a suspicion in his direction, Abrams beat the victim to a bloody pulp. On one occasion, he stood over a pickpocket victim who had dared to infer that Abrams was part of the gang that had robbed him. Police—in what was a rare appearance—arrived to see Big Mike's knuckles skinned and bloody, but they arrested the Chinese businessman instead, accepting Abrams' story that the Chinaman had attacked him.

"Hop Alley," in Denver's Chinatown in the early 1920s; police are shown guarding the many entrances to the opium dens that have just been closed down.

Big Mike hired his fists to the highest bidder and often went into Chinatown to attack any merchant, especially operators of opium dens, who failed to pay off white extortionists like himself. The Chinese had little protection from the police who seldom patrolled Chinatown and so they depended upon local tongs to look after their interests. Abrams ignored the tong leaders and bragged throughout Chinatown how he had killed no less than ten Chinese men. Three of these victims, he boasted, were decapitated by Big Mike, who used his clasp knife to slice off their heads. A Hip Sing hatchet man named Sassy Sam became incensed with Abrams' insults and, after downing a bottle of hot rice wine, confronted Big Mike in the middle of Pell Street with a long sword. Abrams took one look at the hatchet man and ran down the street, Sam in pursuit, losing much of his fearsome image.

In vengeance, Abrams sought out Hip Sing leader Ling Tchen. He dragged him into a Chinatown alley and cut off his head, carrying this blood-dripping trophy through the area to cast fear into the hearts of any Chinese who dared oppose him. The hierarchy of the Hip Sings met to carefully outline a murder scheme that would eliminate the white menace. A short time later, Big Mike Abrams was found dead in his room. He had been gassed to death.

Knowing Abrams never opened the window to his room (and had, in fact, nailed it shut to prevent intruders from getting to him during his sleep), Hip Sing assassins crept along the upstairs hallway of his boarding house. They fixed a small tube to a gas jet in the hallway and inserted this through the keyhole of Big Mike's room, where they knew he was asleep. They then turned on the gas. The fierce Abrams was found the next day, quite dead, much to the relief of the residents of Chinatown.

Big Mike's death did not interrupt the ongoing war between the Hip Sings and the On Leongs. The On Leong tong was led by a crafty Chinese leader called Tom Lee. His opposition was the Hip Sings (from which the drug slang "I'm hip," purportedly stems), which was headed by a fierce Chinese thug called Mock Duck. These two tongs waged open war in the streets of New York's Chinatown for decades. Hundreds were slain on both sides in the war's most savage period, 1900-1906. The war ended in 1906 with a strange treaty signed by Lee and Duck in the home of Judge Warren W. Foster of the Court of General Sessions. The war, however, resumed in 1909-1910, again over the control of opium, and raged until the early 1930s.

Though the tong wars came to an end, the opium dens stayed open. So heavy was the demand for the drug that Chinese merchants converted their grocery stores and recreation areas to opium dens. In the days of Mock Duck and Tom Lee, the old Chinese Theater on Doyer Street became a drug haven. In the theater's cellar hundreds of hooks were affixed to the masonry and from these were hung bunks for the opium addicts. Scores were found dead on these bunks from overdosing. Their corpses were routinely removed, quickly dumped into garbage cans in order to provide more bunk space for newly-arriving addicts.

Not until presidential reformers like Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson took federal action and launched legislation against drug abuse and trafficking were the Chinatown opium dens closed down. Even then, city officials, who had grown rich from payoffs from the Chinese drug lords, resisted such reforms, obstructing their own police officers in raiding and padlocking such places. Some of these opium dens went underground and continued to operate until the late 1940s. By that time, the American crime syndicate had instituted widespread street distribution of all illegal drugs throughout the major cities of the United States. (See: Tongs, Criminal Secret Societies.)

THE JAZZMAN'S JUNKET/1900-Present

Since 1900, many famous jazz musicians throughout the world, and chiefly in the United States, used drugs to inspire if not alter their spectacular performances. They have routinely used cannabis, cocaine and, to a lesser degree, heroin, such use beginning in the jazz joints of New Orleans. The types of drugs used by jazz (and later Rock) musicians varied with the types of music played—blues, Dixieland, Chicago Style, hot, cool, modern jazz—and in the accounts of those who used drugs, from 1920s clarinetist Milton "Mezz" Mezzrow ("mezz" became an official slang term for marijuana) to Gerry Mulligan, the motivation for drug use varied according to temperament.

Jazz musicians in New Orleans in 1900 were exposed to bordello madams who routinely sniffed cocaine and dispensed this drug to their clients and girls. Many black musicians who played in the bands at the more lavish bordellos picked up the cocaine habit in these surroundings. The lyrics of an early New Orleans jazz song reported:

I was comin' down Canal Street
Comin' down Main
Looking for a woman
That uses cocaine.

Storeyville, the center of prostitution in New Orleans, became a leading center for marijuana use. Small Negro jazz joints were beehives of cannabis smoking and selling. Another lyric of the day ran:

Gimme a pigfoot
An a bottle of beer
Send me gate—I don't care
Gimme a reefer
An' a gang of gin
Slay me cause
I'm in my sin.

And yet another:

Did you ever hear about Cocaine Lil?
She lived in a house on cocaine hill.
She had a cocaine dog and a cocaine rat.

She had cocaine hair on her cocaine head.
She had a cocaine dress that was poppy red.
But the cocaine blues, they made her sad.
Oh, the cocaine blues, they made her feel bad.

Black jazz musicians like Buddy Bolden were not alone in their drug habits. White musicians like Joseph Leon Rappolo, Dixieland clarinetist supreme (who first took lessons from Professor Carrie, a drug-addicted whorehouse piano player), began with marijuana in New Orleans, graduated to harder drugs, and, like the great Buddy Bolden, died in an insane asylum. Heroin addiction destroyed "cool" jazz musician Charles "Bird" Parker and killed Fats Novarro in the early 1950s. Many gurus of Rock music met the same fate. Elvis Presley (1935-1977) and Janis Joplin (1943-1970), to name only a few, died

Rock star Elvis Presley, long addicted to drugs, died of an overdose in 1977, a death that shocked his millions of fans.

Rock singer Janis Joplin, who died of a drug overdose on October 4, 1970 at age twenty-seven and remains a druggie idol.

The great blues singer Billie Holiday, shown with the inimitable Louis "Satchmo" Armstrong, was a lifelong heroin addict; her premature death was brought about by this drug.

from drug overdoses. The same kind of addiction prompted jazz great Stan Getz to attempt the armed robbery of a drugstore, which all but ruined his reputation and career.

The spectacular career of Negro blues singer Billie Holiday (Eleanora Fagan, 1915-1959; she took the name "Billie" from silent screen actress Billie Dove, whom she admired), was impeded and finally halted through her addiction of heroin. Known as "Lady Day", Holiday became addicted to heroin at an early age which brought about her premature death at the age of forty-four. During her lifetime, when drug addiction was deemed a crime and not an illness, she was arrested many times for simply using heroin. One report held that she was actually arrested for use on her deathbed.

One of the greatest blues singers of all time, Holiday died with less than $1.00 in her bank account. Strapped to her leg was $750.00. She had known lifelong poverty and carried everything she owned on her person. Holiday was inducted into the Big Band and Jazz Hall of Fame in 1979. In the year 2000, she was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, under the ironic category of "Early Influence."

Drug use by jazz artists was routine for many such musicians. The 1920s jazz musician and historian Mezz Mezzrow began smoking marijuana, which he and other jazzmen like legendary cornetist Leon Bismarck "Bix" Biederbecke, called "tea" or "muggles". Mezzrow graduated to opium, a habit that took him five years to quit. According to Mezzrow, Detroit gangsters, who were members of the Purple Mob, introduced him to opium smoking in 1925. He was given a fancy pipe

Clarinetist Mezz Mezzrow (at left), who became addicted to opium in the 1920s, was given the drugs by Detroit gangsters; he later described the strange "highs" the drug produced when he puffed a "pill" on a diamond-encrusted pipe.

Saxophonist Gerry Mulligan, hooked on heroin in the late 1940s, when he entered the dangerous "dream world."

with a diamond implanted in the stem and told to puff "in quick jerks."

Mezzrow described his reaction thusly: "Before I finished one pill a heatwave heaved up out of my stomach and spread all through me, right down to my toes, the most intense and pleasant sensation I have ever felt in all my life. At first it tipped easy-like through my main line, then it surged and galloped down all my side streets; and every atom in my body began to shimmy in delight. That fiery little pill was toe-dancing up and down every single strand of my nervous system, plucking each one until it hummed a merry song, lighting up a million bulbs in my body that I never knew were there—I didn't even know that there were any sockets for them. I glowed all over, like the sun was planted in my bread basket. Man, I was sent and I didn't want to come back..."

Contemporary jazzman Gerry Mulligan recalled: "In the late 1940s, just making a living was tough. I had my first hard stuff, heroin, in 1947 or 1948. It was a one or two time affair. A friend of mine thought I'd like to try it. The first time someone tried to inject a needle in me, I jumped ten feet and felt that was the end of that. The next time was a muscle shot and I liked it pretty much. These were the days of widespread general use of junk around town [NYC]. I knew there were guys in bad shape, but I didn't associate their condition with junk. I figured they were in bad shape anyway. There was a frustration everywhere with us. Nobody really seemed to know what they were doing or where they were going. Junk could provide a dream world. The daily process of living was dull and you had to scrounge for an income when you just wanted to play your horn. Junk seemed to help in a bad time..."

The spectacular drummer, Gene Krupa (in sweatshirt, center), surrounded by jazz greats (left to right) Tommy Dorsey, Bunny Berrigan and Jimmy Dorsey. His use of marijuana brought about his career-damaging arrest in 1943.

In good or bad times, jazz drummer Gene Krupa (Eugene Bertram Krupa, 1909-1973) used drugs to the point where he risked imprisonment. Just such an occurrence took place in 1943. John Pateakos, an underage helper in Krupa's band who took care of the jazzman's drums, accompanied the band to San Francisco. On the night of January 19, 1943, Pateakos was found coming from Krupa's room at the St. Francis Hotel with his pocket filled with marijuana.

Pateakos told narcotics detectives, who had been trailing him and Krupa, that he was merely en route to deliver the marijuana to the drummer at his dressing room in San Francisco's Golden Gate Theater. Krupa was arrested. He pleaded guilty to the charge of contributing to the delinquency of a minor and served a short time in the local jail. Krupa was then convicted on the drug charge, even though he was brilliantly defended by noted criminal lawyer Jake Ehrlich. Krupa was given a six-year term at San Quentin, but Ehrlich appealed the sentence and later won on a technicality. Krupa went free, but his reputation as a "druggie" forever tainted his long and illustrious career.

Actor Basil Rathbone as Sherlock Holmes in The Hound of the Baskervilles, a 1939 film which ends with Rathbone's closing, line: "Watson--the needle!"

LITERATI LIGHTING UP/1820s-Present

Robert Louis Stevenson, who used cocaine when he wrote The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.

Writers, particularly those working with creative forms, have long experimented with drugs and the first to write openly in favor of drug use was the noted British essayist, Thomas De Quincey. He wrote and published his Confessions of an English Opium Eater in 1821, a work that promoted extraordinary stimulants, which De Quincey claimed could produce revealing visions and unlock the mysteries of the ages.

Twenty years later, Pierre Jules Theophile Gautier, a French novelist, poet and painter, founded the Club des Hasischins. Members met in monthly sessions in the Latin Quarter of Paris. In 1843, Gautier published an article entitled "Le Hashish," wherein he promoted the use of the drug. In that same year, French writer Francois Lallemand incorporated the use of hashish in the plot of his novel, Le Hachych. Alexandre Dumas, one of France's greatest writers, included a chapter that detailed the use of hashish in his celebrated novel, The Count of Monte Cristo.

Some notable writers not only described or promoted the use of drugs, but admitted that they themselves were users. French writer Honore de Balzac confided to a friend in a letter dated December 23, 1845, that he had used hashish. Two years later French novelist Gerard de Nerval detailed his involvement with hashish and double consciousness in his Voyages to the Orient. In 1850, David Urquhart, a member of the British Parliament, included his experiences with hashish in his two-volume work, Pillars of Hercules and at the same time the use of hashish as a sexual stimulant was advised in Frederick Hollick's Marriage Guide.

American writers were slow to embrace the drug culture advanced by their European counterparts. In 1856, Scribner's Magazine shocked its readers by publishing the first addict experience article by cannabis smoker Fitzhugh Ludlow, a citizen of Poughkeepsie, New York. Ludlow, who later went on to write extensively about drug use, had obtained cannabis from a Poughkeepsie pharmacist, who had imported the resin for use in treating lockjaw. Two years later in France, author Charles Baudelaire published Artificial Paradises, which contained the "Poem of Hashish." This book was widely read in America by drug cultists.

In decades to follow, leading physicians and writers continued to advance the use of drugs. Sigmund Freud, the founder of psychoanalysis, applauded cocaine's medicinal virtues in his treatise, Uber Coca. (Freud bought cocaine in the early 1880s for $1.27 a gram.) Many European writers, some with decidedly unstable personalities, used and promoted the use of drugs as worthwhile hallucinogenics, including Robert Louis Stevenson. In creating his chilling 1886 novel, Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, Stevenson himself used cocaine. Reportedly taking massive doses of the drug, Stevenson wrote the manuscript within six days, revising its 60,000 words twice within that amount of time, which must be a record for a book's completion.

In creating his most famous sleuth, author Arthur Conan Doyle, profiled Sherlock Holmes as using cocaine in the story, "The Sign of Four." Repeated references are made in many other Holmes stories as to the great detective's dependence upon drugs. The reason why Doyle assigned this addiction to his superlative character was to prove him human and vulnerable to at least one vice. The brilliant and indefatigable Holmes, therefore, was not only imperfect, but like millions of others, was nagged and tortured by an addiction that even his powerful mind could not overcome.

The closing line in the 1939 film, The Hound of the Baskervilles, shows Basil Rathbone as Holmes, turning in a doorway to say to Nigel Bruce, as the detective's ever loyal friend: "Quick Watson, the needle!" This last startling statement, unexplained in any previous conduct by the sleuth in this film (and perplexing many viewers unaware of the fictional detective's addiction), is delivered by Rathbone in arcane reference to Holmes' addiction to drugs, notably cocaine, which, according to the immortal Doyle stories, Holmes mainlined through injection, along with heroin, morphine and other exotic drugs.

In this manner, the producers of the film skirted the censors of the day, but the statement is still startling for that guarded era when reference to the use of drugs in films was taboo. Another obscure reference to Holmes' drug addiction in movies appears in the 1942 film, Sherlock Holmes and the Secret Weapon. In this production, Lionel Atwill plays the malevolent Professor Moriarty and is about to kill the great detective. But Holmes, again played by the riveting Rathbone, stalls him, challenging the evil mastermind to come up with an inventive demise, stating that he, Holmes, would certainly devise an ingenious ending for Moriarty if the shoe was on the other foot. Holmes/Rathbone then suggests that he would slowly drain off the five pints of blood in the average human body, making death agonizingly slow, a method Moriarty/Atwill adopts, smiling at the suggestion and saying in an oblique reference to Holmes' addiction: "The needle to the end, eh?"

Holmes' drug addiction would not be openly profiled until 1977, with the release of The Seven-Per-Cent Solution. In this Wealthy hedonist, Satanic cultist, and writer, Aleister Crowley, who used and abused drugs throughout his bizarre life and died of a heroin overdose in 1947.

The brilliant American author, Edgar Allan Poe, who dabbled with drugs throughout his brief and troubled career.

Beat novelist Jack Kerouac, who promoted the use of dangerous drugs in his rambling writings and died of alcoholism in 1969.

film, Holmes (brilliantly essayed by Nicol Williamson) is shown using cocaine to stimulate his mind. Further, Sigmund Freud, who in real life advocated the use of certain drugs to uncover the hidden memories of the subconscious, appears in this film (played by Alan Arkin) as Holmes' analyst. Freud is shown ostensibly unlocking the reasons for his terrible addiction through hypnosis.

During the 1920s, a bevy of avant garde writers experimented with drugs and some became addicted. Occultist writer and eccentric Aleister Crowley squandered away his family inheritance of $400,000, spent on Satanic masses, endless parties and chiefly drugs. Called "the most evil man in the world," by Ernest Hemingway, Crowley, who called himself "The Great Beast," had become addicted to cocaine and heroin. At one point he wrote about his use of cocaine, stating: "I've had about a gram and I feel nothing but a sort of nervousness. I will go on. This is rather against my inclination, for I have a sort of despair as to its usefulness, and perhaps a trace of fear. On the other hand there is a sort of dull physical hunger for more."

Crowley, like most addicts, caused several of his wives (he had fifteen of them at one count) to become addicts, two of them dying in insane asylums. Of his many mistresses, five drug-addicted women committed suicide. At the end of World War II, Crowley was living in England as a penniless, hopeless heroin addict. Several of his aging, equally-addicted mistresses begged in the streets of Brighton in order to secure enough money for them and their sexual master to buy drugs and continue Crowley's near incomprehensible diary, which he thought to be a literary masterpiece (it was later termed "an addict's gibberish"). The day before his death from an overdose of heroin on December 1, 1947, Crowley scratched out a final entry in his diary: "What an ass I am! Will heroin help me to forget it?"

The great James Joyce toyed with cannabis, while other scribes wholly embraced drug use, including Stephane Mallarme, Friedrich Nietzsche and Guillaume Apollinaire. American writers of repute also dallied with drugs, including Edgar Allan Poe, Mark Twain, Walt Whitman, Gertrude Stein and her lifelong lesbian lover, Alice B. Toklas, Henry Miller, William Burroughs and most of the "Beat" writers of the late 1940s and early 1950s.

The "Beat" writers made drugs integral with their literary ambitions. Further, they made of their cruel addictions a religious cult to which they insidiously lured the unsuspecting literary novice to join. The "Beats," who had no cause other than their own self-indulgent destruction, were really the catalysts of the drug generation of the 1960s and 1970s. These latter-day Dadaists boasted of their addictions and frenetically promoted the use of the most dangerous and exotic drugs as a shabby defiance against all authority, that, for the most part, disdained and disregarded their pitiful existence, but their influence on the unsuspecting, the naive, the gullible, was deep and vast.

HOLLYWOOD'S DRUG WORLD/1910s-Present

As Hollywood's movie production began to produce fortunes for film stars during and following World War I, many of these sudden millionaires embraced the use of drugs as part of their chic lifestyles. The first great star to fall prey to drugs was matinee idol Wallace Reid (1891-1923), a handsome, six-foot-three-inch actor who exuded charm and not an inconsiderable

Morphine sent silent screen star Wallace Reid into an insane asylum and early death; some claimed he was purposely overdosed.

Opposite page: Writers and lesbian lovers Gertrude Stein and Alice B. Toklas experimented with drugs through their stormy careers.

Barbara LaMarr, the sultry silent screen siren, who gave cocaine parties in her lavish Hollywood home and died from an overdose at age twenty-nine.

Alma Rubens, popular silent screen star; her morphine addiction sent her into an institution.

amount of on-screen talent in romantic comedies and adventure films. He was for several years Paramount's top male film star, appearing in dozens of films, especially popular when playing racing drivers.

Reid himself had a passion for speed and drove his expensive sports cars wildly in and about the Hollywood hills. He also developed a passion for morphine and was soon so deeply addicted that his ability to perform even the easiest acting chores became arduous. So debilitated by his morphine addiction, it was reported, that Reid had to be propped up and supported before the cameras in an effort to complete his last films.

On the verge of complete physical collapse, Reid was taken by his producers to a private sanitarium in March 1922, where it was hoped he would withdraw from his addiction. This was not the case. He reportedly left the asylum and refused to take any kind of cure. He died in a padded cell on January 18, 1923, allegedly driven by his addiction to a state of raving lunacy. Hollywood rumors persist to this day that he was purposely overdosed with morphine to end his agonizing addiction, as well as prevent his secret drug life from becoming public and an embarrassment to his film producers.

Though one report stated that Reid was first addicted to morphine after the drug was administered to him after he suffered injuries in a train wreck, the actor's wife, Dorothy, blamed her husband's premature death on his uncontrolled lifestyle: "It was one wild party after another each one worse than the last. Nobody could do anything with Wally. And then—morphine." His wife later appeared in a quickie film entitled Human Wreckage, which warned the public against the use of drugs. Such warnings had no effect on other Hollywood stars, who plunged headlong into drug use, spending any amount of money to obtain cocaine, morphine and heroin.

The most flagrant user of drugs at this time was the beautiful writer-actress Barbara LaMarr (Reatha Watson; 1896-1926), a silent screen siren who had appeared in many hit films, including Souls for Sale and Strangers of the Night. LaMarr gave cocaine parties in her sprawling Hollywood home, offering drugs to all of her friends. She reportedly kept cocaine in golden buckets and on silver salvers placed throughout her home for any guest to take and use. The sultry brunette actress, went through a fortune as well as six husbands in less than a decade, dying at the age of twenty-nine from an overdose on January 30, 1926.

Another silent screen actress, Alma Rubens (1897-1931), became addicted to morphine, supplied, she said, by her own doctors. By the late 1920s her career was in shambles and she had to be forcibly placed in an asylum after attacking a physician and his attendant trying to place her in an ambulance. She took the cure, but returned to drugs, this time heroin, and died on January 22, 1931 at age thirty-three. Many another film star followed the path taken by Reid, La Marr and Rubens. In the era of the talkies, drug use among film stars saw widespread consumption of marijuana, cocaine and barbiturates.

The most sensational Hollywood drug case that seemed to herald the hardcore horrors to come was comparatively innocent by today's dreadful standards, except that it involved a superstar of films, Robert Mitchum (1917-1997). The burly leading man ran afoul of one of the most dedicated Federal Bureau of Narcotics agents in the field, one George H. White.

White had spent years kicking down doors in New York's Chinatown while on the trail of the poppy. When he was transferred to Los Angeles in the late 1940s, he swore that he would bring to a halt the use of marijuana, just then becoming a fad among the golden boys and girls of the West Coast. One of these beauteous girls was an attractive blonde starlet named Lila Leeds, a friend of Mitchum's, who invited him to her Laurel Canyon cottage on the night of August 31, 1948.

Mitchum, who was no stranger to marijuana, had bummed his way around the country as a teenager and had worked at Lockheed in Los Angeles during World War II. When he arrived at the Leeds cottage, he was offered a "reefer," accepted it, and began puffing. A few seconds later, federal agents, White in the lead, bounded through the front door, arresting Mitchum, Leeds, painter Edward Balchowski and others. Mitchum posted bail and went into seclusion.

The day following his arrest, Mitchum failed to appear on the steps of the Los Angeles City Hall, where he had been scheduled to speak against juvenile delinquency. His agent showed up instead to say that the actor was suffering from "laryngitis." Reporters soon learned the real reason for his absence and one newsman tracked the actor down. Mitchum exploded, saying: "It's a frame-up! They didn't find a thing on me."

Rugged screen actor Robert Mitchum is shown as he is released from jail after a marijuana conviction in 1948; he claimed he was "set up."

Mitchum's studio bosses, fearing the loss of the actor's teenage fans, who numbered in the millions, immediately hired famed lawyer Jerry Giesler to defend their star. Giesler told the wise-cracking Mitchum to keep silent, that his producer, David O. Selznick was going to stand behind him, and that his $3,000-a-week contract was secure.

In court, Giesler claimed that Mitchum's arrest on the marijuana charge had been a set-up, that the Leeds cottage had been bugged with a microphone planted on a wall. "The most spectacular thing about the whole affair," the attorney stated, "was that the press had the story before the cops crashed in." The flamboyant Giesler more than intimated that powerful people in Hollywood were out to destroy the career of the free-wheeling Mitchum. None of this, of course, excused the actor's breaking the law. He was indicted by a grand jury on charges of possession of marijuana and conspiracy to possess marijuana. Giesler shrewdly advised his client not to testify before the grand jury, an option open to the accused.

Next, the attorney moved to prevent Mitchum from entering a plea of not guilty, which would have led to a jury trial, giving the district attorney the opportunity to parade an army of witnesses against Mitchum and destroy his character and career. Instead, Giesler had Mitchum make no plea at all—he never pled guilty despite later claims to the contrary—and asked that the court decide whether he was innocent or guilty on the conspiracy count alone, based upon the grand jury transcript, which was, at best, flimsy.

When appearing at the bench trial, Giesler simply asked the judge to decide on the sole basis of the grand jury transcript. He meanwhile kept an army of reporters from getting to Mitchum, later saying that: "They were slavering for scandal in raw, juicy chunks." After reviewing the transcript, the judge sentenced Mitchum to two years in jail, but then reduced the sentence to sixty days behind bars. Mitchum did not complain. In fact, he accepted his fate with resignation. When asked in court to state his occupation, he replied: "Ex-actor." After hearing his sentence, Mitchum remarked: "I might as well admit it—I've been smoking it [marijuana] since I was a kid."

Mitchum was sent to the county penal institution, Wayside Rancho, to serve out his time. He was photographed mopping floors, sweeping out hallways and performing other menial tasks. He did all this without rancorous comment. He was given ten days off his original sentence for good behavior and emerged from jail several pounds leaner than when he was incarcerated. Newsmen were present when the actor left the institution.

One reporter asked: "How was it inside, Bob?"

Mitchum shrugged and replied: "Just like Palm Springs—without the riffraff, of course."

The remarkable aspect of the Mitchum marijuana case was that his career had not been injured and that he remained intact as a Hollywood star, albeit he was thought to be a rebel and a "character" thereafter. This was basically due to the actions of tycoon movie mogul Howard Hughes, who thought as the rest of the country came to believe, that the actor had "taken his medicine like a man." Hughes bought Mitchum's contract from David Selznick for $200,000 and starred him in a number of film noir productions that made the actor an even greater star and more in demand than before his drug conviction.

Lila Leeds, the starlet who had invited Mitchum to her cottage for a "reefer" party, later capitalized on the Mitchum case by appearing in a low-budget film entitled She Shoulda Said No (1949), which was also known as Marijuana, the Devil's Weed. This film took the same approach as the 1938 cult film, Reefer Madness (AKA: Tell Your Children), another cheaply-produced movie showing marijuana-crazed addicts uncontrollably gyrating and cavorting toward self-destruction after smoking the drug. Both of these films are no more than curiosities, worthless in depicting the actual effects of dangerous drugs. A more accurate and devastating portrait was drawn in Otto Preminger's 1955 film, The Man with the Golden Arm, a production that shows Frank Sinatra playing heroin addict Frankie Machine, a character created by Chicago writer Nelson Algren in his novel of the same title.

Where actor Robert Mitchum was thought to be a drug offender, the unstable film actress Marilyn Monroe was considered a classic victim of drugs. The drugs that engulfed Marilyn Monroe (Norma Jean Mortenson, 1926-1962), America's top movie sex symbol, made of her a cause celebre. Her lethal overdose from barbiturates in 1962 has nagged researchers and crime enthusiasts to embrace, without much verification, the idea that she was, for arcane if not ridiculous reasons, actually murdered by powerful people.

Monroe had catapulted to fame in the early 1950s, appearing in such highly acclaimed films as The Asphalt Jungle (1950), All About Eve (1950), and later, in bigger roles in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes (1953), How to Marry a Millionaire (1953), and Billy Wilder's classic film noir comedy, Some Like It Hot (1959). The Hollywood moguls and press agents of that era typecast this tragically insecure actress as the quintessential "dumb blonde." It was a stereotype she vainly fought to overcome throughout her professional career.

Born in Los Angeles on June 1, 1926, as Norma Jean Mortenson, she spent much of her childhood being shuttled from one orphanage or foster home to another. In her teens, she became a photographer's model, his cheesecake images adorning wall calendars, magazine covers and advertising brochures. There was a refreshing, wholesome quality to her image that photographers were quick to exploit. A celebrated photograph of her in the nude was later sold to Hugh Hefner, who, in turn, published it in the inaugural issue of Playboy Magazine in January 1953. This photo proved to be the springboard to Monroe's successful acting career, but it was also the cornerstone on which Hefner built his girlie magazine fortune.

Monroe's highly publicized love life became standard fare in the Hollywood fan magazines and gossip columns. She was married three times and two of her husbands were complete opposites. She wed baseball star Joe DiMaggio in 1954, but his conservative views and possessive nature doomed the marriage to an early failure after just nine months. Two years later she married Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Arthur Miller. The unschooled actress was suddenly thrust into the literary and academic arena, a disconcerting, unfamiliar world, where she was again looked upon as a "dumb blonde." Her marriage survived through five tortuous years.

After her break-up with Miller, Monroe was rumored to be romantically linked to both President John Kennedy and his brother, Robert. Many Washington insiders claimed that the president carried on an illicit love affair with the glamorous actress, altering visits from Monroe with that of Washington socialite Mary Pinchot Meyers, while Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy was absent from the White House.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, an ardent political foe of the Kennedys, reportedly assigned several of his agents to uncover information about Monroe's alleged sexual liaisons with the Kennedys in order to embarrass the administration or, worse, to blackmail the president and his then boss, Robert Kennedy, into giving him a free hand with the Bureau, as had been the case with all other administrations. Hoover was deeply resentful of Robert Kennedy's repeated challenges of his authority over the FBI and the manner in which he conducted his agency. Hoover's secret file folders reportedly "bulged" with scandalous information on the Kennedy-Monroe trysts.

The actress suddenly died from an overdose of barbiturates at her West Coast residence on August 5, 1962. Her death was officially listed as a suicide, but over the years allegations persisted that she was the victim of foul play. According to one report, members of the underworld were contracted to murder Monroe at Hoover's instigation in return for past favors. There has never been any evidence to support this claim, although some pathologists maintained that Monroe was given a lethal injection of drugs shortly before her death. There is no conclusive evidence to verify this claim either.

Opposite page: Sex symbol Marilyn Monroe, in the 1954 film, There's No Business Like Show Business; her problem was barbiturates.

Monroe and baseball superstar Joe DiMaggio; their 1954 marriage lasted only nine months.

It was known that Monroe was despondent shortly before her death. She had been routinely taking barbiturates in large quantities for years to calm her nerves and her career, debilitated by such drugs, had come to a standstill because of her inability to perform. Throughout her movie career she was known to be unreliable, often late for filming schedules and sometimes not appearing at all. During her last film, The Misfits (1960), written by her ex-husband Miller, her even-tempered co-star, Clark Gable, often complained about her "no shows" during the production.

Two years later Monroe was suspended for failing to meet schedules on a new film production. Her fragile nerves were gone and her good looks were going. This she knew, and like the fading film sirens before her, she also knew that she was no longer in vogue. Newer screen sirens like Sophia Loren and Jayne Mansfield were the leading sex symbols and Marilyn Monroe was yesterday's fascination. At the time of her death, she was a lonely 36-year-old woman with few friends and little or no professional future. Her only consolation was drugs, the insidious substance that claimed her tragic life.

Drug use in Hollywood and throughout the realm of American High Society has not abated since the days of Mitchum and Monroe. The addictive habits of its wealthy inhabitants have led to prison and suicide or murder for many. That fate was meted out with tragic routine to many offspring of the famous and wealthy. On October 2, 1975, Caspar Fleming, the drug-abusing son of Ian Fleming (author of the celebrated James Bond novels) used narcotics in committing suicide. In August 1977, Robert Reid Topping, who within a year would inherit $1 million, was stabbed to death in Miami, Florida. The son of Bob Topping, the former owner of the New York Yankees, had regularly traveled to Florida to buy large amounts Clark Gable and Monroe in a scene from the 1960 film, The Misfits; this was the last film made by both stars.

Marilyn Monroe with her husband and playwright Arthur Miller, another union that did not last.

The table next to the bed in which Marilyn Monroe died from an overdose in 1962 is shown littered with containers of barbiturates.

of cocaine. In April 1984, David Anthony Kennedy, son of assassinated Senator Robert Kennedy, died of an overdose of cocaine and Demerol in Palm Beach, Florida.

In more modern days, heavy users and abusers of drugs included such Hollywood icons as director Sam Peckinpah (David Samuel Peckinpah, 1925-1984); director Oliver Stone (b.1946), who was first arrested and jailed in Mexico for possession of marijuana at age twenty-one and suffered through a prolonged cocaine addiction, arrested as late as June 1999 for drunk driving and possession of hashish; actor Rob Lowe (Robert Hepler Lowe; b.1964); actor-composer Jimi Hendrix (1942-1970); film star Richard Dreyfuss (b.1947); actor Robert Downey, Jr. (b.1965), who was repeatedly jailed for drug violations in the late 1990s; actor Charlie Sheen (b. 1965); Acid Rock composer and filmmaker Sid Vicious (1957-1979), who murdered his live-in girlfriend and member of his band, Nancy Spungen (1958-1978), in 1978, and committed suicide with a heroin overdose on February 2, 1979, to avoid a trial in which he knew he would be convicted. There are many more, so many that Hollywood, by the late 1990s, was dubbed "Hophead City."

Access to drugs by Hollywood personalities came into focus with the suicide death of Hugh O'Connor (1962-95), an actor and the adopted son of actor Carroll O'Connor (1924-2001). Always beset with drugs, the younger O'Connor grew despondent with his inability to find work because of his dependency upon drugs. He called his father on March 28, 1995, to tell him that he could not quit his cocaine habit and could not cope with life. He committed suicide a short time after making that call.

Carroll O'Connor's response to the premature death of his drug-addicted son was to launch a campaign against songwriter Harry Perzigian (b.1956) for selling and supplying Hugh O'Connor with drugs. Perzigian had already been convicted and jailed for this offense, but when the senior O'Connor labeled Perzigian "a partner in murder" in the death of his son, the songwriter sued the famous actor for slander, a suit O'Connor invited.

On July 25, 1997, a Los Angeles jury acquitted O'Connor of the slander charges and many of its members openly agreed with O'Connor in branding Perzigian "a partner in murder." Perzigian complained that "you're not going to get a fair shake in L.A., if you sue a celebrity." O'Connor was viewed as a courageous citizen, becoming a national hero for his stand against Perzigian and drug distributors in general. He was later instrumental in the passage of California's Drug Dealers Civil Liability Act, which allows citizens to sue drug dealers whom they feel are responsible for the drug-related deaths of their family members.

DRUG TRAFFICKERS/1910s-Present

Outside of the American Chinatowns and the enclaves inhabited by North African and Chinese immigrants in major European cities, drug traffickers in the early part of the 20th Century found their customers in lowlife saloons and whorehouses. One of the most notorious American drug traffickers in the early part of the century was Lucy "Ma" Beland (d. 1941), a mother of six. Beland grew weary of rural life in Texas and insisted that her husband, J.H. Beland, move the family to Fort Worth, in 1908. She had threatened her husband that unless he could give her the finer things in life, she would send their daughters out to work as prostitutes. Beland, an engineer for a cotton-oil gin, used up his savings to satisfy his wife's demands and went broke, leaving the family in 1912 and dying a few years later.

Ma Beland, true to her awful word, sent her daughters into prostitution, turning her Fort Worth home into a brothel and center of narcotics distribution. Her children all became either heroin or morphine addicts and her daughter Cora died of a morphine overdose smuggled to her by her own mother while she was in jail, where she was serving a term for prostitution. After the 1914 Harrison Narcotics Act became law, drugs were scarce and Ma's sons, Charles and Joseph Beland, became the top drug peddlers in the Southwest.

Harry Perzigian, who sued actor Carroll O'Connor in 1997, charging him with libel over his remarks in the 1995 drug-related suicide of his son, Hugh O'Connor.

Beland and her clan became rich and paid out enormous bribes to officials, who protected their widespread operations. The Federal Bureau of Narcotics began to concentrate its energies against the Beland mob in 1930 and, in the following year, obtained enough evidence on the drug clan to send Ma's daughter, Willie Beland, and her husband, Lester James, to prison in 1931. In 1935, FBN agents caught Charles Beland selling drugs and he was given a long term.

Not until 1937 was the infamous Ma Beland herself caught red-handed dealing drugs. An agent walked into her Fort Worth dry goods store and flashed a roll of hundred-dollar bills. The greedy old harridan could not resist the temptation of selling the undercover agent seven ounces of heroin. She was immediately arrested, tried, and given a two-year prison term.

Ma Beland would have received a longer term but the judge in the case, swayed by her feigned image of a kindly grandmother victimized by ruthless federal agents, gave Beland a reduced sentence "because of her advanced years." When released in 1939, Ma Beland returned to aggressively selling drugs, but she did not live to enjoy the fruits of further illegal earnings, dying in 1941. Her funeral was attended by only a few mourners since most of her relatives were in prison.

Carroll O'Connor is shown testifying in his 1997 trial against Perzigian; he was acquitted by a jury that agreed with him in his indictment of Perzigian.

A decade after Ma Beland's drug trafficking operations ground to a halt, an enterprising, young Italian gangster, Marius Ansaldi thought to dominate drug trafficking in France. He developed a widespread drug network in the country and was successful for some time during the late 1940s, until, through the combined efforts of French and U.S. agents, this major drug supplier was caught red-handed. During a drug bust in 1950, U.S. narcotics agents picked up the trail of Ansaldi in Paris and soon had an undercover agent, John C. Cusack, negotiating a deal for heroin with Ansaldi when the drug dealer disappeared.

New York drug traffickers are shown in disguise while preparing drugs for street sale.

Police officers are shown with a large cache of drugs and weapons seized from 1970s drug traffickers in New Jersey; such seizures would become routine in decades to come.

Cusack handed the case over to Commissaire Hugues of the French Surete. Hugues located a member of Ansaldi's gang and carefully watched his movements, until he led him to Ansaldi. At just the right moment, Hugues and eight of his men burst in on Ansaldi's operation at a villa in Montgeron, seizing Ansaldi and two chemists manufacturing drugs. Ansaldi and his gang, including Antoine Bergeret, who was picked up later, were convicted and sent to the Melun penitentiary.

At the same time Ansaldi was operating in France, Alphonse Attardi (b.1892) was deeply involved with drug trafficking controlled by Mafia kingpins in New York City. Known to his former Mafia associates as the Peacemaker, Attardi had taken a bum rap in Houston and gone to prison, while many of his friends went free. While Attardi was in prison, a bank had foreclosed on his small olive oil importing business on Christie Street in New York City and his wife, the one joy in his life, had died.

Agents from the Treasury Department visited him in 1952 to see if he would become an informer. The aging mobster told Agent O'Carroll that he was out of the drug trade. All he had left, he said, was his life and a little room on Delancey Street. "I can't do it," he said. "I'd be dead if I worked for you." O'Carroll left his card and told him to think it over.

Six months later a need for money prompted Attardi to make the phone call, and he agreed to work with the agents. His job was to introduce an undercover agent to some friends involved in the drug trade. Joe Tremoglie, who was fluent in Italian, was chosen to work with Attardi. In the next ten months the undercover agent met several of the major drug traffickers and capos working the Lower East Side, including Benny Bellanca and Pietro Beddia, who were put under heavy police surveillance. These men were soon snared in an all-encompassing net woven by Treasury agents. Attardi, the Peacemaker, collected his $5,000 reward and took his new girlfriend out of the country.

UNDER THE LAW/1910s-Present

Governments throughout the world, since the early years of the 20th Century, passed severe drug laws with equal punishments meted out to drug smugglers and pushers. In the United States, the 1906 Pure Food and Drug Act required labeling of any cannabis contained in over-the-counter remedies. The first stringent U.S. federal law governing the use of hard drugs was the passing of the Harrison Act in 1914, which made it a federal offense, among others, for any physician to administer morphine, except under special conditions.

Yet the smuggling of drugs into the United States, the country most plagued by hard-line drug addiction, continued and increased. By 1920, $20 million in drugs was smuggled into the United States each year, the most popular drug at that time being opium. By 1923, there were one to four million users of smuggled dope in the country, and by 1928, experts claimed that sixty-nine percent of all violent crimes in New York City could be traced to the use of cocaine.

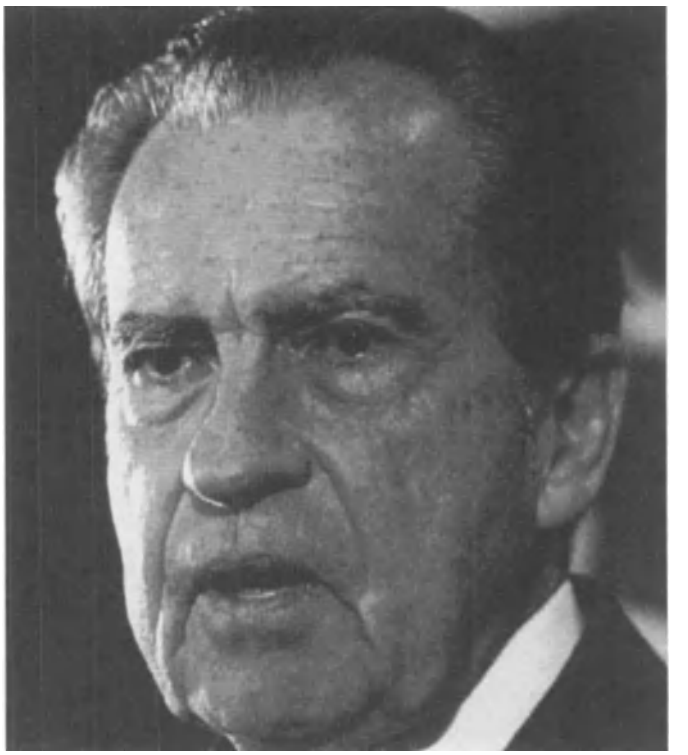
The Marijuana Tax Act of 1937, hotly debated today by present-day drug users, made it illegal to use cannabis. Strict federal enforcement of this law was carried out by the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, which operated under the Treasury Department from 1930 to 1973. This agency was headed by the controversial and unorthodox Harry Anslinger (1892-1975). Anslinger was the first federal law enforcement leader to publicly announce the existence of a national crime syndicate, which now reaps billions of dollars each year from the distribution and sale of illegal drugs.

Anslinger's announcement of the existence of the national crime syndicate caused FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover to denounce his law enforcement peer. Hoover denied the existence of such an organization and continued to do so almost to the 1960s. By that time, the facts were undeniable and even Hoover then admitted that organized crime and the Mafia existed.

Born in Altoona, Pa., Anslinger was attending Pennsylvania State College in 1914, when war broke out in Europe. When the U.S., entered the conflict in 1917, Anslinger went to work for the Ordnance Division of the War Department in Washington, D.C. He later held diplomatic posts in the Netherlands, Germany, Venezuela and the Bahamas, where he became acutely aware of the drug menace to the U.S.

After five years abroad in the diplomatic service, Anslinger returned to Washington in 1926, becoming the chief of the Division of Foreign Control with the Treasury Department. He represented the U.S. at the Conference on Suppression of Smuggling in London that year. By 1929, he was recognized as a foremost expert on the smuggling of illegal liquor and drugs into the U.S. Receiving a law degree in 1930, Anslinger was appointed the first U.S. Commissioner of Narcotics, a position he held through five presidencies. His uncompromising stance against drugs drew criticism from the American Medical Association and other regulatory organizations more concerned with treatment than punishment. Anslinger considered drug addiction a problem for criminal law enforcement. He urged medical treatment for addicts, but offered no sympathy to those who committed crimes to satisfy their habits.

Anslinger's handpicked agents in the Bureau of Narcotics were burly men who used any means, legal or not, to bust a drug ring. The Bureau drew criticism for its oft-times illegal methods, but the colorful Anslinger retorted to such criticism by stating that the ruthlessness of organized crime could only be met by similar measures. It was not uncommon, as the author learned in interviews with ex-FBN agents, for raids to be led by agents carrying baseball bats, which were liberally used on dope peddlers and smugglers, guaranteeing hospitalization, if not conviction, of those arrested.



President Richard Nixon, who established the Shafer Commission in 1972; he rejected the commission's suggestion that use of marijuana should be decriminalized.

The Bureau's files were quickly overflowing with reports of violence, from mayhem to murder, originating with users of drugs. One such report read: "On August 4, 1930, in a hotel room in Spokane, Washington, Joseph Mines, 26 years of age, battered almost beyond recognition the body of 74-year-old John Karakinikas. Apparently, Mines had never known Karakinikas before the moment he jumped through the window of his room and beat him to death. Mines had jumped from his own room 18 feet above, and after the crime jumped 30 feet to an alley without injury to himself. He said he felt as if he were flying, and he claimed to have no recollection of what he had done."

"Mines alleged that he had been crazed by smoking two marijuana cigarettes. A small quantity of the drug was found in his room, and he had just been released a few days previously after serving a sentence for the possession of marijuana." (Mines pleaded guilty to a manslaughter charge and was sentenced to twenty years in prison.) To specifically govern such conduct—the possession of marijuana—two federal laws were later enacted, the Boggs Act of 1952, and the Narcotics Control Act of 1956. Under these laws, a first-offense marijuana possession carried a minimum sentence of 2-10 years with a fine of up to $20,000. Congress, bowing to the enormous pressure from counterculture media in 1970, repealed most of the mandatory penalties for drug-related offenses, advocates insisting that the mandatory minimum sentences of the 1950s had done nothing to eliminate the drug culture that saw widespread use of marijuana in the 1960s.

Throughout his long career, Anslinger came under con-

President Ronald Reagan signed the powerful Anti-Drug Abuse Act in 1986, which called for mandatory life term prison sentences for repeated drug offenders.

stant criticism from FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, who early on resented Anslinger's depiction of a real criminal syndicate in the U.S. Anslinger's aggressive prosecution of organized crime leader Charles "Lucky" Luciano brought him applause from the international law enforcement community, except from Hoover, who resented the headlines Anslinger gleaned through the Luciano case.

While the FBI director focused on the dustbowl bandits of the 1930s, Anslinger compiled impressive lists of big city racketeers in the narcotics trade. It was Hoover who gleaned the favorable headlines. He mounted massive publicity campaigns that highlighted the sensational careers of bank robbers like John Dillinger and Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd—brought to bay by the FBI. On the other hand, Anslinger's crusade to combat the distribution of drugs by organized crime members was considered a law enforcement sideshow and received little press.

Yet Anslinger remained a vigilant foe of dangerous drugs. The effect of marijuana on youth obsessed the FBN director. His article, "Marijuana: Assassin of Youth," appeared in the July 1937 issue of American Magazine, one which shocked the nation and goaded politicians in that same year to pass the Marijuana Tax Act. The Act banished the cannabis plant from general medical use and caused it to be stricken from the official record of the Pharmacopoeia of the United States of America.

At the time, Anslinger stated: "The answer to the problem is simple: Get rid of drugs, users and pushers. Period." It was Anslinger who provided enormous pressure on legislators to pass the anti-marijuana acts in the 1950s. After thirty-two years as Commissioner of Narcotics, Anslinger retired in 1962. He died on November 14, 1975, at his home in Holidaysburg, Pennsylvania.

In 1972, the bipartisan Shafer Commission, appointed by President Richard Nixon at the direction of Congress, determined that laws regarding the personal use of marijuana should be decriminalized. President Nixon emphatically rejected that recommendation, but over the course of the 1970s, eleven states decriminalized marijuana use and most other states reduced their penalties for such use. A year after the Shafer Commission was established, the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs (BNND) was merged with the Office of Drug Abuse Law Enforcement (ODALE), under the title of the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA).

The Shafer Commission saw a widespread conservative backlash from millions of concerned parents, who, through organized groups, lobbied for stricter regulation of marijuana, and especially the prevention of use of this drug by teenagers. These powerful groups sought and got the support of the DEA and the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA). The DEA and other drug enforcement agencies throughout the world initiated sophisticated procedures by which to detect smuggled drugs, using X-rays on people and animals carrying drugs. By the 1970s, dogs were effectively used to sniff out drugs being smuggled into the U.S. and elsewhere. One dog, a German Shepherd named Trepp, was credited with more than 100 arrests up to 1979 and the recovery of more than $63 million worth of narcotics. Another intrepid dog named Snag, a Labrador retriever employed by U.S. Customs, was the all-time champion canine detective, responsible for 118 drug seizures and the recovery of more than $810 million worth of drugs.

The DEA was the guiding force in launching the effective War on Drugs campaign of the 1980s, one in which all school children at early grade level were taught the dangers of drug use, a campaign that has resulted in millions of drug-free youths disdaining such use. The state of California went against the grain in 1996, when voters in that state passed Proposition 215, which allowed the sale and medical use of marijuana for patients with AIDS, cancer, and other serious and painful diseases. This law stands in defiance of federal laws prohibiting the use of marijuana.

During the 1980s, President Ronald Reagan campaigned for stricter laws governing those who perpetrated drug-related crimes. In 1986, he signed the Anti-Drug Abuse Act, which instituted mandatory sentences for drug-related crimes. This new law worked in unison with the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, and one that raised federal penalties for marijuana possession and dealing. Penalties were based upon the amount of drugs involved in each offense.

For instance, possession of 100 marijuana plants received the same penalty as possession of 100 grams of heroin. The Anti-Drug Abuse Act was later amended to include a "three strikes and you're out" policy. Under this amendment, life sentences were mandatory for repeated drug offenders and even provided the death penalty for "drug kingpins." Reagan's successor, President George Bush, appearing in a national television appearance in 1989, declared a new war on drugs. During that year, a Panamanian dictator, Manuel Noriega, who had turned his country into a "Narco Nation," directly challenged the U.S. Bush would confront this swaggering drug kingpin with military force in order to close down his billion-dollar drug trade.

PANAMA'S DRUG CZAR/1980s

By the 1970s, the Latin and South American suppliers of drugs began to usurp the distribution channels long controlled by members of organized crime in the U.S. The bosses of the Mexican and Colombian drug cartels ordered their minions to infiltrate the distribution networks in the U.S. and elsewhere, which led to savage drug wars and countless murders. These new networks gleaned billions in drug dollars, but the Mexican and Colombian bosses, having no place to wash this money, looked about for a safe haven for their illegal cash. They found it in Panama through the dark offices of that country's tinpot dictator, Manuel Antonio Noriega (b.1937).

Ironically, Noriega had come to power in Panama in 1983 during an anti-drug campaign that initially won him the praise of U.S. officials (chiefly the CIA), who paid him hundreds of thousands of dollars each year to continue his suppression of the drug trade in his country. CIA agents slowly learned, however, that Noriega, instead of attacking drug cartels and traffickers, was collusively working with them, while laundering millions in drug money flowing chiefly from the Medellin drug cartel in Colombia.

Further, it was later proven that Noriega had taken millions in bribes from Medellin cartel boss Pablo Escobar, and had turned Panama into a haven for drug smugglers and established dozens of drug manufacturing plants in his country. At one point, the military strongman had personally supervised a failed attempt to smuggle more than 1.4 million pounds of marijuana into the U.S. Noriega had purchased a jetliner that was used exclusively to transport drug money earned from trafficking in the U.S. back to Panama, where it was placed in Panamanian banks.

On February 5, 1988, federal grand juries in Tampa and Miami, Florida, indicted Noriega in absentia for taking bribes from international drug traffickers. The swaggering dictator responded by threatening the U.S. with war, while waving a sword on a balcony in a drugged state. In a lightning military incursion to Panama, he was captured by U.S. forces in 1990 and taken to the U.S.

Noriega was tried in Miami, Florida, proceedings against him beginning on September 16, 1991. Prosecutors stated that Noriega intended to make Panama a center of cocaine manufacturing and distribution. Fifteen of Noriega's co-defendants had already pleaded guilty in plea-bargain arrangements and would later testify against their former chief. Noriega, was convicted on this testimony of drug trafficking and money laundering on April 9, 1992. He received a forty-year prison term.

On March 4, 1999, U.S. District Judge William Hoeveler reduced Noriega's sentence from forty to thirty years. Although parole in the U.S. federal prison system was abolished, Noriega still qualified for parole, because he was sentenced before its elimination. Judge Hoeveler stated that his decision to reduce the former dictator's sentence was based on the fact that many of Noriega's co-defendants, who had committed even more serious offenses, had already been released from prison.

Manuel Antonio Noriega, dictator and chief drug trafficker of Panama, who was deposed in 1990 and imprisoned in the U.S. the following year.

THE COLOMBIAN CARTELS/1970s-Present

On February 4, 1987, thirty-six Colombian police officers broke into the jungle hideout of drug kingpin Carlos Enrique Lehder Rivas (b.1947; AKA: Colombian Rambo; Joe Leather) in Guarne, outside Medellin. Lehder Rivas was flown to Miami, Florida, to stand trial, charged with smuggling more than 3.3 tons of cocaine into the U.S. The DEA accused him of exporting eighteen tons of cocaine to the U.S. between 1978 and 1980.

Born in the coffee growing region in Armenia, more than 100 miles south of Medellin, Lehder Rivas was brought to New York at an early age, and later ran a stolen car ring between Detroit, Canada, and South America. Lehder Rivas was arrested in January 1973 in Detroit, but jumped bail and moved to Florida, where he trafficked in marijuana. In September 1973, Lehder Rivas was arrested in Miami for possession of nearly 200 pounds of marijuana and sentenced to two years in prison. Following his release in 1975, the U.S. government deported Lehder Rivas to Bogota, Colombia.

In Colombia, Lehder Rivas learned to fly, and by 1979 had organized a distribution outfit specializing in aerial drug drops. He operated from the remote Bahamian island called Norman's Cay, where he built a fortress stocked with sensitive radar and aerial surveillance equipment. The DEA filed an indictment against Lehder Rivas in Tampa, Florida, but when the Bahamian police raided Norman's Cay, Lehder Rivas was gone. He had returned to Armenia, Colombia, where he built a lavish Bavarian-style hotel. Lehder Rivas also organized his own political party, the Movimiento Civico Latino Nacional (MCLN).

Following the extradition of four drug traffickers on January 4, 1985, by Colombian president Belisario Betancur Cuartas, Lehder Rivas vowed to spend millions of dollars destroying the Colombian government. He published his own newspaper, Quindio Libre, to attack the U.S., labeling America an imperialist government and promoting his candidacy for the Colombian senate. His rhetoric—a mixture of left and right wing fanaticism—however, appealed to few and Lehder Rivas lost the election.

The Colombian drug cartel organized its ranks with strict protocol in November 1981 after the abduction of drug gangster Fabio Ochoa Restrepo's daughter. A cooperative venture known as Muerte a Secuestradores (MAS or Death to Kidnappers) united the previously independent drug lords.

Following his surprise arrest and extradition to the U.S., in 1987, Lehder Rivas' seven-and-a-half-month trial in Florida ended on May 19, 1988, when a jury found him guilty on eleven counts, ranging from possession of cocaine to running a continuing criminal enterprise. In July 1988, Lehder Rivas was sentenced to life imprisonment without parole, plus 135 years and a fine of $350,000.

With Lehder Rivas deposed, Pablo Escobar Gaviria (1949-1993) became the most powerful drug lord on earth. Escobar, a multibillionaire who operated autonomously in Colombia with an army of more than 1,000 hired guns, was tracked down by an elite commando force, Colombia's Bloque de Busqueda (Search Unit), and shot and killed on December 9, 1993. The killing of Escobar, however, made little dent in the billion-dollar illegal drug trade flowing from Colombia to the U.S.

Escobar had become the prototype of the new international gangster, dubbed a "narcoterrorist." He headed the Medellin drug cartel and thousands of deaths were attributed to him. He operated an international drug-smuggling operation that reached into every corner of the U.S. and South America, the cocaine trade in the Western Hemisphere being largely dominated by him. On his orders thousands of competing gangsters, politicians, judges, prosecutors, journalists, police officials, and reformers were summarily murdered. His more than 1,000 killers-for-hire gunned down more than 400 Colombian policemen.

With billions in his coffers, Escobar lived in luxury, building dozens of comfortable hideouts and having several communications systems—phone, fax and computer—that linked him to his lieutenants and allowed him to keep tight control on his vast operations. He owned a mansion in Miami, Florida, and had a vast ranch that was stocked with giraffes, camels, and kangaroos, the drug kingpin having a taste for exotic animals.

Pablo Escobar Gaviria, Colombian billionaire drug czar, who was tracked down and killed in 1993.

On June 19, 1991, following the passing of a Colombian law that prohibited the extradition of Colombian nationals, Escobar surrendered to authorities. He had been indicted for drug trafficking and murder, but, under the new law, he could not be sent to the U.S. for trial. Following his conviction for drug trafficking, he was sent to a facility especially built for him (he paid the expenses for the construction) in Envigado, Colombia, not far from his massive drug operations in Medellin. His "prison" was more like a posh country retreat than a prison. When later realizing that government officials might overturn the new law and allow his extradition to the U.S., Escobar fled.

On the run from hideout to hideout by early 1993, Escobar was spending lavishly to stay out of the hands of the police, almost $1 million a day in payoffs to officials and police. Many residents in Medillin protected the drug czar, believing he was some sort of Robin Hood, because of the crumbs he gave them. Believing that police and military units would eventually track him down, Escobar thought to protect his family by sending his wife, Victoria Eugenia, his 16-year-old son, Juan Pablo, and his 9-year-old daughter, Manuela, to Germany for safety. The German government, at the urging of Luis Jorge Ochoa, who took over the declining Medillin drug cartel in Colombia after the death of Pablo Escobar; he bowed to the emerging Cali cartel and retired with his billions.

the U.S. and Colombian governments, denied the family admittance and returned the Escobars to Bogota, where they were used as live bait to entrap the drug lord.

The hunt for Escobar was led by the Bloque de Busqueda, but enormous help was given by American intelligence agencies, including the CIA, DEA, and NSA, the latter actually diverting spy-in-the-sky satellites to fly over Colombia in electronic search for the elusive drug lord. U.S. C-130 reconnaissance planes were sent from Panama to aid in the search. Supporting government commandos were the Cali drug lord brothers, Gilberto and Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela, who had been secretly funding a vigilante organization called Pepes (People Persecuted by Pablo Escobar). This group killed scores of Escobar's gangsters and even blew up the drug lord's touring car, once owned by Al Capone and prized by the drug czar.

On December 8, 1993, Escobar made a phone call to his son, Juan Pablo. The boy blurted: "Dad—hang up, because they will trace you." Escobar called again the next day and this time a police wiretapper was able to trace Escobar to a safe house in Medellin. A wiretapper in a stakeout radio van reported: "I see a man talking on the telephone," and pinpointed the safe house. Escobar himself saw the van in the street, telling his son: "I see something strange. See you later." He hung up and, wearing only pants and a white shirt ran barefooted to the attic.

Minutes later heavily armed members of the Busqueda broke down the door of the house and ran upstairs. By this time Escobar was attempting to escape over the rooftops, but the house was by then surrounded by more than 150 commandos. Escobar opened fire on them and they let loose a hailstorm of bullets, six striking and killing him. Dead, his body tumbled down the slope of the tiled roof to the street. Swarms of commandos gathered about his overweight corpse while an officer radioed the great news to headquarters in Bogota: "Viva Colombia!"

When hearing the news of his father's death, Juan Pablo Escobar shouted, "I'm going to kill all those sons-of-bitches [the commandos]," but the 16-year-old later recanted his remark. Escobar's death, although heralded as a triumph for law enforcement in Colombia and in the U.S., did not slow the cocaine traffic to North America. Indeed, the Cali cartel, which had always preferred to operate diplomatically instead of by sheer violence, benefitted enormously through Escobar's passing, and, from that point onward, the Cali drug cartel and its leaders, the Rodriguez brothers, not the Medellin cartel, became the dominant drug operation in Colombia, controlling 85 percent of the world's illegal cocaine trade.

The Medellin drug cartel, having lost most of its power with the death of Escobar, was taken over by Luis Jorge Ochoa (b.1950). The U.S. had in vain attempted to extradite Ochoa to the U.S., for trial in 1984. When the drug lord was arrested in 1996, American officials felt positive that Ochoa would be turned over to them. This was not the case. The Columbian government incensed U.S. law enforcement officials when, on July 5, 1996, he was set free.

Ochoa, it was believed, had made a deal with Colombian authorities in collusion with the powerful Cali Cartel, agreeing that he would retire if released. This is exactly what he did, living lavishly on the billions of dollars acquired by the Medillin cartel's manufacturing and distribution of cocaine. A considerable amount of those enormous drug funds were used, it was reported, to bring about his release.

MEXICO'S DRUG LORDS/1990s

Mexico's top drug lord, Juan Garcia Abrego (b.1944), had, for decades, been responsible for smuggling at least one third of the cocaine consumed in the U.S. Garcia Abrego's Gulf Cartel distributed the drug through Texas and other gulf states, as well as California. Through a sophisticated "wash cycle," Garcia Abrego laundered more than $2 billion each year through U.S. and foreign banks, paying off thousands of Mexican judges, law enforcement officers and officials to protect his widespread operations.

Garcia Abrego was the first drug lord to make the FBI's "Most Wanted" list, but apprehending the elusive drug lord proved next to impossible. He was shielded by the corrupt regime of President Carlos Salinas de Gortari and his henchman brother, Raul Salinas de Gortari, who was later imprisoned for his involvement in the 1994 assassination of reform politician, Jose Francisco Ruiz Massieu.

Hundreds of murders were attributed to Garcia Abrego, the victims being those who stood in the way of his well-greased drug cartel, centered in Monterey and Matamoros, Mexico. In addition to the countless grafters on his payroll, Garcia Abrego had as many as 20,000 drug suppliers, growers, traffickers and "mules" (actual carriers who smuggled cocaine, and, to a lesser degree, marijuana, across the U.S. border into Texas). He owned fleets of planes, buses, trucks and cars that were employed in his delivery system. At the top of his kickback roster were the financial agents and bankers, who had streamlined the laundering of Garcia Abrego's millions in U.S. currency.

Cash was collected through Garcia Abrego's cocaine network throughout the U.S., chiefly California, Illinois, New York, Florida and Texas, then funneled back to a warehouse in Houston, Texas. The cash was then bundled and moved by truck to Monterey and Matamoros, where it was placed in a system of currency exchanges owned by Garcia Abrego. His top agent, Ricardo Aguirre Villagomez (AKA: Kenny Rogers), a former gas station attendant, deposited the cash, mostly in a Monterey currency exchange business.

Mexican drug lord Juan Garcia Abrego, shown in custody in 1996, following an intensive manhunt for him throughout Northern Mexico; he was imprisoned in the U.S.

The cash, under the legitimate cover of the currency exchanges, was then sent by courier to the First City Texas Bank in McAllen, Texas. Aguirre Villagomez then wired the bank-secured funds from First City to Banker's Trust of New York. Antonio Giraldi and Mario Lourdes Reategui, "relationship managers" at Banker's Trust, then sent the money to numbered Swiss accounts or to the accounts of holding companies in the Cayman Islands, all of the accounts and companies being owned by Garcia Abrego.

When FBI agents and other federal officials began to unravel this money-laundering system, Giraldi and Reategui resigned from Banker's Trust and acquired positions at American Express Bank International (AEBI) in Beverly Hills, California. They established another Cayman Island holding company for Aquirre Villagomez and then AEBI made millions in loans to that company, which used its own portfolio in other banks as collateral. This firm then invested in legitimate enterprises for which it made huge bank certificates of deposit in London and Swiss banks. Through these accounts, the firm then bought up auto dealerships, meat-packing plants and computer stores in Mexico. Similar purchases were made in the U.S.

By late 1995, the hunt for the always-moving Garcia Abrego intensified in Mexico, mostly at the hard prodding of U.S. officials and President William Clinton, who had rated Mexico's anti-drug efforts as poor. Other U.S. officials labelled Mexico as a "Narco Nation." Mexico's newly-elected president, Ernesto Zedillo Ponce de Leon, in order to regain the good graces of the U.S., stepped up the search for Garcia Abrego.

On January 14, 1996, an elite group of Mexican anti-drug agents, fifteen in number and all heavily armed, surrounded a walled ranch house outside Villa Juarez, just south of Monterey, Mexico. The agents crouched next to the wall until dusk and then stormed over the wall and into the house, breaking down doors and crashing through windows. Garcia Abrego and two of his bodyguards were taken by surprise. The drug lord made a dash for a side door, escaped into the yard and attempted to dive over the wall, but agents tackled him.

Hustled to Mexico City, Garcia Abrego was smug and confident. He joked with his captors, saying: "You're going to be hearing from me." He believed that once he was imprisoned in Mexico City, it would be only a short time before he was released, by prison escape or other methods that would be arranged through his high-level and heavily bribed government contacts. The drug lord was shocked when arriving in Mexico City to learn that he would not be held in that city at all. He was told that he was being immediately sent to Houston, Texas, where he would be turned over to FBI agents, and thereafter be tried in the U.S. for the many charges against him.

Garcia Abrego lost his air of confidence on the flight to Houston, snarling at his captors: "You are all dead men!" When arriving at Houston, he was taken into custody by armed FBI agents, who took him to a federal detention center. Tried and convicted of drug trafficking, Garcia Abrego was imprisoned. At first his capture was heralded as a significant victory over the drug cartel bosses of Mexico, but critics claimed that President Zedillo had turned over Garcia Abrego as a token gesture to appease President Clinton, who, on March 1, 1996, was to grade or "certify" Mexico for its anti-drug efforts, and that Amado Carrillo Fuentes (1956-1997), Mexico's new top drug lord, had already taken over Garcia Abrego's empire, down to the last grunting "mule" and was, at that very time, preparing to ship seventy-five tons of cocaine into the U.S.

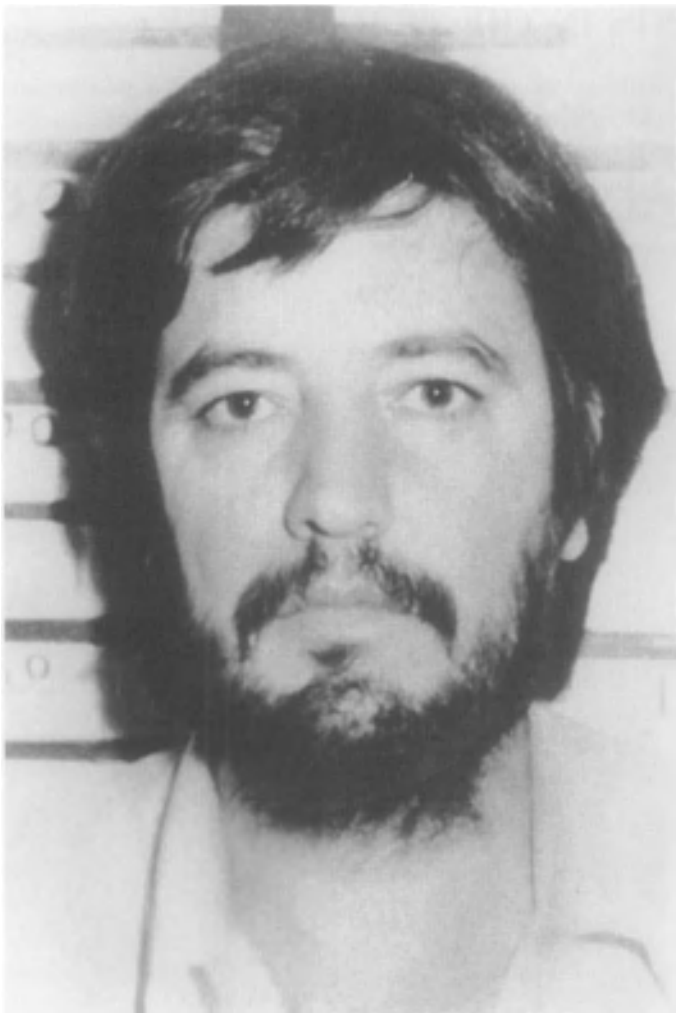
Mexico's new drug lord was an enterprising, clever criminal, who, as a teenager, began his career in the Mexican drug trade as one of the tens of thousands smuggling cocaine and marijuana into the United States. Carrillo Fuentes grew up in poverty and had little formal education, He had few prospects for the future until he entered Mexico's thriving and illegal drug trade at the age of thirteen. He first served as a "mule," a carrier of drugs, sneaking over the U.S. border with packs of cocaine strapped around his body. He next became a subdistributor of drugs and then, while killing off his competitors with devastating alacrity, he took over most of the drug trafficking in northern Mexico.

Sent to prison, Carrillo Fuentes befriended the warden, Adrian Carrera Fuentes, promising him great riches when he was released, if Carrera would aid him in his drug trafficking. This is exactly what happened in the early 1990s. Following Carrillo's release, he met with Carrera, who later became head of the state police. In exchange for millions of dollars in bribes, Carrera allowed Carrillo to operate his drug smuggling without interference and actually provided state police agents to guard the drug trafficker and his drug-smuggling minions.

In addition, Carrera provided protection against local police when shipments were taken to the U.S. border. Within a few years, Carrillo Fuentes had grown fabulously rich. Some estimates had him accumulating as much wealth as Bill Gates of Microsoft, gathering a fortune of more than $25 billion by the mid-1990s. He purchased a huge ranch in his native state of Sinaloa, north of Mexico City. There he played the part of Robin Hood, providing the money to build a new church in his hometown and slaughtering cattle on his ranch at Christmas and giving the meat to the poor. He bought lavish homes and safe houses throughout Mexico and in Cuba and Chile.

Carrillo Fuentes, however, appeared to lose his vast influence with government officials in Mexico late in 1996. Some claimed that he was hoarding his billions and refused to give up larger portions of the spoils to Mexican officials. In January 1997, his ranch was raided by Mexican army troops just as his sister's wedding party was beginning to celebrate at the Carrillo Fuentes ranch in Sinaloa. The raid was apparently a warning to open up his coffers, but Carrillo Fuentes, by then the largest drug cartel boss in Mexico, had decided to quit the racket and leave the country.

In February 1997, Carrillo Fuentes visited Cuba and Chile, making investments that were apparently aimed at establishing residency. He was accompanied by top aides, mostly bodyguards, but one of his "advisers" was Ricardo Reyes Rincon, a surgeon and native of Colombia, who had attended Autonomous University in Guadalajara. It was clear that when Carrillo



The ferocious Mexican drug lord, Amado Carrillo Fuentes, shown while in prison in the early 1990s; he later became a billionaire, controlling most of Mexico's government officials, who were on his staggering payroll.

The badly-scarred face of the dead Carrillo Fuentes; the drug lord attempted to have his appearance changed through plastic surgery, but his doctors botched the job and were reportedly murdered.

Fuentes and his party returned to Mexico, the drug lord had decided to abandon his lucrative but dangerous business and to also completely alter his appearance. He would have plastic surgery performed on his face and his body would be altered by liposuction, wherein all the fat would be sucked from beneath his skin.

Reyes arranged for the surgery with Dr. Ramon Lopez Salcedo, who had been a classmate at medical school. Lopez called in two other specialists, Dr. Jaime Godoy Singh and Dr. Carlos Avila Meigem, to aid Reyes in the surgery. On July 3, 1997, Reyes, Avila and Godoy went to work on Carrillo Fuentes, who had checked into a Mexico City clinic under an assumed name. Godoy began resculpting the drug trafficker's nose, while Avila carried out other facial surgery and performed radical liposuction, drawing many liters of fat from Carrillo's bloated body.

According to reports, the eight-hour operation was a disaster, and the drug czar's face had been mutilated, the tip of his nose snipped off, his eyelids bruised and purple after numerous incisions, the chin sliced away, and the flesh about his mouth drawn so tight that his clenched teeth showed in a fierce, maniacal smile. He looked monstrous. Moreover, so much fat had been liposuctioned away that Carrillo Fuentes' entire body appeared withered. It is not known whether the drug lord died under the knife or survived for a few hours. One story held that he revived, took one look at his hideous face and shrunken body and went berserk, ordering his goons to kill the doctors immediately. Accordingly, all three physicians were taken to the State of Guerrero and murdered, their bodies mutilated, sealed in drums, and left by the side of a road.

Oddly, all three physicians were later charged with murder, Mexican officials stating that the surgeons intentionally killed their patient by giving Carrillo Fuentes anesthetics combined with Dormicum, a sleeping potion. Mariano Herran Salvatti, chief of Mexico's anti-drug agency, stated, "We have concluded that, acting with malice and with the intention of taking his [Carrillo Fuentes'] life, these physicians applied a combination of medicines that resulted in the death of the trafficker."

Though some authorities refused to believe Carrillo Fuentes had died, his own mother, Aurora Fuentes, after viewing the hideous face and limp body in a casket, stated "Yes, it is my son. (Her identification prompted one wag to state that the dead man's countenance was "a face that only a mother could love.") Others claimed that Fuentes was lying to shield her still-alive son, who planned to fake his own death by substituting the disfigured body of another.

Thomas Constantine, head of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, insisted that fingerprints from the body had been matched to those of Carrillo Fuentes. Mexico's ambassador to Washington, Jesús Silva Herzog, was irked at Constantine's remarks, stating that the DEA chief was a "cretin" and that it was for Mexican authorities to confirm the drug czar's death. This they later did, they said, after conclusively identifying the corpse as that of Carrillo Fuentes through DNA.

OTHER NOTABLE DRUG EVENTS IN THE 20TH CENTURY

January 15, 1900: An Arab medical text prescribed cannabis seeds mixed with bread as a treatment for tuberculosis.

January 10, 1904: The Boston Globe reported that the U.S. government was growing cannabis and opium in gardens along the Potomac, to be used later in tests of the drugs' therapeutic potential.

May 12, 1905: Herbert Croker, the son of former Tammany Hall leader, Richard "Boss" Croker (1841-1922), was found dead of a drug overdose in New York City.

April 3, 1908: Five San Francisco pharmacists who had supplied addicts with drugs were arrested on a warrant from the California State Board of Pharmacies.

January 31, 1910: "Vasta Herne," a play chronicling a woman's drug addiction, premiered in New York City.

December 18, 1914: San Francisco police conducted massive raids on opium dens and brothels where narcotics were easily available, arresting scores of prostitutes, who were users and peddlers of drugs.

April 15, 1915: Hundreds of drug addicts flooded New York's public hospitals due to their inability to obtain narcotics under the U.S. Anti-Narcotic Act, which went into effect on March 1, 1915.

September 8, 1915: Henry Goddard Thomas, known as the "King of Cocaine," was arrested in New York on drug charges.

June 26, 1916: After pleading guilty to unlawful possession of narcotics in New York City, Salvatore Charles "Lucky" Luciano (1897-1962) was sentenced to a one-year prison term. He was paroled after six months.

May 8, 1920: The House of Delegates of the AMA vowed to eliminate heroin from all medical preparations.

September 10, 1920: Olive Thomas (Oliveretta Elaine Duffy, 1884-1920), a popular film actress, who had shot to fame after posing nude for a celebrated Vargas painting, and who had appeared in twenty-three films, was found dead from an overdose of drugs in the hotel suite she shared with her husband, actor Jack Pickford (brother of Mary Pickford) in Paris, France, where the couple was honeymooning. One report stated that a hotel valet found Thomas lying on a sable cape, holding a bottle of mercury bichloride tablets. Another report, hushed up by movie moguls, insisted that Thomas, who had a long history of drug abuse, had overdosed herself with an injection of heroin. Still another story held that Jack Pickford found his bride lying in a bathroom, but still alive. A physician was called and the flapper revived briefly, jocularly saying: "Well, doctor. Paris has got me!" Conjectures aside, it was never determined whether Thomas' death was the result of murder, suicide or accidental death. A coroner chose the latter to categorize her demise. Her estate was later auctioned off, with Mabel Normand tenaciously bidding $1,425 to obtain Thomas' gold toilet set; Normand herself would later die from a drug overdose on February 23, 1930.

Silent screen star Olive Thomas, shown with her new husband, Jack Pickford, sailing for a honeymoon in France in 1920; weeks later she died in Paris from a drug overdose.

December 14, 1920: Denver hoodlum, "Big Time Charlie" Allen, was sentenced to five years for drug trafficking.

August 30, 1921: Several thousand dollars worth of opium, being illegally smuggled to prisoners at San Quentin, was intercepted by agents from the California State Board of Pharmacy.

September 8, 1921: Federal agents confiscated opium, heroin and cocaine worth hundreds of thousands of dollars after a wild shootout with the crew of the S.S. King Alexander, docked in New York Harbor.

May 26, 1922: Congress passed the Jones-Miller Narcotic Drug Import and Export Act, which controlled the importation of opium and its derivatives for medical uses, and banned the import or export of opium for smoking.

January 2, 1923: John Barker, who ran dope traffic from a fraudulent clinic in Oakland, California, was arrested on federal drug charges.

January 11, 1923: The New York Times proclaimed marijuana as the city's "latest habit-forming drug."

January 28, 1923: Boston narcotics agent Ralph A. Fry was convicted for taking bribes from a Portland, Maine, drug ring.

March 29, 1923: The cocaine addiction of film actress Juanita Hansen (1895-1961) was exposed in the national press. Hansen, whose movie career dated back to 1915, began as one of Mack Sennett's "Bathing Beauties," and appeared in many dramatic roles in serials produced by Pathe, Universal and Warner Brothers, earning $1,500 a week in 1918 (then a huge salary). She was known as "The Queen of Thrills," but he career disintegrated in 1921, when her cocaine addiction became so severe that she could no longer perform before the cameras. She attempted to quit the habit and was thought rehabilitated in 1928, when she was being considered for a top role in a Broadway play. At that time she was terribly burned by scalding hot water in a hotel accident in New York and to ease her pain she was given morphine, to which she immediately became addicted, preventing her ability to again perform. In 1934, Hansen appeared at carnivals and in sideshows where she lectured on the evils of drug addiction. In 1941, she attempted suicide by an overdose of sleeping pills. Hansen then abandoned her theatrical career altogether, taking a clerking job for a railroad. She died of a heart attack in 1961.

Silent screen star Juanita Hansen in a scene from the 1916 serial film, The Secret of the Submarine; her cocaine addiction ruined her career.

June 5, 1923: Under the alias of "Luciana," heroin-carrying Salvatore Charles "Lucky" Luciano was arrested by New York police. Charges were dropped when he led lawmen to a stash of heroin belonging to enemy gangsters. Luciano, a crafty and devious criminal, would, within fifteen years, become head of the U.S. national crime syndicate and be the most powerful crime boss in America.

January 11, 1926: Famed American sculptor William Ordway Partridge (1861-1930) was discovered to be a drug addict through the medical records of a New York hospital.

September 9, 1926: Jack "Legs" Diamond (1896-1931), a feared bootlegger and gang boss in New York City, was discharged hours after being arrested for smuggling narcotics in Mount Vernon, New York.

June 3, 1927: The Chicago Tribune accused the city's Mexican community of bringing marijuana into the city's classrooms.

October 3, 1928: More than $1,500,000 worth of opium was found behind false partitions on the ocean liner President Harrison, after it docked in Jersey City, New Jersey. It was the largest opium seizure of its time.

December 8, 1928: More than $5 million worth of heroin was confiscated in coordinated raids on hotel rooms in New York, Chicago and on a passenger train in Buffalo, New York. It was called the biggest narcotics bust of the century to date.

January 18, 1929: The Narcotics Farm Act passed, establishing facilities for the treatment of addicts.

July 10, 1929: The wife of former Chinese consul Yin Kao admitted smuggling more than $600,000 worth of opium into the U.S. "for friends." She was deported later that year.

July 20, 1929: Heiress Dolores Elizabeth Ford claimed her marriage to a black man had taken place while she was under the influence of narcotics.

September 20, 1929: The League of Nations adopted a plan to curtail the world's drug trade.

December 16, 1929: Gambler Arnold Rothstein (1882-1928), alleged to be the largest drug supplier in New York, was murdered in a hotel room after playing poker with a group of sharpers. The homicide was never solved.

February 22-23, 1930: Film actress Mabel Normand (1894-1930), a former Mack Sennett star and one of the most popular movie comediennes of the silent era, died from tuberculosis, complicated by her long addiction to cocaine. Normand, who was known as the "Queen of Comedy" and the "Female Chaplin," became a cocaine addict before 1920, but her film career continued under protective moguls like Samuel Goldwyn and film director William Desmond Taylor. Taylor, who had been having a long love affair with the actress, tried to end Normand's drug addiction. He was murdered on the evening of February 1, 1922 and it was later learned that Normand had been the last person to see him alive. She and Mary Miles Minter, another popular silent screen actress who had also been seeing Taylor, were both suspects in the killing, one never solved. The scandal resulting from the Taylor killing all but wrecked the careers of both Normand and Minter. Fans by the millions boycotted the films of both actresses and Normand's reputation was further sullied when her chauffeur shot and wounded millionaire Courtland Dines with her pistol on New Year's Eve 1923. She married actor Lew Cody and the couple exhausted their nights in one wild party after another throughout the roaring Twenties. Normand's cocaine addiction became so severe that she was placed in a sanitarium in 1929, where she remained for six months, until her death on February 22-23, 1930.

Screen comedienne Mabel Normand, who became addicted to cocaine, which brought about her premature death in 1930.

July 5, 1930: Following the mysterious disappearance of Reginald Arthur Lee, British acting consul-general in Marseilles, France, there was widespread belief that he was the victim of the drug smugglers he was investigating. Lee's body was never found.

June 8, 1931: Show girl Starr Faithfull (Starr Wyman, 1906-1931), reportedly the mistress of a powerful Boston politician, was found dead on the sandy shoreline of Long Beach, the cause of her death certified as drowning. The coroner stated that she had been rendered unconscious with drugs before she died. Her death was ruled accidental, though most believed the partying flapper had been murdered. John O'Hara's novel and the subsequent 1960 film based on the book, Butterfield 8, was wholly drawn from the Faithfull case.

September 23, 1931: Custom officials in Shanghai seized a huge heroin shipment intended for delivery to the U.S. Chinese authorities claimed that the drugs were being smuggled by Japanese members of the Black Dragon Society to raise funds for Japan's war machine.

October 16, 1933: Marijuana use was determined to be a contributing factor when Victor Licata murdered five family members with an ax in Tampa, Florida.

January 24, 1934: A dope ring that included hundreds of prisoners and scores of guards and a deputy warden, was uncovered at Welfare Island Prison in New York.

February 22, 1936: Melody Maker, a British music magazine, published an expose on widespread marijuana use by British musicians.

October 28, 1941: M. Elias, Harlem's biggest drug dealer was arrested and charged with drug smuggling. He was not convicted.

November 21, 1945: In Palermo, Italy, the top Mafia dons met to organize their plan for international drug trafficking.

April 8, 1947: Boss of one of the biggest drug smuggling rings in the U.S., Joseph "Pip the Blind" Gagliano hanged himself in Manhattan before being sent to Sing Sing on a narcotics conviction.

May 28, 1947: Blues singer Billie Holiday was convicted for being a drug addict (heroin) and was sentenced to a year and a day in federal prison.

June 15, 1948: Jazz musician Charlie "The Bird" Parker was arrested in Manhattan's Dewey Square Hotel for drug violations.

January 8, 1949: Several importers of a $300,000 cache of opium were arrested by New York City Customs agent Charles E. Wyatt. Wyatt's claim that "Lucky" Luciano was behind the smuggling ring was unsubstantiated.

September 24, 1950: Federal agent Anker M. Bangs was shot to death by John Wong, a suspected drug dealer, during a raid in St. Paul, Minnesota.

April 24, 1951: More than 3,000 heroin tablets were stolen from a London hospital by Kevin Patrick Saunders.

December 25, 1955: Massive drug raids in Houston, Texas, by customs officers snared dozens of dealers and pushers, and collected huge drug caches and millions of dollars in drug money.

June 2, 1958: Leroy Jefferson, reportedly a leading U.S. drug dealer, was arrested in New York City, but was released due to lack of evidence.

December 13, 1958: The Italian Court of Appeals in Rome freed Salvatore Charles "Lucky" Luciano, who had been deported to Italy from the U.S. many years earlier. The Court declared that Luciano had "nothing to do with murder, narcotics, or illegal rackets." Luciano was then ostensibly in retirement, although it was widely known that even in his exile in Italy, he directed drug trafficking in the U.S., remaining one of the directors of the U.S. crime syndicate which he had helped to create more than twenty years earlier. Luciano, who had killed dozens of people in his long crime career, died in 1962.

Charles "Lucky" Luciano, a founder of the U.S. crime cartel, who instituted widespread drug trafficking in America and was deported to Italy, where a court stated that he was not involved in criminal pursuits.

March 10, 1959: West Coast mobster Anthony Marcello was arrested in Los Angeles for drug trafficking.

October 3, 1960: U.S. Narcotic Bureau agents arrested drug trafficker Adolphe Tarditi, Guatemalan Ambassador Muricio Rosal, and an airline steward, confiscating 100 pounds of heroin valued at $20 million, and $26,000 in cash, at a New York City intersection.

March 30, 1961: The United Nations adopted the Single Convention, which allowed each country to adopt its own laws against the cannabis plant.

January 24, 1962: Mafia members Mario Caruso and Salvatore Mamesi, who had operated large drug rings in Europe, were arrested in Madrid, Spain, for narcotics violations and bail-jumping. Each received a fifteen-year prison sentence.

March 22, 1963: Drug trafficker Alvin Beigel was arrested in Queens, New York, in possession of more than $3 million worth of heroin.

March 29, 1963: Rock 'n' Roll singer Jimmy "Baby Face" Lewis was arrested in New York City on drug possession charges. Police later stated that his arrest led to the uncovering of a nationwide narcotics ring.

May 10, 1963: Professional football player, Eugene "Big Daddy" Lipscomb, died from a suspected heroin overdose.

January 21, 1964: On orders of Michael Gargano, a crime syndicate terrorist, Chicago policeman and mob drug pusher Thomas N. Durso killed heroin addict and informant Anthony "Lover" Moschiano.

February 7, 1968: Actor Nick Adams (1931-1968) was found dead from a drug overdose; his death was thought to be suicide, but murder was not ruled out.

February 11, 1969: An all-out war on organized crime was declared by President Richard M. Nixon, who asked Congress for $61 million to combat drug trafficking. Governments of several other nations were asked to cooperate with the U.S. in its war on organized crime and, in particular, the campaign against international drug trafficking.

February 6, 1971: Joaquin Gonzales, chief of air traffic control at Panama's international airport, was arrested in the Canal Zone. He would be convicted and sentenced in Texas for his role in facilitating drug trafficking in his country.

January 9, 1972: A "dope" war erupted in Detroit, Michigan. It claimed more than 200 victims in nine months.

January 28, 1972: Tiring of conflicts between the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs and customs officials, President Nixon established the Office for Drug Abuse Law Enforcement.

February 3, 1972: New York City drug dealer Barry Glen Lipsky began confessing to his crimes to police. His information led to one of the largest roundups of drug dealers in U.S. history.

May 16, 1972: Enrique Barrera was arrested in Manhattan as he attempted to receive a 100 kilogram shipment of heroin. Four months later, U.S. customs agents intercepted several South American couriers in Miami as they tried to bring a large shipment of cocaine into the city. Barrera, who was out on bail, was identified as the intended recipient and arrested again on September 12, 1972.

January 1, 1973: East coast drug lord Frank "Pee Wee" Matthews, who supervised drug processing mills in New York City and widely distributed cocaine and heroin, was arrested in Las Vegas, Nevada.

January 23, 1974: Carmine "The Cigar" Galante was paroled in New York after serving several years in prison for dope smuggling. Galante was a top Mafia kingpin who supervised national distribution of drugs for the U.S. crime syndicate.

November 20, 1974: Indictments were issued in a Brooklyn, New York, federal court, naming fifty-eight suspected heroin and opium smugglers and twenty-five co-conspirators. Stemming from the investigation of a global network led by Wong Shing Kong, the cartel used Scandinavian seamen and Chinese distributors to import drugs into New York, San Francisco and Canada.

January 9, 1976: Teo Hock-Song, a Malaysian stevedore, was sentenced to death in Singapore for morphine smuggling.

April 2, 1976: John Thomas Jova, the son of the U.S. ambassador to Mexico, was sent to prison in Maidstone, England, for two-and-a-half years for drug smuggling.

May 1, 1976: Actress Louise Lasser (b.1939), the first wife of comedian Woody Allen, was arrested on charges of cocaine possession in Beverly Hills, California.

July 18, 1976: DEA agents arrested six members of a drug ring led by Oscar Mancillas, in Joliet, Illinois. The ring was reputed to have imported $12 million worth of heroin a month to the Chicago area.

October 16, 1976: The U.S. Coast Guard intercepted a Panamanian freighter, the Don Emelio, off the coast of the Bahamas. Agents reported that the ship carried eighty tons of marijuana and 400 pounds of cocaine. At the time it was the largest seizure of drugs ever recorded.

October 28, 1976: Japanese police arrested 2,489 people in Tokyo in massive drug raids, confiscating large amounts of illegal drugs.

November 19, 1976: Chow Sae Choorachait and Supol Laohavichairat, two Thai citizens, were arrested in Atlanta, Georgia, and were in possession of more than $3 million worth of heroin carried in hollowed-out books.

February 1, 1977: Coast Guard officers apprehended a drug boat, the Night Train, off the coast of Florida, arresting thirteen men, while seizing fifty-four tons of marijuana valued at $21.6 million.

February 20, 1977: Marijuana smuggler Robert Yuckman was murdered by one of his employees at his home in Coconut Creek, Florida.

March 11, 1977: Actress Anjelica Huston (b.1951), the daughter of famed film director John Huston and granddaughter of the great actor Walter Huston, was arrested for cocaine possession in the home of actor Jack Nicholson, while police were searching the house for evidence related to charges that film director Roman Polanski had drugged and raped a 13-year-old girl there the previous night. Huston maintained a common-law marriage with Nicholson from 1973 to 1989. Nicholson was in Europe at the time of the drug bust. Statements about drug use were later attributed to Nicholson, such as: "That the repressive nature of the legalities vis-a-vis drugs are destroying the legal system and corrupting the police system;" and: "The only reason that cocaine is such a rage today is because people are too dumb and too lazy to get themselves together and roll a joint." Huston was quoted as saying: "Of course, drugs were fun. And that's what so stupid about anti-drug campaigns—they don't admit that."

Actress Anjelica Huston, shown with actor Jack Nicholson in the 1985 film, Prizzi's Honor; she was arrested for cocaine possession in Nicholson's home, where she maintained a common-law marriage with Nicholson.

March 23, 1977: Twenty-one people in a heroin-smuggling ring centered in Ypsilanti, Michigan, and headed by Richard Phillips, were arrested at several sites in Cleveland, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh and Washington, D.C.

April 10, 1977: Four members of the Rastafarian cult, a sect which included marijuana smoking in its ritualistic worship, were found murdered in Brooklyn, New York. At least two of the members were known marijuana dealers.

July 3, 1977: Three men were killed during the sale of $60,000 worth of marijuana near Turkey Point, in the Florida Keys.

August 14, 1977: More than $350,000 and assorted narcotics were confiscated by police in Warwick, Rhode Island, after a chain of events unraveled a large drug distribution network headed by Meyer Lansky and Robert Vesco.

November 28, 1977: Sixteen tons of marijuana valued at $8 million was seized and seven people were arrested, including five who were members of the Ethiopian Zion Coptic Church, in a drug raid on Miami's Star Island.

December 20, 1977: As part of Operation Snowbird, a drug "sting" operation, planes used for marijuana smuggling were seized at Pompano Beach and Sebring, Florida. Ten days later, as part of the same operation, a plane containing seventeen tons of marijuana was captured in Florence, South Carolina, while a yacht with two tons of marijuana aboard was captured at Fort Lauderdale, Florida. On January 10, 1978, the same operation snared eight people and 19,000 pounds of marijuana in a drug raid at Charleston, South Carolina.

January 19, 1978: New York drug kingpin Nicky Barnes was sentenced to life imprisonment and fined $125,000 for operating a "continuing criminal enterprise."

March 26, 1978: Drug dealers Carlos Fernando Quesada and Rodolfo Rodriguez were arrested in Miami, where officials seized fifty-five pounds of cocaine valued at $14 million and $900,000 in cash.

June 12, 1978: Police arrested two men and seized $1.2 billion worth of cocaine, after blocking the takeoff of a private plane on Great Exuma Island in the Bahamas.

June 28, 1978: Former TV newsman Jack Kelly was one of five men murdered in Boston after a dispute involving cocaine.

July 19, 1978: Giorgio Giuliano, deputy chief of police in Sicily, who had successfully undermined numerous Mafia drug operations, was murdered in a Palermo café. Casare Terranova, a 58-year-old judge appointed to investigate the Giuliano murder, was himself murdered, shot to death by Mafia motorcyclists in Palermo, on September 26, 1978.

December 14, 1978: Three Iranians were arrested in California while attempting to smuggle 35 pounds of opium concealed in hollowed-out packets of pictures of Ayatollah Khomeini.

January 6, 1980: Gaetano Costa, a Sicilian prosecutor of numerous Mafia drug dealers, was murdered in Palermo, Sicily.

January 17, 1980: Former Beatle Paul McCartney (b.1942) was arrested for marijuana possession and jailed for ten days in Tokyo, Japan. The arrest and imprisonment caused McCartney's spectacular career to go into a nose-dive. He went into seclusion, but, reportedly disdaining drugs, he made a comeback, his status repaired to the point where Queen Elizabeth II knighted him in 1997.

June 3, 1980: Bolivian drug lord Roberto Suarez, Sr. was indicted by a federal grand jury, although he was not then in U.S. custody.

October 7, 1980: Film producer Robert Evans (b.1930), who headed production for Paramount Studios in the early 1970s, pleaded guilty to agreeing to buy $19,000 worth of cocaine in July 1980. He was given a year's probation in New York City for drug possession. Evans later produced an anti-drug TV special called Get High on Yourself. In May 2002, he was given a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

November 8, 1980: William and Tracy Melton, facing minimum sentences for cocaine and marijuana possession, swallowed cyanide and died in a Rockville, Maryland, courtroom.

February 26, 1981: Isaac Kattan, a Colombian drug financier, known as South Florida's "Al Capone," was arrested in possession of twenty kilos of cocaine at an intersection in Miami.

August 4, 1981: Bolivian President Luis Garcia Meza resigned after his government was charged with human rights violations and cocaine trafficking.

February 20, 1982: Former basketball star James Bradley was killed by members of the syndicate on a Portland, Oregon street. According to police, the drug traffickers feared that Bradley would reveal their identities and operations to avoid a jail term for drug possession.

March 5, 1982: Actor and comedian John Belushi (1949-1982) died after injecting a mixture of cocaine and heroin in a bungalow at the Chateau Marmont, popular celebrity hotel in Los Angeles. Some years later his companion, Cathy Smith, was sentenced to three years in prison for supplying the actor with the drugs. Belushi had taken drugs for some time and became addicted to cocaine about the time of his appearance in the film, The Blues Brothers (1980)

Dan Aykroyd and John Belushi are shown in the 1980 film The Blues Brothers at the time when Belushi became addicted to cocaine and from which he died from an overdose that was mixed with heroin.

March 9, 1982: Almost two tons of cocaine valued at $1.3 billion, were seized by customs officers at Miami Airport, found mixed in with a clothing shipment from Colombia.

June 30, 1982: Sepala Ekanayaka, who seized a 747 Alitalia jet just after takeoff from New Delhi, was later identified by narcotics officials in Colombia as having been involved in hashish smuggling in Yugoslavia in 1974 and morphine smuggling in 1981.

October 19, 1982: Car manufacturer John Zachary De Lorean (b.1925) was arrested in the Sheraton Plaza Hotel in Los Angeles for trying to buy and sell $24 million worth of cocaine in order to shore up his collapsing financial empire. De Lorean would be charged on December 20. He would be found not guilty on August 16, 1984, the jury mutely following the instructions of Judge Robert Takasugi, who instructed members: "If you find John De Lorean committed the acts charged, but did so as the result of entrapment, you must find him not guilty." Prosecutors were incensed with the judge's wording of his instructions, which, they felt, amounted to an order to the jury to find the car manufacturer innocent. Video tapes made by agents showing De Lorean negotiating with them for the buying and selling of drugs, did not indicate, in the perspective of most, that De Lorean was entrapped.

May 5, 1983: Sheik Juamir, 35-year-old Pakistani "heroin king," was turned over to authorities by tribal elders at the Khyber Pass in Pakistan.

July 9, 1983: In London, Michael Fagin, a drug addict, was found with his hand dripping blood, talking to the Queen in her bedroom at Buckingham Palace. He was arrested for trespassing.

March 10, 1984: Colombian police seized 13.8 tons of cocaine worth $1.2 billion from a jungle complex near the Yari river in Caqueta.

December 24, 1984: Gustavo Jacome Lemus, the second secretary of the Colombian Embassy in Madrid, was arrested on drug smuggling charges.

January 26, 1985: Masahisa Takenaka, the leader of the Yakuza which controlled all drug traffic in Japan, was shot to death, along with two of his bodyguards, in Osaka.

March 6, 1985: The bodies of two DEA agents were found in Guadalajara, Mexico, following their kidnaping by Mexican drug traffickers the previous month.

January 7, 1986: The foreign minister of Mauritius and three other ministers resigned after Mauritian members of parliament were arrested in the Netherlands for smuggling drugs.

December 14, 1986: A police and army drug raid in Karachi, Pakistan, triggered five days of rioting during which at least 180 people were killed.

December 15, 1987: Benjamin Herrera, a Colombian drug smuggler suspected of being the founder of a cartel supplying 80 percent of the cocaine brought into the U.S., was arrested in Davie, Florida.

January 5, 1988: Attorney General Carlos Hoyos of Colombia and two bodyguards were killed by drug traffickers near Medellin. Hoyos had sought to allow the U.S. to extradite members of the Medellin cartel.

February 11, 1988: Officials in Bangkok, Thailand, impounded 1,816 pounds of heroin, the largest cache of this drug ever seized.

October 11, 1988: Nine executives and seventy-six employees of the Luxembourg-based Bank of Credit and Commerce International S.A. were charged by the U.S. government with conspiracy to launder millions of dollars deposited by cocaine dealers.

February 21, 1989: FBI agents in Chicago arrested 70-year-old Joe Wing, a key figure in an international drug ring based in New York's Chinatown. Wing, reputedly the ring's Chicago connection, was tied to Fok Leung Woo, better known in New York as Peter Woo.

March 26, 1989: Richard Wallstrum was convicted as the ringleader of a $33 million cocaine ring which operated between California and South America from 1974 to 1984. Wallstrum and eleven others had been charged with trafficking in December 1987.

April 8, 1989: Mexican officials arrested top cocaine trafficker Miguel Angel Felix Gallardo, 43, and the entire police force of the city in Culiacan, which was the center of the drug ring.

May 2, 1989: Doctors in Chicago, Illinois, performed surgery on Kayode Olujare, 33, to remove 49 packets of 90 percent pure white heroin which he had ingested as a means of smuggling. Olujare had passed 32 more packets, but one packet had burst, putting him in danger of death. He was charged with possession.

September 29, 1989: DEA agents in Sylmar, California, seized 47,554 pounds of cocaine, considered to be the largest cache of drugs ever seized.

October 26, 1989: Kristan Bennett, 20, was arrested with two Turkish men after police in Costa del Sol, Spain, seized 109.2 kilograms of heroin valued at $42 million, this being the largest single heroin seizure in the country's history.

January 10, 1990: Gosie Mbachu was arrested at the Intercontinental Airport in Houston, Texas, by customs agents for drug smuggling after an X-ray showed his stomach contained 42 condoms filled with heroin.

May 19, 1990: Jose Abello Silva, a key figure in the Medellin drug cartel, was convicted on federal drug charges. On May 29, 1990, he was sentenced to 30 years in prison and fined $5 million.

June 4, 1990: Marion Barry's trial on drug charges began. The mayor of Washington, D.C., faced eleven counts involving cocaine use and three felony counts of lying to a grand jury. On June 28, 1990, prosecutors showed a video tape of Barry smoking crack cocaine in a Washington hotel room in January 1990. Defense attorneys claimed that the tape reinforced their claim that Barry had been entrapped. Barry would be found guilty on one count of possessing crack cocaine on August 10, 1990, but a mistrial was declared when the jury deadlocked on 12 other counts. On October 20, 1990, Barry was sentenced to six months in prison and fined $5,000. Federal Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson said that Barry's conviction and sentence set an example for other public officials and that Barry had given "aid, comfort and encouragement to the drug culture at large."

Marion Barry, mayor of Washington, D.C.; sent to prison for drug offenses.

February 16, 1991: Drug trafficking terrorists exploded a bomb, killing twenty-two people and injuring another 140 persons near a bullfighting ring at Medellin, Colombia, in order to intimidate anti-drug officials.

February 19, 1993: Else Christensen, a 79-year-old medical office worker in Levy County, Florida, was found guilty of running marijuana from Texas to Florida. She would be sent to prison.

March 28, 1993: U.S. Department of Justice officials in Washington, D.C., announced that drug trafficking convictions accounted for one fifth of all felony convictions in the U.S., during 1990, up from thirteen percent four years earlier. State courts had convicted 168,000 persons of trafficking in illegal drugs, twice the number of convictions on the same charges in 1986. Another 106,000 persons were convicted in 1990 of possessing illegal drugs. Almost half of the convicted drug traffickers were sent to prison, compared with 37 percent four years earlier.

October 4, 1994: Drug enforcement agents in San Juan, Puerto Rico arrested Charles Galleti in his penthouse apartment, charging him with drug dealing and money laundering. Galleti had reportedly run one of the largest heroin distributing rings in New York City for two decades before "retiring" to a lavish lifestyle in Puerto Rico, where he oversaw several legitimate business ventures. At one point, during his heroin heyday, prosecutors stated, Galleti took $800,000 a month in profits. He lived lavishly, having condos in Manhattan and Puerto Rico. He had a house located at 26 Katherine Court on Staten Island, which boasted five bathrooms, a $100,000 swimming pool with a waterfall and a jacuzzi that could hold twenty people. The day after Galleti was arrested, five of his associates were arrested in New York City.

December 1, 1994: Drug agents arrested a man when he attempted to claim a sheepdog that had been shipped from Colombia to John F. Kennedy International Airport. The dog had been carrying in its belly five pounds of cocaine contained in condoms. The drugs were surgically removed by a veterinarian. (The dog survived, the drug smuggler went to prison.)

June 9, 1995: Colombian Police arrested Cali drug cartel boss Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, who, according to U.S. officials, was responsible for smuggling 80 percent of all the cocaine into the U.S.

March 29, 1996: Juan Carlos Ortiz, reportedly a leader of the Cali drug cartel, turned himself in to authorities in Bogota, Colombia, to face a charge of illegally possessing a weapon. The 33-year-old Ortiz had been arrested in 1994 on charges of murder, kidnaping and extortion, but had been released for undisclosed reasons. Earlier this month, Juan Carlos Ramirez, another young Cali cartel leader, also surrendered to police.

May 2, 1996: Prosecutors ordered the arrest of Attorney General Orlando Vasquez in Colombia, on charges that he took money from the Cali drug cartel, the world's largest illegal drug organization.

August 8, 1996: Herbert Huncke, a notorious drug addict, sometimes dope peddler and burglar, who had spent most of the 1950s in jail and whose vicious drug and crime experiences inspired much of the gutter-life literature of his cronies, Jack Kerouac and Allen Ginsberg (he is credited with coining the tag "Beat Generation"), died of congestive heart failure at age eighty-one. Huncke had the unsavory distinction of giving writer William Burroughs his first drug fix. Jerry Garcia, of the Grateful Dead group, reportedly paid Huncke's rent at New York's Chelsea Hotel.

September 6, 1996: Police in Houston, Texas, seized a shipment of 12-foot steel cylinders used to compress paper from a Colombian registered ship and found, crammed into the hollow steel rollers, more than a ton of cocaine with an estimated street value of $100 million. No arrests were made.

February 6, 1997: General Jesus Gutierrez Rebollo, chief of Mexico's top anti-drug agency, resigned after allegations were made that he had taken huge bribes from the Mexican drug cartels. Gutierrez Rebollo was arrested on February 15, charged with taking bribes from drug cartel boss Amado Carrillo Fuentes. Four days later, U.S. officials reported that Gutierrez Rebollo had been briefed about everything the U.S. knew about Mexican drug trafficking and that Gutierrez Rebollo had passed this information on to Carrillo Fuentes.

February 28, 1997: U.S. President William Clinton certified to Congress that Mexico was cooperating in the fight against drugs and hence was eligible for continued military and economic aid. On the other hand, Colombia, for the second straight year, was denied such certification. Madeleine Albright, U.S. Secretary of State, stated that the influence of the Colombian drug cartels extended to the highest levels of the Colombian government, essentially branding Colombia what it truly was—a Narco nation.

August 26, 1997: Mauricio Guzman, the mayor of Cali, Colombia, was arrested and charged with taking money from the drug cartel that controlled the area. The 42-year-old Guzman was accused of taking $200,000 from a company fronting for the Cali cartel to finance his 1994 election.

April 19, 1998: A small plane flown from Texas and followed by three Customs Service planes, crashed onto a school baseball field in Detroit, Michigan, flipping upside-down and killing the pilot. The plane spilled out large bundles of marijuana and wads of cash. Witnesses said that many persons rushed to the plane, ostensibly to help, but wound up running away with the bundles of drugs and some of the cash.

May 5, 1998: Joseph DiFronzo, a fugitive since he was charged in July 1993 with overseeing the largest indoor marijuana-growing operation in Illinois history, was located in Boca Raton, Florida, and arrested on drug charges. DiFronzo, the brother of Mafia boss John DiFronzo, was identified as a high-ranking member of the U.S. crime syndicate.

May 6, 1998: Pasquale Cuntrera, a Sicilian Mafia boss extradited from Venezuela, who had been convicted of running an international drug trafficking ring between Italy, Canada and Venezuela, was released from an Italian prison pending a second appeals trial. The wheelchair-bound Cuntrera promptly disappeared with embarrassed police and court officials ordering a nation-wide manhunt for the fugitive.

September 29, 1998: Authorities in Chicago, Illinois, seized 1,100 pounds of cocaine having a street value of $62 million, one of the largest drug seizures in the city's history. Five persons were arrested in the seizure of the illegal drugs, and charged with possession of cocaine and conspiracy.

October 5, 1998: Two Amish men, Abner King, 23, and Abner Stoltzfus, 24, pleaded guilty in a Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, court to conspiring to sell cocaine to other Amish members. The men had been purchasing cocaine from the Pagans, a motorcycle gang, and selling it to Amish youth from 1992 to 1997. The plea shocked the 22,000 members of the Old Order Amish.

December 25, 1998: Dutch and British customs ships intercepted a vessel off the Netherlands coast, officials seizing 19 tons of marijuana, while Colombian police seized 17.9 tons of marijuana packed into shipping containers in the Colombian port of Buenaventura, Colombia.

President William Clinton refused to certify Colombia's efforts to combat drug trafficking in 1997.

CHAPTER SIX: FRAUD

Since the beginning of time, man has defrauded his fellow man by every conceivable ploy and device. The more sophisticated man became, the more adept he also became at scamming his neighbor. He has used his considerable wiles to deceive and mislead his victim by ruse and impersonation, by sleight of hand and misrepresentation, by confidence games and financial swindles, by forgery and embezzlement. The grifter has mulcted, cheated and bilked his victims from pennies to millions, branding these myriad dupes as marks, suckers, rubes, and Hoosiers (the latter being anyone from the state of Indiana, these trusting residents considered naive enough to be hoodwinked in the most blatant confidence games practiced by the most inept con artists).

In the U.S., criminal fraud falls into two broad categories. The most common form involves the issuance of a check for which there are not sufficient funds. The other is the confidence game, the success of which is dependent upon the victim's gullibility and, most importantly, greed. Over the years, the exploits of many infamous confidence men and women have become legendary. Many of these enterprising grifters possessed captivating personalities and high intellectual capabilities. Victor "The Count" Lustig taught himself to speak German, Italian and French before embarking on a life in crime in Europe and the U.S. and became one of the world's most spectacular con men, selling the Eiffel Tower in Paris for scrap metal not once, but twice. Chicago con man, Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil, outwitted bankers and financiers, gleaned more than $8 million from his scams and died a pauper at the age of 101.

In Europe, the criminal statutes also define fraud to include any misunderstanding arising out of normal business transactions. An omission or concealment that allows one party to take advantage of another may also constitute fraud. Similarly, the embezzlement of money or the forging of bank notes or checks are regarded in the same manner. Most persons arrested and convicted of embezzlement committed their crime while employed by a financial institution. Before computerization significantly altered the rules of the game, there were at least two hundred estimated ways to embezzle funds without being immediately detected. Industry executives blame the high incidence of embezzlement on the courts, claiming that the light sentences given for fraud convictions encourages the commission of these crimes.

Sometimes it takes months or even years for an embezzlement to be detected. Even with the advent of sophisticated computer systems, the methods have changed to adapt to those new methods. It is now possible for progammers to divert vast sums of money with a few simple keystrokes. John Rankine of IBM stated: "The data security job will never be done—after all, there will never be a bank that absolutely can't be robbed." The subtle machinations of swindlers have been for centuries in advance of law enforcement, but the age-old techniques of grifters have changed little from ancient times to the present.

Simple fraud was practiced in biblical times as it is today. The Old Testament relates how Isaac's youngest son, Jacob, and his wife Rebekah, defrauded the eldest son Esau out of his father's blessing and inheritance by having Jacob dress up as Esau and fool Isaac, the blind father. In the Third Century B.C., the Greek orator and statesman Demosthenes (384-322 B.C.) at the age of twenty was defrauded of his father's fortune in Athens by three executors of the estate, causing him to sue for repayment. Late in his life, in 324 B.C., the great orator was exiled by the pro-Macedonian party, charged with fraud. English philosopher and scientist Roger Bacon (c.1220-1292), wrote in 1271 that fraud was rampant among merchants and craftsmen, as well as the rest of society in England. It was in England where the first great swindler appeared, a beautiful, clever woman, an actress whose impersonating talents brought her a fortune and a path to the gallows at age thirty-one.

"THE GERMAN PRINCESS"/1663-1673

Mary Moders (1643-73), was born on January 11, 1643, the daughter of a chorister at Canterbury named Moders (or Meders). She lived in obscurity with her humble parents until early womanhood and was by then well read and determined to live an adventurous life. She was inspired by this ambition after avariciously consuming hundreds of books available in the church library, favoring such gothic stories as Parsimus and Parismenus, Don Belianis of Greece, and especially Amadis de Gaul, a book portraying the character of Oriana with whom Moders became obsessed.

As a teenager, Moders began to think of herself as a princess or a highborn lady of quality, a fancy that became so entrenched within her mind that she later convinced herself that she was, indeed, a princess of royal blood. The legends of Cassandra and Cleopatra were also among Moders' favorite stories, and she adopted the cunning and guile depicted in these characters. The girl's memory was phenomenal. She could recite entire books word for word without error.

As a displaced intellectual, Moders felt that her marriage at an early age to an apprentice shoemaker named Stedman was leagues beneath her. She bore her husband two children, but both were sickly and died in infancy. Stedman's troubles increased as his wife began to demand finery and gifts he could not afford. About this time, Moders began to carry herself as a person born of the blood royal, insisting upon splendors and extravagances she felt to be her birthright.

Moders then suddenly abandoned her husband and fled to Dover, where she encountered a wealthy surgeon named Day. She married the physician and after bleeding him of his life's savings, she fled, but was apprehended and a charge of bigamy was lodged against her. Tried at Maidstone, Mary Stedman Day, nee Moders, worked her wiles on the court, presenting an eloquent defense. Since the impoverished Stedman could not afford to travel to the trial—Moders was quick to point out his absence—the case was dismissed for lack of evidence. Moders immediately departed for Europe, first going to Holland and then to the free-wheeling city of Cologne, Germany. There, Moders entered a brothel, then politely called "a house of entertainment."

Mary Moders, known as "the German Princess," the first great female con artist, shown acting on the British stage in 1663.

Her exquisite beauty and haughty airs soon earned her own suite of rooms at the bordello. She reigned as would a queen in this house of assignation and she sharply discriminated among the many gentlemen seeking her sexual favors, selecting only those she knew to possess great wealth. One of her most avid clients was an elderly lecher, who owned a wealthy estate near Liege. He showered presents upon the conniving Moders, money, jewels, even his most prized possession, a gold chain with a priceless medal given to him for exceptional services to Gustavus Adolphus, the King of Sweden.

The aging swain lost all reason, his passion for Moders controlling his every move. One contemporary account described how "the foolish, old dotard urged his passion with all the vehemence of a young, vigorous lover, pressing her [Moders] to matrimony, and making her very large promises." At first, Moders pretended disinterest. Then, putting to use her consummate skills as an actress, appeared to relent slowly under his demands that she marry him, giving the old man a lusty sense of triumph with sigh-bloated phrases such as: "You are shattering my will, sir." She finally agreed to marry the old man, while the ancient suitor made feeble love to Moders. Her submission, the doddering swain believed, was brought about by his sexual prowess.

Thus, working the old man's vanity to blend with his lust for her, Moders convinced the suitor that he had won her through a mythical virility. They would be married within three days, Moders said, but she would need money for the preparations, a great deal of money. The old man withdrew most of his savings and gave the gold to Moders, along with all of his jewelry and even his prized medal from the King of Sweden. Moders quickly packed away the gold and jewels and fled to Utrecht, then to Amsterdam, then to Rotterdam and then to England.

Moders arrived at Billingsgate in March 1663, and quickly convinced some young gentlemen that she was a highborn German lady banished by her father for loving an unacceptable man. Moders, of course, had been rehearsing this role since childhood. In vivid detail, she described how her stern father, Lord Henry von Holway, a prince of the German empire, had persecuted her for giving her heart to a lowborn lover.

The young British gentlemen promised to help her, and gave her gold to pay for suitable rooms at an inn owned by a man named Ling. The "German princess" was introduced to Ling's brother-in-law, John Carleton, a man of immense wealth. Within days, the two were married. But Carleton's father received an anonymous letter accusing her of bigamy, and Moders was arrested. Again, no one came forward to testify against her when she was briefly tried at the Old Bailey. Neither Stedman or Day appeared to testify against her.

Upon her release from Newgate Prison, Moders was offered the starring role in a play based upon her exploits and background which she herself had falsely promoted. She accepted the well-paying part and became the theatrical rage of London, appearing in The German Princess. Enormous crowds flocked to see Moders enact her own fanciful past. So popular did Moders become that she enamored businessmen and intellectuals, commoners and noblemen. Moders enacted the role in private showings at the mansions and country homes of some of England's most distinguished bluebloods.

Samuel Pepys, the great British diarist, became one of Moders' most devoted fans, amused and fascinated by this bold creature cavorting upon the stage. In his entry of April 15, 1663, Pepys wrote: "To the Duke's house and there saw The German Princess enacted by the woman herself; but never was anything so well done in earnest, worse performed in jest upon the stage." Pepys saw the play again on May 29, 1663, traveling to Creed to see Moders perform at the Gate House, Westminster. On June 7, 1663, he wrote: "My Lady Batten inveighed mightily against the German Princess, and I was high in defence of her wit and spirit; and glad that she is cleared at the Sessions [court]."

Though Moders earned a good deal of money as an actress, her ambitions of great wealth consumed her. Of the many admirers who appeared backstage after her performances, she selected only the wealthiest beaux. She promptly bilked them of hundreds of pounds, threatening to expose their affairs with her to their wives. One elderly admirer was gutted of his entire fortune by Moders, who, after telling him that he was not fit company for a princess, rifled the man's safe and trunks and stealing his savings, silver plate, gold seals and watches.

The old Marshalsea Prison, where Mary Moders was imprisoned.

Leaving the stage, Moders concentrated on crime, cheating one man after another, sometimes employing a swindle that would later be termed "the badger game." She would entice a wealthy man to her apartment, then have an accomplice pretending to be her husband barge into the room, raging that he would kill them both. Invariably, the compromised suitor paid handsomely to be spared his life. When this practice became too dangerous, Moders spent years bilking merchants of expensive goods, ordering lace, silverware and jewelry under various identities, all being that of a lady of wealth. She had the goods sent to false addresses, where she would receive the goods, give the delivery man a fake check, then depart, leaving the real occupants of the house, who were then on vacation at the time of her scam, to face the wrath of the mulcted merchant.

As the years passed, Moders' once stunning beauty withered, and along with it the money-making ability it had brought her. To make ends meet, she was reduced to stealing silver tankards from the better inns and reselling them. At one time, she was caught stealing a silver tankard from a Covent Garden inn and was arrested as a petty thief. She was jailed at Newgate Prison. No longer a cause celebre among the socially prominent, she was now shunned by most of her former admirers. Convicted of robbery, Moders was condemned to death, but through the intercession of an anonymous person of considerable influence, the sentence was commuted to banishment from England, then called "transportation."

Moders was put aboard a ship packed with common criminals, the dregs of the British jails, and sent to Jamaica. Smuggled to her, however, was a small pouch of gold from an old-time admirer, and, within two years, Moders used this gold to secret herself aboard a British merchant ship sailing for England. Upon her arrival, she again took up her criminal pursuits. Accidents and irony were her undoing. A man named Lancaster, who had been a prison jailer, was directed to inspect several London boarding houses in the hopes of discovering some stolen goods. During one such inspection, Lancaster identified Moders as one of his former prisoners. Knowing that she had violated the terms of her transportation, Lancaster arrested her.

She was tried and convicted, then sentenced to death. Moders desperately tried to save her life by "pleading her belly," saying that she was pregnant and that her innocent, unborn child could not be executed under the law. The court appointed several midwives to examine her and they quickly found her to be lying. On January 2, 1673, the once bright star of the British stage, adroit confidence trickster, and highly paid harlot, was driven to Tyburn in an open cart, along with the hangman.

It was her final performance and Mary Moders played it to the hilt. She drank a glass of gin before mounting the scaffold, then turned to a group of female spectators, saying in a clear, calm voice: "Ladies, your failings consist of falling, and mine in filching, yet if you will be so charitable as to forgive me, I will freely forgive you." She gracefully stepped beneath the noose and uttered not one word of remorse as the rope was placed about her neck. After she fell through the trap, her body dangled for an hour and was then placed into a cheap coffin, which was buried at nearby St. Martin's Churchyard. None of the mighty men she had known in her spectacular heyday attended her execution or burial. Her epitaph was chiseled onto an inexpensive stone above her grave, written by a wag whose offbeat wit would haunt the memory of Mary Moders for eternity:

The German Princess, here against her will,
Lies underneath, and yet, oh strange, lies still.

THE MULCTING MEDICAL QUACKS/ 1730s-1780s

The prosaic scams of Mary Moders could not compare to the outlandish money-making schemes enacted by a bevy of medical quacks who prospered a half century after the hanging death of the German Princess. The first of these medical messiahs was Joshua Ward (1685-1761), who proved to be England's first great medical swindler. Ward began his career in politics and was elected to Parliament in 1716, but his name was erased by the House of Commons, when it was learned that he had not received a single vote and had rigged the election.

British quack Joshua Ward.

Ward fled to France, where he promoted a quack medicine known as "White Drop of Ward and the Pill," which, if used in excess, caused permanent liver damage. Ward advertised this noxious medicine as a cure for all diseases. He was spared imprisonment in the Bastille by his friend John Page, and traveled back to England to market the drop and the pill to the public.

King George II became his most devoted patron after he succeeded in "curing" the king's dislocated thumb. The king granted him his own apartment in a government building and there the inventive doctor developed a sprawling practice. He purchased three lavish country houses, and converted them to hospitals for his poor patients, an act of charity inconsistent with the dubious nature of his business. On November 28, 1734, an item appeared in the Daily Courant which charged Ward with plotting to introduce "popery" into Protestant England through the dissemination of his drop and pill. There were other attacks against the harmful side effects of the nostrums, but Ward continued marketing his products until the day he died. Of course, Ward's medicine was useless, but it brought him vast amounts of money and he died a rich man.

James Graham, holding a "health meeting" in London, 1779; he used electricity to bilk his victims.

Instead of pills, Dr. James Graham (1754-94) employed electricity to enrich his medical practice. Graham was a doctor in Philadelphia when he became acquainted with the new phenomenon of electricity. His treatment of any ills by immersing patients in a bath and subjecting them to mild electrical shock became the fashion, first in Philadelphia, then in London. In 1779, he expanded his business into a lavishly appointed building he called The Temple of Health, which featured various ways to use electricity on the body, lectures by Graham, and demonstrations by his protege, 16-year-old Emma Lyons, who was called Vestina.

The following year Graham moved his quarters into a mansion in Adelphi Terrace called The Temple of Health and Hymen, at which Graham promised to cure nervous and sexual disorders. The main attraction at the Temple was the "Celestial Bed," a huge canopied couch that played music, gave off exotic scents, and tilted as required to guarantee conception. It was this absurd contraption that enabled Graham to charge £50 for a night's use.

Quack Gustavus Katterfelto, 1783; he claimed a cure for the plague.

The following year, Graham moved his Temple to Pall Mall, but its appeal was broken as it became less exclusive. In addition, the authorities began to view the place as more brothel than hospital. In 1783, with authorities building a case against him on possible charges of prostitution, Graham closed his temple and returned to his native Scotland. His mental instability led him to believe that permanent fasting was the only way to health. He died of starvation at age forty-nine. His one-time protege, Vestina, however, fascinated the British public by eventually becoming Lady Emma Hamilton, mistress to England's greatest military hero, Lord Horatio Nelson.

At the same time Graham's quackery scams were collapsing, Gustavus Katterfelto launched a successful medical swindle. Passing himself off as a worldly philosopher and scientist, Katterfelto swindled Londoners with his sleight of hand tricks and medicine show for nearly three years. In 1782, he claimed to have invented the Solar Microscope, which he used to detect a deadly plague similar to the Black Death. According to Katterfelto, there was only one known cure a "scientifically tested" potion, attributed to a Dr. Batto, and available for five shillings per bottle from none other than Gustavus Katterfelto.

Katterfelto opened a sideshow in Piccadilly and hawked medical wonders to the public and advice to gamblers. At the time, an alarming outbreak of influenza devastated London. During the epidemic, Katterfelto cleared nearly £25,000 by selling his useless potions to desperate citizens. By 1783, this medical scam failed to produce substantial funds, forcing Katterfelto to sell his holdings at a loss. A year later, he introduced his new gimmick: an invention to demonstrate perpetual motion. By this time, however the public had come to know Katterfelto for the humbug he was. Broke and out of favor, he was arrested for vagrancy. Upon his release, Katterfelto retired to Bedale, Yorkshire, where he died in 1799.

ENGLAND'S FIRST GREAT FORGER/1780s

Forger Charles Price, who duplicated Bank of England notes.

Charles Price is shown in one of his many disguises.

Master forger Charles Price (c.1730-86) was the son of a secondhand dealer who conducted his trade on Monmouth Street in London. When Charles was twenty, his father died, reportedly from a broken heart. The elder Price was unable to cope with the larcenous conduct of his son, who, on one occasion, stole some fine gold lace and peddled it to a street vendor. The vendor, in turn, sold it back to Mr. Price. Initially Price was apprenticed to a maker of hosiery on St. James Street, but he swindled the man out of £10 worth of merchandise. At the same time, he stole an expensive suit of clothes from his father before running away to the Netherlands and there became a clerk to a prosperous Dutch merchant. Price promptly seduced the man's daughter, stole a sum of money, and returned to England undetected.

Price spent the next few years engaged in a variety of swindles. He went to work for a small brewery in Gosport, and displayed a surprising aptitude for the business. His employer, impressed with the young man, nearly consented to a marriage between Price and his daughter when the street peddler, who had purchased the stolen lace, alerted the brewer to Price's shady reputation. Undaunted, Price then inveigled British comedian Samuel Foote into a business arrangement. Foote advanced £500 to Price to start up a legitimate brewery, but the money was squandered and the business failed. Not long afterward, Price went back to him for additional monies to start a bakery. "As you have brewed, so you may bake," the comedian replied in an acid tone. "But I'll be cursed if ever you bake as you have brewed."

Price continued his deceptions. Posing as a Methodist preacher he bilked several people out of large amounts of money. He placed advertisements offering to procure wives for men of property; he attempted to open a second brewery at Gray's Inn Lane, before going bankrupt in 1776. Price again fled to the Netherlands, where he engaged in an elaborate smuggling scheme that netted him £300. However, the con man was brought before a magistrate and sentenced to prison.

Returning to England upon completion of his sentence, Price, who now called himself Brant, hit upon what he believed was a foolproof money-making scheme. He began forging notes drawn on the Bank of England, which were passed by an unwitting confederate, who had been hired by Price through a newspaper advertisement. Disguising himself as an elderly, decrepit man, Price was able to avoid detection after the unfortunate confederate went to prison for a year for passing forged bills totaling £1,400. With his ill-gotten loot in hand, Price retired to the country and lived under cover until 1782.

Price reappeared in London that same year to pass some more of his bogus bank notes to an apothecary named Spilsbury, who maintained a shop in Soho Square. Using the alias of "Wilmot," Price easily deceived the merchant. Meeting Spilsbury sometime later in a coffeehouse, Price commiserated with him over his loss. Eventually, Price's forgeries were detected. A London pawnbroker recognized the notes, and acting on his complaint, constables took Price into custody. His trial began on January 14, 1786.

Determined not to let the forger slip away, the Bank of England brought vigorous prosecution against Price. It was estimated that he had stolen or embezzled £100,000 during his criminal career, one that flourished only because of his many ingenious disguises. The incriminating counterfeit plates Price had manufactured were found buried in a field near the Tottenham Court Road and ordered destroyed by magistrate Sir Sampson Wright. Price was convicted and sentenced to death, but before the judgment could be carried out the prisoner hanged himself in his cell at the Tothillfields Bridewell Jail. Afterward, the body was quickly buried by the warders, but not until a stake was driven through the heart of the corpse, then a symbol of eternal condemnation for those who chose to exit the world through suicide.

Price is shown at left, disguised as an old man while defrauding Spilsbury.

THE MIRACULOUS MAGICIAN/1780s

Among the myriad humbugs who flourished in the flamboyant, fashionably greedy 1780s, was a colossal mountebank, who was known as Count Alessandro di Cagliostro, a title he bestowed upon himself in order to gain entrance to the royal heads of Europe, as well as the royal coffers he intended to loot. Cagliostro (1743-95) was born Joseph Balsamo in Sicily of poor parents. His father, Peter Balsamo, died when he was three and his mother, destitute, was supported by a kindly merchant brother. As a youth, Balsamo lived in the squalor of Palermo, where he associated with the worst thieves and confidence men of the city. These underworld dregs taught the poor but intelligent youth the techniques of pickpocketing and burglary.

Joseph Balsamo, who became Cagliostro, the powerful magician and spectacular swindler.

The boy even stole from his indulgent uncle. An unaccountable curiosity led Balsamo to read, his tastes running to tales of adventure, great wealth, and power. He was also fascinated with mysticism, ancient cults, and supernatural powers. He tired of petty thievery and concluded that he would require a tool, a device by which to make his own great fortune. He chose the most popular of the black arts of that uninformed era, alchemy, a process of treating common metals with chemicals that would, it was claimed, change them into silver and gold.

By the time he was seventeen, Balsamo had, through trickery and guile, gained a considerable reputation as a successful alchemist. No one ever saw him perform the changing of lead into gold but he allegedly produced such minor miracles, or so the best informed gossips had it. The youth could also call forth spirits, it was said, and was reported to be a powerful medium. Of course, the legends the clever youth was building stemmed from sleight-of-hand tricks he had learned and developed since childhood.

There was some substance by then in the clever Balsamo's background. He had sought out Benedictine monks in a mountain monastery and there learned chemistry and medicine. He had also apprenticed as an apothecary, so that by the time he met a greedy goldsmith named Marano he was able to perform some basic chemical experiments that convinced the goldsmith that he could produce gold from common metals. He told Marano that he would require sixty ounces of pure gold to produce several pounds more of the precious metal. When Marano delivered the gold to Balsamo, he immediately fled to Messina, where he adopted the title of Count Alessandro di Cagliostro.

With his stolen gold, Cagliostro purchased an impressive wardrobe and became the sponsor of an ancient mystic named Althotas, who dressed in Oriental robes and was always accompanied by an Albanian greyhound. It was rumored that the greyhound aided Althotas in his performance of black magic, the so-called art of which he slowly taught to Cagliostro. To expand his perception of ancient black arts, Cagliostro toured Africa and Asia with Althotas, his guide into the realms of magic.

In Egypt, Cagliostro studied the pyramids and became knowledgeable in the history of secret sects and their rites. From this he put together a loose brotherhood philosophy, which he labeled Egyptian Masonry. At age twenty-three, Cagliostro sailed to the Mediterranean island of Malta. By this time the soothsayer and clairvoyant Althotas had vanished. Some later claimed that he was murdered and that Cagliostro had had a hand in his violent end, wishing to rid himself of someone who might later expose his feats of black magic and alchemy as nothing more than the tricks of a clever charlatan.

On Malta, Cagliostro managed an introduction to the powerful Pinto, grand master of the Order of the Knights of Malta, an organization that stemmed from the crusaders of 800 years earlier and was now a Masonic sect of great political influence. Pinto was impressed with the erudite and cunning Cagliostro and not only further taught him in the occult arts of alchemy and black magic, but provided him with considerable funds with which to travel to Italy as a sort of Masonic spy in high places, sending back information to his mentor in Malta. In southern Italy, Cagliostro established a lavish resort which was little more than a gambling casino. He traveled for some time, meeting the hypnotist, Franz Antone Mesmer, creator of mesmerism, and learned how to hypnotize even the most sophisticated person. (Mesmer, a charlatan of sorts himself, later denounced Cagliostro as a fraud, a clear-cut case of the pot calling the kettle black.)

In Rome, Cagliostro met a beautiful young girl, Lorenza Feliciani, the daughter of a Calabrian glove maker. They married and she joined him in his fabulous confidence swindles. Establishing themselves in various Italian cities as nobles, where they rented huge villas, Cagliostro and his wife cultivated the company of aristocrats and held seances and demonstrations of his magical alchemy, where he supposedly changed stones into rare gems and rope into strands of priceless silk but, of course, these "miracles" were nothing more than the magic tricks Cagliostro had perfected over the years. To raise money, the charlatan resorted to the old badger game, sending his alluring wife to lure some wealthy aristocrat to her bed and then bursting into her boudoir to shockingly "discover" the sexual betrayal which invariably resulted in Cagliostro collecting substantial blackmail payments from the aristocrat.

All during his travels through southern Europe, Cagliostro continued to establish branches of his own sect of Egyptian Masonry and these naive groups regularly sent him money to establish new chapters. His ego bloated by his own impossible claims, Cagliostro insisted that he could perform acts of astounding wizardry, such as bringing forth spirits. He claimed that he could heal all manner of illnesses by laying his hands upon sick people and pronouncing secret oaths, and that his alchemy could produce the richest metals seen on earth. He became the social rage of France and was heralded as a great healer, but his so-called miracles were nothing more than demonstrations of common sense.

Cagliostro never accepted real medical challenges and only after Lorenza and other aides determined the causes of an illness, would he deign to perform his healing magic. Invariably, his patients were made up of self-indulgent nobles, who were not really ill, but had convinced themselves that they were suffering from some strange maladies. Before a large crowd assembled in his villa or mansion, Cagliostro would simply approach his subject and state: "It is our will that your body become healthy!" The subject would usually begin to feel better and, when Cagliostro used his own planted shills, some "miracles" were seen to occur. Those imposters, pretending paralyzed limbs or blindness, suddenly stood and walked, astoundingly regained their sight. Cagliostro easily "cured" those aristocratic ladies, who were suffering from malnutrition due to reckless diets by simply telling them to "eat a full dinner and drink one bottle of red wine."

The priceless diamond necklace, ostensibly purchased for Marie Antoinette, involved a dramatic swindle that sent Cagliostro to prison.

Enormous amounts of money began to flow into Cagliostro's coffers—gifts, donations, and outright payments from the nobility for his cures, his seances, his advice on matters of health, hygiene, and even sex. He became the highest-paid oracle on earth. Coupled to this princely income were great gluts of cash he received from the dozens of Masonic sects he had established in Italy, Greece, Spain, and France. The rogue slowly withdrew from his regular private meetings and gatherings, living the life of kingly leisure. He made a great show of giving away money and food to the poor and from them he received his greatest support; in their ignorance the peasants utterly accepted Cagliostro as a true worker of magic and miracles, a man gifted with supernatural powers. His name was spread throughout Europe by the lowly-born as one of the great men of their times.

In 1776, Cagliostro traveled to London, where he was celebrated and feted as the world's greatest alchemist and occultist. He and his wife Lorenza, who now called herself Serafina, lived in regal splendor in a mansion on Whitcomb Street near Leicester Square. Cagliostro's reputation preceded him to London and by the time he moved into his regal rooms, he was inundated with requests from high-born ladies, who begged for audiences with him, seeking his "elixir of youth," or love philtres that were supposed to make them sexually active and alluring, all of these potions widely advertised by Cagliostro's shills before his arrival in London.

Cagliostro continued to claim that he could turn base metal into gold and silver and now added that he had obtained the all-powerful Philosopher's Stone, a few rubbings from which, when mixed with melted brass or copper, would produce pure gold. Those fortunate enough to buy an audience with Cagliostro entered his mansion to behold a stunning array of silk tapestries and drapes, hanging from ceiling to floor and emblazoned with occult designs and mystical symbols. Rare incense hung sweet and thick in the air. Mirrors decorated the walls of most of the larger rooms and Cagliostro often produced ghosts and apparitions in them, or so it appeared.

The great charlatan had by then enriched his lore of the occult by obtaining an obscure manuscript by one George Gaston, which ostensibly claimed to provide answers to the Great Mysteries. Cagliostro used Gaston's gobbledygook phrases to explain the unexplainable. He had also by then studied with the enigmatic occultist and mystic, St. Germain of France and he employed this charlatan's methods to great effect, producing spectacular seances (for staggering fees, of course) which saw spirits from the netherworld invade rooms, float to the ceiling, drift in and out of mirrors, sink into glass goblets, and cry out messages to the living. These were the tricks of master occult frauds and swindlers, which Cagliostro had carefully studied and perfected. He reveled in his riches and in his power, knowing that all feared him, including those who sat on thrones, because of his supposed control of spiritual forces. He was fond of jocularly saying to disbelievers upon first meetings: "Remember, I can afflict as well as heal."

Cagliostro's wife and co-swindler "Countess Serafina," who was sent to a convent to do penance for her crimes.

Like Phineas T. Barnum a century later, Cagliostro gave a great deal of time to appearances, that of his home, his wife, and particularly himself. He strutted about London dressed in bright-colored silk coats, shoes with jeweled buckles, his hair braided and powdered, gold buttons studding his stockings, rings of diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and sapphires gleaming on his fingers. Across his frilled silk shirt was a large gold chain from which hung a gold watch, and dangling beneath this a huge diamond drop which lay atop his braided waistcoat. He adorned his head with a brilliant musketeer's hat topped with a colorful plume. He was the most sartorial resident of London.

Cagliostro next claimed to foresee the future, claiming impeccable clairvoyant powers and, for great sums of money, he would predict the winning numbers of lotteries, the health and sex of children to be born, and, especially for lustful noble ladies, the amorous intentions of men they admired and desired. When Cagliostro's predictions failed, he had myriad excuses, which were accepted out of fear or shame. The subject had not been worthy of winning, so fates changed the winning lottery number. The subject's conspiratorial thoughts caused a wanted lover to turn away. There was no end to his fantastic apologia. Not everyone accepted Cagliostro's outlandish claims and powers. He quickly made enemies, some of whom broke into his mansion and attempted to destroy the chemicals he used in his feats of alchemy, along with the apparatus he employed to conjure spirits.

The charlatan's Masonic branches in Europe nevertheless flourished and continued to send him considerable funds. Cagliostro's reputation as a leader of this brotherhood impressed the London Freemasons and he was welcomed at their meetings. He agreed to represent and spread the philosophy of the Grand Lodge of England before he and his wife shortly departed for the continent. By then, Cagliostro was glad to leave England, where he was hated by an increasing number of "jealous husbands and frustrated lovers." The great charlatan toured Europe in triumph, visiting the Masonic Lodges in Belgium, Holland, and Germany, being received as a distinguished guest by Frederick II of Prussia and other monarchs. He returned to France, where he became a court favorite of King Louis XVI and his tempestuous, beautiful queen, Marie Antoinette.

In 1785, however, the powerful Cagliostro was undone in the notorious Affair of the Diamond Necklace. He was, at the time, a house guest of the archbishop of Paris, Cardinal Louis de Rohan, who had been duped through some spectacular seances into believing that Cagliostro possessed extraordinary talents, if not mysterious spiritual powers. The cardinal, a capricious sort, gave over an entire wing of his palace to Cagliostro and Lorenza-Serafina and provided him with a huge laboratory in which to practice his alchemy and produce gold for his host.

De Rohan, in return, made sure that every important noble and lady in France met his mystical guest and profited from Cagliostro's astounding wisdom. So lofty had the charlatan become that he was now referred to as the Divine Cagliostro. One of his most devoted sponsors and patrons was the Countess de LaMotte, who intrigued with her husband and a band of sophisticated thieves to use Cardinal de Rohan in a bold swindle which would involve the cardinal and the queen herself, or someone who appeared to be the queen.

LaMotte and his wife knew that the rather naive de Rohan was deeply in love with Marie Antoinette. He was approached by an emissary of LaMotte's, who told him that the queen reciprocated his affections, but was forced to be discreet and not offend her ineffectual and sexually inactive husband, King Louis XVI. The queen, de Rohan was informed, desired a special necklace that had been recently designed, one that boasted a fabulous collection of perfect diamonds that were worth $100,000. Marie Antoinette would be eternally grateful if de Rohan would guarantee purchase of the necklace. The cardinal asked that the queen personally make this request of him.

De Rohan was given a letter reportedly signed by the queen, which requested the delivery of the necklace, a clever forgery of the queen's handwriting and signature. De Rohan told the jeweler that he would guarantee payment for the necklace after it was delivered to him. The necklace was delivered and de Rohan kept a rendezvous with a woman he thought was Marie Antoinette, a night meeting in a dark palace garden, where a woman named Leguet, heavily veiled, successfully impersonated the queen. The cardinal slavishly presented the necklace to the monarch he loved and she promised to reward him in the future with her "favors." With that the woman departed with the necklace, the diamonds from which were sold one by one outside of France within a few weeks, Count LaMotte and his wife receiving most of the spoils from this swindle.

A short time later, the jeweler presented his bill to the queen, saying that Cardinal de Rohan had guaranteed its payment. Marie Antoinette had no intention of paying for a necklace she had never received. When de Rohan was informed of this by the jeweler, he soon discovered that he had been swindled. Moreover, he was asked by Louis XVI to explain his actions and the embarrassed cardinal told him that he had been the victim of a giant fraud. Oddly, for his indiscretion, de Rohan was thrown briefly into the Bastille for compromising the queen and his prized house guest, Cagliostro, was seized and thrown into an adjoining cell.

Cagliostro, while imprisoned in Italy under orders from Pope Pius VI; he was chained to the floor of his cell, going insane before his death in 1795.

Though he had committed hundreds of crimes for which he deserved imprisonment, Cagliostro was entirely innocent of the diamond necklace swindle, or so it appeared. After a six-month investigation, the great charlatan was proved innocent, as was de Rohan, and both were released. The LaMottes were exposed as the culprits but, Count LaMotte had fled. He was sentenced to the galleys for life in absentia. His wife was sentenced to be branded with a V (for voleuse, thief), whipped publicly, and sent to an asylum for life.

Cagliostro at first reveled in his exoneration, but his credibility was seriously undermined by the suggestion that he was suspected of being involved in this swindle. Even the suggestion of being a fraud lent belief to the many accusations that he was, indeed, a fraud. His association with de Rohan also injured him in that Marie Antoinette was livid at the cardinal for dragging her into the Affair of the Diamond Necklace and he was ostracized.

Cagliostro left Paris and continued his travels, but the necklace swindle tainted his image and eroded his carefully-constructed reputation. The swindle caused the French peasantry to further resent the "Austrian" monarch and this incident was one of the first to create the intense hatred for her and her overly-indulgent husband, a hatred that swept through France and eventually brought about a revolution that would end the lives of Marie Antoinette and Louis XVI.

In the very year of the French Revolution, 1789, Cagliostro returned to Rome and there purchased a lavish villa, resuming his seances and magical rites. At one of these exhibitions, the main salon teemed with nobles and distinguished visitors eager to see a demonstration of Cagliostro's powers of alchemy. One visitor described the event thusly: "At the end of the salon had been erected a kind of altar, on which were placed skulls, stuffed monkeys, serpents who writhed and coiled as in life, owls, musty parchments, amulets, crucibles, and other strange furniture. Incense was burning before the images of fantastic Chinese and Egyptian idols.

Cagliostro, wrapped in a Chaldean robe, appeared followed by his wife. He passed, or pretended to pass, into a trance, and gave a lively description of the Marriage of Cana of Galilee. (By this time in his life Cagliostro had been telling his patrons that he was thousands of years old and had been a personal friend of Cleopatra and the Queen of Sheba.) He then seized a glass beaker of pure water and crying "Ero sum qui sum" poured therein two drops from a small vial he kept in his bosom, whereupon the liquid seemed to be transformed into a sparkling wine, cups of which were handed to the guests who pronounced it delicious. Psychometry and crystal-gazing followed..."

These performances were reported to members of the Inquisition and caused Cagliostro and Lorenza, and their chief aide, Fra Francesco, to be arrested on December 27, 1789. Before the tribunal of the Inquisition, Cagliostro denied that he was a heretic and practiced fraud. Lorenza, however, after reported torture, confessed to these crimes and wholly implicated her husband. She was sent to the convent of Santa Appollonia in Trastevere, where she remained a prisoner and died many years later.

Cagliostro was sentenced to death, but Pope Pius VI commuted the sentence to life imprisonment. In the Vatican fortress prison of San Leo, Cagliostro lived miserably in a sparsely furnished cell, chained to the floor. Some reports held that he slowly went insane before dying on August 28, 1795. One account insisted that he was strangled to death by his wardens, who believed that followers of his Egyptian Masonic sect were planning to free him.

ENGLAND'S GREAT IMPOSTER/1866-1874

More than a half century after the miserable demise of Cagliostro in Italy, an equally spectacular character emerged in England. He was the tall, heavyset and well-mannered Arthur Orton (1834-98; AKA: Thomas Castro; The Tichborne Claimant), a fabulous imposter, like Cagliostro, who, with incredible presumption, laid claim to one of England's greatest estates by assuming the identity of a long-missing heir, Sir Roger Doughty Tichborne.

This spoiled aristocrat, whose disappearance sparked one of the costliest, and most infamous episodes in British legal history, was born in Paris on January 5, 1829. He was the son of Henrietta Flicit and James Tichborne, whose family baronetcy dated back to 1135. Roger, who was expected to become the eleventh baronet of Tichborne, was enrolled in the Jesuit College at Stonyhurst. In 1849, he received a military commission in the Sixth Dragoons (or Carbineers). Young Roger eschewed the vulgar mannerisms of the military class. He preferred to associate with gentlemen of fine breeding and young women from titled families.

However, the parents of Roger's first cousin, Katherine Doughty, looked with disfavor upon their daughter's blooming courtship with the Tichborne heir. For one thing, Roger and Katherine were first cousins. Roger's profligate lifestyle was another concern. At last they decided on a three-year waiting period before the young couple exchanged their vows. At the end of that time, if the couple's feelings had not changed, Katherine's parents would consent to the nuptials.

This arrangement was perfectly satisfactory to Roger, who then made hasty preparations to embark on a world tour. The 24-year-old Tichborne sailed for Rio de Janeiro in January 1853. From South America, he continued his sojourn to New York, sailing on the Bella on April 20, 1854. The vessel capsized due to an improperly balanced load of coffee, and all forty passengers and crew were thought lost at sea. An empty lifeboat and assorted debris were found floating in the ocean four days later by a passing vessel.

Sir Roger Doughty Tichborne, heir to a fabulous British estate, an adventurous youth, who was lost at sea in 1854.

The news filtered back to England. Lawyers for the Tichborne estate executed Roger's will, which had been filed shortly before he left on the voyage. Katherine, his beloved, married Sir James Radcliffe of Yorkshire. Roger's father was the next in line to inherit the estate, but he died in 1862. Alfred Joseph Tichborne became the next in line to inherit the title and estates, but Lady Henrietta did not like him. Hearing rumors that her son had miraculously survived the ship wreck, Henrietta placed advertisements in English, French, and Spanish newspapers soliciting information from anyone who might have seen Roger alive. She intimated that a large reward would be paid for such information, noting that her son was heir to a sizeable fortune.

The news item was read with great interest by Thomas Castro, a butcher's son, who was then living in a hut in Wagga Wagga, Australia. Castro, by an incredible coincidence, had made the acquaintance of a servant named Bogle, who had served as Sir Edward Doughty's valet for many years. Castro, whose real name was Arthur Orton, was facing financial ruin. He decided on a bold gambit. Through a Melbourne man named Cubitt, Castro-Orton passed himself off as the long-lost Roger Tichborne. Cubitt, anxious to curry the favor of Lady Henrietta, conveyed the happy news back to England. Bogle met Orton at the Metropole Hotel in Sydney, Arthur Orton (AKA: Thomas Castro), who claimed to be the missing Tichborne, even though he bore no resemblance to the missing heir.

and though he was initially skeptical, he came to believe that Orton was, indeed, the long-lost Roger Tichborne.

Lady Tichborne wired £400 to Australia to pay for her "son's" passage back to England. He arrived on Christmas Day, 1866, and began to familiarize himself with the family estate. Orton sought out the law clerk, who was employed by the family's solicitors, the firm of Dunn & Hopkins. The clerk, whose name was Rous, became convinced that Orton was the missing Roger Tichborne, despite the striking lack of similarity between the two men. Tichborne had been reed-thin and Orton weighed in at over 300 pounds. He also lacked refinement. Yet he succeeded in hoodwinking many individuals connected with the Tichborne estate, including the dowager Lady Henrietta, who happily received her long-lost son in Paris in January 1867.

Lady Tichborne gleefully exclaimed: "This is my son!" and she awarded him a generous allowance of £1000 a year. Although the old lady naively believed that her son had come back from among the dead, the other members of the Tichborne family were not so easily convinced. On May 11, 1871, the matter went before the Court of the Common Pleas. The debate over the "Claimant's" legitimacy was to become one of the longest ordeals in British legal history, dragging on through two trials before ending on February 28, 1874. Hundreds of witnesses appeared before the bench, and the testimony they offered consumed some 10,000 pages.

Sir John Coleridge, who later became Lord Chief Justice, led for the prosecution. His blistering cross-examination quickly discredited Orton and all he was trying to accomplish. "The first sixteen years of his life, he had absolutely forgotten while the few facts he had told the jury were either already proved or would be shown to be absolutely false or fabricated," Coleridge said. "Of his college life he could recollect nothing. About his amusements, his books, his music, his games, he could tell nothing. Not a word of his family, the people with whom he lived, their habits, their persons, their very names. He had forgotten his mother's maiden name; he was ignorant of all particulars of the family estate; he remembered nothing of Stonyhurst; and in military matters he was equally deficient. Roger, born and educated in France, spoke and wrote French like a native and his favorite reading was French literature, but the Claimant [Orton] knew nothing of French."

Lord Bellow, a school chum of Roger Tichborne, was brought to the stand. He testified without reservation that Roger had tattooed the initials "RCT" on his arm. Orton's arm was examined, but there was no trace of a tattoo. Chief Justice Bovell ordered the claimant imprisoned on a charge of perjury, pending bail of £10,000. Nearly a year passed before the second trial convened. Although Orton claimed to have been rescued at sea by the ship Osprey, which had taken him to Melbourne, a check of the maritime records showed that no such vessel existed.

The prosecution in the second trial proved that Roger was actually Arthur Orton, that he had been born in Wapping, before traveling to Valparaiso, where he stayed with a family named Castro, the name he used when he lived in Wagga Wagga, Australia. He returned to England in 1851, the prosecution stated, working as a butcher's apprentice under his father. He left the following year for Australia. In 1854, prosecutors pointed out, Orton stopped writing letters to his family. It was in this year that the real Roger Tichborne was lost with the missing Bella.

At this point, the prosecution hinted at the fact that the real Roger Tichborne may have somehow survived the shipwreck and had been stranded in Australia, where he actually met Arthur Orton. Testimony pointed out that Tichborne had been identified in Australia and had reportedly sold a ring he was known to have worn. More testimony insisted that the missing heir had been seen in Australia with none other than Arthur Orton in one of the bush country stations. The implication of all this testimony was that Orton had murdered the young man after learning from him his family background, preparatory by a decade to impersonating the wealthy heir.

Orton arriving at his 1874 trial, where his preposterous claims were disproved and his brazen impersonation exposed.

Orton, convicted of fraud (with walking stick), is shown entering Newgate Prison.

A jury deliberated for only a half hour before returning a guilty verdict against Orton on charges of fraud and perjury. Orton was sentenced to fourteen years in penal servitude. He served just ten years before earning his freedom in 1884. Another decade passed before Orton gave up all pretenses and admitted to the colossal fraud. Driven by poverty he sold his story to People Magazine in 1895. Orton died on April 1, 1898, All Fool's Day, and was buried in a coffin that bore the curious inscription (enigmatically allowed by the Tichborne family), which read: "Sir Roger Charles Doughty Tichborne; born 5 January 1829, died 1 April 1898."

THE GREAT BANK OF ENGLAND FORGERY/ 1872-73

Three clever but relatively inexperienced American swindlers undertook one of the most fantastic forgeries in British history, that of the Great Bank of England. By the time the three U.S. con artists had determined to pool their resources to defraud European banks in 1872, each had already experienced limited success. The leader, 33-year-old George Bidwell, had been sentenced to two years imprisonment in July 1865 for defrauding grocers in Wheeling, West Virginia, with his partner, a man using the name Dr. S. Bolivar. Bidwell escaped before completing his sentence. His brother, 25-year-old Austin Bidwell, had cashed £13,000 in stolen U.S. bonds in Europe in 1871, while Bostonian George MacDonnell had learned his criminal trade from the "Terror of Wall Street," master forger George Engel. However, none had undertaken a massive swindle until after their arrival in London in 1872.

The trio's modus operandi was relatively simple. They would visit a bank where one of them would obtain a letter of credit while the others stole the bank's letterhead. These letterheads were used to forge additional letters of introduction, which were then submitted to European banks. George Bidwell used this procedure at the London and Westminster Bank, calling himself Hooker, one of sixteen aliases he used during the endeavor.

As Hooker, the elder Bidwell traveled to Bordeaux, France, and cashed a forged check for 50,000 francs. During the next two days, he cashed forged checks for 62,000 francs in Marseilles, and 60,000 francs in Lyons. Following a relatively unsuccessful venture to a Brazilian bank, where the con still netted £10,000, the three became bold enough to believe that they could successfully defraud the Bank of England.

George Bidwell wired a fourth confederate, Edwin Noyes, in New York and he soon joined the swindlers in London. Noyes acted as the group's delivery man, exchanging the notes obtained from forged checks for U.S. bonds, gold, and cash. Austin Bidwell, using the name of Frederick Albert Warren, met a society tailor named Edward Hamilton Green, whose introduction to the Bank of England provided the swindlers with an outstanding opportunity.

George Bidwell, one of the leading sharpers in the Great Bank of England forgery.

Posing as Warren, Austin Bidwell deposited £1,200 and the con was underway. By November 1872, an additional £8,000 was deposited. From January 21 to February 28, 1873, the foursome forged and cashed ninety-four bills of exchange, totaling £102,217. These funds were transferred to the Continental Bank, and exchanged for gold and £65,000 in U.S. bonds. On the last day of February 1873, the fraud was discovered. Until then, the forgers had been meticulous in preparing the forged documents. Because the Bank of England had no safeguards against fraudulent transactions used by the Bidwells, the fraud could only fail if the swindlers themselves made a mistake, and this they did on February 28, 1873.

The Old Bailey trial of the Bidwells, MacDonnell and Noyes in 1873.

The transaction of February 28, 1873, failed to show a date of issue, a glaring error easily spotted by a bank clerk. Although the fraud was carried out as usual, the bank contacted the alleged issuer of the worthless note, B.W. Blydenstein, for the missing date, and discovered that the bill had never been issued. The next day, March 1, Noyes was arrested at the Continental Bank, while making another deposit. His confederates fled when they heard the news, destroying all evidence of their illegal trade, except for the blotter upon which the forgeries had been drafted. MacDonnell escaped to New York where he was arrested as he disembarked from his ship. Austin Bidwell was apprehended in Havana, Cuba, and, like MacDonnell, was returned to London. The last to be captured was George Bidwell, who fled first to Ireland, and then to Edinburgh, Scotland, after learning that a reward was offered in Ireland for his capture. A month later he, too, was returned to London after his arrest on April 3, 1873.

During the trial, the judge actually wore a gun, fearing that friends of the defendants might attempt to free their comrades. The blotter, forgotten by the forgers, led to the conviction of all four men. Police were able to detect impressions left on the blotter which matched the gang's forgeries. Also used against the swindlers were the contents of a package, sent to Major George Matthews in New York. The package contained George Bidwell's jewelry and the ill-gotten U.S. bonds. George Bidwell had also boasted, in a letter to MacDonnell, of his dexterity in eluding capture, thus implicating the entire gang. Each of the four was sentenced to penal servitude for life.

George Bidwell, after an aborted suicide attempt and near starvation, was released from Dartmoor Prison on July 18, 1887, because of poor health. Bidwell returned to the U.S., where he wrote his autobiography, Forging His Chains. He also made a living touring the country, lecturing on the evils of crime. His younger brother was released in 1892. Together they traveled to Butte, Montana, in March 1899, where Austin Bidwell died on March 7. George Bidwell died on March 25, 1899, found dead in the same bed where his brother had died only two weeks earlier.

NEMESIS OF THE PINKERTONS/1870s

Undetected by British prosecutors in the notorious Bank of England forgery was a sophisticated, handsome man named Walter Cartman Sheridan (1838-90: AKA: John Holcom; Charles H. Keene or Kean; Charles H. Ralston; Walter Stanton, Walter A. Stewart). As events unfolded years later, it was learned that Sheridan had been the criminal inspiration for the forgeries on the Bank of England passed by the Bidwell brothers. He had long known the Bidwells and had reportedly masterminded the system of forgeries they implemented in their gigantic swindle. Although Sheridan was often involved in the armed robberies of banks, he was known as one of America's most dexterous swindlers and was the nemesis of the Pinkerton Detective Agency for nearly three decades.

Sheridan was born in New Orleans to a respectable family and received a liberal education. His foray into crime began while he was still in his teens. In 1858, he was arrested by Missouri authorities for stealing a horse, then a crime often punishable by death. Sheridan was arrested later that same year in Chicago with Joseph Moran, a western outlaw, who helped him plan a bank robbery. This caper resulted in a five-year prison sentence at the penitentiary in Alton, Illinois.

After his release from Alton, the wily Sheridan, along with Charles Hicks and Philip Pearson, planned a daring holdup of the First National Bank of Springfield, Illinois. Hicks and Pearson entered the bank through an open window, while Sheridan held the teller at gunpoint. The robbers then removed $35,000 from the vault and made their way out of the bank without firing a shot. Pearson took his share of the loot and fled to Europe. Hicks was soon arrested and sent to prison at Joliet. Detective William Pinkerton was then assigned to the case by his illustrious father, Allan Pinkerton, who at the moment, was in Washington, where he was engaged as President Lincoln's chief of security. Finding Sheridan proved to be no problem. Holding on to him was another matter.

William Pinkerton arrested Sheridan in Toledo, Ohio, finding $22,000 on his person. He was escorted back to Chicago, but while in transit Sheridan tried to convince his fellow train passengers that he was being held hostage by two kidnappers. When this ploy failed, Sheridan offered $10,000 to the second Pinkerton operative assigned to guard him. William Pinkerton sat out the remainder of the train ride with his sidearm poised to shoot Sheridan or his own assistant, if circumstances warranted it. In Chicago, Sheridan spent the bulk of his $20,000 savings to avoid another prison sentence. He forced the courts into granting him a change of venue to Decatur, Illinois. Then, armed with the best legal minds available to him, Sheridan won an acquittal from jurors he had allegedly bribed.

In the next few years, Sheridan committed a series of robberies in the eastern half of the U.S. Following his acquittal in

The suave Walter Sheridan, who forged railroad bonds worth $2.5 million.

Decatur, Sheridan made off with $120,000 in bonds from the Maryland Fire Insurance Company. He followed this up with the successful holdup of the Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank of Scranton, Pennsylvania. With the help of "Little" George Corson, Sheridan looted $37,000 in bonds from the vault. Next came a $40,000 heist of a Cleveland bank. Sheridan got away, but his confederates, Jesse Allen, Joseph Butts, and James Griffin, were captured. Allen and Griffin were convicted and sentenced to the state prison; Butts was discharged.

One of Sheridan's most notorious frauds involved the father of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Milford Blatchford. The elder Blatchford was accosted by Sheridan near Nassau and Liberty streets in Manhattan one day. During their conversation, Blatchford unthinkingly placed his wallet containing $75,000 worth of bonds on an apple stand. In an instant, the billfold was snatched by one of Sheridan's confederates. Several of these bonds were later found in the possession of Horace S. Corp, a brother-in-law of one of the men working for Sheridan.

In 1872, Sheridan and his gang of confidence men, which included the likes of George Wilkes, Andrew J. Roberts, Frank Gleason, Samuel Perry, George McDonald, Austin Bidwell, and Gottlieb Engels, devised a fabulous scheme to forge notes drawn on the Bank of England.

Before the last hand was played out in that elaborate forgery, Sheridan and company precipitated a near-panic on Wall Street that sent dozens of investors to ruination in Summer 1873 by flooding the market with forged railroad bonds. The London end of the operation was headed by Austin and George Bidwell and McDonald, none of whom could keep the affair to themselves. They spent much of their time drinking and roistering in the pubs in the Argyle and Barnes district of London. When their monies were spent and their criminal intentions revealed, the Bidwells and McDonald evaded arrest by crossing the ocean to hide out in New York.

Meanwhile, Sheridan was forced to make adjustments. The remaining members of the gang began forging false bonds made out in the issue of the New York Central Railroad, the Buffalo and Erie Railroad, the Union and Pacific Railroad, New Jersey Central Railroad, Tobo and Neosho Railroad, the California and Oregon Railroad, and the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. The penman Engels, an artisan in his own right, prepared the bogus securities, whose face value exceeded $2.5 million. Posing as Charles H. Ralston, Sheridan became a member of the New York Produce Exchange and rented an office at 60 Broadway, where he advertised himself as president of the Belgian Stone Company, purveyors of exquisite marble. The forged bonds were placed on the market for astonishingly low prices. A shareholder of the Buffalo and Erie Railroad demanded to know if they were genuine. "Why my dear sir, of course they're genuine," Sheridan replied. "And a surprising bargain at that figure." The man bought $30,000 worth of the bogus bonds.

The forgers obtained $70,000 from the New York Guarantee and Indemnity Company, giving as collateral $102,000 in forged bonds of the Buffalo and Erie Railroad. The following day, Sheridan secured an additional $30,000 using the same worthless securities. The scheme was revealed in September 1873, by which time Sheridan had already escaped to Europe. Pinkerton detectives hired by the U.S. railroads traced his movements through Belgium and across the continent, until Sheridan made the mistake of returning to the U.S. in Fall 1875. The chase continued through Ohio, Nebraska, Colorado, Utah, California, and all over the west until Robert Pinkerton, William Pinkerton's brother, received a tip that Sheridan was returning to New York. At 11 p.m. on the night of March 22, 1876, the con man stepped off a ferry at the foot of Desbrosses Street in Manhattan, walking right into the waiting arms of Robert Pinkerton. "Bob, what's this for?" the startled Sheridan asked. When told that the game was up, he shrugged and accompanied Pinkerton to the Twenty-Seventh Precinct Station. He was arraigned at the Court of the General Sessions the next day on eighty-four counts of forgery. With a staggering amount of evidence against him, Sheridan was convicted and sent to prison for five years.

Upon his release he returned to his former haunts to pick up where he left off, though advancing age and declining health began to take their toll. In January 1890, he was arrested by Canadian police for the robbery at La Banque du Sheridan is arrested by Robert Pinkerton on March 22, 1876, upon his arrival in New York.

Peuple in Montreal. He was sentenced to serve six months in prison, but swore to the judge that he would not live a full week if he were compelled to do hard time. On January 19, 1890, Sheridan proved that he was not bluffing. A warder found him dead in his cell. The coroner ruled that Sheridan's death was brought on by typhoid fever.

THE AMERICAN ROBBER BARONS/ 1810s-1870s

Many of the first great American fortunes were first gleaned by a group of ruthless and utterly corrupt businessmen, who busily deceived each other in one colossal fraud after another. Fraud in all its forms and techniques were freely employed by these enterprising entrepreneurs. They stopped at nothing in their rabid desire to destroy each other's fortunes and in the process consistently brought economic ruin to tens of thousands of investors. These high-rolling swindlers were later termed "robber barons," but they were little more than conniving crooks in beaver hats.

Pioneer con man Daniel Drew; he watered livestock to boost the price of cattle.

One of the earliest of these American sharpers was Daniel Drew (1797-1879). A tall, lean, narrow-eyed illiterate, Drew, with typical pioneer spirit, learned and practiced fraud with the alacrity of an aggressive opportunist. He began as a drover and horse trader who, in 1815, made enough money from a cattle scheme to put his other spectacular frauds into action. In that year, Drew drove a large herd of cattle to the New York pens of Henry Astor, the brother of John Jacob Astor. He was a strange-looking cattleman, wearing a giant floppy hat, baggy pants, prodding his cattle onward with an umbrella, while riding a mule. He thus appeared before Henry Astor, who looked over Drew's livestock and exclaimed: "Drew, that's the finest-looking herd of cattle I've ever seen!"

Astor paid Drew top dollar, but three days later, Astor was amazed to see that this herd had turned into the worst-looking animals on four hooves, all of them sickly and so thin that their ribs almost poked through the flesh. Drew had simply driven his herd without water for three days, mixing salt in the cattle's food and allowing them to drink just before delivery, causing the animals to bloat and look fat, weighing in at almost twice the normal weight.

With his shady profits from Astor, Drew bought a broken-down ferry line which consisted of an ancient paddle-wheeler, Water Witch, an old tub that leaked from every board and joint and was wholly unseaworthy. Yet, with a coat of paint and Drew's elaborate plans to build more ships, he convinced Commodore Cornelius Vanderbilt that he would soon outstrip Vanderbilt's lucrative steamship services.

Vanderbilt, enormously rich, paid a huge sum to Drew, buying out the line, only to discover that he had bought nothing more than a hulk and some rotting docks. Drew would go on victimizing Vanderbilt for millions of dollars, especially in his enormous stock fraud during the so-called "Erie War," in which his junior partners, James "Big Jim" Fisk and Jay Gould, attempted to take over the Erie Railroad, in which Vanderbilt held considerable stock. Drew employed the same mulcting method on Vanderbilt as he had on Henry Astor, except that he watered stock instead of cattle.

Drew, Fisk, and Gould made it appear that they were going to start buying up all the Erie stock, which caused the greedy Vanderbilt to make such huge purchases of the stock that he believed he had cornered all the stock Erie possessed. But new Erie stock kept appearing on the floor of the then-unregulated stock exchange in New York. Drew, through his henchmen Fisk and Gould, was simply printing up more and more shares and selling these worthless certificates to Vanderbilt. The stock soared to a bloated value of $57 million, until the fraud was discovered when a broker smeared the ink on an Erie certificate with the slight pressure of his thumb and then fainted dead away under the shock. Erie stock plummeted, but by then Drew, Fisk, and Gould had bilked as much as $10 million from the gullible Vanderbilt.

From 1873 to 1876, shrewd, old stock-watering Drew found himself trapped in one exchange panic after another, until he was reduced to the status of near-pauper, having only $500 left of his millions. When he filed for bankruptcy, Drew listed his possessions as "seal-skin coat, watch and chain, bibles and hymn books." Though he died impoverished, Drew is oddly remembered today as a religious benefactor. In 1852, while still flush, Drew had endowed several religious groups with on-going funds that allowed the razing of the Old Brewery, a vile charnal house in New York City, where countless murders had been committed and vice ran rampant.

In 1866, Drew established Drew Theological Seminary in Madison, New Jersey, leaving that institution with permanent funds so that his name would be forever associated with it. Drew's aim, of course, was to establish a good and worthy name to shield his fraudulent activities from public view but never embracing the teachings of the institutions he founded. He died a mean old schemer, having finally learned to read in his old age, but giving this up after having perused only one book, Pilgrim's Progress.

Drew's most energetic proteges in stock fraud were James Fisk, Jr. (1835-72; AKA: Jubilee Jim, Prince Erie, Big Jim) and Fisk's erstwhile partner Jay Gould (1836-1892). Of the two, Fisk was the leader, a towering, broad-chested, jovial confidence man, the most spectacular swindler of his era. He was known as Jubilee Jim because of his expansive and expensive style of living. He was also called Prince Erie because of his wild manipulation of the Erie Railroad Stock, which caused a Wall Street panic that became legendary. Many times a millionaire before his murder by Edward "Ned" Stokes in 1872, Fisk began dirt poor and without a formal education. Yet his native intelligence and shrewd judgment was to benefit him time and again in his confrontations with America's super rich. He bested the greediest of America's tycoons and became the "Commodore" Cornelius Vanderbilt, bilked by Drew in a fake steamship scam and was later swindled out of millions by Drew, Fisk and Gould in a gigantic stock watering scheme.

Big Jim Fisk, flamboyant robber baron; he watered stock offerings to loot millions from investors.

supreme robber baron of his day through nerve and an acute sense of the ridiculous.

Fisk was born in Pownal, Vermont, on September 12, 1835. He was a strapping youth at the age of fourteen and he left his homestead to travel with Van Amburgh's circus, working first as a roustabout, then a barker. He stayed with the circus for eight years. At age fifteen he married circus performer Lucy Moore. He then returned to Pownal to work in his father's peddling business. Fisk was so effective a salesman that he had soon built up the business to make it an attractive purchase by Marsh & Co., a large Boston firm. He went to work for this firm as a salesman, but when the Civil War began Fisk went to Washington, D.C., and obtained huge contracts for blankets to be used by the Union Army, though his supplies for this item did not exist. He then purchased blankets at cut rates from depressed mills and made his first fortune. Fisk was not above bribing Union Army officials to obtain more Army contracts for such supplies and his coffers filled again.

Following the war, Fisk became a hated carpetbagger, traveling through the South, using his war spoils to buy up enormous amounts of confiscated cotton at bargain prices. He then moved to New York, entered the brokerage business and peddled cotton at high rates, gleaning enormous profits. He Josie Mansfield, Fisk's expensive and cheating mistress.

The New York brownstone Fisk bought for Josie Mansfield.

befriended at this time another entrepreneur, Jay Gould, and together this pair set out to outwit the financial giants of the U.S. Fisk and Gould, in 1867, joined forces with the crafty and unscrupulous Daniel Drew, who had made his fortune years earlier by watering livestock.

Drew had swindled his arch business enemy, Commodore Cornelius Vanderbilt, years earlier by selling him a steamship line without steamships. Vanderbilt, as greedy as Drew, owned the lucrative New York Central Railroad and cast covetous eyes on Drew's Erie line. Drew made Fisk and Gould directors of the Erie Railroad. Fisk planted newspaper reports that Erie stock was about to be purchased in large amounts by a secret consortium and this prompted Vanderbilt to begin buying up Erie stock in a brazen attempt to take control of the railroad. In that era, little or no regulations governed stock sales so that when Vanderbilt began buying huge blocks of Erie stock, Fisk and Gould simply printed more certificates and flooded the market. Once valued at about $20 million, Erie soared to an inflated value of $57 million.

Vanderbilt bought and bought and still could not corner Erie. Said Fisk to Gould as they stood next to their printing operations where Erie stock was being created: "If this printing press don't break down, I'll be damned if I don't give the old hog [Vanderbilt] all he wants of Erie!" Vanderbilt finally uncovered the watered stock swindle when one of his buyers received new Erie stock certificates and the ink smeared on his fingerprints, causing him to collapse in shock. Fisk, Gould, and Drew, with more than $6 million stuffed in carpetbags, escaped ahead of Vanderbilt's detectives by fleeing to New Jersey on the ferry.

The robber barons took refuge in Jersey City, fortifying a hotel called Taylor's Castle and surrounding the place with more than 100 thugs imported from New York. Vanderbilt's own army of strong-arm men arrived to retrieve the commodore's millions, but they were beaten off, Fisk himself leading his men in a head-bashing attack. Fisk gave interviews to New York reporters from his New Jersey bastion, boldly admitting that he had bested Vanderbilt by floating Erie stock, and saying that he and Gould were nothing more than two enterprising young men who were trying to expand their business interests.

Gould, tight-lipped, refused to meet with the press. He spent days in his room at Taylor's Castle, writing down schemes in which to swindle Vanderbilt out of more millions. Drew told Fisk and Gould that he was disgusted with both of them and resented being an exile in New Jersey. Then Gould, at Fisk's urging, stuffed $1 million into a carpetbag and left in the middle of the night, secretly traveling to Albany, New York, the state's capital.

The next day Helen Josephine "Josie" Mansfield, a ravishing and successful actress, who had become Fisk's mistress, arrived to keep Fisk company in Jersey City. Fisk showered Mansfield with jewels and furs and invited the press to interview her. Newsmen wrote columns about her "buxom beauty" and "dazzling white skin." Meanwhile, Gould met quietly in Albany with William Marcy Tweed, the most corrupt state

Fisk (left) dining with Josie Mansfield and friends; the man at right is Edward S. "Ned Stokes," one-time Fisk friend, who stole Mansfield from Jubilee Jim and later murdered him.

Directors and stockholders of the Erie Railroad are shown breaking into Gould's offices to serve summons; he had already fled.

Fisk is shown with President Grant on board the swindler's yacht, while Fisk's agents tried to corner the gold market.

Rioting investors are shown outside of Gould's office after he and Fisk cornered the gold market.

Swindler Jay Gould (in top hat) flees process servers after his gold market scam collapsed.

senator in the legislature. Tweed would later take over New York's political power base, Tammany Hall and become the country's leading grafter. Gould simply bought the state legislature through Tweed, paying some senators as much as $70,000 and others only $5,000. They voted approval of all existing Erie stock, even legitimatizing another huge block of stock still in the hands of Drew, Fisk, and Gould. Vanderbilt was thusly deprived of legal action in the gigantic Erie swindle.

Vanderbilt nevertheless continued to file lawsuits, but dropped the involved legal actions when Fisk, Gould, and Drew agreed to return $4.5 million of his stolen money. The robber barons kept almost $3 million more they had taken from Vanderbilt. The commodore was willing to split the difference, figuring that he was recouping money he might never see again. With their profits, the ambitious Fisk and Gould made bold plans to corner the gold market in 1869.

To that end, Gould first bribed Abel R. Corbin, brother-in-law of President U.S. Grant, to spy in the White House and learn whether or not the Grant administration intended to keep a lid on releasing gold reserves. When Corbin informed Gould that no gold would be released into the open market for some time, Fisk and Gould began buying up the $15 million in gold then in the marketplace.

To disguise their identities, Fisk and Gould employed purchasing agents to sign gold purchases for them. To keep Grant from knowing of his move, Fisk invited the president on board his resplendent yacht, The Providence, and there wined and dined the liquor-loving Grant. Fisk was in his element, elegantly attired in his admiral's uniform and hosting an enormous seaboard fete. Fisk questioned the president about his administration's plans to release gold in the future, but the crafty Grant, suspecting Fisk's intentions, merely puffed on his cigar and gulped down whiskey, while he engaged Fisk in an innocuous and uninformative conversation.

Meanwhile agents for Fisk and Gould bought gold in a frenzy, driving the price up from 133 to 165. When gold reached this peak, Fisk and Gould sold out their enormous holdings and reaped about $10 million each. The sell-off caused a panic which culminated on "Black Friday," September 24, 1869. Thousands of investors were ruined and dozens committed suicide or went insane. Fisk and Gould went on to plan more grand schemes. One of these was the acquisition of a productive oil refinery owned by Edward S. "Ned" Stokes. Fisk and Stokes became fast friends and Fisk introduced Stokes to his mistress, Josie Mansfield. Stokes, who was born in Philadelphia on April 27, 1841, and came from an aristocratic Pennsylvania family, was immediately attracted to Mansfield and the two began to meet secretly.

Fisk began to spend lavishly on Mansfield and himself. He bought Pike's Grand Opera House at Eighth Avenue and 23rd Street, moving into sumptuous offices in this building. He bought a brownstone for Mansfield nearby and he gave lavish parties regularly. Fisk added more mistresses to his roster, at least a dozen, driving around in his huge carriage with no fewer than six beautiful women. He wore a new suit of clothes each day and he glittered with diamonds. He backed musicals in the Opera House and spent most of his time selecting seductive females to appear in his shows, adding these women to his list of mistresses, all of which soon alienated Josie Mansfield and drove her into the arms of Ned Stokes.

Edward S. "Ned" Stokes is shown lurking at the head of the grand stairway at New York's Broadway Central Hotel, where he patiently waited to kill Fisk.

Fisk by then had bought stock in Stokes' oil refinery. When Fisk heard that Stokes was secretly visiting Mansfield, he exploded, swearing out a warrant for Stokes' arrest, claiming that his business partner had embezzled $50,000 from their joint ventures. Stokes was jailed overnight on January 4, 1871, until he could arrange bail. The next day Stokes sued Fisk for slander. Then Fisk, to punish Mansfield for going over to Stokes, charged Mansfield and Stokes with blackmailing him. Josie Mansfield sued her former lover for libel. Stokes was brought to trial on January 6, 1872, where he was humiliated by Fisk's lawyers.

That afternoon, Stokes had a long lunch at Delmonico's, where a messenger informed him that a grand jury had just indicted him for blackmailing Fisk. Enraged, he returned to his hotel and pocketed a four-chamber Colt revolver. He dined with Josie Mansfield that night and learned from her that Fisk would be entertaining out-of-town guests at the Broadway Central Hotel. Stokes went to the hotel and waited in an upstairs hallway, gun in hand, for Fisk to appear. Late that night, Fisk arrived in all his sartorial splendor, wearing a red-lined military cloak, a top hat and a gold-headed cane. Fisk began to climb the grand staircase to his suite of rooms, when Stokes appeared at the top of the stairs. He took slow and careful aim at the man he hated. "I've got you at last!" Stokes shouted down to the portly Fisk.

Opposite page: Stokes fatally shoots Big Jim Fisk as a hotel employee stands helpless and in shock.

Fisk looked frantically at some hotel employees standing helplessly nearby, crying out: "For God's sake, will no one help me?"

Stokes fired two bullets, one striking Fisk in the arm, the other ploughing into Fisk's ample stomach, a mortal wound. Fisk fell onto the stairs, while Stokes fled through a back exit of the hotel. Jubilee Jim, with the help of some bellboys, stood up and, despite his bleeding wounds, climbed the long stairs to his rooms. He died at 10:45 a.m. the following day.

As he lay bleeding to death, Fisk asked Mansfield to visit him. Her answer was to pack the jewels and furs he had given her and flee the city. Mrs. Lucy Fisk, however, a wife loyal to the end, did arrive to kiss her husband goodbye. A few minutes later, Fisk died and his wife told reporters through sobs: "He was a good boy." Fisk lingered long enough in Room 213 to identify Stokes as the man who had shot him. Inspector Thomas Byrnes brought Stokes before the dying Fisk and Fisk weakly nodded and then said: "He is the man who shot me."

Stokes was promptly arrested and put on trial. He insisted that he encountered his former business partner by accident, that he had been at the Broadway Central to meet friends and that when he saw Fisk coming up the stairs, Fisk reached for a revolver and he shot Fisk in self defense. This was, of course, a brazen lie, but his lawyers managed to confuse the jury to the point where they could not agree. Stokes was tried twice more and, at the conclusion of the third trial, was found guilty and sentenced to six years in Sing Sing. Josie Mansfield, who had testified for him, saw him off at the train station in Manhattan, kissing him goodbye and promising to wait for him.

A few days later, Mansfield hired a theatrical manager who booked a European tour for her. Mansfield left for Paris and began giving lectures about her spectacular love life with Jubilee Jim Fisk and Ned Stokes. She never returned to the arms of Stokes, but remained in Paris where she grew rich. She lived to the age of eighty, dying in 1931, unmarried and alone in a small Left Bank studio. At the end, she reached for two photographs, one of Stokes and one of Fisk.

Jubilee Jim Fisk in his casket, surrounded by mourners; the slain robber baron's mistress, Josie Mansfield, did not attend.

Stokes emerged from prison and used up his considerable fortune in poor investments. He then became manager of the prestigious Hoffman House, one of New York's most resplendent hotels. Stokes acquired some interest in the hotel and again grew rich. He died in his Fifth Avenue mansion in 1901, also unmarried. Next to his bed on a table was the very Colt revolver he had used to murder Fisk, his rival in business and love.

Big Jim's partner, the indefatigable swindler Jay Gould, who was left with considerable stock in the Erie Railroad, eluded all efforts on the part of his millionaire victims to have him jailed for his massive stock frauds. Yet, the shrewd Gould was himself bilked by a refined English gentleman, who confronted him with his high crimes, compelling Gould to make a financial restitution that amounted to no more than a staggering pay-off. This clever English schemer was known as Gordon Gordon (d.1872), who used the bogus title of Lord Glencairn as a social front to cover his fraudulent grifts.

Few nineteenth-century con men matched the exploits of Gordon Gordon (his real name remains a mystery). He was all pluck and sheer gall. A first-rate swindler, Gordon, upon hearing of Big Jim Fisk's untimely murder, set out to swindle one of the last of the great robber barons, Jay Gould. By this time, Gordon was no novice at swindling. He had first appeared in Edinburgh in the winter of 1868, posing as a wealthy nobleman with the title of Lord Glencairn.

Gordon visited the salon of Marshall and Son, one of the city's fashionable jewelers. There he selected several precious jewels and paid for them by check. When the transaction cleared the bank, his credit in the city was established. His next and all following jewel purchases were paid for by credit. By the spring of 1869, when the bills came due, the merchants realized that they were out £25,000. But by then Gordon had vanished.

When next seen, Gordon was selling the local gentry in Minneapolis, Minnesota, on a wild scheme to buy vast tracts of land in the wilderness and build gleaming new cities for the displaced residents of Scotland. As fantastic as the proposal appeared, the residents believed it, especially after Lord Glencairn deposited $40,000 in cash in a local bank. The coming land boom would make Minnesota a financial Mecca, Gordon predicted. The residents lavished Gordon with all the luxuries then available in the Northwest.

The real target of Gordon's swindle was not the small-time businessmen of Minneapolis, but New York City railroad tycoon Jay Gould. The Minnesota adventure was merely an elaborate screen to attract publicity. With great fanfare, the soft-spoken, cultured con man arrived in Manhattan in February 1872, only a month after Net Stokes had shot and killed Gould's partner, Big Jim Fisk. Gordon carried with him forged letters of introduction to Gould and other tycoons. His coming was reported in the local gazettes, and he made a close ally of the editor of the New York Tribune, Horace Greeley.

At their first meeting in the Metropolitan Hotel, Gordon told Greeley of his plan to buy up millions of shares of Erie Railroad stock and drive out Gould once and for all. The plan was music to the ears of Greeley, who aspired to the White House and for whom Gould was a major obstacle. "I've heard he's an impossible rascal," Gordon said. Yes, that much was true, the editor conceded. "That simply won't do, will it, Mr. Greeley?" Indeed it wouldn't. Greeley next promptly arranged a meeting between the swindler and his prey.

Gordon came right to the point with Gould and told him that his investors now had majority control of the stock and that he, Gordon Gordon, intended to remove him from the company, unless he came to some sort of understanding about certain necessary changes. Jay Gould was aghast. He sputtered out a promise to implement new policies or tender his resignation if unable to do so. Gordon then demanded securities. After all, he had spent more than $1 million lining up Erie Railroad investors and securing legal help. Gould hedged, but his vanity got the better of him and he promised Gordon a half-million dollars to cover expenses. "This pledge was not to be used by him, but was to be returned to me on carrying out my part of the agreement," Gould later explained.

With the stocks and securities in Gordon's hand, the "sting" was complete. He dumped the stock in Philadelphia, by which time Gould realized that he had been taken for $150,000. Gordon was arrested, but Cornelius Vanderbilt and other financiers, who had been cheated in the Erie stock frauds, paid for Gordon's defense counsel. Free on his own recognizance, Gordon realized that it was only a matter of time before the British authorities supplied the Americans the true facts of his life.

Fisk's fellow robber baron, Jay Gould, who was outwitted by a more inventive swindler, Gordon Gordon, who called himself "Lord Glencairn."

Gordon took a fast train to Fort Garry, Manitoba, where he believed he would be safe. He had not counted on the persistence of Marshall and Sons, his first victims in Edinburgh, who had obtained a warrant for his arrest. Thomas Smith, the clerk of the firm, tried to serve the warrant, but was rebuffed in Fort Garry by people who had come to regard their visitor as a shrewd investor and kind-hearted philanthropist. But in the end, Smith succeeded in getting Gordon to surrender. The night before he was scheduled to depart, a great farewell ball was given in his honor. At three that morning, the handsome and enterprising Lord Glencairn shot himself to death in his room.

AMERICA'S FIRST GREAT CON MEN/ 1850s-1870s

One of the great gambling legends of the old Mississippi riverboats, William "Canada Bill" Jones' specialty was cheating suckers with three card monte. Born in England, Jones (d.1877) migrated with his family to Canada and became an accomplished card cheat at an early age, studying the techniques of a con man named Dick Cady. For years, Jones traveled across Canada, fleecing suckers with three card monte, losing only when he wished to convince gullible players that they could win. He employed the bent card routine in being able to pick the correct card. (Three card monte was a game where three cards, two aces and a queen, were dealt face down. The sucker would then be told to point to the queen in order to win the bet. It appeared easy, and they were permitted to win several hands before Jones so dazzled and confused the suckers with his deft movements of the three cards that he invariably won the escalating stakes.)

American sharper Canada Bill Jones in 1875.

By 1850, Canada Bill Jones was known throughout Canada, and with his game played out, he moved south and began to ply his tricky trade on the Mississippi riverboats. He met another talented sharper, George Devol, and formed a partnership with him, occasionally using other card cheats to back his crooked play. Jones' favorite ruse was to pretend to be a country bumpkin, who attempted to outwit his patrons, but who acted in such a bumbling, idiotic manner that the sucker was easily convinced that he could take advantage of Jones. As a card sharp, few could rival the dexterity and delivery of Canada Bill, and as an actor, he had no equal in the world of cheating.

His oft-times partner, George Devol described Canada Bill thusly: "Imagine a medium-sized, chicken-headed, tow-haired sort of a man, with mild blue eyes, and a mouth nearly from ear to ear, who walked with a shuffling, half-apologetic sort of a gait, and who, when his countenance was in repose, resembled an idiot. His clothes were always several size too large, and his face was as smooth as a woman's and never had a hair on it.

"Canada Bill was a slick one. He had a squeaking, boyish voice, and awkward gawky manners, and a way of asking fool questions and putting on a good-natured sort of a grin, that led everybody to believe that he was the rankest kind of sucker, the greenest sort of a jake. Woe to the man who picked him up, though. Canada was, under all his hypocritical appearance, a regular card shark, and could turn monte with the best of them."

Jones and Devol suckered thousands of riverboat gamblers and passengers through the 1850s, but following the Civil War the river trade diminished and the sky-high gamblers and plungers vanished. Canada Bill was not without flaws. He was himself an inveterate gambler, one who insatiably sought action, no matter the risk. This was never better demonstrated than on the occasion when Devol found Jones in a Natchez gambling den, playing faro.

Devol walked up to his partner and said in a startled voice: "Bill, you here! What's the matter with you? Of all people you know this faro game is fixed. It's always been fixed! You can't win!"

Canada Bill Jones disguised a country bumpkin.

"I know, I know," replied Canada Bill, as he delivered the classic gambler's lament, "but it's the only game in town."

The partnership between Jones and Devol dissolved when Canada Bill discovered that Devol was trying to swindle him out of his share of their mutually pooled funds. Taking his enormous earnings, Jones left for Kansas City and there he teamed up with another sharper named Dutch Charley. The pair roped a group of wealthy Kansas City bankers into an investment swindle and realized more than $200,000 before the city big shots learned they had been suckered. By then Canada Bill was long gone from the city, relocating in Omaha. He then took to riding the trains between Omaha and Kansas City, fleecing anyone foolish enough to play three card monte with him. For fifteen years he rode the rails, gleaning a fortune.

Officials of the Union Pacific heard of this one-man confidence plague and they ordered train detectives to eject anyone playing three card monte on their trains. Canada Bill was incensed when he heard this edict and he wrote to the president of the line, complaining how unfair the new rule was. He then offered to pay the Union Pacific $10,000 a year, plus an annual percentage of his take, if he were allowed to have an exclusive franchise of playing three card monte on its trains. Moreover, he promised that he would only swindle wealthy passengers and Methodist ministers. The railroad authorities declined Canada Bill's offer, generous though it may have appeared.

Railroad officials had posters of Canada Bill plastered on the walls of its trains. Every conductor and railroad detective knew him and looked for him. Though he disguised himself, Jones was repeatedly recognized and thrown off the Union Pacific cars. He finally quit the railroads in 1874 and moved to Chicago, where, with gamblers Charles Starr and Jimmy Porter, Jones established four huge gambling dens in the Levee or the Red Light District (Chicago's First Ward). Within six months, Jones had taken in more than $150,000, but he lost almost every dime in crooked casino games and he moved on to Cleveland. Here he was known and shunned, too infamous to convince anyone that he was anyone other than the celebrated Canada Bill. In 1877, Jones appeared in Reading, Pennsylvania, where he grew ill. He was taken to the Charity Hospital, where he died broke in 1877.

Dozens of gamblers, including Devol, attended Canada Bill's funeral. One sharper bet $100 that "Bill is not in the box," but no one took this jesting wager to heart. Another stepped up and delivered the gambler's eulogy:

O, when I die, just bury me
In a box-back coat and hat
Put a $20 gold piece on my watch chain
To let the Lord know I'm standing pat.

Canada Bill's longtime partner George Devol (1829-1902), outlived Jones by more than two decades, continuing successful con games until almost the day of his death. Devol was basically a card sharp, a cheat, and skilled player of three-card monte during the forty years he spent sailing the great paddlewheel ships that traversed the Mississippi River during the mid-nineteenth century. His partner, Canada Bill Jones, played the role of the gullible dupe, while Devol raked in $2 million by his own estimate.

In his published memoirs entitled Forty Years a Gambler on the Mississippi, Devol described himself as "a cabin boy in 1839; could steal cards and cheat the boys at eleven; stack a deck at fourteen...fought more rough and tumble fights than any man in America and was the most daring gambler in the world." Faro, three card monte, and rigged games of poker were his particular specialties. Victims who recognized that they were being cheated would not hesitate to pull a gun or knife. During these tense moments when his life hung in the balance, the gambler would extricate himself from the dilemma by "butting" heads with the swindled victim. Devol's cranium was the envy of the Mississippi con men. He used it many times to cold-cock adversaries, and became known as the man with the "most awesome cranium."

Canada Bill fleecing suckers in a three-card monte con game.

From time to time, Devol would butt heads with circus performers for prize money. He knocked unconscious the famous Billy Carroll of Robinson's Circus, who promoted himself as "the man with the thick skull," or "the great butter." It was a title Carroll was forced to relinquish. "Gentlemen, I have found my papa at last," he said. In 1887, Devol published his memoirs and drifted into semi-retirement. After his death, the Cincinnati Enquirer stated that Devol had won and lost more money than any other gambling blackleg in history.

THE BARON OF ARIZONA/1870s-1880s

Where Canada Bill employed the disguise of the raggedy country bumpkin when employing his confidence games, James Addison Reavis (d. 1908; AKA: Baron de Arizonaca, Caballero de los Colorados) donned the robes of aristocracy in an unbelievable forgery that, if upheld, would have given him ownership of all of what is now the state of Arizona and more. Reavis' land swindle was of such monumental proportions and it was so cleverly manufactured that it withstood the close scrutiny of some of the finest legal minds of the American Southwest for nearly a decade before a Spanish scholar and linguist named Mallet Prevost took a closer look. Only then did he discover that James Addison Reavis, the notorious "Baron of Arizona," was not the real-estate mogul he pretended to be. The vast acreages of land he had acquired over the years was the result of an elaborate forgery which took shape in the early 1870s.

James Reavis, who would have otherwise been doomed to a life of obscurity, served in the Confederate army during the Civil War. During this period he discovered his talents as a "penman." Armed with a forged pass, he succeeded in fooling the camp sentries to slip away from his regiment. His ability to duplicate the signatures of his commanding officers kept him away from the front lines for the duration of the Civil War. When the South was defeated and Reavis' military career came to an end, the forger returned to private life in St. Louis, where he found work as a streetcar conductor. This was not to his liking, however, and in time he decided to open a real-estate business that pandered to a somewhat shady clientele.

One of his customers promised a sizable commission if Reavis could come up with a quitclaim on a large parcel of land. The forger put his talents to good use by producing an authentic-looking document that was accepted by the courts without question. Encouraged by the ease with which he had deceived the authorities, Reavis went on to help other St. Louis residents forge property titles. But when the police became aware of certain improprieties, Reavis closed shop and headed west.

By the time he reached Santa Fe, New Mexico, he had squandered the bulk of his small, illegal fortune. He managed to find a job in the records division of a governmental agency which handled the claims of Spanish and Mexican residents, whose lands were ceded to the U.S. at the close of the Mexican War. The U.S. was bound by the terms of the 1848 Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to restore the rightful land to the owners and to honor all legitimate claims. While toiling over reams of documents, much of it printed in archaic Spanish, Reavis stumbled upon an idea that on the surface seemed so simple one could only wonder why no one had thought of it sooner.

What he decided to do was to forge or alter Mexican and Spanish land documents, some of which had been prepared by religious monks hundreds of years earlier, and then lay claim to existing properties under the name of Miguel de Peralta, a fictional character Reavis invented to lend legitimacy to the fraud. Reavis carefully went over the quality of the parchment paper, the type of ink the ancient scribes used, going so far as to whittle an identical quill. He attached an identity to the imaginary nobleman, Miguel de Peralta.

According to Reavis' own account the Spanish don was a lineal descendant of King Ferdinand, who had been awarded a princely title, military honors, and fabulous wealth. He went on to say that he was related to the family. His half-brother was Juan de Peralta, an itinerant gambler, who had arrived in Arizona in 1851 to purchase a large tract of land.

Reavis spent years putting it all together. He created generations of Peraltas, awarding Miguel's descendants with ten million acres of prime land in Arizona, which had once been the province of Spain. By 1870, the real estate huckster had traveled through Guadalajara, Lisbon, Madrid, Seville, and Mexico City, where he carefully placed his forged deeds, mortgages, and family wills in all the important libraries, monasteries, and archives, exactly where any investigating lawyers were mostly likely to look.

The great land-grant forger, James Addison Reavis, known as the "Baron of Arizona," shown in prison garb.

At last everything was in place and Reavis was ready to make his outlandish claim on the people of Arizona. He appeared in Prescott, Arizona, some time in the late 1870s, accompanied by an accomplice named Dr. George Willing. Reavis claimed that the doctor had purchased rights to a portion of the Peralta lands in Arizona for $1,000. But then he was poisoned to death (by Reavis, allegedly) and the grant reverted back to the con man for $30,000. The forged documents proved it, of course. In 1881, Reavis went before the surveyor general of the U.S. with certified copies of the falsified papers.

Notices soon appeared in the towns of Silver King, Pinal, Florence, Globe, Casa Grande, and Tempe advising the residents, who owned homes on Reavis property that they were obligated to pay taxes. Not even the Southern Pacific Railroad or the Silver King Mine, which had business interests in this area, were exempt. A battery of lawyers, many of them employed by the railroad and mining concerns, did as Reavis anticipated. They searched through state records and the ancient parchment land grants only to discover to their dismay that Reavis' claim of ownership was valid.

The Southern Pacific was obliged to pay $50,000 as a first down payment for a right-of-way through Arizona and New Mexico. The Silver King Mine contributed $25,000, and thousands of ranchers, homesteaders, and business people were forced to follow suit. Reavis collected his taxes and rental fees with impunity. Overnight he had become one of the wealthiest land entrepreneurs in Arizona. But in the back of his mind, he feared that he may have gone too far. To fool any government people who might be snooping around, he plucked a young Mexican woman off the street, sent her to a finishing school, and then married her. Reavis told his business associates that the woman, Maria Sanchez, was a direct descendant of the Peralta royal line. They had twin boys, who were educated by private tutors and attended to by a battery of servants. The family lived ostentatiously in opulent mansions in New York, Washington, St. Louis, and Mexico. Reavis even took his family to Spain, where they received all the courtesies of the royal house, including an audience before King Alfonso.

In March 1890 the charade ended unceremoniously when the Spanish historian and expert linguist Mallet Prevost took a second look at some of the parchment documents. Through chemical analysis, he determined that while the first few pages of each file were genuine, the succeeding sheets of paper had been produced in a much later period. Mallet further noticed important differences in the script. The writing of the genuine Spanish monks was done in iron ink. Reavis' forgeries were written in common dogwood ink. Important birth register pages had been noticeably altered. The ancient scribes were not likely to change a record after the fact, Prevost pointed out.

With these facts in hand, James Reavis was brought before the Land Grant Court in Santa Fe, where his frauds were exposed. He was charged with forgery and sentenced to serve six years in the Phoenix Penitentiary beginning in April 1890. When he emerged he was a broken, dissolute man without family or friends. Reavis' wife had divorced him years earlier and had taken the children to Denver. The remaining years of his life were spent on the streets of Santa Fe, where Reavis hustled for spare change. He died in 1908 without family, money or the title he most coveted in life.

ADVENTURES IN THE DIAMOND FIELDS/ 1871-1872

In the shady annals of American confidence games, Philip Arnold (1829-73) and John Slack had the distinction of being the only two grifters to ever successfully salt a diamond mine in the U.S., a scam that fleeced the pockets of some of America's richest men. In the summer of 1871, both Arnold and Slack went to the offices of George Roberts, a mining promoter, Con men Arnold and Slack, who were caricatured as snakes for their audacious "diamond field" swindle.

asking him to store a sack of precious stones—diamonds, emeralds, sapphires and rubies—saying that they had discovered a high plateau in Wyoming, which was loaded with every known rare gem in the world. This occurred, of course, at a time when lapidary experts were extremely limited in their ability to determine the value of true gems.

The jewels left by Arnold and Slack were valued at being worth more than $300,000, even though the con men had spent only $20,000 in buying industrial gems to use as their lure. Arnold and Slack asked the mining promoter if he thought he might be able to put together a financial group to invest in developing the diamond field they had found. They were willing, of course, to give controlling interest in the field to the investors; they were but simple farmers and prospectors who sought only to make a "reasonable profit" from their discovery, Arnold said.

Roberts took little time in contacting more than a dozen multimillionaires, including William C. Ralston, president of the Bank of California; General George H. Dodge, August Belmont, Henry Seligman, General George P. McClellan, General Samuel L. Barlow, and General Benjamin F. Butler. Baron Rothschild got involved through his U.S. representative and London millionaires Asbury Harpending, William Lent, and Alfred Rubery also asked to invest. It was an "insider's" investment, one which would reap untold billions in rare gems.

The con men passed several tests set for them by the investment consortium, taking representatives of the millionaires to the Wyoming field blindfolded for the last part of the trip on muleback, where they were shown a plateau of 6,500 feet, which they had salted with another $50,000 in industrial gems Arnold had purchased in Antwerp. The representative was allowed to fill a sack full of the gems and cart this back to civilization, where such distinguished jewelers as Charles Lewis Tiffany turned them over to their inexpert lapidaries who pronounced them priceless.

Yet, before the millionaire investors bought controlling interest in the fabulous diamond field, they assigned Henry Janin, one of the country's top mining experts, to investigate. Janin was a suspicious, circumspect individual, who vowed to examine every square inch of the field. He, like other mining experts before him, was led blindfolded through narrow canyons and passes, until arriving at the field. He was accompanied by several of the investors, including General Dodge, Lent, Harpending and Rubery.

When Janin beheld the field, he began kicking over anthills, digging with knives and overturning boulders and rocks to find not only great quantities of diamonds, but rubies, emeralds and sapphires. For about eight days the party dug up more than a ton of dirt, their harvest of gems amounting to more than $10,000, according to Janin, who had in the past examined more than six hundred gold and silver mines and had never once been wrong in assaying their worth. Estimating the return from his initial discovery, Janin was convinced that the diamond field was genuine.

Janin told the investors on hand that they and other partners possessed the richest field in mining history, that the area he pinpointed should yield more than $5 million in rare gems per acre, adding that the field was made up of more than 4,000 acres. "With a hundred men and proper machinery," Janin stated emphatically, I would guarantee to send out a million dollars in diamonds every thirty days." This was enough for the investors, who leaped headlong into the investment, attempting to get as many shares available from miners Arnold and Slack, and even buying the 1,000 shares Janin had received for making his appraisal of the diamond field. (Janin was paid $40,000 for his shares which were not recoverable.)

General Benjamin Butler, fleeced by Arnold and Slack.

General Grenville M. Dodge, fleeced by Arnold and Slack.

General George B. McClellan, fleeced by Arnold and Slack.

William C. Ralston, president of the Bank of California, fleeced by Arnold and Slack.

Asbury Harpending unwittingly lured scores of millionaires into the diamond swindle.

Baron Rothschild sent representatives to invest in the nonexistent diamond fields.

The consortium coughed up $100,000 as a down payment to Arnold and Slack and continued to give them similar amounts regularly over the next two years to develop the field, holding a claim on the area. Of course neither Arnold nor Slack developed anything, except their own bank accounts. They pocketed at least $500,000 in payments from the consortium before departing the West. Slack was never seen again, but Arnold boldly returned to his native Elizabethtown, Kentucky, where he bought an estate. When the bilked millionaires discovered that they had been conned, most of them kept quiet, lest the world mock them for their greed and lack of common sense, let alone the shabby business acumen they had displayed.

One of the suckers, William Lent, did admit to having been taken in this preposterous scam and filed suit, which is how the details of the impossible fraud came to light. There was little chance of Lent winning his suit since Arnold would be tried in his home town, where his friends admired him for suckering some of the world's richest men. He nevertheless refunded about $150,000 to Lent to rid himself of the suit. Arnold was still left with about $250,000. This money went to his head, however, and he soon had visions of becoming an international financier himself. To that end, he opened a bank in Elizabethtown, but his financial glory was short-lived. In late 1873, an enraged banking competitor let loose a blast from a shotgun into Arnold's back as he strolled down the street one day, and the con man died a short time later from these wounds, coupled with pneumonia.

IN THE DAYS OF BIG MIKE/1870s-1890s

One of the first crime bosses of Chicago was no strong-armed thug, but an affable, big-hearted character whose criminal domain was dominated by legions of artful sharpers. His minions relied upon their wits to bilk victims, either in rigged gambling or in simple or elaborate confidence games. This was a Chicago where the gambler and con artist were kings and long before the murder gangs took over the city with automatics and submachine guns. The ruler of the this criminal empire was Michael Cassius McDonald (1837-1907: AKA: Big Mike), a tall, robust, good-humored gambler, who appeared in Chicago in 1855.

McDonald first worked in the gambling halls on the near south side and, during the Civil War, recruited for the Union army, which was then paying $300 to each enlistee. McDonald encouraged thousands of recruits to join up, then desert, return to Chicago, and enlist again under a different name each splitting their $300 entrance fee with McDonald. Following the war, McDonald campaigned for mayoral candidate Harvey Colvin. When Colvin took office, he turned over control of virtually all gambling in Chicago to McDonald, who organized all the gambling dens and saloons, demanded and got forty percent of all profits, and then split these considerable funds with Colvin.

Big Mike McDonald, who ruled an army of con men in Chicago for three decades and was betrayed by two wives.

Big Mike's first wife, Mary Noonan, who cheated on him and finally ran off with a priest, but the crime czar forgave her on his deathbed.

Burlesque queen and second wife Dora Feldman, who cheated on McDonald and killed her lover; Big Mike forgave her, too.

From that point on and for the next thirty-five years, Big Mike McDonald was the underworld boss of Chicago. All gambling and prostitution came under his control, along with all other gang activities. Forty percent of all money taken in went directly to McDonald, who, in turn, paid off officials in city hall and the rank and file of Chicago's police force. By the 1880s, Big Mike was a multimillionaire. His rule was law and during his reign Chicago was known as a gambler's paradise. Hundreds of confidence men operated freely in the city, as long as they returned 40 percent of the profits to Big Mike.

These sharpers included Lou Ludlum, Red Adams, Tom and John Wallace, George W. Post, Charley and Fred Gondorf, Snapper Johnny Malloy, Charley Drucker, Kid Miller, Snitzer the Kid, Jim McNally, Red Jimmy Fitzgerald, Dutchy Lehman, Dutch Bill, Boss Ruse, and Tom O'Brien, who was known as "king of the bunco men." Enterprising youths such as Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil and Fred "Deacon" Buckminster grew up in McDonald's wide-open Chicago, learning the skills of the con man from the dozens of sharpers operating around the clock in McDonald's many gambling dens.

In addition to buying a new mansion and squandering thousands of dollars on diamonds for the many showgirls he squired about, McDonald's fertile brain was forever scheming up new ways in which to earn a dishonest dollar. He preyed upon the city coffers like a hungry vulture. In 1887, Big Mike ordered his bribed alderman to approve of a coat of "preserving fluid" which was applied to City Hall, guaranteed to keep the stately building intact for a hundred years. The bill came to more than $200,000, which was paid in cash the day after the job was completed. Two days later it rained and the "preserving fluid" washed away. There was no refund from Big Mike.

The World's Fair of 1893 in Chicago proved to be a gold mine for McDonald and his host of confidence men. Millions of dollars were gotten from the armies of tourists and spectators flocking to the fair. All manner of gambling flourished and every known confidence trick, from three-card monte to the old shell game, was practiced on each street corner, while the police and fair officials looked the other way. As usual, Big Mike's collection agents, numbering in the dozens during the Fair, arrived each night to collect McDonald's 40-percent take.

By the turn of the century, McDonald went into semi-retirement. His domain was by then being taken over by his hand-picked successors, aldermen Michael "Hinky Dink" Kenna and John "Bathhouse John" Coughlin, who, in turn, were grooming a former street sweeper, James "Big Jim" Colosimo, as the new underworld boss of the city. McDonald's personal life, by 1907, was a disaster.

Though he possessed untold millions, lived in a huge

Webster Guerin, Dora McDonald's young lover, murdered in 1907 after he cheated on Big Mike's adulterous wife.

The stately mansion Big Mike built for his second wife Dora; he died here in bed, disgusted with his cheating wives.

mansion, and was waited on hand and foot by a stream of servants, his love life was a great disappointment to him. His first wife had died of natural causes. His second wife, an attractive showgirl named Mary Noonan, abandoned him. Although McDonald had built an elaborate home on Ashland Boulevard for Mary and gave her what she wanted, she ran off on two separate occasions with two men, the second of whom was a priest. (McDonald himself had arranged to have the priest visit Mary to hear her confession.)

McDonald's third wife was Dora Feldman McDonald (1874-1917), who met McDonald in 1898, when she was dancing in a Chicago burlesque show. McDonald married Dora after bribing her baseball player husband, Sam Barclay, with $30,000 in cash to procure a divorce. It was a union of contrasts. McDonald had been strictly (if hypocritically) Catholic, but converted to Judaism at Dora's request. Dora was thirty-five years younger than McDonald and had been a playmate of the children of his former marriage.

McDonald was even more generous with Dora than he had been with Mary. Although he built her a sumptuous home and provided her with clothes and jewels, she had an affair with a sixteen-year-old neighbor, Webster Guerin for several years. When Guerin finished college, he asked Dora for a large sum of money to start a business, intimating that if she refused he would reveal the affair to McDonald. Dora gave him the money, and Guerin, once set up in business, continued the affair.

Guerin, however, was also seeing a younger woman, whom he intended to marry. After hiring private detectives, Dora confronted Guerin and he promised never to see the woman again. The following day, however, he ran away with her. Dora followed them and Guerin returned to Chicago with her, again promising to be faithful. When Dora heard of his renewal of the other affair, she went, on the morning of February 21, 1907, to Guerin's office where she shot and killed him.

Only upon hearing the news of Guerin's death did McDonald discover the affair. Disillusioned, he fell ill. He took to his sickbed, telling Dora and those about him that he looked forward to dying, stating: "I'm glad to be rid of the whole pack of you!" Before McDonald passed away peacefully in his sleep on August 9, 1907, both of his former wives visited his deathbed. Dora (released on bond provided by her husband) and Mary asked his forgiveness.

The old crime boss, who had reigned from 1873 to 1900, was still devoted to Dora. McDonald showed his nagging affection for her by leaving her a third of his estate. Following Big Mike's demise, Dora was tried for Guerin's murder, and early in 1908, with the help of her husband's lawyers and a $40,000 defense fund, was acquitted on grounds of temporary insanity. By the time she died ten years later, she had spent all of McDonald's sizable bequest.

In 1917, news of Dora Feldman McDonald's death was brought to the then Chicago crime boss, Big Jim Colosimo, who remembered McDonald with fondness. "So the old broad kicked the bucket without a dime left to her by Big Mike," he said. He withdrew a wad of bills and handed these to the messenger, adding: "She was no good, but we gotta do right by Big Mike. Get her a fancy wreath and put her in a good box."

THE FEMALE CON ARTISTS/1860s-1910s

Beginning in the mid-Nineteenth Century, some of the most daring female swindlers made bright names in the world of fraud. They were rare creatures in that most women of their era were home-bound, voteless and without the rights and freedoms enjoyed by men. Yet, these singularly astute and clever ladies outmaneuvered their male counterparts. A few of them even enjoyed their ill-gotten riches in to old age, some dying millionaires. Typical of many women who became con artists, Ellen Peck (1829-1915) was a late bloomer.

Born Nellie Crosby in the quiet village of Woodville, New Hampshire, Peck spent the first half of her life as a law-abiding citizen. She was a schoolteacher in Connecticut before moving to New York City, where she met and married a businessman, Richard W. Peck. They moved to Sparkville, New York, had three children, and lived a quiet life. For unknown reasons, Ellen Peck packed up and left for New York City in 1880. There she met an elderly man, B.T. Babbit, who had made a fortune selling soap. Peck became his confidante, dining with him frequently and visiting his office. On one occasion when Babbit left Peck alone there, she came across a folder on his desk containing $10,000 in negotiable bonds. Without hesitation she concealed them on her person and made off with them. When Babbit discovered the loss and began bemoaning it to Peck, she offered to act as his detective. Delighted not to have to involve the police, Babbit offered to pay her expenses up to and beyond the value of the bonds for the satisfaction of catching the thief.

Peck quickly ran through her first $5,000 retainer while conducting her "investigation." She spent another $5,000 of Babbit's money without turning up a culprit, then disappeared without a trace. Realizing that he had been swindled, Babbit hired some real private detectives, who caught up with Peck four years later in Sparkville. She was indicted for fraud, sentenced to four years in prison, paroled a year later, and continued her criminal career. Her next victim was another elderly man, Dr. Jason Marks, whom she bilked of $20,000 in cash and jewelry. Peck demonstrated her prowess in 1887 by conning robber baron Jay Gould out of an undisclosed sum. She was arrested again when Dr. Marks filed charges against her. She was again convicted and imprisoned.

Peck was released from prison in 1892 and lived with her family in Sparkville until the urge struck her again two years later. Now sixty-five years old, Peck took a suite of rooms at a fancy Brooklyn hotel, where she posed as Mrs. Mary Hansen, wife of Admiral Johann Carll Hansen of the Danish Navy. Hansen, a man of solid reputation, was on an extended vacation at the time, giving Peck plenty of latitude in her swindle. She started borrowing on his name from a number of banks and, before bank investigators caught up with her, she had obtained an estimated $50,000.

Months later, using an alias, Peck rented a New York City brownstone and targeted one of her neighbors, Dr. Christopher Lott, an elderly physician. Peck talked Dr. Lott out of his $10,000 life savings and destroyed his health, reportedly through excessive sexual activity. Peck continued her swindles until 1913 when, at the age of eighty-four, she attempted to bilk a Latin-American businessman on a luxury cruise in Mexico. After engaging him in an affair, she threatened to tell his wife. He gave her title to several valuable coffee plantations for her silence. She was arrested for this last swindle and died two years later with more than a million dollars stashed in various banks across the U.S.

Ellen Peck, who was "compromising" gentlemen while in her eighties.

The most celebrated American con woman of the Nineteenth Century was undoubtedly the ubiquitous Sophie Lyons (1848-1924, AKA: Mary Wilson, Kate Wilson, Fannie Owens). In the 1880s, Lyons was dubbed the "Queen of Crime" by William S. Devery, chief of the New York Police Department. "Sophie Lyons is one of the cleverest criminals that the country has ever produced," Devery told reporters. "She has carried her operations into nearly every quarter of the civilized globe and is known to the police of every European capitol. She has been arrested hundreds of times since she was first picked up by the police in 1859 at age twelve. And don't you believe that nonsense about her reforming. For her that's impossible."

The most celebrated female con artist of the 19th Century, Sophie Lyons, shown in her twenties.

Sophie's notorious husband, Ned Lyons, shown in a prison hospital, recovering from wounds, the only photo ever taken of this arch criminal.

As it turned out, Devery had his "Queen" pegged wrong. Lyons did reform, but only after she had acquired a vast, illegal fortune along the way. Lyons was born in New York City on December 24, 1848, to Sam Levy and his wife, who used the aliases Julia Keller and Sophie Lyons. Her father was a professional housebreaker, her mother a skilled shoplifter. As a small child Lyons learned how to shoplift and pick pockets. Her first arrest came at age twelve. "All during my childhood I did little but steal and was never sent to school," she recalled years later. "I did not learn to read or write until I was twenty-five years old." Once, when some childhood companions convinced her that stealing was immoral and she tried to quit, her father grabbed her and burned her arm with a hot poker. At sixteen, she married Maury Harris, who boasted of being one of the cleverest pickpockets in America. To Lyons' dismay, Harris was only an amateur, and was quickly arrested and sentenced to two years in prison. She soon forgot him.

After Harris' departure, Lyons met the man who would stay with her for most of her life, the English-born burglar Edward "Ned" Lyons. He had learned his craft from Johnny Hope and was a member of George Leonidas Leslie's gang when they stole $786,879 from the Ocean Bank of New York on June 27, 1869. Ned Lyons also kept company with other noted underworld figures, including, "Banjo" Pete Emerson, Harry Raymond, Abe Coakley, and "Worcester" Sam Perris. With Lyons providing leadership, this gang of career criminals burgled the safe at the Philadelphia Navy Yard of $150,000 in 1870. Ned Lyons was highly respected by the underworld, which the New York Times admitted on the occasion of Sophie Lyons' death in 1924. "There is nothing like that world today, but at the time there was a conscious pride about the big crooks, and they married as in a caste and often passed their craft from father to son or from mother to daughter. Sophie, then, was something of a catch. So was Ned Lyons."

The couple married. Unlike his wife's parents, who were dedicated criminals, Lyons wanted Sophie to quit criminal activities. He purchased a home on Long Island for her, and stocked it with servants, imported china, rugs, and furniture. Sophie Lyons, however, was not prepared to live the pastoral life. When her husband was away, she slipped into Manhattan to shoplift and pickpocket, and turned the proceeds over to Fredricka "Marm" Mandelbaum, known as the "millionaire fence." In 1871 Sophie Lyons was arrested and sent to Blackwell's Island for six months after stealing a cache of diamonds in a New York jewelry store. Shortly afterward her husband was imprisoned for looting a bank safe of $150,000. Ned Lyons was sentenced to serve seven years in Sing Sing. Determined to help him escape at all costs, Lyons allowed herself to be arrested on a charge of grand larceny and joined her husband in Sing Sing on a five-year sentence.

Sophie Lyons during her heyday as top lady grifter.

Within a few weeks of her arrival at the prison, Lyons befriended the head matron. She was permitted to stroll the grounds with the matron's small children, and was even allowed outside the walls. During one such walk, Lyons made contact with John "Red" Leary, a member of her husband's gang, and with him planned her husband's escape. Leary, posing as a lawyer, was given a pass to visit his "client," Ned Lyons. When it was time to return the pass, Leary claimed to have lost it somewhere, but he had cleverly concealed it in the roof of his mouth. A duplicate pass was forged in New York and passed along to Ned Lyons, along with a change of clothes and a wig. A day after receiving these items he merely walked out of prison.

Ned Lyons freed his wife in much the same manner, except that he smuggled a piece of wax into the prison, which she used to make an impression of the key that opened the main door. On a snowy night, December 19, 1872, Lyons used the key made from the impression to exit the gates of Sing Sing, then climbed into an awaiting sleigh. Lyons and her husband went to Canada, where they lived as fugitives. At this time Lyons begged her husband to give up the criminal life, or so she later claimed, but he refused to listen. They quarreled bitterly for the next few years before agreeing to separate.

Returning to the U.S., Sophie and Ned Lyons went their separate ways, but were reunited in 1876, when the Long Island Fair, according to Ned Lyons' enthusiastic estimate, offered "thousands of suckers waiting to be plucked." Their hasty plans to mulct these visitors went awry; Lyons and her husband were arrested on October 26, 1876, and returned to Sing Sing to finish their sentences. Lyons had time in jail to reflect on what direction she wanted her life to take. She decided to become a blackmailer, bank thief, and confidence woman on her own. "My early training, under such expert bank robbers as Ned Lyons, Max Shinborn, and Harry Raymond made me extraordinarily successful in this variety of crime," she later wrote.

Upon her release from Sing Sing, Lyons joined with a new accomplice, Billy Burke. They followed the circuses for several months. While the small-town spectators watched the elephants and clowns, Lyons and Burke would remove cash from the local bank under the noses of tellers and guards preoccupied with the parade. Another favorite ploy was the carriage trick, in which Lyons would portray a society woman. An expensive carriage carrying Lyons would stop outside a small town bank during lunch time, when there was likely to be only one clerk on duty. Burke would explain to the clerk that his wealthy employer desired to open an account, but could not leave the coach due to a physical impairment. The clerk would have to come to the street in order to do business with the rich woman, and of course Burke withdrew all the cash from the teller's drawer while the clerk talked to Lyons.

These con games were only the beginning. The Queen of Crime sailed to Europe in the 1880s and pulled off a number of successful capers there. She bought a villa on the Riviera and became friendly with the wealthy Americans living in Paris. She was frequently seen at the European homes of the Vanderbilts, the Whitneys, and the Ryersons, posing as the daughter of a gold prospector who had struck it rich in the U.S. While in Paris she stole the jewels of Mrs. Herbert Lorillard, who was staying at the same hotel. Her technique, she explained later, was quite simple. "Mrs. Lorillard picked out the particular pieces of jewelry she wanted to wear at the reception and closed up the bags, turning them over to the maid to place in the safe. The maid came out of the apartment with the two bags and I met her in the hall and began to ask her some trivial questions. She stopped to talk with me and laid down the bags. While I kept her engaged in conversation a comrade of mine crept up, substituted another bag for one of the jewelry receptacles and slipped off. I continued to talk a little longer, and then the girl and I parted." Lyons fenced the Lorillard jewels, which netted her well over $250,000.

After she returned to the U.S., Lyons resumed her marriage with Ned Lyons, bearing him three more children. (Their first son George went on to become a career criminal. He died in prison.) Their marriage ended, after which Sophie Lyons blackmailed a score of wealthy men who had indiscreetly solicited her sexual favors. Typical of such scams, a married Boston merchant was locked in the closet of Sophie's hotel room and told that he could not come out until he had written a check and slipped it under the door. After threats of notifying his wife, the man promptly wrote a check for $5,000.

Lyons' career began to wane by the early 1890s. No longer attractive, she became addicted to opium. According to one police report from that period: "Of late years, she has had little opportunity for plundering, for her face is so well known in all the large cities of America and Europe that she is constantly watched for, if she is not arrested on sight." Her last great caper was aimed at swindling members of her own sex. With a partner, Carrie Mouse, Lyons opened the New York Women's Investment and Banking Company, which purported to return 15 to 20 percent on investments by "widows and other women of means." Before the fraud was exposed it took in $200,000, but much of it was taken by Carrie Mouse. "If you can't trust your fellow crooks, it's time to get out of the profession," Sophie said. Proving to be a woman of her word, Sophie vowed to go straight.

By 1897 she was well known as a gossip columnist for the New York World. Trading on her past association with the rich, Lyons reported all the "inside" news of the society world to her readers. She frequently traveled to Europe to dine and socialize with, among others, the Prince of Wales. At the same time she preached against the evils and folly of crime. "Tread on the past as you would a doormat," she cautioned. She grew rich from her column and spent a large portion of her money funding prison libraries and halfway houses for the children of career criminals. Then she married her one-time partner in crime, Billy Burke, who also reformed. Sophie Lyons explained her reformation in 1910. "Twenty years ago I heard the voice calling. I now own forty houses, but I want something more than property. I want the respect of good people."

Sophie Lyons as a distinguished newspaper columnist; she preached reform, but was ironically murdered by burglars in 1924.

The life of the famous criminal turned gossip columnist ended tragically on May 8, 1924, when three Detroit hoodlums entered her house. Believing that there were valuables in the house, they bludgeoned her before escaping. Sophie Lyons died that night from a massive brain hemorrhage. Her estate was found to be worth at least $750,000. but to her daughter Esther, who had openly expressed shame over her mother's criminal past, Lyons left only "$100, and a silver purse to keep it in." Few female criminals equaled the audacity of Sophie Lyons. One of these exceptions was Constance Cassandra Chadwick (1859-1907; Elizabeth Bigley; AKA: Lydia de Vere Cassie; Lydia Springsteen; Lydia D. Scott).

Born in Strathroy, Ontario, Canada, the daughter of a railway section hand, this clever con artist was able to dupe scores of gullible suckers in swindles both simple and elaborate. Her most infamous fraud was her most daring, one that briefly netted her a fortune and involved none other than one of the world's richest men, Andrew Carnegie.

Clever Cassie Chadwick perpetrated a bold fraud that ruined leading banks in Ohio.

At the age of sixteen, Cassie, as she was usually called, tried to cash a forged check in the amount of $5,000. She was released by the court, which found her temporarily insane. But, as her future conduct revealed, such actions were normal for this adventuress. Traveling to San Francisco, Cassie gave herself the grand-sounding name of Lydia de Vere, claiming to be a clairvoyant.

Billionaire Andrew Carnegie, who was used in Chadwick's fantastic flimflam.

The beautiful young con lady insisted that she was a powerful hypnotist, who could make a fortune for those willing to pay the high price for her seeress services, or that she could cure any illness. After several clients found themselves still afflicted by the same deformities and maladies, their savings depleted through high payments to Cassie, the con artist fled to the Midwest.

There Cassie practiced the badger game, compromising wealthy married men with an accomplice ready to reveal extramarital scandals unless paid considerable cash. Cassie thus enriched herself for some years. She later began to assume the role of a wealthy society matron, who would arrive in a large town and pretend to be related to socially prominent persons, renting mansions and running up huge debts on credit. She was so extravagant and acted with such authority that most of her creditors believed her to be a true member of the wealthy class, eccentric as most rich persons were expected to be.

At one point, Cassie purchased twenty-seven grand pianos on credit (selling these off to fences). She entertained with the style of a Renaissance princess, hiring full orchestras to play in the ballrooms of her rented mansions, ordering table-glutted banquets from the best catering services. Members of the social set in each city were quickly convinced that Cassie was a genuine member of America's 400 and she, in turn, used these new and influential acquaintances to secure more and more credit, hundreds of thousands of dollars worth. When her creditors began to demand payment, Cassie simply sold off her rented furniture and left town to assume a new identity at another location.

Cassie married several times, wedding well-to-do men and milking them of their fortunes. These included Dr. John Springsteen and Dr. William Scott. By the early 1890s, Cassie was in Toledo, again practicing her clairvoyant scams, which had become more sophisticated than those she had practiced in San Francisco a decade earlier. Here she hired private detectives to learn all they could about her intended victims, mostly information about their tainted pasts and, after revealing these hidden scandals to shocked clients gathered about her crystal ball, she levied heavy fees for her silence, a form of blackmail that netted Cassie an average of $50,000 a year. Finally, one angry client of her spiritualist racket threatened to take her to court, and Cassie closed her clairvoyant operation. She next obtained $20,000 in forged bills from a bank employee she compromised, but she was caught, convicted of fraud and forgery, and given a nine-year sentence in 1894. She was paroled in 1897 and immediately went to Cleveland, where she met and married another naive elderly man, Dr. Leroy Chadwick.

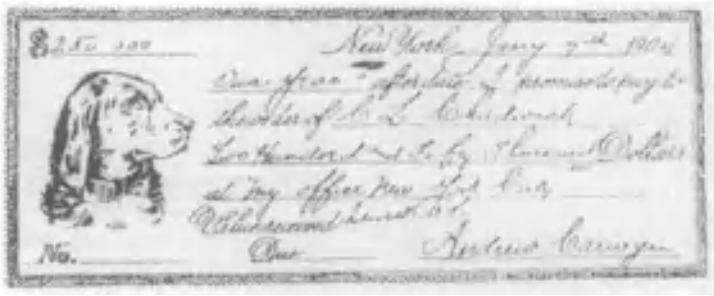
As Mrs. Chadwick, Cassie traveled to New York, where she rented an expensive suite of rooms in the Holland House, a hotel that catered to the social elite. Here she "accidentally" met James Dillon, a Cleveland lawyer, who represented several Cleveland banks. In fact, she had chronicled Dillon's movements and knew he would be in New York on business, staying at the Holland House, which is why she went to New York in the first place. She had met Dillon briefly in Cleveland and he was pleased to see her in New York. Chadwick then off-handedly asked if Dillon would accompany her on a small trip, she then being without a proper escort. Dillon agreed and both took a carriage, at Chadwick's instructions, to a Fifth Avenue. address To Dillon's amazement, the carriage stopped in front of Andrew Carnegie's enormous residence, one recognized by anyone who moved in banking circles.



One of the bogus Carnegie bank drafts used by Chadwick to gain fabulous credit.

Dillon then watched Chadwick go into Carnegie's residence. At the entrance Chadwick asked the footman to see the butler and once inside the first foyer of the sprawling mansion, she asked the butler to see Carnegie's housekeeper and the woman appeared, not knowing who she was. Chadwick pretended to be a wealthy socialite, who was about to hire a domestic who had given Carnegie as a former employer on her reference sheet. The housekeeper was puzzled; no such person ever worked for Carnegie, Chadwick was told. But she had the application, Chadwick said, and held out a letter from the supposed job applicant. Could it be that the woman had been employed at another of Carnegie's many residences?

Chadwick's dining room; her Cleveland mansion was purchased with bogus credit.

The housekeeper asked Chadwick to wait, she would check in her files. It was some time before the housekeeper returned to inform Chadwick that the job applicant was an imposter, that she had never worked for Carnegie. Chadwick took back the letter and thanked the housekeeper for her time and effort, saying that the housekeeper had done her a great service in revealing an untrustworthy domestic. The housekeeper was glad to be of help, she said. With that, Chadwick left the Carnegie mansion. She had been inside using up time, almost a half hour, a stall which was also part of her plan.

Upon returning to the carriage, where Dillon waited, Chadwick climbed inside and purposely dropped a piece of paper which the lawyer retrieved. He could not help notice with gaping mouth that it was a promissory note made out to Cassie Chadwick for $2 million and it was signed by none other than Andrew Carnegie. Dillon handed this to Mrs. Chadwick, who looked embarrassed, and then, as they rode back toward the Holland House, she revealed her family secret. She was accustomed to receiving such payments from Carnegie, she said with hesitant embarrassment, since she was his illegitimate daughter. Of course, Dillon and the rest of the world knew that Carnegie had never married and was a confirmed bachelor. He was a celibate who would, one could easily imagine, do everything in his power to cover up the existence of an illegitimate child to protect his sterling reputation.

Chadwick sighed and said that the $2 million note was her father's way of taking care of her, that she had many more such notes in her Cleveland home, more than $7 million worth of such notes. Dillon was stunned, telling Chadwick that such notes belonged in a safe deposit box, certainly in one of the banks he represented. She shrugged and asked if he could arrange for such business when they both returned to Cleveland. Dillon, delighted at the prospect of gaining such an affluent new client, happily agreed to make such arrangements.

When both returned to Cleveland, Chadwick gave Dillon the notes and these were taken to a local bank. Dillon explained the delicacy of Chadwick's position to his employer, that in no way could she be challenged lest her illegitimate status be made public. In that sorry event, Carnegie himself would be scandalized and his legal wrath might be visited upon the bank, or Cleveland as a whole, for that matter. The banker, thrilled at the prospect of increasing the assets of his bank, vowed to keep Chadwick's secret and then issued a receipt for more than $7 million to Chadwick, which Dillon slavishly delivered to Mrs. Chadwick. The Carnegie notes, of course, were forged, but the banker never bothered to examine these documents, taking Dillon's word for their authenticity.

After receiving the bank receipt, Cassie Chadwick became the biggest spender in Cleveland, buying jewelry, carriages, hiring a bevy of servants, purchasing a mansion and filling it with priceless tapestries and paintings. Meanwhile, the greedy bankers of Cleveland vied with each other in advancing hundreds of thousands of dollars to Mrs. Chadwick, all on the strength of her forged Carnegie notes. The reputation of Chadwick's wealth spread through the social elite and even a Cleveland millionaire, Henry Newton, was glad to advance her $500,000, collecting enormous interest, of course, as were the banks. But unlike the patient bankers, who happily watched the interest leap upward on Chadwick's loans, Newton demanded payment of the interest due him.

Chadwick became hysterical, telling Newton that she had more than $10 million in securities in Cleveland's Wade National Bank. Instead of merely accepting her word and that of her bankers, Newton insisted on inspecting these notes. The documents were judged forgeries. Andrew Carnegie was contacted and indignantly denied ever having had a child and stating emphatically that he "knew no one named Mrs. Chadwick." The glorious ruse was exposed and Chadwick was arrested.

Police found Cassie Chadwick in a suite of rooms in New York's Holland House on December 7, 1904. She was in bed, shouting at officers who had to lift her bodily from her four-poster. A policewoman at the station house searched Chadwick and found a money belt tied tightly about her waist. It contained more than $100,000 in cash. She was taken under guard by train back to Cleveland, where thousands of curious citizens turned out to greet her in shocked silence. Chadwick brazened her way through the crowds, telling one and all that she was innocent and was being victimized, because she was "a member of the upper class." Her aloof airs evaporated once she appeared in court and, following a quick trial in March 1905, where evidence of her guilt was overwhelming, she was convicted on six charges of fraud and sentenced to ten years in the Ohio State Penitentiary at Columbus. There, alone, dreaming of her grand schemes and former opulence, Cassie Chadwick died on October 10, 1907.

A young fan shakes the hand of Cassie Chadwick, shown in custody in New York before returning to Cleveland to stand trial.

BALFOUR AND BOTTOMLEY/1880s-1910s

Of the myriad swindlers who plagued England in the Nineteenth Century, the most spectacular were two glib characters, who engineered widespread scams by appealing to the patriotism of their fellow citizens, while promoting themselves as national heroes coming to the rescue of Britain's failing economy. The first of these was Jabez Spencer Balfour (1843-1912). Balfour's parents were moderately successful people, who provided an above-average education for their son and a way of life that was at the edge of the upper crust, one that gave him a sense of superiority and opulence. His father was a minor official for the Ways and Means Office of the House of Commons and his mother was an author of some repute, writing two popular purple-prosed works entitled Women of Scripture and Moral Heroism. She was able, from the sales of these works, to give her son an education in France and Germany. While in his early twenties, Balfour became an agent for Parliament members and soon rose to become the director of Lands Allotment Ltd., an appointment, which he later admitted "took me quite by surprise."

Mouthing idealism, Balfour became a self-appointed champion of the little man in England, vowing that he would bring financially depressed people better housing and a brighter future. These lofty promises got him elected as a Liberal representative to Parliament. This occurred during a period when the small property owner made advances in acquisitions and, as head of the Balfour Group, the enterprising Balfour encouraged investments in Lands Allotment Ltd. and the Liberator Building Society which, under his leadership, increased its holdings from £15,000 in 1867 to £750,000 in 1888. Hotels and homes were built by the firm, but profits were largely on paper only and few dividends ever declared, most of the money going into Balfour's own pockets. Balfour showed profits through the sale of land and buildings from one company to another, all of which he controlled or owned, a sort of Peter-to-Paul swindle, which was made complicated and almost impenetrable through a labyrinth of documents and deeds.

A financial panic in 1892 caused investors to make universal withdrawals against the Liberator Building Society, demands the firm could not meet since it held mostly paper assets. The Society collapsed and more than 25,000 people were financially ruined, the very constituents Balfour represented in Parliament. Instead of attempting to explain his position, Balfour fled to Argentina and successfully avoided extradition for three years. During this period, the government assigned a small army of accountants and land experts to examine the miasmic records of the Balfour Group, and by the time Balfour was returned to England in 1895, enough evidence was at hand to convict him of fraud on November 28, 1895. He was sentenced to fourteen years in prison and there drew upon his family talent of writing, producing an excellent record of his incarceration entitled My Prison Life, which produced enough sales to make Balfour somewhat comfortable in his old age.

Like Balfour, Horatio William Bottomley (1860-1933) proved to be one of England's colossal frauds and also like Balfour, was elected to Parliament and used his lofty political position to proliferate his myriad swindles. Unlike Balfour, Bottomley saw an extended run, blithely bilking tens of thousands of gullible investors over several decades.

British swindler Jabez Balfour, caricatured as Napoleon, championed and victimized "the little man."

Bottomley was clever enough to avoid being ruined by his own fast-crumbling confidence games for almost forty years. And when it all caught up to him in old age, the wily sharper, acting as his own lawyer, called on the jury's patriotism and God to prevent his imprisonment, a plea that was properly answered with a stiff jail sentence.

Before his long, nefarious career ended, Bottomley had made millions, lived like a king, and was even elected to Parliament. From the beginning, Bottomley thought of himself as larger than life or, at least, equal to the tremendous financial schemes he enacted. He came to believe that he was a brilliant lawyer, a financial genius, and a national hero. That was his public pose. In private, Bottomley was a flagrant spendthrift, a libertine, an alcoholic, and an unconscionable flimflammer who gutted the savings of hundreds of thousands of gullible investors.

Bottomley's background was as empty as any worthless share of stock he ever peddled. His father, William King Bottomley, was a tailor's assistant, although Bottomley, no doubt hating his father for the poverty that placed him as a boy in an orphanage, later insisted that he was the illegitimate son of the famous atheist, Charles Bradlaugh, whom he came to amazingly resemble in later years. The idea for this claim may have come to Bottomley after discovering that his mother, Elizabeth Holyoake, was the sister of Jacob Holyoake, an investment broker and also a pronounced atheist like Bradlaugh.

Horatio Bottomley as a young man and at the time he began his spectacular swindling career.

The boy's parents lived so mean a life that they could not afford to keep their son, and placed him in an orphanage at age five. William Bottomley would shortly thereafter commit suicide. Young Bottomley lived for a while with an uncle, George Holyoake, but the uncle put the boy back into the orphanage at age ten. Four years later, Bottomley escaped the Sir Joseph Mason Orphanage at Edgbaston, fleeing to London.

A fast learner, Bottomley got a job as an errand boy, and while making deliveries, he studied the offices of solicitors and lawyers, realizing that good money could be made in these occupations. He applied for a job as a lawyer's clerk and got it. Bottomley befriended a female legal reporter and, mixing romance with ambition, dated her and induced her to teach him legal shorthand. Within a few years the industrious youth was earning his living as a legal reporter with a reputation for his lightning ability to capture words on paper. It was a short step for Bottomley to start his own small newspaper in 1884, the Hackney Hansard, which reported political activities in Parliament.

For a short time Bottomley prospered, mostly from advertisements for companies with whom Bottomley was familiar. As a court reporter, he had learned much inside information about these firms and their dubious practices. He now solicited advertising from these firms; their managers felt compelled to advertise lest Bottomley publish details about their less than honest operations. To some, this was nothing more than journalistic blackmail, but to Bottomley it was just another way of making a good living.

From the newspaper, Bottomley expanded into printing, establishing two companies, one a publishing operation, the other a printing firm, going to his newspaper advertisers first, then the public, to sell stock in these shaky ventures. He pocketed most of the money and began to live high, returning nothing to his investors. In 1893, the shallow companies went into receivership and Bottomley was charged with conspiracy to defraud. His ego (not to mention the money he would save by not hiring a lawyer) demanded that he defend himself. During his defense, Bottomley proved that he was a brilliant orator, one who could move a jury to his side as easily as he had convinced investors to give him money for useless stock. He won his own acquittal. Inflated with confidence, Bottomley felt he could sell anything to anyone, regardless of its worth, and never face legal consequences.

In the following year, Bottomley capitalized on the public craze to invest in newly discovered Australian gold deposits. He set up public meetings in town halls, church basements, and the backs of pubs, exhorting those who flocked to his meetings to buy his gold certificates in Australian firms, and convincing thousands to hand over lifetime savings. He made an estimated £3 million without ever returning one pound to his investors. Whenever investors complained about not receiving any return on their money, Bottomley merely shrugged and reported that the gold mine had not panned out. Those who were angry enough to file complaints found Bottomley defending himself vigorously in court and with such eloquence (as well as well-placed bribes to jurors) that the con man escaped conviction time and again.

Bottomley was now fabulously rich and he purchased a huge country estate in Sussex, a luxury flat in London, and a villa on the French Riviera. Further, his love of horses caused him to buy a sprawling horse stable in Ostend, Belgium. He began a lifelong habit of drinking champagne for breakfast, and drinking glass after glass until retiring each night. He bought the best champagne available, hundreds of cases every few months, storing these in his Sussex estate where he gave lavish parties.

In London, Bottomley also ingratiated himself with high society by giving sumptuous fetes. With phenomenal ease, Bottomley began one new company after another, selling stock in the almost nonexistent firm (usually a secretary in a single office and a set of books that would confuse the most astute accountant) and then collapsing the company a short time later. Dozens of these shell companies were started and went nowhere. Before stunned investors learned of these failed companies, Bottomley filed bankruptcy. Dozens of complaints and charges of fraud were filed against him, but he evaded conviction year after year. Nothing could be made of his books and no concrete evidence proving fraud could be found.

Fame as well as fortune beckoned to Bottomley, and he soon sought public recognition to go hand-in-hand with his personal fortune. He ran for Parliament in 1905 and was elected as Liberal MP from South Hackney. Now, Horatio William Bottomley had truly arrived. He glad-handed his fellow members in Parliament, who thought him an affable fellow, although a few refused to shake his hand, knowing of his unsavory reputation. To further ingratiate himself with his peers, Bottomley posed as a wealthy philanthropist, giving money to various charities, especially to orphanages, and making sure that he received heavy newspaper coverage for these charitable acts in his newly established weekly, John Bull.

Juggling his many firms became confusing even for Bottomley, and he fell behind in organizing their planned collapses. Too many of these firms shattered in one year, 1909, and his entire fortune was depleted. Bottomley declared personal bankruptcy for the second time and was compelled to resign his seat in Parliament. He soon created a new fortune by organizing sweepstakes and lotteries which brought more charges of fraud, but Bottomley managed to escape conviction once again. His name was becoming synonymous with stock swindles but, astoundingly enough, there never ceased to be a supply of suckers racing to his townhall type meetings to be mesmerized by his oratory and invest in his schemes.

When World War I began, Bottomley seemed to have a change of heart. He was suddenly instilled with patriotic fever. He announced to his friends that he was going to overcome his "sordid past" by helping England in her time of need. Bottomley volunteered to recruit men for the services and was suddenly seen everywhere at public rallies, church meetings, recruiting stations, and particularly at bond rallies, where he bounced across stages, waving his arms, smashing a fist into the palm of his hand, and shouting to the enthralled crowds that England needed men and money to destroy the kaiser's legions. He was well paid for his patriotic efforts, receiving £50 to £100 every time he opened his mouth for England. Bottomley howled his patriotic propaganda in the pages of John Bull, which became immensely popular during the war. His speeches were so popular that large daily newspapers paid him a great deal of money to reprint them. This led to a series of long articles by Bottomley, which appeared regularly in such publications as the Sunday Pictorial. For more than four years, the hustler financed himself with his war propaganda, earning almost £30,000.

So popular had Bottomley become that he was able to run for Parliament once again in 1918, winning back his old South Hackney seat, but this time as an Independent. Shortly after his election, Bottomley developed his all-time money-making scheme, an idea that he borrowed from the British government. When the government announced the sale of Victory Bonds in 1918, Bottomley seized upon the gigantic scam that would eventually land him in prison. Victory Bonds were sold at less than £5 per bond, but could be redeemed later for larger amounts.

Bottomley announced that he would buy these bonds in large numbers and allow the "little people," as he called his suckers, the opportunity of purchasing these bonds for even less than the purchase price, promising that he would return top value on the bonds. Tens of thousands of patriotic citizens bought these Victory Bonds through Bottomley, or at least they thought they were buying bonds. They sent their money directly to Bottomley, who had established the Victory Bond Club which ostensibly bought the government bonds in large quantities and received additional interest because of such huge purchases. These revenues were later to be disbursed to the club members.

Bottomley exhorting crowds in Trafalgar Square at a World War I recruitment rally in 1915.

Of course, Bottomley bought no bonds and pocketed almost every pound he received, living higher than ever before. He did make some token bond payments to the Treasury. It appeared that the great stock swindler had invented yet another scheme that would make him unlimited millions. Yet Bottomley's own tight-wad mentality proved to be his undoing. He had never paid his associates much beyond an initial retainer and they, like his investors, were usually left holding the bag. One of these, Reuben Bigland, who was involved in Bottomley's Victory Bond Club, went public when Bottomley reneged on paying Bigland his fees. Bigland published a pamphlet exposing how Bottomley fleeced the public, stating that the Victory Bond Club was the con man's "latest and greatest swindle," and that Bottomley never had any intention of returning profits on the investments, let alone return the original money.

Bottomley immediately denounced the pamphlet as defamatory and filed a suit of criminal libel against Bigland. Realizing that his appearance in court could open his muddled books to public inspection, Bottomley reconsidered and then dropped his suit against Bigland. The government, however, was urged to act by a public aroused by Bigland's widely read expose. At first the courts were disinclined to go after Bottomley, who was still an MP, but public pressure soon compelled the government to bring fraud charges against the great swindler.

Mindful that their quarry was still a respected member of Parliament, the government of David Lloyd George dragged its feet, having the distinguished Horace Avory and Richard Muir prosecute, but not until the redoubtable criminal counsel, Sir Travers Humphreys, who declined to prosecute, went over the swindler's labyrinthine books. Using a bevy of accountants, Humphreys and his people spent months sifting through every shady, complicated transaction dealing with the Victory Bond Club. They finally emerged, like lost travelers out of the swamps, with what they felt would be enough evidence to convict the grand con man. Bottomley was brought to trial in 1922, acting, as usual, in his own defense. The prosecution did not minimize its opponent's ability to act as his own counsel, knowing full well how Bottomley's brilliant orations had convinced hardhearted juries in the past, and how he had escaped conviction time and time again. He was a spellbinder that could confuse, twist and alter any logical facts, reasonable conclusions, and sound arguments against him.

Before Bottomley went to trial, however, he gave indications that his days as a shrewd legal opponent were over. He asked the court if he could take an early lunch break, at 11:30 a.m. each day, since he was "required" to have his daily portion of champagne (he referred to the bubbly as his "medicine") at that time lest he go into convulsions. He was, as his opponents then described him, "a champagne addict," drinking as much as three or four bottles during the day and an equal number at night before retiring. His appearance bespoke his alcoholic addiction. Bottomley's face was puffy, sagging everywhere. Bags of flesh squeezed his eyes into slits. Heavy jowls sagged over Bottomley's high, starched collar. He was a physical, besotted wreck at sixty-two. He was also concerned about a female friend whose name appeared in one of the accounts Humphreys was inspecting. He practically begged Humphreys and the court not to mention the lady's name, admitting that he had deposited large amounts of money in her name and did not wish to "compromise" her in any way. He insisted that this obvious paramour knew nothing of his business operations and was perfectly innocent of any wrongdoings the court might determine.

Chivalry was not dead in England. The court agreed to keep the woman's name out of the proceedings if Bottomley would admit that the account in her name was his own. Bottomley grinned and said he would claim the account. Then he added: "And what about my medicine?" The court understood that problem and informed the anxious drunk that the presiding judge would recess the court early and allow Bottomley to get to his bottle before noon. Pleased, the old sharper girded his considerable loins for battle. Humphreys took on the burden of attack just before the trial, agreeing to represent the government. The trial took place at the Old Bailey before Justice Salter. Humphreys' opening address to the jury detailed how Bottomley juggled and doubled his books to funnel huge amounts from the Victory Bond Club into his personal accounts. In one instance, it was shown how the club paid a company £20,000 for services that really did not exist, that the firm was really Horatio Bottomley under a different name. In another instance, it was shown how the sharper paid out enormous sums from club funds for the upkeep of his Belgium racing stables.

Bit by accounting bit, the prosecution mounted a damning case against the swindler, who sat glum at the defense table, slumped forward, staring straight ahead as if in a daze (or alcoholic stupor, some who were present later claimed). The prosecution brought some witnesses to the stand, who claimed that Bottomley had not returned profits or even their original investments when requested by them to do so. This brought the old man jumping to his feet. He asked Judge Salter if he could bring 100,000 witnesses—all of those who had purchased bonds through his club to refute such claims. All of these 100,000, thundered Bottomley, had not only received a return on their money, but had enjoyed profits galore. The judge declined to allow a parade of 100,000 witnesses to the stand, which would have taken, certainly, several decades to cross-examine. He set aside his ruling on the matter and told Bottomley that the court would consider any reasonable evidence he could provide. It was obvious that Bottomley was bluffing; he did not have a single satisfied customer to bolster his fast-fading, self-projected image of honest businessman, the working man's friend, the ally of the "little fellow," as Bottomley was forever calling his victims.

What undoubtedly hurt Bottomley more than any of the exacting paper-chase details which pinned him down as a fraud was the prosecution's questioning of his patriotic image. It was shown that he had been paid handsomely for his war lectures and bond rally appearances, so much so that he appeared to be earning money from the boys who did the fighting and dying for England in the trenches of France. This hard evidence was obviously much on his mind when he burst forth with his histrionic summation, an explosive fight for his public life as well as his private business transactions. Bottomley stormed about the courtroom, his massive body seeming to tilt treacherously forward as if he were about to topple onto his face. He raised his arms akimbo, as if asking for divine intervention, and the flab of his face turned bright crimson in anger at being portrayed as one who exploited the heroic dead and the brave veterans who had given him the wages of their bloody battles.

Bottomley, center, under indictment, leaves the Bow Street court; the alcoholic swindler conducted his own flamboyant defense, lacing his oratory with liquor.

To the jury Bottomley fulminated: "You may have entertained a great opinion of me and thought that, whatever my faults in days gone by, I have endeavored to do my duty to my king and country. Now you are asked to change your opinion, and to say that all the time I was an errant humbug and scoundrel." He reminded the jury that his patriotic honor was not on trial and that his peers must only decide whether or not he had defrauded the members of the Victory Bond Club. "You have got to find that I had the intention to steal the money of poor devils such as ex-soldiers who subscribed to the Club. You have got to find that Horatio Bottomley, editor of John Bull, member of Parliament, the man who wrote and spoke throughout the war with the sole object of inspiring the troops and keeping up the morale of the country, who went out to the front to do his best to cheer the lads, you have got to find that that man intended to steal their money! God forbid! I swear before God that I have never fraudulently converted a penny of the club's money."

His anger gushed through a torrent of words, mounting in volume until Bottomley was delivering a cannonade. He charged about the courtroom as if he were a national legend unfairly defiled, posturing shock at the mere suggestion that he, Horatio Bottomley, England's greatest hero, no doubt, since Wellington and Nelson, could be profiled as a villain. His summation to the jury was almost a threat. Should his peers find him guilty of fraud they would face God's own wrath: "You will not convict me! The jury is not yet born that would convict me on these charges. It is unthinkable!" There was a long sword hanging on a wall behind the judge's bench and Bottomley, who had been studying this gleaming blade for days as he heard his sins recited, suddenly wheeled about and pointed to it, saying: "That sword of justice will drop from its scabbard if you give a verdict of guilty against me. I say it with a clean conscience. I say it without one thought of fear or misgiving. I know my country and my country's people, and knowing you, and knowing myself, and knowing the truth about this matter, without one atom of hesitation, one atom of fear...I know by the mercy of God and the spirit of justice you will liberate me from this ordeal!" With that, the heavy-breathing Bottomley buried his head in large, hoary hands and openly wept, his sobs sent directly toward the jury.

In the end, the jury disbelieved the fiery orator, who had relied upon a style of delivery that had long gone out of fashion. He was a man of bombast and hortatory exclamations. His rhetoric creaked of ancient ploys and devices that were all too obvious, even to the most unsophisticated. He tried, as in his court appearances of decades earlier, to shape the jury, to bend its collective will to his own. His roaring rage against the attacks on his image, his dignity, rang hollow and untrue. In the end, the prosecution ground the old campaigner down with the overwhelming weight of its evidence and even he, at his nadir, had to admit that he had falsely advertised his club when claiming that it possessed £500,000. In a half hour's deliberation, the jury returned to find the defendant guilty on all counts but one. The sword on the wall behind Judge Salter never moved an inch.

Bottomley stood mute in the dock as the court handed down its sentence. The judge delivered an unusually scathing summary of the jury's conclusions: "Horatio Bottomley, you have been rightly convicted by the jury of a long series of heartless frauds. These poor people trusted you and you robbed them of £150,000 in ten months. The crime is aggravated by your high position, by the number and poverty of your victims, by the trust which they reposed in you. It is aggravated by the magnitude of your frauds and by the callous effrontery by which your frauds were committed." The arch swindler was given, despite the rancor from the bench, a fairly light sentence, seven years in prison.

Bottomley could only scowl and frown, indignant to the last for being put upon by what he thought to be the judge's gratuitous remarks. He asked if it were not customary for a convicted person to render some remarks before being sentenced. Judge Salter reminded him that that was the case only for capital offenses. Sneered Bottomley: "Had it been so, my Lord, I should have had something rather offensive to say about your summing up!" A short time later the great fraud was shown to his cell at Wormwood Scrubs Prison. He was formally expelled from the House of Commons a few days later.

Bottomley, shown after his prison release in 1927.

Five years later, in 1927, Bottomley was released, broken in health, ignominious, a pauper, but not for long. If he could no longer sell bogus stock, Horatio Bottomley could at least sell the story of the man who sold the bogus stock. He arranged to write a series of articles about his prison days, for which a daily newspaper paid him the then-staggering sum of £12,500. Bottomley showed himself unrepentant in the series of articles, which was entitled "I Have Paid...But I Did Not Owe the Debt." He contacted old partners, loan sharks for the most part, and persuaded them to invest in another newspaper he established overnight, a publication he called John Blunt. (Some claimed that these investors willingly came to Bottomley's financial rescue rather than risk exposure of their past sins by Bottomley, a man who knew well their dark deeds.)

There would be no meteoric rise from the ashes this time. The new publication quickly failed and Bottomley now lost everything. His wife died and he was compelled to sell his country estate, his racing stables, even the furnishings of his London apartment. Flat broke in 1930, he applied for an old-age pension, but this was denied him. The old sharper grew ill, but he found refuge through a one-time musical comedy star, Peggy Primrose, who gave him a home. (Bottomley had backed several of her hit shows during his palmy days.) Some of Ms. Primrose's friends thought to put Bottomley to work by exploiting himself and they arranged for him to make stage appearances. Half tipsy with cheap champagne and dressed in soiled evening clothes, the old fraud shuffled before the footlights to talk about his sinful past. He would pathetically blather about how he had been wrongly pilloried and imprisoned for trying to make money for the "little people." The "little people" in the audience only hooted and jeered in response.

Some days later, in May 1933, Horatio Bottomley was leaving the stage, the roaring ridicule of the audience in his ears. He stopped, heaved a great sigh, and his heavy body crashed to the floor. He died on May 26, 1933 in Middlesex Hospital and was placed in a common grave, an end that the determined orphan boy of the previous century could never have envisioned.

THE PETER-TO-PAUL SWINDLERS/ 1890s-1920s

The scheme of taking money from early investors and paying them off at exorbitant interest rates within a short period of time with money from later-arriving investors in the same investment was an old scam practiced as early as the seventeenth century. It was called Peter-to-Paul (as in borrowing money from Peter to pay Paul), or "the discretionary game," one which allows a large margin of profit between payments. The first American hustlers to make a huge but brief success at this swindle were two New York sharpers, Robert A. Ammon, who used the military title of "colonel," and a youthful con artist named William Franklin Miller (b.1879), who came to be known as "500% Miller."

The brazen con man Charles Ponzi at the time he launched his Peter-to-Paul swindle; he was deemed a "financial idiot," but still gleaned millions.

Miller was a clerk in a Wall Street firm, who was looking to improve his lot in 1899. He hatched a scheme that would net him and his partner, Robert A. Ammon, more than $430,000 within a few months, a grift so simple that no one but those who disbelieved in the "it's too good to be true," credo would put money behind it. Yet, thousands did, losing their life savings in record time.

The 20-year-old Miller worked as a clerk at a New York brokerage firm in 1899. Starting with some young men with whom he had read the Bible for years, he offered, for an investment of only $10, a weekly interest payment of $1 for ten weeks, plus the return of the original $10. As others have done, however, he used the money to get others to invest, whose money he used to pay the first group. His investors believed that Miller could pay such high returns because he had inside market tips.

So successful was this scheme, that Miller expanded, renting a suite of offices on Floyd Street in Brooklyn, in February 1899. He printed handbills and circulars soliciting funds for investment. Promising inside information on hot stock tips, the sham business grew and prospered. The Franklin Syndicate, as Miller called the firm, attracted investors from across the United States and Canada.

Miller soon launched a major advertising campaign. He deposited the huge amounts of cash he received in many different personal accounts, though he did pay up to fifty clerks to handle the $80,000 a day investors sent to The Franklin Syndicate. The new investors, who lined up at one window in Miller's grubby office, could see earlier investors collecting their dividends at another window. Mailmen and express drivers, who delivered at the offices in New York and Boston, were so impressed that they also invested.

Miller regularly sent interest checks to the out-of-towners to ensure their continued support. When the Franklin Syndicate grew too large for Miller to handle by himself, he hired two business agents, Rudolph Guenther and Edward Schlessinger, who in turn introduced him to a New York investment lawyer, the self-styled "Colonel" Robert Adams Ammon.

When newspaperman E.L. Blake warned the public about Miller's "discretionary game," Miller called him "a blackmailer." Miller, worried for the first time by the slander suit Blake brought against him, called in Ammon. Though an attorney, Ammon was really a sharper by trade, one who had for years run bucket shops and boiler room operations where he high-pressured customers into investments. Ammon was able to stop a run on the syndicate's funds by worried investors, who had responded to Blake's attack.

Next, Ammon took charge. He incorporated the business and placed $100,000 in a certificate of deposit with Wells Fargo. By this time there were more reports that Miller was running a green goods game, and that the Franklin Syndicate was little more than an elaborate swindle. This was true, of course, but Ammon hotly denied the allegations and demanded retractions from the papers making these statements.

At the Boston office, investors staged a run on the bank, taking home $28,000 in Franklin Syndicate cash. In New York, the police were closing in. Ammon advised Schlessinger, the Boston manager, to flee to Canada, while he cleverly tucked away $30,500 with Wells Fargo under his own name. (Schlessinger packed away $150,000 and fled to Europe instead of Canada.) Ammon pointed out to Miller that before the state could prosecute, it had to prove that the money placed in several bank accounts under his and Ammon's names was the same money Miller stole from his customers. This would be next to impossible to prove, Ammon claimed, since most of the investors turned over cash to the Franklin Syndicate.

Ponzi in early 1920, raking in millions from his investor scam; he stuffed money into desk drawers, closets and waste paper baskets.

Nevertheless, Miller himself began to panic. He suddenly disappeared, fleeing to Canada and taking hundreds of thousands of dollars (some reports claimed it was upwards of $2 million) and leaving Ammon to care for his family. That same day, a Friday, investors continued to support Miller, aware of the strict rule that only those funds invested by the close of business on Friday would get interest the following week. However, on the following Monday, Miller did not reappear, and the courts stepped in. The enterprise had lasted eleven months.

When Kings County authorities insisted that Ammon appear before the grand jury, Ammon urgently sent for Miller, who came home, stood trial for fraud, and was prosecuted by Kings County District Attorney John Clark. He was convicted, largely on Ammon's testimony, and sent to Sing Sing for ten years. Ammon was very stingy in his payments to Miller's family, and Miller himself soon became ill in prison, so he chose to testify against Ammon.

Ammon argued in his own trial that he had acted only as Miller's counsel and was therefore immune to prosecution, an argument that failed to convince the jury. He was disbarred, convicted of receiving stolen money, and sentenced to four years at hard labor. In return for his testimony against Ammon, Miller was pardoned in 1905, by Governor Wayland Higgins, having served only half his prison term. Ammon received no such pardon and served out his full sentence, although he used his stolen money and influence to gain privileged treatment.

Schlessinger, the Boston manager of the collapsed Franklin Syndicate, was never apprehended. He remained in Europe and reportedly lived comfortably on the stolen investment money he had taken with him. Fifteen years later, Miller was identified as operating a grocery store on Long Island. He refused to tell reporters what had happened to the stolen cash he took to Canada. Newsmen who asked local residents about Miller's reputation were told that Miller's nickname was "Honest Bill."

Where Miller and Ammon convinced their investor victims that they could turn enormous profits in short order simply on "hot market tips," acquired by Miller, Charles Ponzi (1878-1949) said that he had found a legal loophole in the reply coupons from the International Postal Union that would provide investors fabulous returns. In theory, he was right. In practice, the scheme was impossible. Nevertheless, twenty years after Miller and Ammon went to prison for their Peter-to-Paul scheme, the affable and charismatic Charlie Ponzi did the same thing, but on a grand and lavish scale.

Charles Ponzi was an Italian immigrant who arrived in New York in 1893. He believed that the streets of America were, indeed, paved not with gold, but with suckers eager to give up their hard-earned savings to anyone with a get-rich-quick scheme. But several years passed before Ponzi came up with the right scheme, and when he did, it made the five-foot-two-inch sharper an overnight millionaire, a stellar U.S. businessman, a genius of finance, until his colossal fraud was discovered. When first arriving in New York, Ponzi took a job as a waiter, but was fired because he was constantly badgering customers with investment schemes.

Ponzi's $100,000 mansion outside Boston, bought with swindled funds; the garage was packed with cash.

With two dollars to his name, Ponzi emigrated from the U.S. to Canada, but he was arrested within weeks of his arrival for forging a check. Ponzi went to jail for six months. Upon release, he traveled back to the U.S., and went to Atlanta, where he inveigled leaders of the Italian community into a wild immigration scheme. He would, said Ponzi, bring tens of thousands of Italians to the U.S. without any interference from immigration authorities. Certain Italian leaders in Atlanta advanced Ponzi considerable sums to finance the proposal. The dapper little man sneaked a few illegals into the country before being jailed.

In 1914, Ponzi appeared in Boston, where he charmed the daughter of a wholesale grocer in the Italian community. They were soon married and Ponzi took over his father-in-law's business. He was a miserable businessman and the firm soon went under. "The market just fell out," was Ponzi's lame excuse to his wife, Rose. He then took a job as a translator for J.P. Poole, earning $16 a week.

Ponzi sat at his desk most of the day working up schemes to fleece the gullible, but he discarded these ideas almost as fast as he thought them up, realizing that all were impractical. Then, in June 1919, Charles Ponzi hit upon an idea that would make him rich. He called it "The Ponzi Plan," but it was nothing more than the old Peter-to-Paul swindle. Ponzi had undoubtedly read and researched this kind of swindle as it had been practiced by William Franklin Miller.

At first the Ponzi Plan involved reply coupons issued by the International Postal Union. These coupons, Ponzi realized, were issued for cheap prices in certain countries, where the economy was depressed, but could be redeemed in other countries where rates for the coupons were higher. One could purchase an International Postal Union coupon in Germany, for instance, for a penny, and redeem the same coupon in the U.S. for 54. He quit his job and borrowed money, which he sent to relatives abroad to buy postal coupons. This done, Ponzi received the coupons, but when he tried to redeem them, he sank into a quicksand of red tape. His scheme collapsed. But even though it was impractical, the idea of the scheme was salable.

Ponzi went to his friends and relatives and showed them the stacks of coupons he had purchased in Italy and other foreign countries. He told them he was about to exchange these coupons for a 500 percent profit. Now was the time for them to get in on the action, he insisted. They would all be millionaires within a few months. The concept was fuzzy and unappealing to those Ponzi approached, but they nevertheless gambled with him, giving Ponzi $1,250. To their amazement, within ninety days, little Charley reappeared, returning $750 interest on the investment. The investors were shocked. "Reinvest and tell your friends," Ponzi told his investors. They did and within a few weeks, the little Boston office Ponzi maintained was overrun with hundreds of eager, money-waving investors.

Taking in hundreds of thousands of dollars, Ponzi quickly rented new offices for his Financial Exchange Company on School Street, which was in the heart of Boston's financial district. Ponzi spent most of his time trying to hire people to count the money he was taking in. But the cash flow was so heavy that he merely began stuffing the money in empty desk drawers, boxes, filing cabinets, suitcases, and wastebaskets. Hundreds of clamoring investors mostly from the Italian community in Boston, clogged Ponzi's offices every day. He recorded each investor's amount, and amazingly, within ninety days, he returned 50 percent interest on the money. Everyone reinvested, and they were further startled to see a return within forty-five days. This incredible repayment system went on for more than a year, with an average of $200,000 in reinvestments a day taken in by Ponzi.

Ponzi and some of his many relatives; all unwittingly worked for him during his widespread swindle.

His clerks were Italians, who spoke little English, mostly his wife's relatives, and they had no idea how to handle finances. They merely wrote down the investor's name and the amount invested and the day the investment was made. This was the limit of their banking ability. Ponzi then stuffed the money into hiding places and began to live like a millionaire. He purchased limousines, a huge mansion for his family, and diamonds for his wife. Ponzi even bought the Poole firm where he had once worked just so he could fire his former employer, whom he disliked.

Day of reckoning: Ponzi investors are shown swarming into the swindler's offices; all demanded the return of their money, but the con artist was $5 million short.

Little Charley was a clothes horse who loved nothing better than to dress in the finest tailor-made clothes. He purchased 200 suits and 100 pairs of shoes. He bought two dozen diamond stickpins, a dozen malacca canes with solid gold handles, and 100 $5 ties. When Ponzi walked into a store, he began buying everything in sight. He carried huge amounts of cash on his person and hired armed bodyguards to follow him around. In mid-1920, Ponzi appeared at the Hanover Trust Company with two suitcases packed with $3 million in cash. He bought controlling interest in the financial institution.

Continuing to pay his skyrocketing interest rates, more money than ever poured into Ponzi's mysterious coffers. He began to give interviews to the press, telling financial reporters very little, except to point out repeatedly that he was one of the greatest financial wizards of the era. Certain journalists, however, began to question Ponzi's procedures, pointing out to readers that even the "Great Ponzi" could not legitimately return huge amounts of interest on investments in so short a time. Then the Boston Globe asked for an interview. Ponzi suddenly became shy, cautious. He hired publicity man William McMasters to front for his firm, but McMasters became suspicious about the oddball Ponzi operation.

After a few days of working with Ponzi, McMasters shook his head and walked out, going to state authorities to report the obvious swindle. "The man is a complete financial idiot," McMasters said of Ponzi. "He can hardly add. There is money stuffed into every conceivable place in his offices. He sits around with his feet on the desk smoking expensive cigars in a diamond holder and talking complete gibberish about postal coupons."

Because of McMaster's statements, Ponzi was called before state authorities and ordered to bring his books, showing all financial transactions. Arriving at the State House in Boston on July 10, 1920, Ponzi brought along stacks of musty, crumbling ledgers. Outside the building, scores of his admirers cheered Ponzi, one screaming hysterically: "You're the greatest Italian of them all!"

Ponzi shook his head and said modestly: "Oh, no, Columbus and Marconi. Columbus discovered America. Marconi discovered the wireless."

"Sure," someone else responded in the crowd, "but you discovered money!"

The ledgers were examined thoroughly, dozens of financial experts and state auditors studying them. They reported that the books reflected a maze of misinformation. There were investors listed without the amounts of their investments, and there were huge sums of money recorded but no names of investors entered next to these amounts. Ponzi's employees were questioned, but they only blinked at questions, which any junior accountant could have answered.

They knew nothing about banking or financial procedures and they had no idea how the amazing Charles Ponzi invested the staggering sums he took in each day. Nor did they have any idea what Ponzi actually did in his office, other than to sit about, smoke cigars and pontificate about the complicated world of big business. It became clear that Ponzi was simply taking in money from one investor on a ninety-day return on interest and remitting a portion of that money to another investor on a forty-five day return on interest.

Then the Boston Globe published a stinging expose of Ponzi, the result of its investigative reporters' long research into the mysterious affairs of Ponzi. His criminal arrests for forgery and smuggling were cited in the story. The result was a near riot on August 13, 1920, as thousands of Ponzi's investors converged upon his small offices, all demanding the return of their money, with or without interest. Ponzi was impervious to it all, arrogantly telling his harassed and troubled clerks to "pay everybody off!" But this was easier said than done. Although Ponzi had taken in more than $20 million within eight months, the clerks ran out of money after paying back $15 million. Only then did Ponzi stir himself, running about the offices. Frantic, he yanked open empty file and desk drawers, muttering: "There's more money around here somewhere. There's got to be more money. Hurry, find it!" But there was no more money to find.

Shown upon his release from prison, Ponzi greets newsmen in 1934, vowing to fight deportation back to Italy.

Two days earlier, Ponzi had packed $2 million in a suitcase and had driven to Saratoga Springs to gamble at the tables of the largest casino. He had hoped to win millions and thus shore up his crumbling financial institution, but he was as miserable a gambler as he was a businessman. He lost every penny. A week later Charles Ponzi was arrested by federal agents at his twenty-room mansion in Lexington, charged with using the mails to defraud. While being tried, Ponzi, undaunted, was still sending out letters to his investors, urging them to reinvest. None did. Ponzi was convicted of mail fraud, a federal offense, and sent to Plymouth Prison to serve four years.

Upon his release in 1925, he was again arrested for the same swindle, charged by the state of Massachusetts and convicted of fraud. He received another nine-year term. While free on bond, pending appeal, Ponzi fled to Florida, where he attempted to swindle thousands in a non-existent real estate scam during the fantastic land boom then engulfing Florida (and one successfully manipulated by the clever brothers, Addison and Wilson Mizner).

Ponzi was arrested in Florida, convicted, and sent to prison for a year. When released, Massachusetts authorities were waiting for him. He was again taken to prison in Massachusetts where he served out his nine-year state term, being released in Deported, Ponzi sits in a Rome park in August 1935; he bilked Benito Mussolini before fleeing to South America.

1934. He was then deported to Italy. Just before he sailed, Charles Ponzi held his last interview. His suit was old and shabby and his shoes were unpolished and run down at the heels. His wife Rose had divorced him, and he sadly stated that he was returning to his native land without a dime. "I bear no grudges," he said. "I hope the world forgives me."

But the swindler had not lost his touch. After only a few months in Italy, Ponzi was hired by Italian dictator Benito Mussolini, given a lofty position connected with the fascist treasury. Within weeks, however, Mussolini's ministers reported that Charles Ponzi was a "financial idiot" who knew nothing of international banking. Before Mussolini could fire him, Ponzi stuffed two trunks full of money and slipped out of the country on a tramp steamer headed for South America. A newspaper account related how Charles Ponzi, one-time multi-millionaire swindler, had died in a Rio de Janeiro charity ward. According to some estimates, there was still $3 million missing from Ponzi's wild Peter-to-Paul scheme. It was never located.

MASTERS OF THE STING/1890s-1930s

Fred and Charley Gondorf were super con men who operated throughout the U.S. in the late 1890s through the 1900s. For a period of fifteen years, these two sharping brothers, headquartered in New York City, operated a string of big store games that became so celebrated that they were called the "Gondorf Games." Fred and Charley were expert poker players, and often established a small, but swanky gambling den peopled with what appeared to be high society patrons. Dressed in tuxedos, the Gondorfs would arrive with a wealthy sucker and sit down to play poker with a count or an oil baron, all ringers impersonating famous people. In the course of a rigged game, they would fleece the mark for a small fortune. In 1899, the brothers swindled a rich St. Louis pawnbroker out of $200,000 in a big store poker game.

The brothers also specialized in the wire, a con game where a posh but phony betting parlor was established, replete with hustling patrons and employees, who seemed overworked in having to handle the heavy betting that went on in the parlor. A sucker was brought into this busy gambling den, believing that the Gondorfs had a system whereby they could intercept racing results before the wire services flashed the winners to the bookie joints throughout the country. The sucker, thinking the fix was in, would bet enormous sums on what he thought was a sure winner. Adding to the sucker's confidence, the Gondorfs would bet even greater sums on the same horse.

When the true winner was announced, the Gondorfs would shout that they had been betrayed by their "inside man," and demand their money back. Of course, they were refused refunds, along with their mark who believed that he and his gambling friends, the Gondorfs, had been taken and would thus not suspect his hosts of victimizing him. By 1917, the Gondorf luck ran out and both brothers drew long prison terms in Sing Sing for fraud. When they were released, they were too old for the kind of energetic confidence games they had so long practiced. They retired and died in obscurity but relative comfort, using the spoils from their innumerable con games. The 1973 film, The Sting, was largely based on the type of operation conducted by the energetic Gondorf brothers. In fact, the name of the leading player (Paul Newman) is Henry Gondorff.

Confidence kings Fred and Charley Gondorf, masters of the Big Store game.

The female counterparts to the Gondorf brothers were the Poillon sisters, Charlotte and Katherine. Charlotte Poillon and her sister, Katherine Poillon, could match any man pound for pound. Charlotte, who occasionally boxed professionally, weighed 210 pounds, with Katherine a brawny 200. Together they perpetrated a series of lonely hearts swindles against unsuspecting New York men at the turn of the century. In 1903, for example, Katherine filed a breach-of-promise suit against William G. Brokaw for $250,000. The embarrassed financier settled out of court for $17,500 just to keep his name out of the papers.

In 1907, the Poillons were arrested and fined $10 on a drunk-and-disorderly charge after they tossed a hotel manager down a flight of stairs. The brawling antics of the Poillons in some of Manhattan's most fashionable hotels were legendary. In 1908, they were sentenced to jail for three months for defrauding the Hotel Bristol out of $135. In court, they accused a judge named Barlow of not paying the hotel bill after spending the night with them in a riotous orgy. In 1909, six house detectives at the Hotel Willard forcibly ejected the Poillons for creating a disturbance, no easy task since Charlotte had once gone four rounds with prizefighter Gentleman Jim Corbett.

Con artist Charlotte Poillon; dressed as a man, she became a wrestler.

Katherine Poillon, who specialized in "compromising" old men in the Badger Game.

Rector's Cafe tangled with the Poillons in 1912 after Charlotte had to be carried from the dining room in a murderous rage. She filed a $25,000 lawsuit, but the court threw out the case after it was learned that Charlotte had been wearing gentleman's attire, and the waiters had made an honest mistake. In 1923, the sisters were in court again. Charles Dusenbury, a 73-year-old laundry-chain store owner, accused the Poillons of swindling him out of $3,000. In court the sisters showed a complete lack of interest by clipping paper dolls out of a newspaper. On the witness stand, Dusenbury admitted that the $3,000 was a "gift" and the case was dismissed.

Several months later, W.N. Edelstein accused the Poillons of perpetrating a $23,338 fraud. These charges were more serious, and their position more tenuous. The Poillons hired William Fallon, New York's most famous criminal attorney, better known as the "Great Mouthpiece," who admired the spunk of the sisters and appreciated their eccentricity. But not even the great Fallon, who defended them successfully, could remain in their good graces for long. On one occasion the lawyer asked the sisters for a loan when he was short on cash. "You loafer!" Charlotte screamed. "Where do you think we'd get any money! I have half a mind to clean you up!"

By the late 1920s the exploits of the Poillon sisters disappeared from the newspapers. Charlotte surfaced briefly in 1929 when she replaced a department store boxer demonstrating athletic equipment. After slugging the bag for three weeks, Charlotte grew tired of the job and walked off, never to be heard from again.

At the time the ingenious Gondorf brothers began operating in New York, a bulbous-nosed bartender named Lou Blonger began to run a series of successful con games in Denver, Colorado, so successful that he began supervising dozens of such games and eventually a vast army of confidence artists who invaded the city and dominated its criminal operations for several decades. A French-Canadian, Louis Blonger migrated to Denver, Colorado, where he and his brother Sam opened a rowdy saloon in 1880. Blonger offered gambling of all sorts and platoons of strumpets to service customers. When Denver cleaned up its gambling dens and bordellos, Blonger concentrated on confidence games of all kinds, becoming the bunco king of the Rocky Mountain states.

Blonger was assisted by Adolph W. Duff, a wily sharper known as Kid Duffy. Blonger made substantial payoffs to the corrupt Denver Police Department and, by the turn of the century, most of the force, including the chief of police, was on his payroll. Blonger, by that time, was the most powerful man in the city, king of the Denver underworld, with direct phone lines from his office to that of the mayor and the chief of police. There was nothing Blonger could not fix in the city. If any con man in his phalanx of swindlers was caught red-handed, Blonger would simply make a call and the man would be put on a train, returning to Denver when it was safe to do so.

Rules established by Blonger were strictly obeyed by his men. No swindler could pull a "Big Store" game unless Blonger gave his approval and no violence was tolerated. Prominent Denver citizens were to be left alone and visitors to the city were the only suckers his men were allowed to victimize, and these marks could be chosen only after they had been cleared with Blonger and the police department.

Blonger spent a good deal of time on the phone with Police Chief Mike Delaney, discussing what victims were or were not suitable to be fleeced. Whenever one of Blonger's men violated any of his dictates, he was fined or even banished from the city. After Dick Turner, a deputy sheriff from a small town near Denver, was fleeced in a short con while visiting the city, Blonger upbraided the con man for not getting approval to "take the mark." Then the con man was banished forever from the precincts of Denver.

Blonger's reputation as the top con man of the West was known nationwide in the underworld and hundreds of the most Famed criminal lawyer William J. Fallon, shown standing in court; known as the "Great Mouthpiece," he represented and was often threatened by his clients, the Poillon sisters.

daring and notorious con men in the country flocked to his banners, including the celebrated Joe Furey, Reno Hamlin, Charles Gerber, and the legendary Jefferson Randolph "Soapy" Smith, who had fleeced gold-seeking suckers in Alaska a decade earlier. Furey, who ran a gang of con men of his own, made the mistake in 1920 of fleecing a Texas cattleman and one-time sheriff, J. Frank Norfleet, bilking $45,000 from Norfleet in an investment scheme. When Norfleet discovered that he had been mulcted, he exploded and tracked down every member of the con ring. The classic manhunt eventually caused Blonger's downfall. Because of Norfleet's persistent campaign against the Denver Ring, Blonger, Duff, and dozens of their top con men were rounded up, tried, and sent to prison.

Lou Blonger, the Denver "fixer" and head of the largest con ring in America; he bossed the mayor.

Adolph W. Duff, known as "Kid Duffy," who managed Blonger's massive confidence ring in Denver.

One of Blonger's most accomplished sharpers was William Elmer Mead, a con man who preferred to work chiefly alone or with a few trusted shills and practice games of his own invention. Some of them became classic confidence swindles. Born in Springfield, Illinois in 1875, Mead was orphaned at the age of two and then adopted by a farming couple, rigid fundamentalists. Mead had little schooling and worked in the fields until he was fifteen, before running away and never returning.

Yet, Mead retained the deep religious beliefs instilled in him by his step-parents, who read the Bible with him every night of his young life on the farm. This background undoubtedly caused him to forsake liquor, smoking, chewing tobacco and even swearing. Throughout his long criminal career, Mead always attended church on Sunday. His pretentious piety earned him the paradoxical moniker, "The Christian Kid," or "The Christ Kid."

By 1910, Mead established himself as one of the most skilled flim-flam men in the business, a master of the traditional "Wallet Drop," and his unique "Country Send." But his real talent lay in swindling country people of their wagering money in fixed foot races. Mead and his confederates first contacted the local sheriff one known to take money on the sly and offer two bribes, one to allow the race to be held and another to fake a police raid to arrest illegal bettors.

Next he would carefully select his victims, the local sports who enjoyed a game of chance and rarely passed up an opportunity to lay down a bet on the side. Mead, acting as the official "backer" for the foot race, would convince the victim that the smart money was on the favorite. Then on the day of the race, Elmer Mead and his cappers would express great concern over the likelihood of a police raid. But the race would proceed according to schedule with the favorite bolting out to an early lead. The townsman who had followed Mead's advice and placed money on the "sure thing" was ecstatic as the man pulled ahead by twenty, even thirty paces. The gulled sportsman believed that he was about to pocket $50,000 for the $10,000 he had put up.

At the moment victory was certain, the favorite suddenly dropped in his tracks, faking an epileptic seizure. As he gasped for breath the other runners streamed by him to the finish line. While the victim stared at the prone runner, Mead would jostle the man back to reality. "My God, run! It's the sheriff and his boys!" Elmer would assist the sucker to the local train station, assuring him that they would meet again in the next town, a lie of course. Grateful to have avoided the scandal of arrest and imprisonment, the duped bettor temporarily forgot about his losses. Later, Mead would send a telegram ahead to the next town informing the mark that the stricken racer had died from his seizure. "All is lost. Keep on going." Not wanting to be implicated in a possible murder, let alone illegal gambling, he usually did.

Mead's unofficial headquarters was Denver, Colorado, home to an army of bunco men, con artists, and green goods practitioners. It was known in those days as the "Big Store," the place where Ben Marks made his name in the 1860s, sponsoring rigged horse and foot races that no doubt inspired Mead to pursue this line of work. He had worked in California, but with bad luck. He fleeced a sucker in San Francisco in 1897, and was convicted of grand larceny and sent to San Quentin for three years.

Working short cons for years, Mead accumulated considerable savings and he thought to retire, until reading about Blonger's Denver office; the upright phone on the desk had a direct line to Police Chief Mike Delaney, who was on the fixer's payroll.

Former Texas sheriff J. Frank Norfleet, who smashed the Blonger ring after being bilked out of $45,000.

the most spectacular event of the decade, the return of Halley's Comet in 1910, a phenomenon that caused widespread wonder, fright and alarm. Mead thought to capitalize on this astronomical event by meeting with a rich contractor in Cleveland, where Mead posed as a retired judge.

At lunch, Mead pointed to an object beneath the chair of the contractor. The businessman reached down to find a wallet thick with cash and important papers that indicated the owner was the proprietor of many baseball parks and sporting arenas. (This was Mead's own confidence game, one he called "The Magic Wallet," a device that led the sucker into a broader, more expensive con game.)

By chance, the owner of the wallet appeared and the contractor returned it to him. The magnate (a Mead associate) sat down and offered to pay for lunch in gratitude for the return of his wallet. The owner of the baseball parks, when learning the contractor's business, suddenly proposed that the contractor "give me an estimate on the largest sports stadium ever built in America. It's going to be built anyway. Why shouldn't you build it? After all, you're honest. I could trust you. You proved that when you returned my wallet and saved some very precious documents."

Before the arena mogul and the contractor could discuss the details of the advance on the building of the largest sports arena in the country, the mogul suddenly leaned forward to register an inspired thought: "Wait a minute! How silly of me! There's an important factor I've almost overlooked. While you're estimating such a gigantic job, you'll require considerable funds. I was just thinking of how to arrange that..." The mogul was silent for a moment and then blurted: "I have it! With the baseball season over, my parks are empty. For a small stipend, let's say ten thousand dollars, I would be willing to lease every park and arena across the country to you."

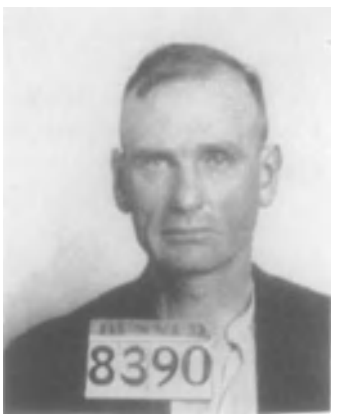
The contractor was stunned. "But, what for?"

The mogul withdrew a newspaper that blared the coming of Halley's Comet and told of the thousands of religious sects about to gather on Judgment Day, when the comet might collide with the earth. He dropped the paper in front of the contractor, saying: "Why, for the end of the world! Think of it! The greatest spectacle in the history of mankind! Don't you read the papers?"

The contractor nodded and stared at the doomsday warnings in the newspaper spread before him.

"He's right!" Mead exclaimed. "Why, you would fill those grandstands with tens of thousands of people!"

The concept was so bizarre that it immediately appealed to the duped contractor. He reasoned that the contract he was getting from the sports arena mogul would certainly cover any serious loss in leasing the parks. He signed the contract to build America's largest sports stadium and then gave the mogul his check for $10,000. After lunch, Mead and the mogul went their separate ways, while the contractor went to his office to prepare promotion pieces that would invite millions of terrified residents to watch the end of the world in comfortable baseball park seats. The profits would be enormous, the contractor believed, especially the purchases of refreshments. Spectators would want to buy beer, soda pop, hot dogs and popcorn while watching Halley's Comet hurtle toward them. He believed, as most reports had it, that the Comet would not actually strike the earth, but the widespread fear of such an occurence was an assurance of millions in profit.

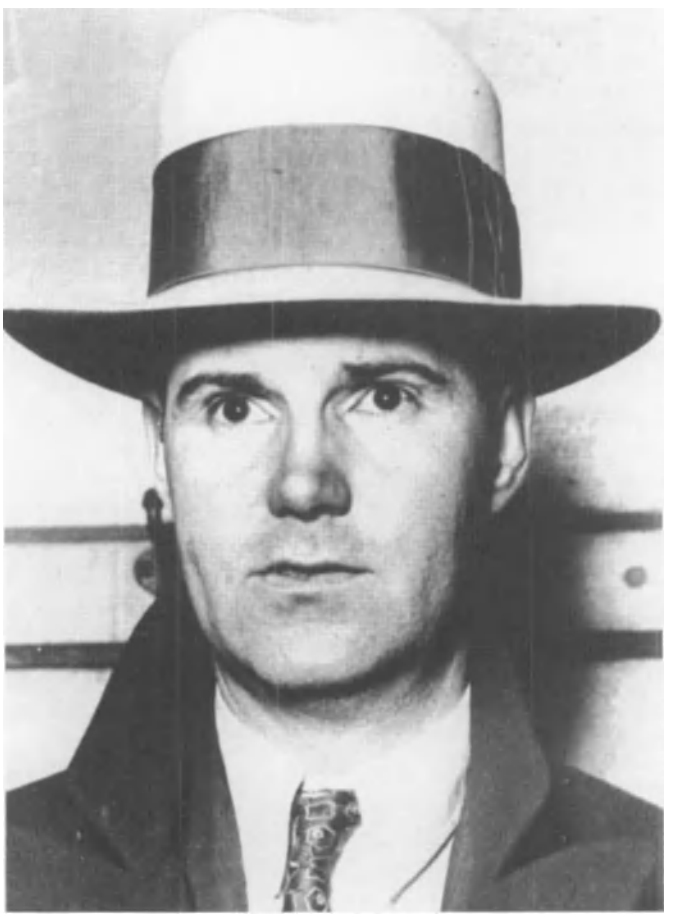


Denver police photo of William Elmer Mead, when he worked as a bunco artist for Blonger.

Meanwhile, Mead and the mogul, who was most probably Joe Furey, Mead's favorite sideman, by that time, had cashed the contractor's check and had departed Cleveland, off to another city, another mark and another fabulous confidence game tied to Elmer's "Magic Wallet." In 1917, while pretending to buy up horses for the army during World War I, Mead used the gimmick to swindle $35,000 from a wealthy female rancher in Cheyenne, Wyoming. The ploy worked for decades. As late as 1932, Mead used the "Magic Wallet" routine to rope a sucker in Missouri, taking him for $200,000, the largest score of his life and an astronomical sum during the days of the Great Depression.

Finally caught in 1936, Mead was charged with postal fraud. Convicted, he was sent to prison for two years at the age of sixty-three. When he was released, he appeared to be a broken man, his spirit gone. Moreover, he was faced with charges of tax evasion based on $60,000 taken in by Mead for a period of eight years, 1921-1928. He was convicted and again went behind bars, this time for life, saying in his cell to a Leavenworth guard: "Somebody talked. I should have figured it out so I could have done it all alone. Partners! It's disgusting!"

Confidence trickster William Elmer Mead, master of the "Country Send," and inventor of the "Magic Wallet" scam.



Con man Alvin Clarence Thomas, known as "Titanic Thompson," who specialized in scamming golfers while posing as an inept duffer.

Two years after Mead was conning marks in his Halley's Comet scam, an enterprising sharper, Alvin Clarence Thomas (AKA: Titanic Thompson), turned a quick profit on the sinking of the great liner, Titanic, while the ship made its fatal maiden voyage from England to New York. Thomas, an expert cardsharp, was on board the Titanic to fleece passengers when the luxury liner made its ill-fated voyage in April 1912. When the ship struck the iceberg, Thomas, and his fellow hustlers, the Hashhouse Kid, Hoosier Harry, and Indiana Harry got into lifeboats. The con men survived and arrived in New York a day or two later. Thomas and his associates immediately filed exorbitant claims for reimbursement of lost luggage and valuables not only for themselves, but for items belonging to the many hundreds of passengers who died. They were paid handsomely.

In the 1920s "Titanic" Thompson, as he was popularly known, associated with New York gambler Arnold "Big Bankroll" Rothstein. He sat in on the last poker game Rothstein played before he was gunned down in 1928. Thompson also defrauded people on the golf course, where he swindled dozens of amateur players. He reportedly collected $250,000 annually in bets with wealthy golfers. His victims thought he was strictly second rate, but actually Thompson hit well, with his left hand or right. After trouncing his opponent while playing right-handed, he would offer his partner a chance to recoup his losses by playing left-handed. Thompson then doubled his earnings, for he was a natural lefty.

ADVENTURES OF THE "YELLOW KID"/ 1890s-1960s

No other confidence man in the U.S. ever approached the audacity and ingenuity of Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil (1875-1976). Weil lived for 101 years and was known in his chosen field of crime as "King Con," the most successful American confidence man of the twentieth century. He claimed to have swindled more than $12 million from greedy, wealthy suckers, but his take was more likely $8 million. He lived like a rajah, headquartering in Chicago, owning hotels and racetracks, and having myriad mistresses. Yet, he died in a nursing home and was buried in a pauper's grave.

Weil was born on June 30, 1875, in Chicago. His parents were immigrants, his mother French, his father German. His father, Joseph Weil, operated a saloon in the vice-ridden First Ward, known as the Levee and later managed "The French Village," an exhibit at the 1893 world's fair in Chicago. During the 1890s, his son, Joseph Weil, sold patent medicines and shilled for racetrack touts. He later graduated to the sale of fake stocks, rigged horse races, and the "salting" of worthless mines. Always inventive, Weil developed many unique confidence games of his own.

He traveled through rural areas of the Midwest, selling a patent medicine of his own creation, Meriwether's Elixir, one he claimed would kill tapeworms. He also worked the spectacles-and-magazine short con. He had several pages of a magazine reset in large type and inserted them in the publication. When stopping at a farm where the proprietor had poor eyesight, Weil sold him the Elixir and then asked if the farmer had lost an expensive pair of spectacles. As he talked, Weil turned the pages of the magazine and encouraged the farmer to try on the glasses. Just as the farmer put on the spectacles, Weil turned to the pages of enlarged type and the farmer thought his vision suddenly had been vastly improved by the glasses. The glasses, which had gold rims, appeared expensive, but the rims were actually painted. The farmer gladly paid $3 or $4 for the spectacles, promising to return them to the owner if he encountered him. The glasses cost Weil no more than fifteen cents each and he bought them by the gross.

Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil, greatest of all con men, shown in 1905; he created elaborated Big Store routines to bilk wealthy, greedy suckers.

"I never cheated an honest man, only rascals," Weil was fond of saying. Of his victims he stated: "They may have been respectable, but they were never any good. They wanted something for nothing. I gave them nothing for something." Weil not only fleeced his customers, he convinced them that they were cheating him. Weil appeared to be a wealthy dandy. His attire was sartorial, complete with spats, white winged collars, silk cravats, diamond stickpin, and tailored, three-piece suits. By the late 1890s, he had acquired his fanciful sobriquet. While lounging in the Chicago saloon owned by Alderman John "Bathhouse John" Coughlin, he discovered a cartoon strip drawn by Ocault, one that featured a character named "The Yellow Kid," an adventurous ne'er-do-well.

Coughlin noticed Weil chuckling over the antics of this character and boomed: "You know, Joe, you're just like that character in that cartoon strip you're always reading, just like that guy, always pulling capers on people. That's you all over, just like the Yellow Kid. That's what I'm calling you from now on, the Yellow Kid." The name stuck and became part of Weil's image as a conniving, cunning con man who never really met his match, although there were some artful swindlers who occasionally worked as his partners, such as Fred "The Deacon" Buckminster.

The meeting of these two men was classic. At the turn of the century, Buckminster was a member of the Chicago Police Department, a detective working in the bunco squad. He trailed Weil about for a few days and saw him work some short cons. He arrested Weil on State Street, telling him he was going to run him in for practicing confidence games. The two men strolled toward a precinct station. At the corner, Weil reached into his pocket and pulled out a wad of money, all in large bills. Without a word he placed the money into Buckminster's hand.

"What's this?" Buckminster asked, staring incredulously at about $8,000.

"That?" asked Weil. "That's just walkabout money. I made that in two hours this morning."

"In two hours?"

"Yes, and so can you. I can use a guy like you, one who knows the ropes. Put that in your pocket." Weil stood staring straight ahead as he talked to Buckminster. "Go ahead, it's chicken feed to me. You can see that kind of dough every day if you throw in with me."

Buckminster clutched the money, then took his badge from his vest and looked at both the money and the badge. He pocketed both and shook Weil's hand. He quit the police force then and there and joined Weil.

Weil and Buckminster then worked the pedigree dog swindle with alacrity and for tens of thousands of dollars each year. Selecting a wealthy bar owner, Weil would saunter into a saloon, dressed elegantly and walking a finely groomed, richly-scented dog that pranced at the end of an expensive-looking leash. Weil would tie the dog to the bar rail and then order a drink.

In the course of his conversation with the bar owner, Weil proudly showed pedigree papers for the hound, along with several blue ribbon prizes the dog had won. He would then take out his solid gold watch and then exclaim: "Great Scott! I'm late for an urgent business meeting!" He would then tell the bar owner: "I can't take Rex into the bank where I have my meeting. Will you be kind enough to watch my dog until my meeting is over?" Weil would slip a $10 bill on the bar, an unheard of tip, cautioning the bar owner: "This dog is priceless so please watch him closely." He would then dash from the bar to keep his appointment.

Fred "Deacon" Buckminster (shown in 1910), former Chicago cop, who became the lifetime confidence partner of the Yellow Kid.

A few minutes after Weil's departure, Fred Buckminster appeared in the bar. He stood next to the dog, ordered a drink, and then looked at the animal. He spit out some beer in excitement and sputtered: "Oh, my Lord! I've been looking for this breed of dog for five years!" He quickly rummaged through his wallet and took out $50, shoving the money toward the bar owner, begging him to sell the dog to him.

"I can't do that, sir," came the usual response. "This dog belongs to a fellow who only left him until his meeting is over. He'll be back in an hour."

"Okay, okay," Buckminster would say, "so you want more. Just say so. The animal is worth more. I'll make it $100!" He then placed $100 on the bar, offering the money to the owner.

"I told you, sir, the animal is not mine to sell."

"All right, no more bickering. I'll make it three hundred!" He then pulled out more money, but the startled bartender would refuse, again telling Buckminster that the animal was not his to sell. Buckminster would not be denied. He put $50 on the bar and told the owner the name of the hotel where he was staying, adding: "Call me as soon as you can persuade the owner to sell. I'll have the other two hundred and fifty waiting for you." Buckminster then gave a maudlin display of affection for the animal and departed.

A half hour elapsed before Weil reappeared. His demeanor was completely changed. He was no longer the confident, ebullient boulevardier. He was crestfallen as he slowly walked to the bar, almost oblivious to the dog.

"What's the matter, sir?" the solicitous bar owner asked, "you look like you've lost your best friend."

Weil shook his head sadly and then explained that his business deal had collapsed and that he was facing financial ruin. "I've been wiped out, emptied, nearly destroyed."

The bar owner seized the opportunity, offering to buy the dog for $200. Weil pretended shock: "Sell Rex, the grand champion for only $200!"

After doing some quick mathematics, the bar owner invariably raised the offer by $25 or $50. He thought that since he already had Weil's $10 tip and Buckminster's $50 down payment, he would clear between $110 and $135 once the dog was delivered and Buckminster paid him the balance of $250. Weil reluctantly took the purchase price from the bar owner and weeping, took his leave of the dog.

When the bar owner appeared at the hotel, where Buckminster was to be contacted, dog in hand, he quickly learned that no such person was registered. Buckminster and Weil then pocketed between $165 and $190 for an investment of $60. They then returned to their own kennel, where dogs from the street or from pounds were being groomed for the next sucker. On a good day, Weil and Buckminster sold ten dogs, making as much as $5,000 a week.

Many of Weil's other schemes, such as his use of an empty bank building in Muncie, Indiana, were much more elaborate. After reading that the Merchants National Bank of Muncie was moving to a new location, Weil went to Muncie and rented the old bank building. With Buckminster handling the details, the old bank building underwent quick renovations. In the lease, Weil stipulated that all the tellers' cages and other banking accouterments remain intact. Weil then secretly established his own bank. He printed deposit and withdrawal slips and put them into desk slots in the foyer. Streetcar conductors were hired as bank guards and tellers and other bank officials were culled from the ranks of some of Chicago's most notorious confidence men and women.

All of these preparations were done for a single day's business: the bank operation was only a ruse to inveigle a multimillionaire sucker into another scheme. When all was ready, a Chicago investor worth millions was escorted by train to Muncie, where he was met by a chauffeur-driven car and taken to Weil's "bank". Buckminister acted as the shill. He had groomed the sucker for months by telling him that the president of the bogus bank, Weil, was one of the shrewdest money men in the Midwest and that when most other banks were having difficulties in this Depression period, his bank was thriving. Buckminister had told the sucker that the bank president had gained control of rich government lands that could be purchased for a quarter of their value and that buyers were waiting to pay twice that much to obtain the federal lands.

The president of the bank, Buckminister stated, would only deal in cash, however. The sucker arrived in Muncie with a large briefcase filled with money, an estimated $500,000. When he entered the bank he was amazed to see the furious business the bank was doing. The place was packed with customers lined up at tellers' cages, thrusting wads of greenbacks at tellers as deposits. Bank officials were dragging sacks of money into a huge vault that appeared to be brimming with money. The customers were all prostitutes, racetrack touts, and gamblers whom Buckminster and Weil had hired for the day. The sucker was overwhelmed by the booming success of the Muncie bank.

He was kept waiting for almost an hour so he could witness the bustling business. He heard clerks complaining to superiors that they could not handle the traffic and that more guards had to be added to protect the burgeoning millions the bank was storing. Then the sucker was finally shown into Weil's offices and was met by Weil, who acted the part of a disinterested tycoon. Yes, he admitted, he had federal land leases in Indiana and out West where oil was in great abundance. He showed bogus leases and oil surveys that supported his claims. The sucker opened his briefcase, prepared to buy all the land he could obtain. The nerveless, cool-

Buckminster and Weil under arrest in 1928; they were released.

Buckminster in 1938; he wound up teaching mathematics in Michigan State Prison.

Yellow Kid Weil in 1951, talking his way out of court.

headed Weil then offered the sucker the convincer, telling him he could not have all of the lands promised to him by Buckminster.

"I've got a lot of friends here in Indiana to take care of," Weil explained. "You're an outsider and if it weren't for my good friend Harry here," Weil said, motioning to Buckminster, "I wouldn't be talking to you at all." At this point, the sucker's greed, which Weil was an expert at manipulating, got the better of him. He began to argue with Weil for all that Buckminster had promised him. But Weil was adamant, even while calmly glancing at the stacks of money in the open briefcase, telling the sucker that he could not have all he expected. Weil reportedly took only $400,000 from the sucker in the land deal and watched with steel nerves as the briefcase closed on the remaining $100,000. "Never be greedier than the mark," was Weil's lifelong credo and in this instance, he proved his words. By allowing the mark to retain a portion of his money, Weil knew, the sucker would be absolutely convinced that he had participated in a crooked deal and that he had gotten the best deal possible for himself.

After the sucker had been given signed deeds to lands that did not exist, he was driven to the depot and escorted to Chicago by Buckminister. By the time the train left the depot, Weil had paid his army of swindlers and closed the bank. The whole operation cost him $50,000 and he and Buckminster had made $350,000 on the deal. This kind of money was average for Joe Weil, who spent lavishly and lived high. He bought a small hotel on the North Side of Chicago and then a string of race horses. He preferred to keep company with tall, voluptuous blondes selected from the chorus lines of Chicago nightclubs and he showered furs and jewels upon these women.

Weil squandered great sums on gambling, bad investments, and women. Moreover, every time he was sent to prison (he served about ten years in prison out of 101 years of life) his brother, a Chicago bailiff, seized his property. Each time Weil was released, he had to start building his fortune again. The few times he ventured away from the world of confidence games, he ran afoul of the law. In 1924, Weil agreed to fence some of the money taken in the Roundout Mail Robbery that had occurred north of Chicago. He was caught exchanging the "hot" money and sent to the federal penitentiary at Leavenworth to serve six years.

During his term at Leavenworth, Weil met such arch criminals as Frank Nash, Earl Thayer, Thomas Holden, Francis Keating, and George "Machine Gun" Kelly, bankrobbers all. At one point, while walking in the exercise yard, Kelly approached Weil and said: "You know, Kid, I've been thinking about you. I just don't understand how a guy like you operates. I mean, you go right up to people, make friends with them, and take them for their money. You spend a lot of time with them and they know who you are and they can bring the law right to your doorstep."

"Really, George," Weil replied. "Well, if you knew anything about the con, you'd know that the sucker can't bring the law to my doorstep because they would also have to admit to the police that he was involved in a shady deal, too. I only do shady deals, George, so the sucker is convinced that he is going to make a ton of money, more than he would make in a legitimate operation. You, on the other hand, George, go into banks armed to the teeth, shoot up the place and maybe clip some poor people who have no business being hurt and then run like crazy with police shooting at you. What kind of a criminal are you, anyway?"

The Yellow Kid testifying before the Kefauver Committee in 1956 and he had a lot to say.

"I'm not a sap who pals around with my victims like you," snorted Kelly.

"You're not a sap, huh?" Weil smirked. "How much time are you doing here, George?"

"Twenty years."

"For what?

"Bank robbery."

"And how much did you get out of the bank?"

"About three thousand."

"Three thousand and twenty years," Weil hummed. "Well, I'm finishing up a six-year stretch. I'm going out next month with time off for good behavior. Five years for a caper that netted me almost a quarter of a million. And you'll still be in this tank doing fourteen more years for three thousand. Who's the sap, George?"

When Weil got out, he embarked on a new series of confidence games he had concocted while serving his time in Leavenworth. He sold fake copper mine stock and pills that he claimed would turn water into gasoline. He even took a trip to Italy where he convinced dictator Benito Mussolini that he was a U.S. mining engineer and government official, selling Il Duce the rights to rich mining lands in Colorado. By the time Mussolini's secret police uncovered this scam, the elusive Weil had already sailed with a reported $2 million in cash from Mussolini's coffers.

Returning to his old haunts in Chicago, Weil began to suffer one setback after another. Fred Buckminister was arrested for a federal offense and sent to prison. Many of Weil's other associates were also sent to jail and he found his reputation preceded him wherever he went. On February 3, 1934, Weil was arrested in a Peoria, Illinois, hotel room. Police had heard that he was in town and about to put across another swindle. They found two suitcases in his room filled with newspaper cut to the size of money, banded together in piles and marked "$200,000." Since the arrest was premature, Peoria Police Chief Walter Williams could only hold Weil for a short time. "I know you're up to something, Kid," Williams told Weil.

"Give me proof that I've broken the law," Weil challenged Williams.

"I can't," said the disgusted police chief, "so I have to turn you loose. You get on a train and get out of town. If you ever come back to Peoria, we'll throw you in jail on suspicion."

Weil left town, realizing that his infamy was his undoing. He went into semi-retirement. He lived off his swindled fortunes for some years and then wrote his memoirs in 1948. Still, Weil pulled a short con or two in his dotage merely to keep busy. The author met Weil in the early 1960s, when Weil was in his eighties and knew him until his death in 1976 at the age of 101. At one point the author spotted Weil standing at a corner on the North Side of Chicago. He was not wearing his customary elegant attire, but was startlingly dressed in threadbare clothes that verged on being rags. He was unshaven and dirty.

Weil staunchly declined an offer of money to see him through this period of financial reversal, and after continuously asking the author to "get out of here," he became angry and finally blurted: "Go away, dammit, can't you see I'm working!" He had been interrupted during one of his short cons, while awaiting the arrival of the traditional sucker. Weil finally retired to a North Side nursing home, where the author regularly visited him. At one point he was asked: "If you could get out of that wheel chair and get to the street, would you attempt to pull off another scam?"

Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil did not hesitate for a moment, replying: "Does a hungry dog like food?" He died a few days later and was buried in Archer Woods on the South Side of Chicago, interred in a pauper's grave.

Author Jay Robert Nash with Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil on his 100th birthday, 1975; the Kid was still smoking and drinking champagne.

THE MAN WHO SOLD EVERYTHING/ 1910s-1930s

Victor "The Count" Lustig, who sold the Eiffel Tower (inset) to scrap dealers twice, convincing them that they were getting "the deal of a lifetime."

One of the world's most clever confidence men, Victor "The Count" Lustig (1890-1947), was born in Hostinee, Czechoslovakia, a town located on the Elbe River and presided over by Lustig's father, the mayor. Lustig was an exceptionally bright student. By the time he graduated from high school, he was able to speak French, English, Czech, German, and Italian fluently. He was a great reader of history and sociology, but he was not interested in attending college. He was more interested in swindling his fellow man.

In 1908, Lustig was arrested in Prague for petty theft and served two months in jail. He was arrested several more times and served short jail terms for various cons in Vienna in 1909, in Klagenfurt in 1910, in Vienna again in 1911, and in Zurich in 1912. Finally, Lustig settled in Paris and lived the life of a Bohemian on the Left Bank. He studied bridge and poker and became so adept at these card games that he supported himself in style through gambling. He also became an expert billiards player, which brought him more profits from substantial wagers.

Lustig played cards so well that he began to travel the trans-Atlantic liners, inveigling wealthy passengers into high-stakes bridge and poker games and gleaning fortunes. One of his suckers was a tall, handsome man, as well-dressed and polished in manners as Lustig himself. Lustig, who by this time referred to himself as a count, played poker with this Swindler and card sharp Nicky Arnstein (Jules W. Arndt Stein), who was married to singer and comedienne Fanny Brice; he was "cleaned" in poker by Lustig on board a transatlantic liner.

passenger and others for almost twelve hours, finally cleaning out his wily opponent.

The victim was amazed that he could be bested, and he complimented Lustig on his card-playing ability and introduced himself, Jules W. "Nicky" Arnstein, one of the sharpest gamblers and thieves in the U.S. Arnstein later became celebrated for marrying star comedienne Fanny Brice and infamous for engineering a million-dollar bond theft on Wall Street in collusion with New York gambler and crime boss Arnold Rothstein. Through Arnstein, Lustig would later establish important underworld contacts that would serve him well.

Following World War I, the count quit his ocean-going card playing and concentrated on bigger game in Paris, the town he most admired. It was here, in 1922, that Lustig got one of his most inspired ideas. He was sitting at a sidewalk cafe one day when he read in one of the Paris newspapers that several engineers had recently inspected the city's most celebrated monument, the Eiffel Tower. The engineers stated that the lofty structure needed repair. One spokesman even ventured to state that if the huge iron structure could not be repaired, serious thought should be given to its being dismantled. Lustig stared at this statement for a long time and then snapped his fingers. He would sell the Eiffel Tower!

Lustig went to work creating forged credentials that showed him to be a high-ranking member of the French government. He then contacted several top scrap dealers in Paris and called them to a meeting in a hotel suite. He explained in confidence that the reason why they had not met in the Ministry of the Interior was because the meeting was top secret. Lustig pointed to the articles in the press concerned with the needed repairs to the Eiffel Tower and then said that the government had, indeed, decided to bring the Tower down. It was unsafe and if its topmost structure gave way, scores of deaths might result when the tower and tourists crashed. Since the Tower was a cherished monument, Lustig explained, the government chose to operate in secret. If it announced the dismantling of the Tower, there would be a great uproar, even riots and bloodshed.

The government had decided to take down the Eiffel Tower, selling off its great iron girders, all before the public was aware of the decision. Lustig then told the scrap dealers that he would take bids on the structure and whichever firm was awarded the job would have to maintain strict secrecy. Its workers would suddenly appear one day and begin dismantling the Tower. The public would be faced with a fait accompli and be helpless to prevent the necessary dismantlement. The scrap dealers were overwhelmed with the possibility of obtaining the enormous amount of iron from the Tower and greedily bid on the structure. Lustig made a great show of accepting only sealed bids and he took his time contacting the highest bidder.

Lustig knew that he had to convince the winning bidder that he, indeed, was a genuine government employee. When meeting with the dealer, Lustig hemmed and hawed before making the award, stating that he was a poorly paid government servant and he complained about the high cost of living and the bills plaguing his large family. The dealer smiled. He was used to this kind of talk from government officials. He had been dealing with them all his life and understood immediately that Lustig was asking to be bribed.

The dealer was prepared for this customary payoff. He had brought along a tidy sum for just that purpose and he slipped a large wad of bills into Lustig's hand. Lustig then awarded the man the contract to destroy the Tower, and the dealer wrote out a check to Lustig, addressing this to the alias Lustig was then using. Lustig had earlier explained that payment must be made in this way so as not to alert talkative bankers to the deal. The funds would be transferred from his account to government accounts later. The reported amount paid to Lustig exceeded $50,000.

Lustig cashed the check and fled to Vienna to live in luxury for some time. The scrap dealer showed up at the Eiffel Tower some days later with a large crew. Tower guards asked him what he wanted. The dealer whispered conspiratorially to the guards that he and his men were there to dismantle the Tower. He showed the guards his fake documents from Lustig. These were examined and then the scrap dealer was told, to his surprise, that he had been swindled. The French Government had no intention of taking down one of the prized monuments of France. The scrap dealer was sent on his way, cursing and fuming. It was reported years later that Lustig so enjoyed working this confidence game that he returned to Paris in the early 1930s and swindled a new group of scrap dealers with the same scam and made even more money on the absurd swindle, about $75,000.

Chicago crime czar Al Capone, who gave Lustig $50,000 to invest and was amazed at the outcome, never realizing that the Count had conned him.

Lustig was in the U.S. during the late 1920s, working sophisticated confidence swindles in New York. He noticed that the most written about gangster of that era was Al Capone of Chicago, whose name appeared almost daily in the New York papers that reported his millions from illegal bootlegging operations. Lustig was by then known in the underworld as one of the world's top con men and his reputation had reached Capone's board room. Knowing this, Lustig traveled to Chicago and conferred with the crime czar, stating that he had a wonderful investment opportunity. He stated that he was going to put up $50,000 of his own money for the scheme and he asked Capone to match this sum, telling the wary crime lord that he would double Capone's money within sixty days.

Capone had no need to invest money to make money. He was earning an estimated $50 million gross a year through his enormous rackets, but he enjoyed action and he counted out fifty one thousand dollar bills, handing this to Lustig and saying: "Okay, Count, double my money in sixty days."

With that Lustig nodded and left. Sixty days later he returned to Chicago and was shown into Capone's large office. Capone sat at a big desk drumming fat fingers on its glass top. "You said you'd double that $50,000 of mine," Capone said to Lustig in a low voice. "What about it?"

Lustig fumbled about and then blurted: "Please accept my profound regrets, Mr. Capone. The plan failed. I failed."

Capone's face reddened and his fingers drew together into tight fists. He leaned forward menacingly and began: "Why, you—"

Quickly Lustig reached into his pocket and withdrew $50,000, placing this before Capone and saying apologetically: "Here, sir, is your money, to the penny. Again, my sincere apologies. This is most embarrassing. Things did not work out the way I thought they would. I would have loved to have doubled your money for you and myself—Lord knows I need it—but the plan just did not materialize. I'm sorry."

Capone sat open mouthed, startled that he had gotten back his money. "I expected $100,000 or nothing," Capone said in shock, "but this—"

Lustig stood up, bowed and apologized once more. He started to leave, but Capone called him back, saying: "By God, you're honest!" He counted out $5,000 and handed this to Lustig. "If you're on the spot, here's five to help you along." Lustig thanked the crime boss and left. He had gotten exactly what he wanted from Capone. Lustig had used Capone's money to buy short-term, no risk bonds with high interest yield and by the time he returned Capone's money, he had already made a handsome profit. He also knew that Capone was generous to those who worked for him. He had expected the bonus of $5,000 he had received from Capone.

Con man on horseback, Robert Arthur Tourbillon (AKA: Dapper Dan Collins), a cultured con man of the 1920s-1930, who partnered with Lustig.

Lustig remained in the Midwest for some time. He dressed in stylish tailor-made Bond Street suits, wore a diamond stickpin, and was attended by servants while driving about in a chauffeur-driven limousine. He appeared in this fashion in Salina, Kansas, where he put up government bonds as collateral for a $25,000 loan made to him by Tormut Green, president of the American Savings Bank of Salina. The bonds, the loan, and Lustig disappeared a few days later. He next appeared in Florida where he mulcted $35,000 from an equipment manufacturer, selling him a large interest in a Broadway show that did not exist.

Victor "The Count" Lustig under arrest in 1934 for counterfeiting; he was convicted, but escaped.

By the late 1920s, the fabulous Victor "the Count" Lustig was living in Palm Beach, Florida, residing in a mansion with pool, servants, and liveried chauffeur to drive his Rolls Royce. He had conned his way to an estimated fortune of $2 million. But Lustig, like so many others, invested his ill-gotten loot in the Stock Market, and like so many others, was financially wiped out when the Stock Market crashed in 1929. Lustig was forced back into the confidence game business, not that he was ever out of it for long. He had a predilection to scamming his fellow man, once remarking: "Everything turns gray when I don't have at least one mark on the horizon. Life then seems empty and depressing. I can not stand honest men. They lead desperate lives, full of boredom."

In the early 1930s, Lustig turned to the green goods game or the green goods box routine. He constructed a handsome lacquered box that he claimed contained apparatus that could duplicate money in $20 denominations. One had to feed a $20 bill into a slot in the machine while feeding a blank piece of paper through the other end. By turning the handle, the original bill would emerge at the other end, and the blank piece of paper would traverse the box and emerge at the other end, appearing as a crisp, brand new $20 bill. Lustig so impressed Herman Loller, an automobile manufacturer, that Loller bought the box for $40,000. Once Lustig was out of sight, of course, the box failed to reproduce money. He had placed just enough $20 bills inside the box to make his point. Lustig went on selling his green boxes for some time until the swindle was too widely publicized to employ further.

Lustig next turned to counterfeiting. He, Robert Arthur Tourbillon, who was known as Dapper Dan Collins, and William Watts, an expert forger and plate maker, began printing quality counterfeit $10 and $20 bills. They flooded the country with these bills in 1934, which caused the Secret Service to assign several squads of men to track down Lustig's ring. Lustig and Watts were arrested and brought to the federal detention center in New York. Tourbillon vanished and was not heard from again. At the federal detention center, Lustig, pretending to be a window washer, let himself out of a third-story window, down to the pavement below, and freedom. After a wild chase, he was arrested in the Midwest and returned for trial.

On December 4, 1935, Watts turned state's evidence and testified against Lustig, who had passed more than $1.3 million in bogus currency. "He was the best distributor of queer [fake money] that I ever saw," Watts said, giving his partner an Lustig (right) is shown in custody, 1934, after Treasury Agents recaptured him;he was sent to Alcatraz, where he died in 1947.

offhanded compliment that led to Lustig's conviction and twenty-year sentence in Alcatraz. Lustig took ill on the Rock and died of pneumonia in 1947. Next to Joseph "Yellow Kid" Weil, Lustig was considered the greatest confidence man in Europe and the U.S. in the twentieth century, gleaning an estimated $10 million through his many cons. And, like the Yellow Kid, Victor "The Count" Lustig was buried in a pauper's grave.

THE INCREDIBLE GASTON MEANS/ 1910s-1930s

Arch swindler, forger, detective, and author, Gaston Bullock Means (1879-1938) was many things to many people. To FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover he was the "greatest faker of all time." A conniving detective, he always seemed to be embroiled in trouble or at the center of a controversy. Means was an inveterate liar whose fabrications were never less than fantastic, but he presented his case so convincingly that he was believed by his gullible victims, who financially backed him again and again.

Means was the fourth of seven children born to William Gaston and Corrallie Bullock, wealthy landowners from Blackwelder's Spring, North Carolina. Raised in the nearby village of Concord, Gaston left the University of North Carolina in 1898, a year shy of receiving his degree. In 1904, he landed a job with the Cannon Mills Company of Concord, a leading textile firm. Means spent the next decade as a traveling salesman (or drummer) for the firm, canvassing the lucrative New York and Chicago markets. His extensive knowledge of the industry convinced the editors of the New York Journal of Commerce to hire him as a "stringer" to report on the latest goings-on in the textile markets.

In 1910, Means quit the business to pursue the far more glamourous career of private detective for the William J. Burns agency. In the course of proving his worth to Burns, who later called him "the greatest natural detective ever known," Means made the acquaintance of Captain Karl Boy-Ed, the naval attache to the German embassy, and when the European war began in August 1914 Means made a deal with Boy-Ed to supply the embassy with sensitive data about allied shipping. For this he was paid a weekly salary estimated to be between $700 and $1,000. Means also volunteered his services to transport top-secret documents for the allies. The money he earned from these ventures enabled Means to furnish an elaborate apartment, where he entertained society friends.

It was about this time that Means accepted his most lucrative assignment: safeguarding the interests of Maude King, widow of millionaire lumber baron James C. King, who had left the bulk of his fortune to his young and vivacious wife. King thumbed her nose at the social mores of the age. She led a riotous life in the capitals of Europe, squandering her deceased husband's fortune. Deciding that he should become the beneficiary of her extravagance, Means wormed his way into King's good graces by faking a holdup in which he saved the lady's honor and purse through an act of gallantry. After that she made him her closest confidant and financial manager.

Gaston Bullock Means, center, former FBI agent, claimed that Mrs. Harding poisoned the president, spied on congressmen, and died in prison.

William J. Burns, who took over the Bureau of Investigation and made Means an agent, calling him "the greatest natural detective ever known."

By July 1917, Means had bilked more than $150,000 from King by managing her estate. That August, King became concerned about the manner in which her finances were being handled. Means reassured her that everything was in order and suggested that perhaps what King really needed was a short vacation to put her mind at ease. He invited her to Concord for a hunting trip in the woods. Maude King was certainly not the outdoors type. She and Means nevertheless went hunting together, but Means returned from a dense woods alone and in a state of agonized grief. He claimed that King, while playing with his gun, shot herself in the head. "Mrs. King, poor soul, was very lightheaded," he said. There were no other witnesses to the tragedy.

A youthful J. Edgar Hoover, just before he took over the FBI from William J. Burns; Hoover hated Means, calling him the "greatest faker of all time."

King relatives and authorities became so suspicious of this "accident" that Means was indicted for murder, but his trial was held in Concord, where the sympathy of the town and his father's name and reputation weighed in his favor. Means was acquitted despite the testimony of ballistics experts, who explained that the shot could not have been fired by Maude King's own hand. In 1918, with his wartime adventures over, and King's ashes scattered to the wind, Means rejoined the Burns Detective Agency. He busied himself with hunting down anarchists and political malcontents during the 1919-1920 "Red Menace" scare, but produced little or no results. It appeared that he would fade into the obscurity of Washington's bureaucratic backwash, but all that changed with the coming of a new political administration, one that proved to be the most venal in American history, controlled by outlandish freebooters in the exact mold of Gaston Bullock Means.

Warren G. Harding of Ohio became the nation's twenty-ninth president in 1921. His administration established new lows in bureaucratic inefficiency and corruption, as he filled sensitive federal offices with some of the greediest politicians the U.S. had ever seen. Means became one of Harding's key players. It took several months of behind-the-scenes "negotiations," but Means secured an appointment to head up the Bureau of Investigation, forerunner of the modern FBI, for his employer, Burns. Burns had ordered Means to come up with letters of recommendation from key congressmen, who might be persuaded to intervene with the president on his behalf, but Means took a more circuitous route. He found the skeletons in the legislators' closet and used them as a bargaining tool.

Burns was appointed to head the agency in October 1921. He rewarded Means for his stellar work by naming him special investigator, much to the chagrin of J. Edgar Hoover, then a low-ranking department functionary. In the few months that Means occupied this office, he spent much of his time conniving with Ohio political boss Jess Smith, who occupied offices at the Department of Justice. Hoover complained to Burns about Means' unethical operations, but not much was done until the press became interested.

Means had recently been implicated in the forgery of a will and had brought a fraudulent claim against the Southeastern Express Company less than a year earlier. The unfavorable publicity this caused the administration led to a public clamor that resulted in Attorney General Harry M. Dougherty suspending Means on February 8, 1922. Means, however, remained on the payroll as an informant. On May 30, 1923, Jess Smith committed suicide amid rumors about wholesale corruption and graft within the "Ohio Gang," a group of Harding cronies who had been illegally selling off oil-rich government lands near Teapot, Wyoming to oil tycoons like Harry Sinclair. The "Teapot Dome" scandal rocked and all but destroyed the Harding administration.

Although he had been a contact man for in the oil scandal, Means emerged unscathed. He involved himself in a variety of shady deals in the next few years and was indicted in October 1923 for the illegal withdrawal of government liquor from federal warehouses, while using Andrew Mellon's signature on a forged document. Then, in March 1924, he was charged with extorting $65,000 from some stock promoters after promising them he would rid them of pending indictments on charges of mail fraud. Before the trial began, he revealed to a Senate investigating committee that key government officials were receiving graft payments.

Heiress Maude King, bilked and possibly murdered by the conniving Means in 1917; King went on a hunting trip with the gregarious Gaston Means, even though she never fired a rifle in her life; she did not survive the excursion.

Heiress Evalyn Walsh McLean, wearing the "cursed" Hope Diamond, was swindled out of $104,000 by Means, who promised to find and return the kidnaped Lindbergh baby in 1932, a scam that sent grifter Means to prison for life.

Means produced two large bundles of supposed "hour by hour" accounts of his investigative work, but then this evidence mysteriously disappeared. Means claimed that the records were now in the hands of Senator Smith W. Brookhart and produced a signed note from the senator, but the document was later proven to be a forgery. Means was indicted on a charge of forgery, but the case never went to trial. However, he was convicted on two earlier charges in April 1925 and was sentenced to spend two years at the federal penitentiary in Atlanta.

While occupying a cell at that institution, Means concocted his biggest scam to date. He persuaded Mrs. May Dixon Thacker, a minister's wife involved in prison reform, to help him write a sensational expose about Warren Harding. In it he accused the president's wife of poisoning her husband during their fateful West Coast trip in 1923. Mrs. Harding had done this, Means alleged, because of his affair with Nan Britton, an ingenue who supposedly gave birth to the president's child out of wedlock. The Strange Death of President Harding appeared in 1930 and was a runaway best seller, with some eighty thousand copies snatched up by the American public, but Thacker expressed her misgivings about the book, when Means failed to produce documentary evidence to support his wild allegations. Writing in the November 7, 1931 issue of Liberty, Thacker completely repudiated the work, calling it pure fiction.

In March 1932, Gaston Means stepped into the criminal limelight for the final time with his most insidious swindle. He agreed to locate the kidnaped Lindbergh baby for Mrs. Evalyn Walsh McLean, a Washington, socialite. McLean agreed to supply Means with $104,000 in ransom money. Working with an accomplice, one Norman T. Whitaker, Means staged two imaginary rendezvous with the so-called kidnappers at Aiken, South Carolina, and El Paso, Texas. He sent news back to Mrs. McLean that an additional $35,000 was required.

At this point the woman notified the police, who promptly ordered Means arrested. He was convicted of grand larceny and sentenced to fifteen years at the Leavenworth Penitentiary. The $104,000 was never recovered, and Means refused to reveal where it was hidden. His remaining years were spent trying to regain his freedom. Means approached the FBI with an offer to help them solve a backlog of unsolved cases in exchange for his freedom, but Hoover was not interested. Gaston Means died at the Medical Center for federal prisoners in Springfield, Missouri, on December 12, 1938.

SWINDLING THROUGH THE FAMOUS/ 1910s-1950s

Where Gaston Means employed his authority as a detective with the Bureau of Identification to bilk victims, a number of con men possessing great acting talents used the authority of famous persons to advance their swindles. Not the least of these was Michael Alexandrovitch Dimitry Obelensky Romanoff (1892-1971; Harry F. Gerguson). As befits a first-class con man, little is known about Michael Romanoff's background. The man who spent a lifetime claiming to be the sole surviving child of Czar Nicholas II of Russia was born in Russia, New York, Ohio, or Illinois, depending on which account one accepts. What is known is that Romanoff, born Harry F. Gerguson (or Gaygusson), was an orphan and lived as a foster child first in the home of a New York banker, F.L. McDavid, and later with Texas congressman Gordon Russell. Precisely how Romanoff managed to get himself placed with two such wealthy and influential families is less clear.

When Czar Nicholas and the Russian imperial family were executed in 1918, Romanoff apparently saw a seed of opportunity in the real Romanovs' misfortune. Soon thereafter he began publicly declaring himself Prince Michael, the sole surviving member of the family. He made so compelling a prince that he was able to perpetuate any number of frauds using this identity. At one point he actually succeeded in persuading several U.S. museums and galleries to give him title to art works, which had been the property of the Romanovs, before the Russian Revolution.

Michael Romanoff (Harry F. Gerguson) bilked his way to fame by impersonation.

Romanoff, however, was a man of many faces. On two occasions he successfully posed as a university professor, once at Harvard University where he convinced the school's administration that he was an eminent Russian scholar whose credentials had been destroyed in the revolution. Romanoff also posed at various times as a European film director, a politician, and the famous illustrator Rockwell Kent. Whatever false identity he employed, Romanoff's scams were usually clever, always bold and often lucrative.

By 1939, however, Romanoff's notoriety had rendered most of his schemes ineffectual. Some of his Hollywood friends, including Humphrey Bogart and Robert Benchley, persuaded him to give up his frauds and run an elegant Hollywood restaurant. The restaurant, Romanoff's, a watering hole for the rich and famous of the film industry, made its owner a tremendous financial success and a celebrity. He even made brief appearances in several Hollywood films including The Arch of Triumph and A Guide for the Married Man. Despite this success on his own, Romanoff never surrendered his claim to the Russian throne. On his deathbed, he insisted that he was the last survivor of the doomed Romanovs, but he uttered this oft-repeated claim with a smile curling his lips.

Where Romanoff impersonated the role of a famous person to gain his riches, the artful Maundy Gregory, sold famous identities in the form of titles. Arthur John Peter Michael Maundy Gregory (1877-1941) earned the sobriquet "The Great Swindler" through his highly accurate perception of what vanities people will pay for and precisely how much they will pay. Gregory was born poor, the son of a Hampshire clergyman. His father's occupation provided him a good education and some exposure to genteel society. After failing at a theatrical venture, Gregory discovered his life work, a lucrative con game in which he convinced people that he could secure for them a title in the British peerage, but for a price, of course.

Maundy Gregory, a British swindler who grew rich by arranging to sell British titles he never arranged.

Gregory claimed to be able to arrange anything from a knighthood, for £10,000, to a peerage, for £100,000. He dressed and acted the part of an important gentleman and kept lavish offices on Parliament Street in Whitehall, between the Old Scotland Yard and the prime minister's home on Downing Street. No one actually knew who Gregory was, thanks in large part to his own efforts to obscure his identity. His manner and apparent wealth convinced many that he held a high position in the foreign office or the secret service.

Gregory's scam worked because he obtained the names of people actually being considered for a title. He then asked around to determine which of the candidates was particularly eager for such an honor. Often the candidates paid Gregory his fee, received the title, and never knew that they would have gotten it anyway without his expensive help. Gregory's reputation grew, and he enhanced it at every opportunity. Eventually, he drew suspicion.

Victor Grayson, a socialist politician and former member of parliament, denounced Gregory. One evening in 1920, Grayson left a hotel bar in London after having a drink with friends and disappeared. Although nothing was ever proved, a number of people suspected that Gregory had arranged the disappearance. Gregory's name was also mentioned in connection with the sudden and mysterious death of Mrs. Edith Rosse, who left him nearly £20,000. In 1925, perhaps in direct response to Gregory's swindling activities, the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act, was passed.

In 1933, Gregory offered to arrange a knighthood for Edward Leake, a retired naval man. Leake agreed to Gregory's price, but really intended to turn him in. Leake alerted Scotland Yard to Gregory's offer, and in February 1934, Gregory was brought to court on charges of "Endeavouring to Procure the Grant of a Title or Honour Contrary to the Honours Act." Gregory wisely pleaded guilty and was fined £50 and sentenced to two months in prison. Upon his release, Gregory filed for bankruptcy and went to live in Paris. He failed to return for his bankruptcy hearing, which showed that he had liabilities of £15,000. Gregory remained in France until the German occupation of June 1940, when he was arrested as an alien. He refused repatriation and died in a Paris hospital the following year.

Where Maundy Gregory sold titles, American con man Frederick Emerson Peters (1885-1959) enacted the roles of famous U.S. figures to pull off his scams. A likable, small-time con man, Peters, first made a living by defrauding expensive stores. The well-dressed Peters would enter a shop and purchase a major item, ostensibly a gift, and ask that it be delivered. He chatted casually to the clerk, bringing in low key references to important people he knew and places he had been. Peters would then ask to cash a check for somewhat more than the cost of the item and most of the clerks obliged. The gift, sent to an incorrect or nonexistent address, ended up back at the store.

In 1915, Peters was arrested for grand larceny and sent to federal prison for ten years. He was released in 1920, when the secretary of war, Newton D. Baker, a friend of Peters' father, obtained a pardon for him from President Woodrow Wilson. The five years he spent behind bars gave Peters time to nurture the idea of famous people and how their reputation not only preceded them, but so dazzled and impressed those who met them that the gullible were grateful to aid them in their need of ready cash. Upon his prison release, Peters went right back to work, but now with the additional ability to impersonate famous people, such as Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., Philip Wylie, Booth Tarkington, and Franklin D. Roosevelt. While posing as these personalities, Peters would ask for short-term loans, claiming the loss of a wallet or checkbook, and would invariably receive substantial cash. He was, however, once again caught in just such a scam and was returned to prison.

Lacking reading material with which he had previously enriched his fraud, he obtained a library for the federal prison at McNeil Island where he was a prisoner and the chief librarian. Peters wrote to U.S. publishers, asking for books. The prison library received some 15,000 new books, which Peters avidly read until he was released in 1931. His impersonations were now more refined, and the attempted frauds much grander. Although Peters was periodically caught and returned to prison, he continued his impersonations. Finally, in 1952, at the age of sixty-seven, he was caught in Washington, D.C., by a detective who had been following his career for years. Peters' only comment was, "It's been a lot of fun, hasn't it?" He died in 1959, registered at a Connecticut hotel under someone else's name.

Frederick Emerson Peters, who posed as Franklin Roosevelt, among other famous persons, to swindle suckers in short cons.

THE GREAT ART FORGER/1930s-1940s

Hailed as the greatest art forger of all time, Han van Meegeren (1889-1947) was born in Deventer, Netherlands. His father, Henricus van Meegeren, was a schoolmaster who did not encourage his son's ambitions to become a painter. When Meegeren was twelve, his severe parents looked over his sketches and then tore them to shreds, telling their disheartened son he had no artistic abilities whatever. Meegeren was allowed, however, to enter the Delft University to study architecture. He failed his examinations and left the university. Meegeren, against the wishes of his father and discouraged by other relatives and friends, stubbornly embarked on a career as a painter. He exhibited his work for the first time in 1916 and was well-received by the critics and the public alike. Success in his chosen profession seemed assured.

Throughout the early 1920s, Meegeren enjoyed continued success. His shows were largely organized and promoted by his wife, Anna. At one show, however, the artist met Johanna Oerlemans, the beautiful and sophisticated wife of a leading art critic. She became his mistress. This affair caused Meegeren's divorce in 1923. He continued his affair with Oerlemans, who, in turn, was also divorced. They married in 1929. By then Meegeren's career began a downslide, his popularity dropping off and critics becoming disinterested in his work. He was in financial difficulties in the early 1930s, and angered at being ignored as an artist, decided to mock the critics and make an enormous amount of money by faking works by long-dead masters.

This was not an original idea. Meegeren's friend Theo Wijngaarden another painter, who had suffered due to Holland's greatest critic, Dr. Abraham Bredius, took his vengeance by faking a work of Rembrandt. Wijngaarden had discovered a painting he believed to be a genuine Frans Hals. It was pronounced authentic by the art critic de Groot, but when Dr. Bredius inspected the work, he called it a fake.

To embarrass Bredius, Wijngaarden painted a work that he brought to the art critic, claiming it to be a Rembrandt. The pompous Bredius inspected it carefully, then pronounced it genuine. At that moment, Wijngaarden produced a long knife and slashed the canvas to pieces as Bredius and others stepped back in shock and horror. Wijngaarden announced that he had painted the work and that Bredius was a fool. Meegeren resolved to perform the same feat, but go even further, creating fake de Hooths and Vermeers and collecting enormous sums for these "discoveries." He would, like his friend Wijngaarden, then tear up the check in front of those whom he intended to dupe.

Meegeren spent more than four years seeking to duplicate works of Jan Vermeer, a noted sixteenth-century painter with whom he was familiar, having paid particular attention to Vermeer in his art studies as a youth. For years, Meegeren worked with pigments and other materials. The painter baked his canvases so that they would appear to have aged by hundreds of years, and he ground earth and stone by hand into his pigments to provide the proper irregular look to them. Thus, if experts examined them under a microscope, they would be convinced the paintings had been produced by ancient methods rather than pigments produced mechanically.

To authenticate the age of his fake paintings further, Meegeren discovered that he could strip down a canvas that was three hundred years old and the "crackle," the tiny cracks that appeared over the decades when the oil dried on the canvas, would remain. When he painted over these canvases the crackle of the first layer of paint still appeared on the newly painted canvas, thus making the new painting appear ancient. Living on the Riviera, Meegeren supported himself by painting portraits of tourists while continuing his research.

He bought chairs, pots, and other items of the seventeenth century so these trappings would appear as genuine in his fake Vermeers. But it was with the oil paint that Meegeren took the most care. Vermeer had been famous for his ultramarine blue, but Meegeren found this almost impossible to duplicate. The oldest available paint coming close to this color had a different chemical make-up, one which was not created until 1802, 127 years after Vermeer's death. Meegeren solved this problem by locating a firm that produced powdered lapis lazuli, which is what Vermeer used to create his ultramarine blue. Meegeren bought all the powdered lapis lazuli the firm had on hand.

Meegeren then mixed his oil paints with lilac oil and phenol resin, which produced the proper viscosity and drying properties. However, Meegeren also knew that the oil paints used by the old masters often took decades to dry thoroughly, so he sped up the drying process by baking his canvases in an electric oven at 105-degree centigrade for about two hours. He then coated the canvas with a light coat of varnish and, when the crackles broke through to the new surface of paint, brushed India ink over it. Next, he wiped away the ink, which rode inside the crackles, making it appear that three centuries of dirt clung to the canvas. A final coat of yellow-colored varnish was lightly added to the entire canvas to give it a natural yellowing look, the result of aging. He would then roll the canvas to create a few more crackles. As a final touch, Meegeren would purposely damage a small portion of the canvas and then "restore" this portion.

Han van Meegeren, the great art forger, stands before one of his own creations, a huge painting entitled The Young Christ, demonstrating to police officials how he easily forged the paintings of the old masters.

The human figures Meegeren chose for his subjects were based on those appearing in genuine Vermeers. He used live models, but carefully selected persons who bore a resemblance to Vermeer's subjects. Since Vermeer's work was mostly of a religious nature, Meegeren opted for the same genre. His first fake Vermeer, produced in 1936 or 1937, he titled Christ at Emmaus. He used himself as the model for Christ, painting himself as reflected in a full-length mirror. When he finished, Meegeren called a lawyer from Amsterdam, telling him that he had acquired the painting and other items from a noble French family that had fallen on hard times and did not wish their identities known. The lawyer saw the signature of Vermeer and took the painting to the art critic Bredius, who excitedly pronounced the work genuine. The painting was then purchased by Dr. D.G. van Beuningen for about $450,000. Dr. Beuningen then presented the work to the Boymans Museum in Rotterdam, where it was accepted as an authentic Vermeer.

Meegeren painted more fake Vermeers, including Isaac Blessing Jacob, The Last Supper, The Washing of Christ's Feet, and Christ and the Adulteress. He also passed off a fake de Hoogh titled Interior with Drinkers. These paintings, completed between 1937 and 1943, brought millions in payment and were marketed by Dutch art dealer Rienstra van Strijvesande. Meegeren grew rich, buying a large house in Holland, then more and more properties. He frequented nightclubs and even bought one of these clubs. Many beautiful women became his mistresses and he indulged himself in heavy doses of morphine until he was addicted to the drug. To explain his new-found riches, Meegeren claimed that he had inherited a small fortune from a distant relative. He then claimed that he had won a lottery, then two more lotteries.

Meegeren's masterful forgeries might never have been discovered had it not been for the treasure-acquiring habits of Nazi Field Marshal Hermann Goering. Following the war, Meegeren's Christ and the Adulteress was discovered in a salt mine near Salzburg, Austria, part of the art treasures looted and later hidden by Goering at the close of the war. Dutch

A Vermeer showing Christ with apostles.

Meergeren's Christ of Emmaus.

authorities learned that Goering had paid $1.25 million for this painting, acquiring it from Aloys Miedel, a German banker. Miedel had gotten the painting from a Dr. Hofer, who had secured hundreds of art treasures for leading Nazis during the war. Hofer, in turn, had acquired the fake Vermeer from the Dutch art dealer Strijvesande, who told Dutch authorities that he had gotten the painting from Meegeren.

Meegeren was visited by police and he claimed that the Vermeer had been obtained through "an old Italian family." This was a mistake. Dutch officials believed that Meegeren had been acquiring art treasures from the Italian fascists and selling them through his contacts to the Nazis. He was arrested and charged with selling national art treasures and being a collaborator. He was interrogated for several weeks, but he refused to identify the source of the painting. Finally, exhausted, he blurted: "You are fools like the rest of them! I sold no great national treasure! I painted it myself!" To prove his claim, Meegeren said that if he were allowed to return to his studio and left undisturbed (provided he was given enough morphine), he could create another Vermeer.

Vermeer's Woman in Blue.

Meegeren's Woman Reading Music.

Meegeren in court on charges of art forgery; he was convicted.

The court agreed. The painter went to work on another brilliant fake, which he completed within two months, while two members of the Dutch security police watched his every move. The charges of collaboration were dropped, but new charges of forgery and fraud were substituted. Eight faked Vermeers and de Hooths were studied by the best art experts in the Netherlands and finally proclaimed bogus after being subjected to x-ray examinations. Meegeren was found guilty of art forgery and sentenced to one year in prison, but he was by then ill and was confined in a hospital. His lawyers appealed to Queen Wilhelmina to grant a pardon, and after prosecutors agreed to this, the painter was granted his freedom. It was too late. Han van Meegeren, master art forger, died on December 29, 1947, in Amsterdam's Valerium Clinic. Following his death, several more fake Vermeers created by Meegeren appeared in the art world, but these works, ironically, though known as fakes, brought enormous prices from collectors, who finally appreciated the artwork of the brilliant Meegeren.

THE HOWARD HUGHES FORGERY/1970-1972

Clifford Irving (b.1930), a hustling hack writer with a three-book contract with McGraw-Hill Publishers of New York, picked up a copy of Newsweek in December 1970 and read an article which displayed the actual signatures of Howard Hughes and of Hughes' aides, Chester David and Bill Gay. Knowing Hughes was a fanatical recluse, who had not made a public appearance in years, Irving decided to fake an "authorized" biography of the hermit-like tycoon. He spent considerable time developing phony correspondence between himself and Hughes, duplicating Hughes' handwriting from the samples appearing in Newsweek. In one of the fake letters, Hughes agreed to "tell all" to Irving in the only authorized version of his fabulous and secretive life.

Irving presented the idea to his publishers, McGraw-Hill, offering the fake correspondence to authenticate his relationship with Hughes. McGraw-Hill hesitated, especially when Irving demanded a $750,000 advance for the priceless biography. Editors wanted to know how the relatively unknown Irving had met one of the world's most elusive men. Irving was evasive, hiding behind the commonly accepted notions that Hughes was eccentric, occasionally befriended strangers, and lived and operated in near complete secrecy. In the end, McGraw-Hill seized the opportunity to publish a book they believed would make millions.

Irving went to work faking the biography, piecing together Hughes' life from various other books written by those who had known the recluse. Some time earlier he had been asked to work on a book about Hughes by a friend, Stanley Myers, who assembled considerable research from the investigations of James Phelan, a newsman, and Noah Dietrich, once a top executive for Hughes. Myers sent this research to the unscrupulous Irving who copied and then returned it, saying he was not interested. He then used the insider research for his own faked book on Hughes.

When McGraw-Hill announced the book's publication in December 1971, spokesmen for Rosemont Enterprises, Inc., a Hughes firm, loudly denounced the book. Rosemont had been established by Hughes to prevent anyone from ever using his name. McGraw-Hill confronted Irving, who brazenly shrugged off the Rosemont statements, saying that Hughes was so secretive that he had undoubtedly failed to inform his own people that he had authorized the Irving biography. Then Irving told McGraw-Hill that Hughes, despite the fact that he was a billionaire, wanted more money. He persuaded McGraw-Hill to write a check for $275,000 in the name of H.R. Hughes, and another for $25,000 made out to himself.

Even though many began to publicly state that the Irving book was a fake, McGraw-Hill was convinced of its genuineness and advanced another $325,000 to Irving, mostly in checks made out to H.R. Hughes. These checks were deposited in a Swiss numbered bank account with Credit Suisse by Irving's collusive wife, Edith, under the name Helga Rosencrantz Hughes. More denials from Hughes' executives were made, but Irving continued to insist that Hughes was paranoid and would not tell anyone of his private arrangements with him. Irving was convinced that not even the most outrageous claims could prompt Hughes into making a public appearance to quash the swindle. In this he completely miscalculated.

Literary swindlers Clifford and Edith Irving.

Hughes did come forth, in January 1972, holding a phone interview with several newsmen who had known him well over the years and convinced them that he had never met Irving or had dealings with him. Still, Irving stuck to his story, insisting that he would soon reveal his inside contact to Howard Hughes. Meanwhile, his wife busied herself with flying to Switzerland and withdrawing all the money from the H.R. Hughes bank account. In March 1972, a reporter from Time magazine, thinking Irving was getting his information from John Meier, a Hughes executive, called Irving and left a message on his answering machine. "We know all about Meier," the reporter stated, testing the waters. Irving thought the reporter meant Stanley Meyer, the man from whom he had stolen his research. He then admitted his swindle, stating that his Hughes biography was a hoax.

Both Irving and his wife Edith were brought to trial and convicted of fraud. Edith Irving was tried in Switzerland and received a two-year sentence, of which she served fourteen months. Irving received a two-and-a-half-year sentence and was released after seventeen months. When he emerged he wrote a book about the Hughes swindle for which he received a much smaller advance than the one he had conned from McGraw-Hill. His marriage had gone to pieces and his credibility as an author was utterly destroyed. Irving, who at first was thought clever by more venal readers, has since been aptly labeled a thief and a liar.

Billionaire Howard Hughes stepped from seclusion to expose the Irving fraud.

LOOTING THE LOVELORN/1940s-1950s

Preying upon lonely hearts victims has long been a swindle practiced by con artists, both male and female. One of the most notorious of these sharpers was Mildred Hill (b.1881), who operated a matrimonial scam out of her Washington, D.C., home for several years in the early 1940s, recruiting her most attractive daughter, one of ten children she sired, to pose as a prospective bride for lonely bachelors. A photograph of the girl was circulated along with a love letter written by Hill promising marriage.

Mildred Hill ran a mail-order marriage scam, peddling her "daughter" as a lure.

Hill would meet with prospective husbands, introducing herself as her daughter's mother, about the only real fact in her scam. She would milk the sucker for as much money as he might have, saying that before her daughter could wed, she, an ailing and destitute mother, needed a life-saving operation. After bilking the victim out of as much money as she could, Hill would tell the man that her daughter had suddenly eloped with a stranger, a car salesman typically, and there was little to be done.

So successful was Hill's swindle that she took to using a mimeograph to copy the hundreds of letters she mailed to potential marks. This was her undoing. In 1945 the postal authorities caught up with the swindler. Hill was sentenced to five years in prison for using the postal system for fraudulent purposes.

Another such con artist also used Washington, D.C. as his base of operations. Maurice Paul Holsinger, who had been a con artist since his teens, preyed upon the lovelorn. He placed ads in lonely hearts columns in East Coast newspapers, claiming to be any number of rich, handsome men. He would send photos of attractive men to lonely, wealthy women, stating that he could put them in touch with these bachelors for a small service fee. Enormous amounts of money poured into his Washington, D.C., offices, about $2,000 each day. Of course, Holsinger never responded to any female once she had sent her his "Cupid's Fee." Holsinger, a crafty fellow, moved his offices regularly, knowing complaints from customers would put postal investigators on his trial.

By the time Washington detectives got a line on Holsinger, he had left town, settling in Philadelphia, where he started his lovelorn racket all over again. He made $12,000 in about ten days and then, with postal inspectors hot on his trail, closed up shop. Holsinger moved west, bilking thousands of lonely ladies, and moving almost each week to stay ahead of pursuing officers. They finally caught up with him at the Des Moines, Iowa, airport.

One of the detectives stared at a strange-looking middle-aged woman about to board an airplane, who walked with the stride of a longshoreman and had beard stubble on a prominent jaw. He approached the woman, who resisted him, screaming: "You brute!" The detective reached forward and grabbed the woman's hair, and a wig of curly black hair fell into his hands. The bald Holsinger was taken into custody and his matrimonial scam came to an end. He was convicted of using the mails to defraud and given a long prison term.

Maurice Paul Holsinger, matrimonial con artist, dressed as a woman to evade arrest.

Holsinger at a police station after his capture, his cheap wig and fur coat removed.

SCHEMES OF COOK AND COX/1890s-1920s

Bogus explorer Frederick A. Cook, sent to prison for fraud.

Oil stock swindler Seymour E. J. Cox, shown with his wife.

When Dr. Frederick A. Cook (c.1865-1940) was sentenced to prison, Federal Judge John M. Killits said angrily: "Cook, this deal of yours is so damnably rotten that it seems to me your attorneys must have been forced to hold their handkerchiefs to their noses to have represented you. It stinks to high heaven. You should not be allowed to run at large." The defendant said nothing, accepting his fate and realizing that his desperate dreams of fame and fortune had brought him to disgrace and prison.

Cook was a physician who instead had sought worldwide recognition as an explorer. He did some sincere exploration of the arctic regions, but felt that what he had actually done was ineffective. Initially he simply claimed that he had climbed Alaska's Mt. McKinley. Under photographs of him and some friends supposedly at the summit, he wrote: "The soul-stirring task was crowned with victory; the top of the continent was under our feet." It wasn't until the great peak was actually climbed, in 1913, that it was discovered that the scenery shown in Cook's pictures was far below the summit.

In 1891, Cook went to Greenland and spent the winter with Robert Peary and six others, exploring that vast, unknown island. Two years later, he spent a winter locked in a boat in the Antarctic, keeping Roald Amundsen and the crew alive through a scurvy epidemic. On another Antarctic trip in 1899, Cook prepared, from someone else's manuscript, a grammar and dictionary of a Patagonian language. His plagiarism was detected before the work could be published, and his academic reputation was ruined.

In 1909, after his friend Peary had reached the North Pole, Cook claimed that he had previously achieved the feat with two Eskimos. He submitted a journal to the University of Copenhagen, but professors inspecting his documents did not accept his proof. They suspected that he had spent the winter in an Eskimo village. However, he went through the rest of his life claiming the honor.

Dr. Cook became involved with a confidence artist named Cox, who had been in the fraud business since he was fifteen. Seymour Ernest J. Cox was one of the most blatant sellers of phony stock during the 1920s, when America was enamored of Wall Street. He was a dapper, smooth-talking character who specialized in oil stock promotions. Cox, who was called "the arch pirate" of oil speculations, began his criminal career in Illinois where he was sent to jail at age fifteen for forgery. Upon his release, Cox went to Michigan where, in 1911, he was again convicted of fraud and sent to prison. In 1914, Cox served time after being convicted of using the mails to defraud. Upon his release, Cox went to Oklahoma and Texas, where he began to sell fake potash and oil stocks, bilking more than 16,000 purchasers out of an estimated $7 million, all before 1920.

This inventive hustler was, perhaps, the first con man to use an airplane in promoting his stock swindles. Cox rented a plane to fly over oil fields that were "off limits" to the public. He would take notes about those locations, where he could see intense activity and large numbers of oil drilling crews, reasoning that "gushers" were soon expected. He filed reports on these oil preparations to his stockholders, telling them that his companies owned portions of these oil operations. When official reports were released on the productivity of these new wells, Cox would sell his customers even more shares of phony stock in these operations, oil wells in which Cox had no business interests at all.

Cox was clever, challenging his prospective victims by writing them letters in which he would ask: "Are you sure that you would like to own an oil well? Are you absolutely certain you care to assume the responsibilities of becoming a millionaire?" Then Cox would send follow-up letters to prospects, knowing they were holders of worthless oil stock, convincing them to exchange their certificates for equally valueless stock he would issue in firms that ostensibly were beginning new oil fields, but which, in reality, had no field operations whatsoever. This was known in the parlance of con men as "stock reloading."

In 1923, Cox contacted Frederick Cook, knowing the bogus explorer was down-and-out and that he would readily lend his name to any scheme in exchange for some cash. Cox used Cook's famous name to entice investors into an oil stock swindle. This "stock reloading" swindle produced great quantities of cash for Cox and his partners, but the swindle exploded when some investors brought suit. Cox, Cook and ten others were convicted of stock swindling. Cox was fined $8,000 and sent to prison for eight years. Cook, the most famous of the group, was fined $12,000 and sent to prison for fourteen years and nine months. When Cook emerged from prison, he was a broken and forgotten man, dying in the obscurity he hated in 1940.

"HE'S A JOLLY GOOD FELLOW"/1910s-1920s

Where the notorious Seymour Cox never performed on the sale of any of his bogus stock, a diminutive stock investment broker did produce sound profits for his clients, until he decided that he should be the beneficiary of all the profits from illegal stock sales he manufactured. Leo Koretz (d.1925; AKA: Arthur Gibson, Lew Keyte) was a successful stockbroker working in Chicago. He had a comfortable, if not luxurious, home and a wife and child. He was a respected and well-known businessman who represented some of the wealthiest families in the Midwest. Over the years, his stock purchases on behalf of these millionaires proved to be sound and profitable.

Koretz had the appearance of a dull investment broker. He had a middle-aged paunch, a round, flabby face, and large eyes with drooping lids that were magnified by thick-lensed glasses. Koretz may have looked like an uninspired financial adviser brokering his way through life, but he harbored the secret dream of becoming a multi-millionaire like his clients. A scheme slowly took shape in his conniving brain. He would swindle his own clients out of their inherited millions.

In 1916, Koretz began talking confidentially to a few intimate friends, some of his best investors, that he had taken a bit of a gamble and bought more than five million acres of land in Panama, which encompassed the Bayano River. He had followed a wild impulse, he said, and bought the land "blind" because he was able to buy it at a bargain basement price. He then became tight-lipped about his adventuresome investment until a few months later when he informed a few people that he was leaving for Panama to inspect his Panama holdings. With that, Leo Koretz went on a three-month vacation. He visited New York, New Orleans, and other cities, where he was not known. He never went near Panama.

Chicago investment swindler Leo Koretz, 1918, during his Panamanian oil and lumber scam.

When Koretz returned to Chicago, he began to improve his lifestyle drastically. He bought a 21-room mansion and moved his family into it. He purchased a lavish summer place on Lake Michigan and suddenly appeared at his office in a chauffeur-driven Rolls Royce. To inquiring friends, Koretz merely shrugged and said that he had "a bit of good luck, that's all, nothing to talk about." The more Koretz refused to talk about his Panamanian investment, the more his investors insisted knowing about it. Finally, Koretz visited his club, pretended to get a bit tipsy, and then grew uncharacteristically chatty, gushing forth his story of the Bayano lands.

"The mahogany trees are thick as wheat fields," he blathered to some of his clients. "I've got six hundred men cutting them down in three shifts. They work at night, even, by torchlight. We are shipping so many tons of mahogany out of the jungles there that we cannot find enough boats to take them to the major ports. And now my manager down there, Arthur Gibson, an oil expert, tells me there's black crude bubbling out of the holes left by the trees we're uprooting. He's never seen so much oil!" With that he showed a cable from Panama, signed by an Arthur Gibson, which read: "700 tons of mahogany shipments stored along riverbank. Need more tree-cutting crews for mahogany and new rigging for oil derricks. Return on mahogany and oil easily twenty-to-one."

So this then, Koretz's friends and investors quickly concluded, was the source of his new wealth. They clamored to invest in his properties, practically fighting to have him take their money to further develop the mahogany forests and establish the Panamanian oil fields on Koretz's fabulous Bayano real estate. He permitted a few close friends to participate, then a few more, until dozens of the tycoons he brokered stock for over the years were investing in his firm, the Bayano Timber & Oil Company. And investors were more than pleased with their returns. They did get as much as 50 percent on their money almost every year. Koretz was hailed as a real estate and financial genius.

Messages glowing with incredible timber and oil production and shipments continued to flood Koretz's new posh offices. The little man with the thick glasses sat behind a huge mahogany desk on which a brass plaque read: "Made from the first log cut at Bayano, January 23, 1917." As investors continued to rush into Koretz's offices, they would stare at this plaque and the little man behind the ten-foot slab of mahogany, and foist enormous amounts of money upon him. He accepted their checks seemingly reluctantly, selling shares at $10,000 each. As time went on, he increased this to $50,000 a share, then $100,000 a share and still the investors littered his desk with huge checks.

The switchboard in Koretz's outer offices was constantly receiving calls from Panama. These calls were put through to Koretz as he sat with investors. He would straighten in his chair and beam, saying into the phone: "Arthur, are you saying that we are doubling our production on timber? How many tons were shipped? Four thousand a day? Excellent! What about the oil? Two more derricks went up yesterday? Production is up to 40,000 barrels a week? Wonderful." He would then hang up and the investors would begin writing checks.

Leo Koretz at his 1924 trial; following his conviction, he committed one of the strangest suicides on record.

Of course, there was no Panamanian manager running the Bayano Timber & Oil Co. Leo Koretz was the industrious Arthur Gibson, an alias he employed when setting up his long distance phone calls from Panama. He simply placed calls to various hotels and businesses in Panama, making inquiries and asking to be called back. He received these calls from total strangers talking in Spanish, and he would pretend to be getting more good news from the mythical Arthur Gibson. Koretz managed to return huge profits to his investors by simply employing the old Peter-to-Paul routine, paying earlier investors with the money later investors made in his firm, while retaining enormous amounts for his own use. This was the same technique used by many other highbinders such as William "500%" Miller" and the spectacular Charles Ponzi of Boston.

It was rumored that even the redoubtable William Randolph Hearst was an investor in Koretz's fabulous enterprises. This, no doubt, came about when Hearst's right-hand editorial director and fellow newspaper tycoon, Arthur Brisbane, invested heavily in the Bayano Timber & Oil Co. Brisbane went further. He gave an enormous banquet in honor of Koretz and invited more than 50 fellow millionaires to attend in praise of Leo Koretz. The fete was held in the main ballroom of Chicago's Congress Hotel. During the festivities, a horde of newspaper boys suddenly raced into the ball room, waving extras and shouting: "Extry! Extry! Read all about it! Leo Koretz oil swindle! Con man Koretz exposed! Millions lost in swindle!" The guests were stunned into silence and several fell back in their chairs on the verge of collapse. Before anyone suffered an apoplectic attack or stroke, Brisbane quickly rose smiling, the grinning Koretz at his side.

Brisbane announced that the whole thing was a party joke. "It's a lark!" announced Brisbane, guffawing. "Mr. Koretz is a great and honorable financier!" Brisbane went on to explain that he had printed the fake extras "exposing" Koretz and that Koretz himself had helped in writing the details of the story, pointing out how his own investors had been hoodwinked. Of course, none of it was true, Brisbane assured one and all.

And to make sure that "lovable Leo Koretz" was appreciated for all he had done for his investors, Brisbane again arose and, holding a spoon aloft, led the hundreds of suckers in singing the praise of the man who was, at that moment, bilking them. Koretz stood next to Brisbane and, through a pudgy smile, listened to his victims sing "For He's A Jolly Good Fellow" and then bowed when he was engulfed with thunderous applause.

The party jest, however, proved all too real. It put suspicion in the minds of some of the investors who, in late 1923, sent representatives to Panama to check on Koretz's operations. They reported back that the Bayano Timber & Oil Co. simply did not exist. Neither did Arthur Gibson. And no one in Panama had ever heard of Leo Koretz. Real newspaper extras then announced the bold multi-million-dollar swindle. When police arrived to arrest Koretz in his sumptuous offices, they found the arch confidence man gone. He had fled the country with one of his many show girl friends. For months the police of several states searched for Koretz. He was finally tracked down in Halifax, Nova Scotia, living like a rajah in the company of several women.

Koretz was extradited to Illinois, tried in Chicago, and convicted of stock fraud in December 1924. Koretz was sentenced to ten years in prison. "I'll never serve a day in Joliet State Prison," he said confidently from his cell in the Cook County Jail. He did not. One of his obliging girlfriends brought him a five-pound box of candy. Koretz sat down on his prison bunk, ate the entire box of candy in one sitting, and then keeled over dead. Leo Koretz had escaped prison through one of the most bizarre suicides on record. He was an acute diabetic and the massive ingestion of sugar killed him, as he knew it would.

BACK TO AFRICA!/1920s

Just as Koretz played upon the greed of his fellow millionaires, black con man Marcus Aurelius Garvey (1887-1940), preyed upon his fellow blacks, promising that he would lead all seven million Negroes in the U.S. in the early 1920s back to Africa where he would set up an independent state that provided everyone a life of ease. This would, of course, cost money, and Garvey charged all those who wished to accompany him to the promised land, a place he called the African Republic, a country that did not exist.

This was not a new ploy. A Chicago dentist, one Howard Givin, had promised fellow blacks the same thing a few years before Garvey launched his scam. Givin said he would ship all the blacks in America on Cunard liners in thousand-person contingents, but he changed his mind and suddenly decided to march all the blacks in the Midwest to the sea, where he would commandeer all the ships in eastern ports. As Chicago police attempted to disband Givin's group on Archer Avenue, where the march began, the dentist, who by then had dubbed himself "Prince Ephraim," drew a sword and pistol and charged the officers on horseback, killing two of their number. Givin was later hanged for these murders.

Garvey had a different plan, less lethal but just as prosaic. Garvey, who had immigrated to the U.S. from England in 1914, settled in New York's Harlem, was well educated and took advantage of illiterate, gullible blacks in one swindle after another. His migratory swindle, however, gleaned him millions. He bestowed upon himself a bevy of distinguished-sounding titles, including the "Provisional President of the African Republic," "Admiral of the Black Star Line," "President General of the Universal Negro Movement Association and African Community League," "Commander of the Nobles of the Sublime Order of the Nile," "Knight of the Distinguished Service Order of Ethiopia," and "Representative of the Black People of the World."

This title-burdened hustler preferred the role of admiral, and donned a garish uniform replete with medals, ribbons, golden epaulets, buttons, and chevrons. He wore a plumed commodore's hat on most occasions when selling his fellow blacks stock certificates in his Black Star Line. It was this shipping firm, Garvey pointed out through advertising and countless meetings, that would provide transportation for America's black community "back to the promised land." More than 40,000 mostly uneducated blacks purchased stock in Garvey's nonexistent line.

To thwart any government move to charge him with fraud, Garvey purchased an unseaworthy excursion boat tied to a Hudson River pier. It never went to sea. (If it had, in all probability it would have sunk immediately.) Garvey held torchlight meetings three or four times a week on the boat, his fund-collecting speeches accompanied by blaring jazz bands. To this swindle, which netted the con man about a half a million dollars over a six-year period, Garvey added the scheme of the Negro Improvement Association. Members, almost four million of them, forked over dues of thirty-five cents a month. In return, Garvey promised to set up a "lusterious [sic] black kingdom" in Africa. Of each monthly due received, Garvey pocketed ten cents, a staggering $400,000 a month.

The millionaire's lifestyle became as expansive as his titles. Garvey purchased several mansions, dozens of open-air carriages, a hundred elegantly groomed horses to pull them, more than a thousand tailor-made uniforms aglitter with gold braid. He bought newspapers and magazines, which he used to spread his scam ever wider and deeper into the black communities across the face of the land. When he needed more money for his blossoming enterprises, Garvey imperiously announced an additional $1 across-the-board charge per annum for members. Those who did not pay promptly would be eliminated from the rolls of future ship sailings to Africa. The suckers happily sent in their dollars.

The power Garvey wielded on behalf of American Negroes was so awesome that, in 1921, he was invited to speak before the League of Nations, and this the hustler did with great flair, full of demands for his future African "republic." While Garvey wowed the European capitals with his global plans for blacks, investigators for the U.S. Post Office began to prepare a mail-fraud case against him. Their work was rewarded in 1924, when the sharper was indicted and tried. He acted as his own lawyer in a carnival-like trial, which resulted in his conviction on charges of mail fraud and a five-year prison sentence in the federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Georgia.

American swindler Marcus Garvey in 1921, dressed in his admiral's uniform; he swindled millions from tens of thousands of blacks on his promise to take them back to Africa.

Before surrendering to federal custody, Garvey, free on a massive bail, hustled up enormous "appeal" funds at his elaborately planned Fourth Annual International Congress of Negro Peoples of the World (the first three had never occurred). He regaled a cheering throng with promises of riches to come and took in tens of thousands of dollars from marks he ceremoniously appointed "dukes, duchesses, knights and ladies of the Black Republic."

In Atlanta, Garvey was all but forgotten for two years. His publishing and steamship empires, hollow as they were of assets, collapsed. His associations disbanded. Upon his 1927 release, the "Admiral" was deported to Jamaica, the land of his birth, where he spent his time in lonely splendor—he had stashed several million dollars away for just such a fate.

At this time, it suddenly occurred to Garvey that European blacks had been neglected in his long crusade to bring Negroes to the promised land. They, too, needed a savior and he was soon off on a heavily financed tour of the Continent, capping his campaign with a windy speech at London's Albert Hall, which he expected 10,000 persons to attend. But, like similar reactions throughout Europe, the lecture was a fizzling flop. Only a few hundred people showed up to see the colorful Garvey. At the end of his fulminating speech, no thunderous applause hammered into the "Admiral's" ears. One spectator loudly demanded his money refunded and shouted to the stage: "You're as crazy as a loon!" It was all over for Marcus Aurelius Garvey, the most enterprising black flimflammer on record.

THE DRAKE INHERITANCE SCAM/ 1600s-1930s

Where Garvey successfully milked blacks eager to have a new identity in Africa, the shrewd manipulators of the Drake Inheritance scam sought to bilk those who might be enriched with another identity—as a rightful heir to the fabulous fortune of Sir Francis Drake. Within months of the death of British privateer Sir Francis Drake on January 28, 1596, Elizabethan con men were collecting money from "shareholders" convinced that part of an immense fortune left by Drake would be theirs. The con made its way to the U.S. around 1835. Even people with last names other than Drake were told that for a small contribution toward the legal fees necessary to straighten out the estate they, too, could share in this great windfall.

Mastermind behind the long-running Drake Inheritance swindle, Oscar Hartzell (center), in custody, 1933; he went to prison.

Oscar's dopey, loyal brother, Canfield Hartzell, who fronted for the Drake swindlers in the U.S.

In 1919, two Drake Inheritance con artists, Sudie Whiteaker and Milo F. Lewis, confronted a Madison County, Iowa, farm woman. Mrs. Hartzell listened to the pitch and decided to invest her life savings, $6,000 in cash. The con artists took her money, thanked her, and left. Their pitch, however, had been heard by Mrs. Hartzell's two sons, Oscar and Canfield. Oscar Merril Hartzell's interest and innate criminal sensibilities were piqued by the scheme, and, after researching Drake in the nearest library, he tracked Whiteaker and Lewis to Des Moines where he confronted them with their swindle. The two admitted to having made $65,000 in Iowa in the previous two months. Oscar informed them that they had underestimated the scheme's potential and needed to make it legitimate by opening an office.

Within a week, the three had formed a partnership they called the Sir Francis Drake Association. Initially they covered Iowa, Illinois, and Missouri, contacting only people with the last name of Drake. Eventually, however, they widened their market and accepted investments from virtually anyone. For two years, Oscar and his partners covered these three states. Oscar understood the laws regarding mail fraud and studiously avoided ever personally having anything to do with the mails. Eventually, he recruited a larger staff, which included Harry Osborne, A.L. Cochran, C.A. Storla, C.C. Biddle, his brother Canfield, and Otto G. Yant. Yant was a former bank cashier and provided the Drake Association with lists of people with large bank accounts. The group's venture continued to thrive. In Quincy, Illinois, they signed up every adult in the city with the full endorsement of the chamber of commerce.

In 1924, Oscar decided to travel to London. He told his investors this was to take charge of freeing the Drake estate from the bureaucracy of the British government. Once there, he lived as if he were Drake himself. His extravagant lifestyle was supported by weekly payments of $2,500 gathered and forwarded to him by his brother. During his sojourn abroad, Oscar tried to keep up his investors' interest and keep them contributing by alternately threatening to drop delinquent payers from the rolls, or enticing new suckers with estimates of the size of the estate, which he alternately estimated to be between $22 billion and $400 billion.

Iowa banker Otto Yant in custody; he provided Hartzell with rich sucker lists in the Drake scam.

By 1927, many of the investors were getting nervous. In response, Hartzell stepped up the optimism in the telegrams he regularly sent home, claiming a settlement was almost within sight. Finally, however, word of the fraud reached postal authorities in the U.S. Their attempts to investigate the swindle were severely hampered by the fact that people, who had invested everything they owned (in some case even taking out second mortgages on their homes to stay in Hartzell's good graces) refused to discuss it for fear of losing out. Iowa's attorney general publicly denounced the scheme and immediately received thousands of letters demanding his silence so the deal would not be ruined.

In January 1933, the U.S. State Department arranged to have Hartzell deported from England as an undesirable alien. Upon his arrival in New York, he was arrested and taken to Iowa City to stand trial for postal fraud. The state presented an elaborately researched and documented case, but Hartzell thought he would go free because he had never personally sent a letter pertaining to the Drake fraud or received one. He was, however, convicted for causing others to commit postal fraud and was sentenced to ten years in jail. His hold on his investors was so strong that even with his conviction many still believed in him. His bail and defense fund was provided by his loyal supporters. Hartzell encouraged their loyalty by alluding to a political conspiracy of enormous proportions that was behind his trial and conviction.

Hartzell finally entered Leavenworth in November 1933. When a group of his fellow con men who had continued to operate even after he had gone to prison was arrested, Hartzell was made to stand trial for a second round of postal fraud charges. He was convicted again and returned to Leavenworth to serve out his full sentence of ten years behind bars. In December 1936 prison officials ordered a psychiatric examination for Hartzell, who had deteriorated mentally since his incarceration. He was adjudged incompetent and sent to the U.S. Medical Center in Springfield, Missouri., where he died on August 27, 1943, only a few months before his prison time would have been completely served. It was estimated that Oscar Hartzell and his minions had bilked 70,000 Midwesterners out of an estimated $14 million.

Those persons named Drake were not the only suckers enveloped in an inheritance scam. Many others having the last names of long-deceased millionaires have been mulcted of their money in identical swindles The Baker Estate con was one of these, begun in Ontario, Canada in 1866, and claiming to settle with all the heirs of Colonel Jacob Baker, who died in Philadelphia in 1839, and who owned property at that time estimated to be more than a quarter of the entire city. Anyone named Baker stood to inherit more than 2,000 acres of land, this scam insisted, including most of downtown Philadelphia.

Unlike Hartzell's any and all gullery, those swindled in the Baker Inheritance scheme had to be named Baker, Becker or Barker, but there were enough of the above-named for operators to rake in millions. The most serious outbreaks of the Baker Inheritance con occurred in 1902 and in 1936. In the 1936 scam, postal authorities unearthed three Baker Inheritance rings in Altoona, Johnstown, and Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, snaring all of those involved, including the leading flimflammer, William Cameron Morrow Smith, who scammed millions on this grift over a thirty-year period, bilking more than 3,000 victims. He went to prison at age seventy. A similar inheritance scheme was perpetrated for decades that involved the heirs of Robert Edwards, a colonial merchant, who left in his will sixty-five acres of Manhattan Island in the middle of which towered the Woolworth Building. Thousands of dupes named Edwards paid sharpers $26 a year in annual dues to settle the estate, one that was never settled.

William Cameron Morrow Smith, at age 70; he bilked 3,000 suckers in his Jacob Baker estate con.

THE DRUG WORLD WIZARD/1920s-1930s

According to the 1938 Who's Who In America, the financial wizard of the drug world, "F. Donald Coster," was born in Washington, D.C., and held a doctorate from Heidelberg. But the distinguished-looking man who had purchased the 105-year-old drug firm of McKesson and Robbins for $1 million in 1926 was not what he claimed. His financial speculations nearly sent the vaunted drug firm into bankruptcy. The $18 million he removed from company assets was used to pay for his extravagant lifestyle. When the bubble burst, F. Donald Coster, who was really Philip Musica (1877-1938; AKA: George Dietrich), retreated to his bathroom and put a gun to his head.

Musica's saga began on the Lower East Side of New York City in 1883, when his immigrant father, Antonio, opened a barbershop in the tenements. Determined to "be somebody," Philip helped his father branch out. Together they started up a small food importing company. The business prospered through the son's astute management. The Musicas made so much money peddling their wine and cheese in Little Italy that they were soon able to afford more lavish quarters.

F. Donald Coster (Philip Musica), who looted $18 million from the drug firm, McKesson and Robbins.

The Musicas moved into the fashionable Bayridge section of Brooklyn and began to mingle with opera stars and leaders of the Italian community in New York. In 1909, the business suffered a sudden reversal. when Philip was convicted of bribing customs officials to mark down the weights of imported cheeses, the resulting lower prices permitting the Musicas to undercut their competition. Philip stoically accepted the blame and was sentenced to the Elmira Reformatory for a year. Impressed by the loyalty he had shown his father, President William Howard Taft pardoned him after serving six months.

Con artist Louise Musica, 1912, bloodied after battling police; her brother, Philip, would perpetrate million-dollar frauds.

Released in 1910, Musica started a new business, the United States Hair Company, which sold genuine human hair pieces to the society ladies of New York. A year later, the company fell apart after Musica borrowed $1 million on invoices signed by his "branch offices" in Paris, Naples, and London. When detectives dropped by his home in Bayridge, they discovered that Philip had fled. He was tracked down in New Orleans on board a boat about to cast off for Honduras. "I am disgraced!" cried the elderly Antonio, who was a party to the scheme. Philip was extradited to New York and sentenced to three years in the Tombs. Released in 1916 with a suspended sentence, he worked for a time as an informant in the employ of District Attorney Charles S. Whitman, who was arresting German spies in the U.S.

Prohibition provided Musica with new opportunities. With his new partner, Sicilian gangster Joseph Brandino, the wily con man began manufacturing hair tonic in Mount Vernon, New York, under the name of Girard & Company. The government sold Musica large amounts of raw alcohol, believing the business to be legitimate. But there was no hair tonic called "Dandrofuge." It existed only in Musica's imagination and in a few sample bottles adorning his desk. The government alcohol was being converted to a cheap Scotch, which was then sold to New York's bootleg gangs at a fabulous profit. When Brandino short-changed him, Musica had him reported to the district attorney as someone who had "misused" government permits. Brandino went to prison as a result.

At about this time, Musica began calling himself F. Donald Coster, a name that lent an air of respectability to the firm. In

The resplendent Fairfield, Connecticut, home of high finance hustler Philip Musica, who committed suicide here rather than face charges of bilking McKesson and Robbins of millions.

1925, he was introduced to Julian F. Thompson, employed by the investment firm of Bond & Goodman, Inc. Thompson looked over the books of Girard & Company and found them to be in good order. His findings were supported by the auditing firm of Dun & Company (later Dun & Bradstreet), which reported Girard's annual profits to be $250,000. Thompson personally extended Musica-Coster's credit and arranged for a substantial loan to help him purchase McKesson and Robbins, a transaction completed in 1926.

Musica-Coster soon became rich selling his bootlegged liquor through the McKesson and Robbins front. In 1928, the firm showed a $600,000 profit under his direction. A syndicate of underwriters floated a $10 million stock issue and with that money Musica-Coster built a nationwide distribution network. A year later, the stock market crash put an end to wild speculation on Wall Street. But Musica-Coster came through it surprisingly unscathed. He had swindled the crude drugs division out of $640,000 and then covered his tracks by "reinvesting" it back into nonexistent inventory. The company survived the worst of the Depression in remarkably good shape. But in 1937, the board of directors ordered Musica-Coster to convert $2 million of the crude drugs into cash to bolster sagging profits during an unexpected downturn in business conditions. Musica-Coster balked at this, demanding that the directors obtain a $3 million loan for improvements instead.

At this point, Thompson became suspicious and ordered an investigation. Thompson determined that the Dun report was a forgery and the W.W. Smith & Company name Musica-Coster had been using as his "distributor" was a fiction. The matter was reported to officials of the New York Stock Exchange. Coster was identified as Musica by a former employee from photographs published in New York newspapers.

When police arrived at the family home in Brooklyn, they found company official George Vernard (actually Arthur Musica (AKA: F. Donald Coster, left, sitting) poses with his attorney, Samuel Rich (right, sitting) and George Dietrich, assistant treasurer of McKesson and Robbins. The trio posed in Musica's home after police arrived to make arrests.

The body of Philip Musica/F. Donald Coster, the day following his suicide; he was buried in style.

Musica, Philip's brother) hastily packing up the family car for a vacation. Under questioning he admitted his true identity. U.S. marshals arrived on December 16, 1938. They found Philip Musica, his cover already blown by the newspapers, lying dead in his bathtub. He had shot himself in such a way that his blood would not stain the imported carpet on the floor.

THE MATCH KING/1900s-1930s

Though the stock and company scams of Philip Musica-F. Donald Coster were staggering, few corporate swindlers approached the magnitude of Swedish flimflammer Ivar Kreuger. His pyramid of bogus stocks and companies spanned the European continent and the financial collapse of his vast but empty empire brought ruin to millions of investors around the world. It was an empire based upon the simple match. The practical, innocuous little invention had already gained widespread acceptance among smokers by the time its greatest promoter, Ivar Kreuger (1880-1932; AKA: The Match King), was born in the rustic town of Kalmar, Sweden, in 1880. The man destined to become the "Match King" of the world embarked on an entirely different career path early in life. He had little time for such a "commonplace unexciting object" though his father was busily engaged in running a small, successful match business in Southern Sweden.

Following his graduation from the Royal Technical Institute in Stockholm, Kreuger decided to seek his fortune in the U.S. With less than a hundred dollars, Kreuger arrived in New York in 1900. He continued to Chicago, but found the Midwestern city spiritless and backward compared to Manhattan. Following an extended trek through Colorado, the Southwest, and Mexico, the enterprising young engineer returned to New York in 1902, going to work for the Fuller Construction Company. He helped build the Plaza Hotel, the R.H. Macy Building, Flatiron Building and the Metropolitan Life Building, all architectural marvels of the age, before sailing to South Africa.

Unsatisfactory wages, and the remoteness of Johannesburg drove the nomadic young businessman back to the U.S. in 1906. After working for a contracting firm that did extensive work in the Buffalo, New York, area, Kreuger returned to Manhattan, where he became manager and vice-president of the Consolidated Engineering Company. He supervised the construction of Archibald Stadium and several other buildings on the campus of Syracuse University. Kreuger was greatly impressed by a new kind of iron implanted in the foundations of the structures. The process was invented and patented by Julius Kahn, a Detroit construction mogul who convinced Kreuger he should go back to Europe and sell the concept to local industry. It was timely advice for Kreuger, who had become disenchanted with the "American outlook." He returned to Sweden in 1907 "bursting with ideas."

On May 18, 1908, Kreuger entered into a partnership with Paul Toll, a 25-year-old engineer, who shared his enthusiasm for the Kahn method. The two entrepreneurs hung out a shingle bearing the inscription: "The Trussed Concrete Steel Co." Within the next year they had their first important commission: an electrical plant in the small Swedish town of Gullspang. Later that year, the partners went to work on the nation's first steel-reinforced "skyscraper," a six-story department store. Kreuger demonstrated his shrewd business acumen by agreeing to pay $1,200 a day in fines for each extra day beyond the allotted four-month deadline to complete the structure.

Ivar Kreuger, early in his spectacular career and before he became the Swedish Match King.

Kreuger with Ingeborg Hassler, one of his many mistresses.

If Kreuger and Toll were to finish ahead of schedule, however, the engineers stipulated that they should receive the same amount for every day saved. To meet these ends, Kreuger ordered his men to work around the clock. A Stockholm newspaper commented unfavorably on Kreuger's methods: "If this American method of building catches on, the Stockholmer will never have a quiet night again." Kreuger and Toll paid no attention to the criticism and collected a tidy bonus of $70,000 after finishing the project in a record time of two months.

In the next three years the partners established themselves as the premier building contractors of Sweden. In 1913, they decided to diversify and enter the match business. Kreuger and Toll quickly bought up and consolidated seven of the independents before setting their sights on the Jankping-Vulcan combine. The merger was completed in 1917, and for the first time the match-making industry of Sweden was monopolized by one man: Ivar Kreuger and his Svenska Tndsticksaktiebolaget (Swedish Match Company). That same year, the partnership was split into two separate entities. Paul Toll retained control of the contracting enterprise, while Kreuger increasingly concerned himself with Swedish Match.

An intensely private man, Kreuger nevertheless entertained lofty ambitions. In 1919, he approached the Scandinavian Credit Bank and the Swedish Commerce Bank for a loan of sixty million kroner to expand the business overseas. Kreuger was given the working capital he needed, because by this time he was a highly respected and accomplished entrepreneur, but chiefly because he provided collateral in the form of Italian bonds worth $100 million. These bonds, placed in Kreuger's own safe deposit box, were forgeries, which Kreuger himself had manufactured. They were "reviewed" by Swedish bankers, but not closely examined, as Kreuger knew would be the case. He reportedly added more Italian bonds as additional security, bonds he later claimed he secretly received from Italy's dictator Benito Mussolini.

Kreuger counted among his employees many down-and-out noblemen, whose titles meant very little in the face of financial ruin. The Match King delighted in ordering these once-privileged employees about like servants. Yet his Stockholm offices were strangely silent, certainly not like any bustling, prosperous corporation. "The entire home staff of the huge match organization consists of 150 persons including secretaries," Isaac Marcosson of the Saturday Evening Post reported. "You scarcely ever see anyone as you move through the halls and never hear a sound." And within that ghostly silence surrounding the world's then richest man was an unbelievable swindle.

Kreuger was a chain smoker. Curiously though, he never carried a match. When asked about this he replied that it was "a petty superstition." It is commonly believed that it was Ivar Kreuger who invented the "three on a match" superstition, which at the very least helped promote business. Further, Kreuger's personality was described as "ice-like," and nothing ever seemed to bother him. No matter what calamity arose, he was always calm. One report held that Kreuger could not feel physical pain. One account stated that "dentists could work for hours on the most sensitive nerves in his mouth without giving him Novocain."

The luxuriously appointed board room at Kreuger's headquarters, where "silence" was foremost in the Match King's work code.

The courtyard of Kreuger's palace in Stockholm; the building had 125 rooms and thirty servants.

Kreuger did not give interviews, but he allowed Marcosson a few minutes of his time, telling the journalist: "Whatever success I have had may perhaps be attributable to three things: One is silence, the second is more silence, while the third is still more silence." He took Marcosson into his inner sanctum, a long room, richly-appointed with priceless tapestries. Above his office door was a large carving of a torch, "symbolic of the match that lighted the world." He displayed his collection of matchboxes which had been collected from around the world. His favorite were those from Africa. "Do you know," Kreuger said with pride, "that in many savage countries my matches, like salt and copper, are legal tender."

Ivar Kreuger's intention was to monopolize the world market. Although by 1924 he controlled nearly 70 percent of industrial production of matches, he was not satisfied. The hundreds of millions of dollars that flowed into his firms initially came from bullish American stock buyers, who invested by 1929 more than $250 million, placing their orders through esteemed firms such as Manhattan's Lee, Higginson Co. (which floated on its own Kreuger bonds worth $60 million).

Kreuger used the bulk of his fortune to bolster the sagging economies of Western Europe and South America, nations devastated by World War I, shoring up deficiencies in crop failures, and the chaos brought on by the Depression. In 1925, he loaned the government of Spain $12 million in return for a promise from King Alfonso that he would receive 16 percent in interest each year. He gave Greece a million pounds in 1926. A year later Kreuger told his investors of a similar transaction completed with Poland (for $6 million) before borrowing money from French and American banks. "Mind you, not a word of this to the Stock Exchange," he warned. "If anything was leaked out then it would mean the end of Spain, the fall of Poland. In fact it would probably bring about war!"

More huge loans to government were made: $75 million to France in 1927; $2 million to Ecuador in 1928 and $1 million to the same country the following year; $36 million to Hungary in 1929; $22 million to Yugoslavia in 1929; $6 million to Latvia in 1929; $30 million to Rumania in 1929. Even when the American stock market crashed in late 1929, Kreuger continued doling out enormous amounts of money to financially distressed governments: In 1930, he gave Lithuania $6 million; Danzig, $1 million; Germany, $125 million; Guatemala, $2.5 million; Turkey, $10 million; and Poland again, with $32 million. Ivar Kreuger alone, it appeared, was supporting half the world and was called by financial writer T. G. Barman: "The greatest constructive financial genius of our generation."

American billionaire banker J. P. Morgan—bilked of $11 million by Kreuger–hired a detective to follow the Match King on board the French liner, Ile de France, thinking Kreuger might jump overboard.

The scheme was deceptively simple. Kreuger issued forged shares, debenture certificates, and securities. In effect, he borrowed money from one nation to lend to another, a sophisticated version of the old "borrowing from Peter to pay Paul" swindle. The original debt was never repaid, for Kreuger simply altered the bank statements and balance sheets. "I will gain control by foul means or fair if I have to," he told his associates. "Do not ask to see my books. There are none except for those I keep in my head." During this time

Kreuger & Toll paid 30 percent in dividends through its 125 subsidiaries.

After the disastrous stock market crash of 1929, the Kreuger empire began to teeter. In November 1931, repayment on $100 million of the forged Italian treasury bonds came due. Four months later, his American creditors were demanding payment on a $2 million loan that had been made to Swedish Match months earlier, but Kreuger's resources were virtually depleted. In desperation, the "Savior of Europe," as he liked to think of himself, returned to the U.S. in an attempt to obtain a loan to bail out the financially strapped conglomerate. The American bankers, squeezed by the Depression themselves, proved unresponsive.

In March 1932, Kreuger boarded the Ile de France for the trip home, aware that he was being shadowed by a private detective employed by J.P. Morgan. The American financier, who was personally owed $11 million from a fake transaction involving Kreuger, advised Detective John C. Brown that Kreuger just might slip over the rail of the promenade deck one night. "He's not the sort to do it with a razor or gun," Morgan said. "'Kreuger Vanishes at Sea' is more to his taste than 'Kreuger Shoots Himself.'" By the time the ship reached Southampton, the Match King was in a desperate quandary. He could turn himself over to the Swedish authorities, or he could gamble one more time.

From the Ile de France, Kreuger wired his second-in-command, Krister Littorin, to call a meeting of all of Kreuger's board members at the Hotel Meurice in Paris on March 11, 1932. The collection of businessmen and bankers, who sat at this board meeting listened as Kreuger asked for additional credit.

Sigurd Hennig asked him to explain where he got the Italian bonds that he had originally used to begin his empire. Kreuger replied that they had come from fascist dictator Benito Mussolini. "He gave them to me as payment for a secret loan," Kreuger explained. But Krister Littorin knew better. The loan never went through, according to an earlier conversation he had had with Mussolini. "He also says that if you have any bills they must be forged. Is that true?"

Kreuger emphatically denied the charge, and then adjourned the meeting. He slipped out of the hotel and proceeded to a gun maker's shop on the Avenue Victor Emmanuel III, where the store owner sold him a small handgun and several rounds of ammunition. The following day, March 12, 1932, the Match King shot himself in the chest and died. He left behind a short note of apology to Littorin. Another report held that Kreuger sat in his posh Paris apartment for some time while contemplating his end. He ate a light dinner before stepping out to the terrace that overlooked the shimmering nightscape of the City of Light and then fired the bullet that would end his spectacular life.

When news of Kreuger's suicide reached the Swedish Riksdag, the ministers hastily convened a meeting to discuss how to stabilize the kroner before the European stock exchanges opened the next day. Soon there were reports of other suicides. In Estonia, a top-ranking official of the State Match company shot himself behind closed doors. But the real panic came two days later on March 14, when the par value of the Kreuger stock fell through the floor. An audit conducted by the accounting firm of Price, Waterhouse & Co. determined that the evidence of wrongdoing dated all the way back to 1917. In his heyday Kreuger had bilked the public out of $560 million and various banks in excess of $164 million.

Price, Waterhouse concluded that the success of the scam had everything to do with the perception of the man himself. "The perpetration of frauds on so large a scale and over so long a period would have been impossible but for (1) the Kreuger was unable to refinance his crumbling empire and knew officials were investigating Italian bonds he had forged; he is shown in 1932, sailing on the Ile de France for Europe and financial destruction.

The body of Ivar Kreuger is removed from his apartment in Paris, en route to Sweden, following his suicide; he had filched more than $750 million from investors.

confidence which Kreuger succeeded in inspiring, (2) the acceptance of his claim that complete secrecy in relation to vitally important transactions was essential to the success of the projects, (3) the autocratic powers which were conferred upon him, and (4) the loyalty or unquestioning obedience of officials, who were evidently selected with great care."

Ironically, the Kreuger debacle affected the economy of Sweden the least. Since most of the Match King's business was conducted abroad, the Swedish people suffered few hardships, though a number of middle-class investors were wiped out. Swedish Match declared a moratorium on its debts, and set up a large reserve fund to offset the writing down of assets. In time the company re-organized and again became the dominant match making concern Kreuger envisioned in 1917.

Kreuger's end was oddly mourned by one of his chief victims, a powerful European financier, who, when hearing the news of the Match King's death, broke down and openly wept. "Kreuger has ruined me and my banks," he sobbed. "But I can not hate him. I still think he was a charming and lovable personality. As a delightful companion, I shall miss him until the end of my days." This gentleman was among a very small minority.

THE STAVISKY AFFAIR/1930s

A colossal swindle perpetrated by Serge Alexandre Stavisky (c.1886-1934; AKA: Sacha) brought scandal and ruin down on the heads of some of France's most esteemed government leaders in the years preceding the outbreak of World War II. "L'Affaire Stavisky" filled reams of official court transcripts as prosecutors attempted to sift through conflicting evidence to learn how it was possible for a Russian-born swindler operating out of a government-supervised pawn shop to cause so much chaos in the marketplace. As the court pondered, hordes of angry citizens standing outside the Chamber of Deputies chanted, "Assassins! Thieves! Staviskys!" A new word had entered the French lexicon of popular slang. Who was this character who seemed to anticipate the techniques of the notorious American swindler Charles Ponzi?

Serge Stavisky was born in Kiev to Russian-Jewish parents. Nicknamed "Sacha," his first encounter with the law occurred in 1908 with his arrest for fraud. After a short stretch in prison, he resumed his career on the streets. In 1912, Stavisky was arrested a second time, and the disgrace brought on his family contributed to his father's suicide. Shortly before World War I, Stavisky left his home to settle in Paris where he acquired residential status. Stavisky carved out a living trafficking in drugs and women, small-time crime when weighed against the skill and dexterity he later showed in passing stolen bonds and securities.

Stavisky spent the war years and the early 1920s running a casting bureau and a medical clinic, where he promised women an accurate diagnosis of pregnancy. He called his bogus examining device a "matrascope." The clinic brought Stavisky into close personal contact with the wives of leading political figures of the Republic, invaluable contacts he would later exploit. He became a wealthy man overnight. For a time

The French flimflammer Serge Alexandre Stavisky, who scammed millions in bogus pawnshop securities and toppled government officials.

January 8, 1934: The body of Serge Stavisky in the mountaintop retreat at Chamonix; his death was ruled a suicide, but later investigations proved that the swindler had been murdered.

he spied for the Surete Generale, informing on the riff-raff of the French underworld. During the 1920s, Stavisky was often seen in the company of some of France's most glamourous women. He later married Arlette Simon, a dress model for the house of Chanel, after promising her he would "go straight."

In 1926, Stavisky went back on his word; the arch-swindler was imprisoned for bilking two clients out of seven million francs in a crooked stock deal. He was housed in the Sante Prison in Paris for eighteen months, awaiting a trial that never occurred. In 1927, Stavisky was given his freedom by shame-faced French authorities, who were unable to sort out the tangled network he had so carefully built. One reason for Stavisky's early release was his business dealings with men in public life who did not wish to be embarrassed by revelations of wrongdoing. The chief prosecutor of Paris, Georges Pressard, a brother-in-law of Premier Camille Chautemps, obstructed and postponed Stavisky's trial nineteen times. Joseph Garat, the mayor of Bayonne and a deputy of France, helped the con man set up the municipal pawnshop in his town, which became a "clearing house" for a gigantic swindle that bilked the country out of millions of francs.

Stavisky paid out in excess of $3 million in bribes to French business leaders and politicians over a six-year period. Their names were entered into a ledger listing the monies paid as "stock dividends." Stavisky then had himself named as the agent for the municipal bonds floated by several French cities, his collateral was a cache of stolen jewels. The bonds would then be discounted at a well-known bank and the money in turn would be invested in one of the swindler's companies.

Premier Chautemps, leader of the left-wing coalition, approved of the government's investment in pawnshop securities. (The pawnbrokers had been carefully regulated by the state dating to the time of King Louis XVI. A Cerdite Municipal, or local council as it was known, could not be organized without permission of the premier.) Using the fake jewelry as backing for the Bayonne pawnshop, Stavisky and Mayor Garat issued fraudulent bonds in the sum of 239 million francs.

The swindle went undetected until Christmas Eve, 1933,

Judge Albert Prince, suspected of receiving bribes from Stavisky, was murdered at the Dijon railroad station just before he was to testify before a committee probing the Stavisky Affair and only a few weeks after Stavisky himself had been killed.

when police not on Stavisky's payroll arrested a party to the scheme, who told all. Warrants were issued for the arrest of the members of the ring, including two chamber deputies and editors Albert DuBarry of the right-wing La Volant newspaper and Camille Aymard of Liberte, a leftist journal. DuBarry acted as intermediary between Stavisky and the corrupt politicians, passing on 1,000 franc notes as bribe money. (Stavisky cleverly cultivated the support of both of France's political factions to ensure the success of his scheme.)

The newspaper L'Action Francaise exposed Albert Dalimier, France's Minister of Colonies, as the party responsible for persuading the insurance companies to invest in the worthless municipal bonds issued out of Bayonne. Dalimier was forced to resign from the cabinet. The full-blown scandal came to a head on January 8, 1934, when police found Stavisky lying dead in a mountain cottage at Chamonix. They listed his death as a suicide, but a pistol was found in his left hand when there were entry wounds above the right temple.

The mystery deepened when Appellate Judge Albert Prince was murdered a day before his scheduled appearance before the Parliamentary Committee investigating the scandal. Prince was lured to the Dijon railroad station one night in February 1934, and tied to the railroad track by his assailant. Railway police found his mangled body several hours later. When questioned about the matter, two eyewitnesses swore that they had seen Stavisky's former secretary, Gilbert Romanigo, lurking about Prince's apartment several days before his murder.

The public outcry was immediate and far-reaching. Suspecting a sinister government cover-up, Royalist sympathizers took to the streets against the embattled leftists. The country teetered nervously toward civil war as the most serious rioting since the 1871 Commune was reported in the neighborhoods of Paris. Unable to hold the government together, Premier Chautemps turned over the reins first to Edouard Deladier. After a brief premiership, Deladier gave control to Gaston Doumergue, who was brought out of retirement from his home in Southern France. To pacify the mobs the new premier forged a bipartisan cabinet and promised sweeping reforms. The remains of Stavisky were exhumed from his mountain grave and an official inquiry was launched. It was conceded that the shooting had been "somewhat forced," an ambiguous explanation that failed to placate hard-liners, who believed his execution was carried out by the French Secret Police.

Twenty people, including Arlette Stavisky, were tried at the Palace of Justice in November 1935 for the swindle that looted French coffers of $18 million. "To be able to go away and forget all this by migrating with my children to America!" Arlette cried. "To bring up my children to love me and respect the memory of their father! That is all I ask!" The eleven-week trial ended with the conviction of just nine of the original defendants.

Arlette Stavisky leaves the Palace of Justice in Paris on January 23, 1936, acquitted in the Stavisky Affair. She accepted an eight-week booking at a New York nightclub, where her singing career began and ended.

Seven-year prison sentences were doled out to Gustave Tissier, Stavisky's right-hand man and manager of the Municipal Pawnshop in Bayonne, and to Henri Hayotte, erudite manager of the Empire Theatre of Paris, where, in former days, the arrogant Stavisky was known to entertain lavishly. Editor DuBarry and the grieving widow were acquitted, but three other defendants received lesser sentences, including General Joseph Bardi de Fourtou (two years), whose name appeared on the phony stock prospectus, and Deputy Gaston Bonnaure, who was sent to prison for one year. The Stavisky murder was never solved.

HORATIO ALGER GOES WRONG/1929-1934

The high rollers of high finance of the 1920s, from Harry Sinclair to Ivar Kreuger, were wheeler-dealers who dared any adventure for gain and flirted with arrest and imprisonment for the power that money could bring them. Many a tycoon saw the inside of a prison cell while others, insulated with their fortunes against such indignities, blithely ignored the law and skipped from country to country, like the elusive Robert Vesco two generations later, to avoid prosecution.

The first financial powerhouse to employ this evasive action, albeit a forlorn procedure in his case, was Samuel Insull (1859-1938), whose Horatio Alger image exploded in scandal when his utilities empire collapsed during the Depression, leaving tens of thousands of investors with useless stocks. Insull, born in London, boasted no aristocratic background. In fact, he came from a dirt-poor family whose economic position was so dire that Insull was compelled to quit school and go to work at age fourteen as an office boy, taking home $1.25 a week.

Insull later became a clerk for Thomas A. Edison's representative in London and so impressed the boss with his diligence that he was recommended as an assistant to Edison himself. The great inventor hired Insull, sight unseen, and Insull, at age twenty-one in 1881, immigrated to the United States where he became the inventor's personal secretary, setting up Edison's various companies.

Sent to Chicago to manage the vast utility firm there, Insull proved himself such a company wizard that he became president of the Chicago Edison firm in 1902. Five years later the empire builder had amalgamated all the power and light firms in the area into the enormous Commonwealth Edison Company.

The position Insull held already assured him of a vast fortune, yet he was obsessed with gathering every utility in the Midwest under his spreading umbrella, and by the end of the 1920s, the light and power czar was president of eleven companies, the director of eighty-five other firms, and was the board chairman of sixty-five additional companies. More than 75,000 employees worked for Insull, and his empire encompassed the Midwest, reaching down the Mississippi Valley and eastward into New England.

Utilities magnate Samuel Insull, being interviewed while a fugitive on board the steamer, Exilona, in 1934.

When the stock market crashed in 1929, Insull, like many other self-centered tycoons, made the mistake of thinking he was bigger than any panic and hurled his $100 million personal fortune into the abyss in a desperate gamble, to keep up the level of his own stocks. After going through his own money, Insull borrowed heavily from friends and family and managed to salvage most of his firms. Just when he thought he had saved the day, however, he was challenged in a head-to-head power play by Cyrus Eaton, a multimillionaire from Cleveland.

With reckless abandon for his own shaky fortune, Eaton attempted to purchase the controlling stock interest in all of the Insull companies, most of which had huge blocks of stock available at depressed values. When Insull discovered what Eaton was doing, he dove into the open market in an incredible battle to buy up enough of his own stock to keep control, an effort that used up another $60 million, depleting Insull's coffers and gutting many of his firms.

Depleted of capital, the magnate could not withstand another financial crisis. As the Insull firms began to collapse in the summer of 1932 under the onslaught of the grinding Depression, investors in those firms were wiped out. Losses to stockholders soared to more than $750 million and Samuel Insull, one-time titan of American utilities, was nearly penniless. Disgraced and humiliated, the ex-tycoon sailed for Paris, where he intended to retire. But the loss of his fortune was not his only problem. Within months, tens of thousands of irate investors sued Insull. His creditors also brought suit in the millions. More serious were charges against him for embezzlement and mail fraud. It was claimed that he had looted the funds of his companies illegally in his wild stock battle with Eaton.

Extradition of the broken czar was laboriously arranged between France and the U.S., but before Insull could be returned to the U.S., the 72-year-old man, ill and harassed, hurriedly collected the money from his $21,000-a-year pensions (from three of his surviving companies) and fled to Greece, where he was given a year's sanctuary. Upon arriving in Athens, Insull went into seclusion, while every U.S. correspondent throughout the Continent hunted him for interviews. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., then a correspondent for Liberty magazine, received a tip which gave him Insull's address in Athens, and he flew to that city, amazed to discover that Insull was staying at a maternity home. Vanderbilt found Insull, formally dressed in a morning coat, sitting in a courtyard, and reading an article that described his flight in an English newspaper published in Rome.

Samuel Insull is shown entering Chicago's Cook County Jail, charged with fraud; he attempted to shore up his failing company's stock by gutting other firms he controlled.

Vanderbilt introduced himself as a Liberty correspondent and asked that the old man tell him the story of his life. Insull, taking off his pince-nez, betrayed his desperation for cash by immediately inquiring: "Do you people intend to pay me, or am I to give you my story free?" He went on to ask for $100,000, and when Vanderbilt stated that his magazine would be disinclined to remit such a staggering amount (for those days), the old man shook his white-haired head and stroked his white mustache. He then began dickering with Vanderbilt, who said that Liberty might pay as much as $20,000 for the full story. Insull replied he would think about it; that he would get back to Vanderbilt. He never did.

U.S. demands for Insull's extradition forced the Greek government to close in on the ex-tycoon in 1934. Using almost his last dime, Insull chartered a leaking steamer and sailed aimlessly about the Mediterranean for almost two weeks. Running out of provisions, the tramp ship made port in Istanbul, where Turkish authorities immediately seized the old man and sent him back to face trial with his brother, Martin Insull, who was already under arrest.

Insull's arrival in New York on the Exilona was a sensation. The press flocked to the dock in the hundreds. Still photographers and newsreel cameramen mobbed the old man as he resolutely marched down the gangplank where his son, Samuel Insull, Jr., managed to wedge through the crowd and slip a piece of paper into his father's hand. Reporters punched and shoved one another to get close to the old man, shouting and screaming questions at him. Many of them ordered Insull to answer their queries, treating him as if he were already a convicted felon, the embezzler several Chicago indictments claimed him to be. Incensed, Samuel Insull suddenly regained his old firebrand personality for the moment. He whipped off his hat to show his snow-white hair and jutted his jaw, shouting back at reporters: "Keep quiet! There is plenty of time for taking pictures, but this is my mug and I have a proprietary interest in it."

The old man then looked briefly down at the piece of paper his son had handed him, a statement he had never seen until that moment. Trusting his son's judgment, Insull announced: "I have a statement for the gentlemen of the press...I have erred, but my greatest error was in underestimating the effect of the financial panic on American securities and particularly on the companies I was working so hard to build. I worked with all my energies to save those companies. I made mistakes, but they were honest mistakes. They were errors in judgment, but not dishonest manipulations." The old man then reminded the press that "...you only know the charges of the prosecution. Not one word has been argued in even feeble defense of me, and it must be obvious that there is also my side of the story. When it is told in court, my judgment may be discredited, but certainly my honesty will be vindicated."

Insull had read this written speech without error and without pause, but upon finishing, he turned to his son and asked in a low voice: "Where in the hell did that statement come from?" His son told him that a brilliant publicist the firm had hired, Steve Hannagan, had written it. Hannagan, Insull was informed, would continue to direct the old man's public posture. Minutes later, federal agents seized Insull and he was led to a waiting car and taken to New Jersey (to prevent New York authorities from claiming the old man for charges pending there, it was later alleged). In New Jersey, Insull was put aboard a westbound train to Chicago.

Publicist Hannagan became Insull's adviser once the old man arrived in Chicago, insisting that he not pay the $200,000 bail demanded, which his family and friends could have easily raised, but instead spend time in the Cook County Jail. Insull meekly agreed to follow the publicity plan to earn sympathy from the public. He was photographed while being booked as a common felon. Photographers delighted in taking his picture as he stood, small and ancient, in his cell, no longer the decisive tycoon. After a few days of subjecting Insull to these indignities, Hannagan decided that the old man had gleaned enough pity. The bail, then reduced, was paid, and the old man moved into a $4-a-day room at the less-than-posh Seneca Hotel, although he could just as easily have moved into his son's Gold Coast apartment. Again, this was Hannagan's plan to glean more sympathy for Insull.

The Chicago press flooded readers with Insull's plight, describing how he had sold off his $9 million Hawthorn estate for a mere $780,000 while trying to shore up sagging stocks; he was portrayed as a heroic U.S. businessman risking his own fortune to save the stock of his "little man" investors. Chicagoans were also reminded that it was Insull who had built the Civic Opera House building.

Insull awaiting trial for fraud, October 1934; he was acquitted, but his reputation was ruined.

All of this, of course, stemmed from the fertile brain of publicity wizard Hannagan, who made sure that Insull was followed about Chicago while awaiting trial, shown entering movie theaters like any common man and pictured giving up his seat to a woman on a streetcar. He was even photographed smelling flowers he bought from a street vendor, ostensibly spending his last dollar.

The public attitude toward Insull began to radically change. The "man in the street," even those who had lost their life savings in his stock purchases, began to express sympathy for the "hounded" old man. But there were others, hundreds, who sent anonymous letters to authorities and to the Insull family, threatening to shoot, stab, or bomb the Insulls out of existence. With that, the old man was guarded twenty-four hours a day by dozens of hired men. He moved to better quarters and traveled to and from court in a bullet-proof limousine.

On October 2, 1934, Insull went on trial before federal judge James H. Wilkerson for using the mail to defraud in the sale of stock of the Corporation Securities Company of Chicago. His lawyer, Floyd Thompson, a one-time judge, shrewdly placed his client on the stand immediately and asked him to tell his rags-to-riches story and of his close relationship with Thomas Edison, who was an American institution. The saga so enthralled Judge Wilkerson that by the time prosecutor Dwight H. Green objected, the judge overruled him. Day after day, Insull continued his charismatic tale, winning the judge and jury. On November 24, 1934, he was acquitted. But who got the money? Answered Thompson: "Old Man Depression." The spendthrift era of the 1920s was blamed for the loss of countless millions, not Samuel Insull.

Immediate accusations were made that the jury had been bribed. The press at large felt that the old man had glibly talked himself out of a conviction. Columnist Franklin P. Adams wrote: "The public is a masochist at heart, and not only likes to be cheated, but has admiration for those who deceive and defraud it." The Nation was even more adamant in its belief that Insull was guilty as charged, stating that the acquittal "illustrates once more the difficulty of sending a rich man to jail, no matter how flagrant his crime." Two more trials awaited Insull. He faced charges of embezzlement, along with his brother, Martin, on March 12, 1935, and on June 11, 1935, with his son, to face charges of illegally transferring funds before declaring bankruptcy in one of their companies.

The scattered debris of the Insull paper empire was so vast, so complicated, that the government could find no concrete evidence that Insull or his brother and son had indeed embezzled or hidden funds. Hundreds of his minions had handled the actual transference of money into stock purchases in a web of accounting so intricate that the best government experts were nonplused to figure out the system. The same held true for the mail fraud charges, and finally the old man, by then a wreck, was set free. He sailed back to Paris to live out his days and, on July 16, 1938, at seventy-nine, died in a Paris subway of a heart attack. He left an estate of less than $1,000 to his wife Gladys, an 1890s actress, and more than $14 million in personal debts. At the moment of Samuel Insull's death, he was wearing monogrammed underwear and had 854 in his pockets.

"I DON'T LIKE YOUR FACE"/1937

Richard Whitney (1889-1974) was no grassroots hustler. He was deeply rooted in the American past, and he looked like it, a tall, ruddy-faced (thanks to his fondness for bonded whiskey), lantern-jawed man who dressed and spoke impeccably, a man of wealth and tradition who was thought to be the very image of America's super rich and super intelligent businessman. In reality, he was, after two decades of the most horrendous frauds and swindles, discovered to be as crooked as the cheapest mugger absconding with a bag lady's purse. Yet even when he went behind bars he insisted upon the courtesies extended to any high-born gentleman.

Whitney's ancestors were easily traced back to Plymouth Rock, coming from England on the Arabelle in 1630, ten years after the arrival of the Mayflower. Born in 1889, the son of a Boston banker, Whitney attended Groton, an exclusive boy's preparatory school, where he established himself as a resolute leader, becoming captain of the football and baseball teams. At Harvard, where he became an important man on campus, he was an oarsman helping to triumph over other ivy-league boat racers in 1909. He exemplified the well-dressed, well-groomed, well-educated Bostonian, who could be counted on to become a captain of finance. His brother George, who attended the same schools, however, was nothing like his outgoing, limelight-loving brother. George Whitney was a serious and stellar student, who spent his time in the library and not on the gridiron or pursuing popular college activities. George Whitney would die a multi-millionaire partner in the omnipotent firm of J.P. Morgan, while his dashing and suave brother would end up struggling to pay his laundry bills.

At twenty-seven, Richard Whitney decided to marry well, wedding Mrs. Gertrude Sheldon Sands in 1916. She was a widow of one of the Vanderbilts. Also in that year, Richard placed himself on the New York Stock Exchange, buying a seat with money loaned to him by a relative. Through his father-in-law, George Sheldon, who was head of the Union League Club and treasurer of the Republican National Committee, Whitney came to meet what few members of New York's 400 he had not already met through his own family connections. These members of the social elite would not only become well-paying customers paying staggering commissions, but, later on, individuals from whom Richard Whitney would borrow hundreds of thousands of dollars.

As a broker, Whitney soon earned a reputation as a hard-driving, keen-minded businessman of short words and an occasional acid tongue which could whiplash any subordinate into frenzied duties. He was equally short with his peers, who respected but never as a whole liked the man. He was a good organizer, so good that he was soon a member of the governing committee at the exchange, becoming its chairman. He sat in judgment of members accused of misconduct, an ironic role considering Whitney's later transgressions. Whitney's rise was meteoric at the exchange. He was 39-years-old in 1928, when he was elected vice-president and forty-one in 1930, when he became the exchange's president, the youngest man to hold that post in the history of the securities exchange.

In addition to the prestige these Olympian positions brought Whitney, he became the Morgan broker. Orders placed by J.P. Morgan and Company earned Whitney more than $50,000 in commissions alone from this account each year. (The Morgan orders actually came through Whitney's brother George, who was a high-ranking company official and later a Morgan partner.) Yet these handsome profits proved to be inadequate for Whitney, whose tastes ran to the sublimely expensive.

Whitney and his wife maintained a 495-acre estate at Far Hills, New Jersey, and a Manhattan townhouse. He owned a fleet of eight expensive cars and a yacht. An army of servants slaved to meet his needs—butlers, maids, cooks, and at the country estate gardeners, herdsmen for his dogs and foxes (he rode with the hounds regularly), and jockeys for his private stable of horses, which cost him thousands each month. His wardrobe was vast with over fifty newly tailored suits hanging in his closets. His wine cellar was always stocked with magnums of champagne and vintage imported wines. He also maintained elegant, fifteen-room offices on Broad Street.

All of these enormous costs caused Richard Whitney to look about frantically for capital. He began borrowing from his brother George during the mid-1920s, as much as $575,000 to purchase fertilizer and mineral stocks, which proved worthless. The man who was thought to be the most astute securities analyst in the country knew nothing about stocks and repeatedly plunged into foolhardy, even bizarre investments that spiraled his debts into the millions. Whitney used as collateral more than $100,000 in stocks, which belonged to the account of his dead father-in-law to cover one loan from the Corn Exchange Bank, where he was director and later president, the first of his criminal acts of embezzlement and fraud.

He continued plunging in useless stocks for which he became the chief purchaser and using securities and stocks of others he was holding as collateral for loans that soared into the millions, loans so large that he could not even afford to pay the interest on them, a maddening, round-robin routine that would have caused any normal man to crack, but Richard Whitney was a nerveless type and raced forward in his wild schemes, confident that he would eventually make a killing that would pay off all his debts. A great deal of his courage undoubtedly stemmed from his knowledge that his brother George was always available for a vital bailout.

For a brief moment in the Great Crash of 1929, this misfit of finance became a hero in the eyes of the world. On October 24, 1929, Black Thursday, when stocks were crashing downward across the board, Whitney, who was then vice-president of the exchange and the ranking officer present (with exchange president Edward H. H. Simon in Europe) went to the rescue of the market. Actually, he had been selected to represent J. P. Morgan and Company and the pool of great investors Morgan had gathered to shore up the sinking stock market.

As panic gripped the floor of the exchange and brokers burst blood vessels in desperation to sell off stock, Whitney, calm and stoic, appeared at 1:30 p.m. The hundreds of fear-frenzied men on the floor became, in the instant of his appearance, a stone-silent crowd, staring at him as he moved resolutely to Post Two. He said in a loud clear voice which he obviously intended the entire floor to hear, (directing his question to Oliver Bridgeman): "What was the last bid you received for Steel?"

"One-ninety-five," replied Bridgeman.

In an even louder voice, like that of a rescuing god, Richard Whitney boomed: "Ten thousand at two hundred and five!" This was ten points above the last bid and the price of the last sale. In that second, Whitney had tossed more than $2 million of the Morgan pool into the market to stem the downward tide. The act was electric and caused the brokers to shout out roaring cheers. Whitney, the hero of the hour, his finest moment in life, in fact, then marched like an avenging angel against fear and panic, to several more posts placing upward of $30 million in purchase orders of fifteen or twenty important stocks in blocks of 10,000 shares.

As the Morgan people estimated, the clear movement by their moneyed clan to back up the market caused a brisk rally that sent the stock market upward again, dizzily so. But the downward trend had been gnawing away at the underpinnings of the synthetic market for many months, and the move by Whitney, representing Morgan and his people, really came too late. The selling panic resumed the next day and the following week, on Black Tuesday, October 29, 1929, the market all but collapsed. The pandemonium was ear-shattering as supposedly solid stocks fell $40, $50, even $60 a share, more than sixteen million shares being sold. It was, as the New York World termed it, "a financial nightmare, comparable to nothing ever before experienced in Wall Street."

Bedlam ruled the exchange floor that day. Said one stock exchange guard who witnessed the financial collapse: "They [the brokers] roared like a lot of lions and tigers. They hollered and screamed, they clawed at one another's collars. It was like a bunch of crazy men. Every once in a while, when Radio or Steel or Auburn would take another tumble, you'd see some poor devil collapse and fall to the floor."

Opposite page: Nervous investors gather on Wall Street after seeing stocks plummet in 1929.

Whitney did not appear on the floor that fatal day. He had made his bold play the week before and Morgan's people, seeing that their millions had not stemmed the tide, refused to pour more millions down the drain. Whitney and other high-ranking exchange members sat in a smoking room beneath the floor puffing on cigarettes, helpless. Whitney later remembered how the "panic was raging overhead on the floor. Every few minutes the latest prices were announced, with quotations moving swiftly and irresistibly downward. The feeling of those present was revealed by their habit of continually lighting cigarettes, taking a puff or two, putting them out and lighting a new one, a practice that soon made the narrow room blue with smoke and extremely stuffy."

Richard Whitney in 1929; he attempted to rescue the failing stock market on behalf of Morgan's "pool."

When many of his ruined peers later blew out their brains or stuffed their heads into gas stoves or leaped from high office windows, Whitney merely shrugged. He would survive and did, but his methods had nothing to do with the business practices his exchange committee insisted be followed. In Summer 1930, Whitney was given charge of the New York Yacht Club's securities, worth more than $100,000; he was then president of the club. Whitney, instead of locking these in his vault, used them to negotiate personal loans at thirteen separate banks. Moreover, he walked into the Corn Exchange Bank, where he was a director, and demanded and got, without any securities, another $300,000 loan. When another nervous director asked timidly what the dynamic stock exchange president (he would serve four terms in that lofty office) was putting up as collateral, Whitney replied archly with his favorite line: "I am taking the loan on my face."

By 1934, Whitney's incredible loans, which totaled in the millions, cost him $250,000 a year in interest, and to cover this, he took out more loans using as collateral more securities belonging to others and entrusted to his care. He shamelessly borrowed $2 million from his brother George, but this gave him only momentary relief from his debts. (George Whitney was never repaid for the many enormous loans made to his brother, and these amounts later became nothing more than very costly gifts.)

When Prohibition was repealed, Whitney thought that the shrewdest investment he could make would be to buy the controlling stock in Distilled Liquors Corporation, which was about to turn out millions of gallons of alcoholic applejack. First he bought 15,000 shares at $15 each and was pleased to see the stock shoot to $45. He did not, however, sell out and take his handsome profits, which would have helped to set his ledgers right. He stayed with the stock, which began to plunge when consumers opted for beer and wine and hard liquor. Still, he continued to buy more and more of DLC stock, pouring hundreds of thousands of dollars into the losing proposition, good money after bad, again and again. He took out more loans, borrowed more money. He never had enough.

In 1937, another windfall presented itself to the drowning broker. The stock exchange entrusted to his care its Gratuity Fund of more than $2 million in cash and bonds, sums taxed from exchange members and intended for widows and orphans of deceased members. Whitney promptly used the bonds as collateral for new loans and used the cash to pay off interest on old loans.

At a meeting of trustees for the fund, it was voted that $175,000 in bonds be sold and that these bonds be turned back by Whitney. He was asked politely five times by George W. Lutes, clerk of the trustees group, to return the bonds for sale, but Whitney stalled him. Finally the trustees gave Whitney a deadline to return the bonds.

The casual broker was unruffled. He went to millionaire Bernard Smith, a powerful stockbroker he barely knew and boldly asked Smith to loan him $250,000.

"On what collateral?" asked Smith.

"On my face," replied Whitney with his favorite line.

"I don't like your face," snorted Smith and closed the discussion.

Whitney went back to brother George who, along with other Morgan partners, agreed to cover the losses to save the face of J.P. Morgan and Company. But the self-destructive, money-hungry Richard Whitney went on as before and within the next twelve months took out staggering loans that exceeded $27 million. There was really no hope of ever paying off the interest on this amount, let alone the principal. Finally, after being compelled to submit to the exchange a routine financial statement, it was obvious to executive board members that Whitney's firm existed only on paper and had been gutted by its director. He was asked to withdraw from the exchange, despite pleas he made to Averell Harriman, a partner in Brown Brothers, Harriman and Company, to bail him out.

Brother George could no longer help. Other Morgan partners felt that they could no longer spend millions to support Richard Whitney's wastrel ways. When the broker's firm was removed from the exchange, it became apparent that he had at least mismanaged funds, and this brought about an investigation into his incredible affairs by New York's energetic District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey.

Richard Whitney testifying; he was tried and convicted of embezzling his investors' funds and was sent to Sing Sing.

All of Whitney's many years of fraud were slowly revealed, and he was arrested and charged with embezzling his father-in-law's estate. His trial was brief and he was quickly convicted, sentenced to five years in Sing Sing. When Richard Whitney went to prison, his conduct was as formal as if he were entering one of his private clubs. He was more than $6 million in personal debt, not including the almost $3 million his brother had given him. His townhouse and country estates, his horses, cars, and even his wardrobe had been sold to pay creditors.

Yet the stolid, gray-faced man insisted upon personal dignity and was strangely accorded high respect by fellow convicts in Sing Sing. They tipped their hats to him, as did the guards. When he first arrived in prison, a turnkey stated: "All men who came in Saturday and Mr. Whitney please step out of their cells." He was addressed as "Mr. Whitney" by convicts and guards alike through his three-year stay at Sing Sing, being paroled in 1941.

The fact that Whitney had stolen millions and had only received a minimum five-year sentence rankled many citizens, and, in particular, a St. Louis judge. The judge was to sentence a youth who had stolen $2 from a gas station. One report stated: "Taking pencil and paper, he made elaborate computations and then announced his decision. 'Richard Whitney got five years for stealing $225,000,' he said. 'That would be $45,000 a year, $120 a day, $5 an hour. You stole $2. That would be twenty-four minutes and that is your sentence!'"

When Whitney emerged from prison, he returned to his heavily mortgaged estate and his wife Gertrude. His brother George saw to it that Richard could live out his life in the comfort to which he was accustomed, irrespective of the blatant corruption with which he had stained the Whitney name. On December 5, 1974, Richard Whitney died in comfort at the age of eighty-six. Whitney is not remembered with ill will by members of the New York Stock Exchange. He is not remembered at all. In the elegant Board of Governors room at the exchange hang huge oil paintings of past presidents of the exchange, all except one—Richard Whitney.

"THE ARMORED TRUCK IS ON THE WAY"/ 1951-1955

Patrick Henry Lennon (AKA: Packy; Harry Hoffman) headed a confidence ring in Manhattan as early as 1926. Lennon's cohorts included Leo F. Hampton, Harold P. Odom, and George V. Arlen. They specialized in large-scale stock frauds, and their schemes were so notorious that in 1930 the New York Evening Journal published Lennon's photo with the caption: "Don't let him sell you any stock." Lennon earned this notoriety for his fraudulent manipulation of InterCity Radio and Telegraph Corporation stock.

Lennon's primary victim in the InterCity swindle was Rochester, New York, industrialist Augustine Joseph Cunningham, who, over a three-year period, invested more than $100,000 before the stock proved worthless in 1929. Lennon and other members of his ring served prison terms for the InterCity fraud, but that did not obscure the fact that Cunningham had been a remarkably gullible target. He had inherited most of his fortune from his grandfather, James Cunningham, who had been successful in the manufacture of horse carriages. After the turn of the century, his firm, James Cunningham Son & Company, moved into automobile manufacturing; during World War II, it produced tanks and planes.

Apparently Lennon and his gang spent some of their long hours in prison thinking up new ways to tap the remainder of A.J. Cunningham's sizable reserves because in 1951 they approached him again. In February of that year, a member of Lennon's gang showed up at Cunningham's home in Rochester, claiming to be a friend of a Harry Hoffman, who had also supposedly suffered tremendous losses when InterCity failed in 1929.

The advance man told Cunningham that he had learned that InterCity's head, Dr. Randolph Parker, had died and had bequeathed his patents to InterCity's three largest investors, Cunningham, Hoffman, and J. Driscoll. Cunningham's visitor let him look at the purported will, then explained that the patents in which he now shared a 33 percent interest had become quite valuable. The motion picture industry was a primary user of the patented items, and several Hollywood tycoons, who had been infringing on them wanted to settle out of court to avoid bad publicity.

The advance man claimed that the expected settlement would be in the neighborhood of $60 million. Cunningham wanted more details, so the con man promised to get back to him shortly. Several days later, he returned with Lennon, masquerading as Hoffman. The twenty-one years that had passed since Cunningham's last contact with Lennon had apparently erased all memory of the man who had swindled him out of $100,000.

Cunningham not only failed to recognize Lennon, but he took an immediate liking to him and joined him in commiserating over their losses in the 1929 debacle. Cunningham's secretiveness cinched Lennon's hold on him. Feeling that this "windfall" concerned no one else, Cunningham had not contacted either his attorney or his banker to investigate the bogus Parker legacy. Even the most superficial probe would have revealed that neither Parker, Hoffman, Driscoll, or the will ever existed.

With Cunningham solidly in his grasp, Lennon laid out the rest of the con. He explained that there might be some snags before they could collect their millions. Other investors in the InterCity deal would be likely to file claims and would have to be paid off before the money could be disbursed. Cunningham agreed to pay his share of these claims as they arose.

Two months after their conversation, Lennon called to say that an InterCity investor had surfaced and was demanding a settlement of $3,200. When Cunningham sent off a check for his share in the amount, $1,600, he doubtless did not suspect that he would write eighty-three more checks before the con was discovered. As soon as Cunningham had been tapped the first time, a regular courier service between Rochester and Manhattan was established. Various Lennon cohorts, including George Arlen and Harold Odom, took turns picking up the "settlement" checks that Lennon directed Cunningham to write. Gradually the payments increased. Lennon explained that Hollywood lawyers were intentionally holding up settlement of the case and would have to be paid off to get them out of the way. When Cunningham had paid out $50,000, he began to resist any further outlay of cash, so Lennon contrived a meeting between Cunningham and Driscoll, the mysterious third legatee named in Parker's will.

Cunningham apparently was not suspicious about the fact that Lennon happened to be in town from Oklahoma. He agreed to go with Lennon to the Fifth Avenue Hotel to meet Driscoll, who was played by another con man by the name of Knowles. Before Cunningham could begin to complain about his outlay of cash, Driscoll bitterly decried the "holdup artists" in Hollywood to whom he claimed he had already paid several hundred thousand dollars. The meeting ended with all three of the participants writing out more checks to pay off the Hollywood hucksters. Of course, only Cunningham's check was genuine.

Over the next year, Lennon bilked Cunningham out of approximately $50,000 by promising that a partial payment of at least $2 million was right around the corner. When the $2 million did not appear, Lennon claimed it was because Driscoll had been killed in an automobile accident and his widow was demanding immediate payment. Cunningham responded as requested by writing out a check for $15,000.

Stock swindler Patrick "Packy" Lennon, who bilked the same millionaire twice.

Next Lennon sent con man Leo Hampton to see Cunningham. Hampton, claiming to have purchased an interest in Hoffman's share, got away with another $35,000 of Cunningham's money. Throughout 1953, Lennon took Cunningham for another $200,000. By the time the Cunningham well began to dry up, even the couriers who took Cunningham's money from Rochester to New York City had begun to bilk him on their own.

Early in 1954, Lennon informed Cunningham that he would be on the road typing up loose ends, and that the paperwork on the deal would now be handled by a William Ryan. Ryan was actually Harold Odom, another of Lennon's accomplished con artists. Odom continued to get more money out of Cunningham for the next few weeks. Finally, Lennon called to announce that the battle had finally been won, and that Cunningham's share, $28 million, was on its way to him in an armored truck. "The armored truck is on the way," promised Lennon. "Watch for it from your front window. It'll pull up into your driveway late this afternoon. We had to send extra guards, six of them, to carry all the money into your home." When the truck did not arrive as expected, Lennon called to say that it had been stopped by Canadian customs officials and the money impounded. Cunningham sent off yet another check for legal expenses to cover the fees of attorneys, who would bring about the release of the money shipment.

After another six months, Lennon asked Cunningham for another $30,000 to pay off a stubborn customs official. At first Cunningham would give Lennon only $600. When he agreed to get another $10,000, his bank refused the loan because they had already put up more than $325,000 for this highly secretive deal. Cunningham's bankers finally convinced him to have the affair investigated, and postal inspectors were soon on Lennon's trail. Between 1951 and 1955, Lennon and his crew had taken Cunningham for $423,771. They had also taken seven other wealthy men for another $300,000 during that same period.

Lennon, Odom, Arlen, and Hampton were arrested and brought to trial in 1956. All four were convicted. Lennon received five years, the longest sentence of the four. Before going behind bars, Packy Lennon told newsmen: "I couldn't help myself. Cunningham was the greatest sucker of a lifetime. He was a slot machine that paid off every time I pulled the lever."

FLYING DOWN TO RIO/1950s

Poor from his birth in Wilson, New York, on February 5, 1907, Lowell McAfee Birrell possessed a brilliant mind that saw him at the head of his class at Syracuse University and the University of Michigan Law School. He obtained his doctorate of law at the unheard of age of twenty-one, and went on to become the most successful lawyer at the esteemed firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft. During the 1930s, Birrell became one of New York's most celebrated lawyers and businessmen. After Prohibition's repeal, he put together a chain of small breweries into one firm, the Greater New York Breweries, and made a fortune. He appeared to have everything, lavish living quarters, a burgeoning bank account, and the high regard of his peers. Yet, lurking deep in Lowell Birrell was the desire to acquire more. His insatiable greed led him into white collar fraud on a giant scale.

Cecil B. Stewart, millionaire broker and insurance underwriter, thought he was about to die in 1944. Birrell, who had met Stewart at a social gathering, told him to consult one of his own doctors, who could "shrivel up" Stewart's cancer. Following some consultations, Stewart became convinced that Birrell's physician had eliminated the cancer and gratefully named Birrell as head of his many far-flung companies. A few months later, Stewart promptly died of cancer and Birrell went on a swindling rampage.

Using the sound Stewart companies as collateral, Birrell engineered huge loans to buy other firms and then gutted the coffers of those firms, later merging them with healthy companies to hide their hollow shells. Birrell created a fantastic corporate maze that utterly confounded investigators of the Securities and Exchange Commission. The corporate con man established interlocking directorates, foreign agents as company registrants, and these led to even more foreign agents who, in Birrell's name, set up anonymous bank accounts in foreign countries, all of them controlled by Birrell.

A typical Birrell operation was the acquisition of Swan-Finch Oil, a much-respected firm. After Birrell got control of this company he increased its shares from 43,000 to three million, moving its assets to other firms he directed that were about to collapse, thus shoring up his shaky empire. Birrell would boost his stock in the weaker companies by having agents buy up shares of these failing firms near the close of the day, creating a small upward trend the following day. When the stock of one of these empty firms rose to the breaking point, Birrell would quickly sell his stock, reap great profits, and leave his investors taking the loss. With his profits, Birrell lived like a rajah.

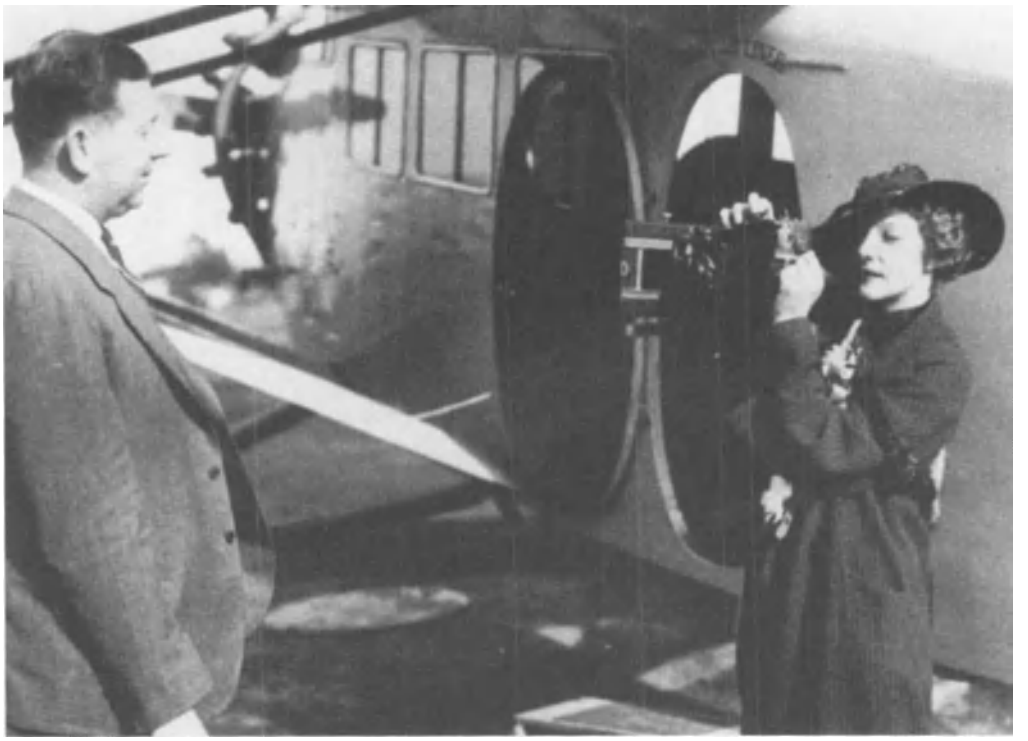
Birrell never seemed to sleep, giving round-the-clock parties on a lavish scale in his Manhattan apartment or at his palatial Bucks County, Pennsylvania, estate. The cream of New York society attended these extravagant fetes, including such fellow stock swindlers as Serge Rubinstein, who would be mysteriously murdered in his own posh Manhattan apartment in 1955. Birrell was also a notorious womanizer, patronizing attractive call girls, including the notorious Pat Ward, at $500 a night, this expensive flesh supplied by socialite whoremaster Mickey Jelke.

Birrell's illicit success attracted other slick sharpers to his side, including Virgil Dardi and Alexander Guterma who became directors of one of Birrell's once-healthy firms, United Dye and Chemical Corporation. They looted this firm on behalf of Birrell, and Dardi later went to jail for his illegal efforts. Birrell, however, always seemed to escape indictment since he made sure there was no direct trail of documents that would lead to him and provide evidence to convict him. He swaggered about New York nightclubs actually bragging that he was one of the most astute swindlers of his era. One evening a wealthy attorney meeting Birrell in a night spot informed him that he had just invested large sums in one of his firms. Birrell, tipsy on champagne, a blonde under each arm, laughed uproariously and boomed: "You put money into one of my companies? That was a mistake, sir! Nobody makes any money in any of my companies except me!"

Lowell McAfee Birrell fled to Rio de Janeiro to escape imprisonment for fraud, saying: "no one makes any money in my companies."

New York District Attorney Frank Hogan worked long years assembling enough evidence to convict the bold swindler, and Birrell finally received a subpoena to answer questions about one of his bogus firms in October 1957. He hurriedly packed $3 million in cash (out of the $14 million Hogan later estimated he looted from his firms) and fled to Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, a country then having no extradition agreement with the U.S. Birrell's records were seized, such as they were, and government accountants spent years trying to figure them out. Meanwhile, the high-living Birrell basked in the warm sun of Rio from a mountaintop retreat, vowing never to return to the U.S. But, inexplicably, he returned in 1963 to face charges of swindling upward of $25 million from gullible investors.

Birrell was confident, however, that he would be exonerated, and his subsequent trial soon revealed why he had returned without fear of punishment for his flagrant acts. Judge Inzer B. Wyatt ruled that all the Birrell records that had been taken by government agents had been illegally seized and were therefore inadmissible. The original search warrant issued for these records was so ambiguous as to be meaningless in a court of law, according to Judge Wyatt, a conclusion Birrell's lawyers had already reached when they urged their client to return to the U.S. without fear of conviction.



Businessman turned hustler Virgil Dardi was ensnared in Birrell's schemes and went to jail; he is shown having his picture taken by movie star Elissa Landi in 1935.

Birrell associate Alexander Guterma, who went to prison for fraud.

Youthful swindler Earl Belle fled to Rio after scamming millions from investors.

Birrell smiled broadly through pudgy cheeks as he walked from court, exclaiming to reporters: "The Constitution still prevails!" But government agents did not give up on the swindler and continued their investigations, dragging Birrell through a seven-year nightmare of interrogations, depositions, and court appearances, until they had proved he had illegally used some stock certificates in obtaining a paltry $5,000 loan from the First National Bank of Cincinnati.

Convicted of stock fraud, Birrell was given a two-year sentence. His many appeals failed, including that with the U.S. Supreme Court, and Birrell went behind bars on January 11, 1972. It took fifteen years of dedicated work on the part of government officials, not to mention millions of dollars in costs, to finally take Lowell McAfee Birrell out of the American business community where he had wreaked financial havoc and wrecked the fortunes of countless investors.

Long before Birrell was brought to justice, one of his most influential associates, Alexander L. Guterma (1915-1977) was firmly embraced by the long arm of the law. Guterma was born on April 29, 1915, in Irkutsk, Russia. He illegally entered the United States via China in 1935. In 1951 he was president of the American Kenaf Corporation and gained public attention for selling $2 million of Kenaf fibers, a jute substitute, to the Commodity Credit Corporation.

In 1959, two years after Birrell had fled to Brazil, Guterma was found guilty of stock fraud and served five years in prison. In 1977, Guterma and five members of his family were killed when their private plane crashed in the Bronx. At one time, his multi-million-dollar empire included holdings in the United Hotels Corporation, F.L. Jacobs Company, the Western Financial Corporation, McGrath Securities, and the United Dye and Chemical Company.

Though Earl Belle (b.1932) never had any connections with Lowell Birrell, he was considered, like Birrell, a corporate genius and, also like Birrell, he collateralized huge bank loans with firms he later gutted. Also, like Birrell, he fled to Rio de Janeiro when authorities closed in on him. A native of Pittsburgh, Pa., the 26-year-old, baby-faced Belle was considered at one time the boy wonder of high finance. After establishing his Cornucopia Gold Mines company, Belle's profits soared out of sight, and he was briefly hailed as one of the most brilliant young businessmen in America.

Interviewed by Mike Wallace, Belle spewed forth a credo worthy of Horatio Alger: "If you claw your way up to success, you never have to ask anyone for anything," he said. Belle's clawing, it was later revealed, consisted of taking out one enormous bank loan after another, the last to cover the first and so on, and then, with the participation of a partner, draining the assets of the company. With more than $2 million thus stolen from his own firms, Earl Belle, wizard of American finance, then beat a hasty departure for Rio de Janeiro, Brazil in 1958, only one year after Lowell Birrell had fled to that non-extraditable country.

There Belle resided, successfully resisting all attempts at extradition. Belle later confessed from his posh living quarters in Rio that the records of his firm, Cornucopia Gold Mines, were "falsified and quite incomplete." He added that he was "deeply sorry for all the people who have been misled and all the wrongs done." When asked whether or not he deserved to be punished for his swindle, Belle shrugged, smiled and said: "I imagine a permanent exile is punishment enough."

THE COMMODITIES CON ARTISTS/ 1950s-1970s

During the 1960s and 1970s, two brazen swindlers made millions by collateralizing vast commodity holdings in exchange for huge loans and government subsidies, holdings that existed for the most part only on paper. The first of these two strutting grifters was Anthony "Tino" DeAngelis. In a colossal fraud dealing with salad oil tanks, DeAngelis was able to bilk banks and investors out of $219 million. DeAngelis claimed to have many salad oil tanks throughout the U.S. containing vast amounts of oil. His tanks, however, had false or hollow bottoms with only a portion of the tank filled with salad oil. Suspicious officials not taken in by this ruse were bribed into giving DeAngelis phony receipts showing full tanks.

Anthony DeAngelis, who perpetrated the Great Salad Oil Swindle.

The swindler then used these receipts to borrow millions of dollars which he used in an attempt to corner the cottonseed and soybean markets on the commodities exchange, thinking that once he had made his "killing," he would convert the hollow salad oil tanks to full capacity. His fake receipts, however, were scrutinized by officials who examined the tanks and discovered the truth. DeAngelis was charged with fraud in 1965, convicted, and given a twenty-year prison sentence. All but $1 million from the so-called Great Salad Oil Swindle was recovered.

Billie Sol Estes (b.1925), used the same techniques as DeAngelis in his broad-based frauds, but his swindles were much more ambitious and far-reaching than those of DeAngelis. By his own admission, Estes was able to conduct his multi-million-dollar swindles with the collusion of high-ranking politicians and that one of his secret partners could be found in the Oval Office in Washington, D.C. The crooked machinations of Billie Sol Estes were performed in the garb of a checked suit, ten-gallon hat, and ornate cowboy boots coated with fertilizer.

Estes was the first, but certainly not the last, of the "good old boys" from Texas who managed to build a huge fortune based upon the gullibility of finance firms, government allotments, and high-level contacts within the federal government. Before he was thirty, Estes, the son of a country preacher from Clyde, Texas, was named by the U.S. Junior Chamber of Commerce as one of America's ten outstanding young men of the year. In accepting his award, Estes told one and all that the reason for his success was good living. He explained that he did not drink, smoke, or dance and that, most importantly, he followed the dictates of the Lord.

But the dictates Estes truly followed were his own inner voices of deceit and greed. He had, in the late 1950s, acquired thousands of acres of land in and about Pecos, Texas, calling himself a cotton farmer. He appeared to be as rich as the oil barons of his native state. He shared his wealth, spending freely, giving lavish gifts to local bigwigs, and contributing mightily to the political campaigns of those who might someday overlook the rough corners of his landed empire. This included Senator Ralph Yarborough and Congressman J.T. Rutherford, who represented the Pecos area.

When John Fitzgerald Kennedy became president, Estes, who thought of himself as a pioneer, moved in on the New Frontier. He purchased $6,000 worth of tickets, at $100 a ticket, to the presidential birthday party celebrating the New Frontier in 1962 and made a beeline for Washington. His aim, really, was not the office of the presidency, but the Department of Agriculture, which, through clever manipulation of crop allotments and a few gifts to officials, he had managed to con into naming him as a board member to the National Cotton Advisory Committee, although he had little or no cotton.

What Estes did have was a monopoly on grain storage. He had bought up a great number of grain storage elevators during the mid-1950s, on credit, of course, after realizing that the government paid handsome subsidies for grain storage. For three years alone, 1959-1961, he collected $8 million in storage payments from the federal government for storing more than fifty million bushels of grain. This lucrative enterprise did not appease the entrepreneur's greed, however, and he hit upon a scheme to further enrich himself, knowing that government subsidies in cotton were ridiculously high.

The government had set high prices for cotton allotments, but these allotments applied to only long-established cotton acreage. Estes' Texas land, however, was mostly barren of cotton; he had never grown the crop and was therefore not entitled to allotments. The Texas promoter decided that he would merely go out and buy land that did have allotments for cotton crops. This proved to be somewhat difficult, but Estes solved the problem or, to nervous government inspectors, appeared to have solved it. He and his agents roamed through Georgia, Alabama, Oklahoma, and Texas, locating farmers who were about to lose their lands to the government.

Texas commodities swindler Billie Sol Estes, handcuffed and in custody; he gleaned millions through bogus storage tanks.

The proposition was simple. Estes found more than 3,000 acres that had existing allotments, and went to the farmers about to lose this land. Under a special proviso, the government would allow the transferring of allotments by farmers who bought new land. They could transfer the cotton crop allotment to new tracts of land from old acreage having the existing allotment. Estes said that he would sell them his land so that the allotments could be transferred to that acreage.

Through his financial contact, he would arrange for mortgages to be taken out for them so that they could ostensibly acquire his property, but they would have to agree to default on the mortgage payments so that the Estes land would revert to its original owner, Estes, who would then have his original land and the federal allotments transferred to it. Of course, the Texas boy wonder paid the farmers under the table for their trouble.

The scheme worked well. Even though certain government officials in the Department of Agriculture going over these deals found them suspicious and wrote unflattering reports about Estes' methods—reports that were filed in the offices of Under-Secretary Murphy's minions—the under-secretary steadfastly approved of the allotments to Estes, saying that Estes was an upstanding citizen who was greatly helping the economy to flourish.

While the allotment scheme was flowering, Estes embarked on a new adventure in economic swindling, a strange and bizarre scheme dealing with simple fertilizer. Anhydrous ammonia, a liquid fertilizer which was easily applied to crops and proved to increase crop production almost overnight, was much in demand by farmers throughout Texas. Estes, knowing this, approached hundreds of farmers and offered to sell them the fertilizer at between $40 and $60 a ton, which was $50 less per ton than the going retail rate. They leaped at his purchase price which was, of course, designed to corner the anhydrous ammonia market. He would lose great sums, but in the end he would reap new fortunes when complete control of the product was his. He made up the losses through the income generated by his grain storage business.

There was one big problem—the fertilizer had to be stored in expensively manufactured tanks. Estes sold these tanks through a labyrinthine mortgage system to farmers and businessmen in West Texas, assuring them that he would take full responsibility for any problems with the tanks. The profits from such an investment, Estes demonstrated on paper, would be enormous. Thousands of mortgages were taken out for the tanks, and Estes took these to finance companies who bought them at a discount.

Estes' bank accounts swelled. He was suddenly the king of the grain storage business, reaping fortunes on cotton crop allotments, and had moved into the fertilizer business so successfully that he appeared to have gotten complete control of the market. Though there were murmurs about his odd techniques by bureaucrats in far-off Washington, Texas authorities greeted the success of their native son with backslapping pride.

Doubts about Estes did form in the minds of some local Pecos businessmen, who went to Oscar Griffin, the young editor of the tiny Pecos Independent & Enterprise. The newspaper editor listened to the suspicions cast upon Estes' methods and was astounded to learn that he had, within months, cornered the anhydrous ammonia market.

Griffin began a tedious investigation into Estes' fertilizer scheme, a probe that would later earn him a Pulitzer Prize. His research provided eye-popping figures. The Texas wonder boy had sold, through a series of involved mortgage arrangements, more than 33,000 storage tanks, which were listed as being located throughout West Texas. The editor, after consulting with fertilizer experts, quickly learned that such a vast number of tanks could not possibly dot the broad stretches of land around Pecos.

The large financial institutions in New York and Los Angeles, which had arranged for millions of dollars in mortgages for the 33,000 storage tanks were contacted, but representatives of these institutions were cautious. Estes was a V.I.P. client with powerful friends in Washington, D.C. His business involved vast amounts of money, and they did not intend to annoy the Texas genius. Investigators were sent out to make polite inquiries about the storage tanks.

Initially, investigators thought the whole procedure was senselessly repetitive. They had already checked a number of Estes' storage tanks, and had checked the serial numbers on the tanks built by the Superior Manufacturing Company of Amarillo, Texas. Dutifully, the investigators went about their work, going first to Estes' office where the affable tycoon went over lists of storage tanks and their locations and corresponding serial numbers. The investigators then drove to the sites, checked the serial numbers, and reported back to the home offices that everything was in order. One investigator, however, Frank Cain, a lawyer for the Pacific Finance Company in Los Angeles, which had invested heavily in buying up the storage tank mortgages, did not go to Estes' office first.

The lawyer, working out of Dallas, went to Pecos, Texas, unannounced and conducted a private investigation. He could not locate a single storage tank bearing the firm's corresponding serial numbers. Next, he went to Amarillo and inspected the premises of the Superior Manufacturing Company, which constructed the tanks. He learned that two of Estes' close friends operated this firm. Moreover, he quickly realized that this company could not have produced 33,000 storage tanks with its limited facilities. As it turned out, the firm had not manufactured more than a few hundred tanks.

What the Amarillo firm had produced was thousands of plates with serial numbers on them, more than 33,000, in fact. Normally, such plates were welded onto a tank, but those used by Estes were interchangeable, and could be slipped into brackets so that the switching of plates was a simple matter. And this is exactly what Estes had been doing. Whenever an investigator appeared, he would direct him to the location of a storage tank but send ahead of the investigator a crew of men who would switch the serial number plates so that they corresponded to those on the investigator's list. The system was so streamlined that Estes would supervise the operation via short-wave radios installed in his office and in the jeeps being driven by his plate-switching crews.

When the finance companies learned, to their great dismay, that they had been gulled in one of the oldest Peter-to-Paul scams, a full-scale state inquiry ensued. Those involved in Estes' storage tank scheme began to talk. J.S. Wheeler, who operated a Pecos fertilizing company, told Texas officials that he saw through the Estes scheme early on and had confronted Estes, who merely laughed and told him that the finance firms were easily hoodwinked. "They'll never catch up with you," Estes had chuckled. "These people are stupid."

It was all a clever game to Estes, who then went on to tell Wheeler how ranchers had employed the same technique in falsifying assets when getting huge loans on their ranches. They would merely put up their cattle as collateral, then drive the banker around and around on their vast tracts of land so that he could get a general count of the livestock available. The easily fooled banker would really be counting the same cattle over and over again, but from a different vantage point on the same ranch. "It's the same thing with the tanks," Estes told Wheeler reassuringly. "We'll starve them to death looking for equipment."

Cain's investigation proved out-and-out fraud; it was the end of the Texas Tycoon. Following the storage tank revelations, the federal government inspected the allotments given Estes for his cotton lands. It was learned that Under-Secretary Murphy and other officials had visited Estes in Texas and had been taken to swanky stores, such as Neiman-Marcus, where expensive wardrobes and other items were bestowed upon them. Murphy and the others were asked to resign their posts, which they did. The cotton allotments were revoked.

According to swindler Billie Sol Estes, Lyndon Johnson, shown with President John F. Kennedy, was behind Kennedy's assassination.

Estes himself blithely faced prosecution, perhaps never believing until it was too late that he would actually be convicted for his schemes. His attitude did not change, even when Frank Cain first confronted him with the truth and told him: "You realize that you are subject to criminal penalties?"

At that moment, Estes shrugged and lamely admitted that the millions he had scammed through the storage tank scheme was "penitentiary money." Estes' unshakable belief in his own immunity seemed, at first, to be justified. Although a Texas court convicted him of fraud and sentenced him to eight years in prison, the U.S. Supreme Court overturned this ruling and sentence, stating that Estes' trial had been televised and, because of the press coverage, Estes had been denied due process of law.

Jubilant in this decision, Estes made plans to go back to his bilking operations, but was shocked to find himself again on trial, this time for mail fraud. A U.S. District Court found him guilty and he received a fifteen-year sentence. The Supreme Court did not overturn this conviction, and the swaggering Estes went to prison, his crazy dreams of empire shattering with the clank of his cell door.

Yet, for years thereafter in West Texas, the sharper was still held in high regard by some residents who thought of the Estes schemes as merely shrewd business moves. Of course these admirers lost no money in Estes' $22 million storage tank scam. Said one during the trial of the Texas wonder boy: "Hell, the man was only trying to make a living!"

Estes served six years on the mail fraud conviction, entering prison in 1965 and emerging in 1971. Promising to stick to the straight and narrow, Estes took a job as a truck dispatcher for a petroleum firm in Abilene, Texas, and regularly reported to his parole officer. He pointed out to his parole officer that he had learned his lesson and that nothing was then beneath him, including manual labor, where he "even washed trucks and fixed flats." To make a few extra dollars, Estes explained, he worked as a straw boss on his brother's cattle ranch.

But the habitual criminal in Billie Sol Estes was hard at work on yet another swindle. This time, Estes' scheme involved the purchasing and leasing of nonexistent steam-cleaning machines used to wash equipment in the oil fields. Knowing the hustler's old techniques of claiming equipment that did not exist, officials inspected the Estes operation and quickly proved fraud. This time, Estes was allowed to plead guilty to one charge only, tax evasion. He went back to prison in 1979 to serve a five-year term. Estes was released in 1983, and again he claimed that he would follow only the honest path and that his name would never again be involved with crime.

Yet the world heard from the hustler once more in the following year, when he came forward to clear up an old murder as a favor to a U.S. Marshal, Clint Peoples. Before entering prison in 1979, Estes had promised Peoples that he would solve the death of Henry Marshall, who was found shot and poisoned on his small West Texas ranch in 1961, and whose death had been originally labeled a suicide. Estes, in 1984, went before a grand jury and claimed that Marshall had gotten on to his cotton swindles and, as an official of the Department of Agriculture, was about to expose Estes' far-flung operations.

The hustler then met with Lyndon Baines Johnson, who was linked to Estes' cotton swindles along with some Johnson aides, according to Estes. Following a meeting, where Johnson concluded that Marshall would ruin them all, Estes claimed, the newly inaugurated vice president ordered Malcolm Wallace, a family friend (who had once been convicted of killing a man), to execute the troublesome Marshall, which he did. Estes went even further, stating that the ubiquitous Wallace was Johnson's lifetime "hitman," and who had disposed of several of Johnson's political enemies in the past, and that he occupied an unmarked office in the U.S. Department of Agriculture, a post secured for him by Johnson. It was from this office, Estes claimed, that Wallace obtained information about on-going investigations into the Johnson-Estes schemes and was thus in a position to obstruct or thwart them. Estes capped this fantastic tale by intimating that Wallace, a sharpshooter, was the actual shootist positioned behind the fence atop the grassy knoll, who fired the fatal bullet into President John F. Kennedy on November 22, 1963, a killing performed at the behest of the power-mad Lyndon Johnson. Most authorities utterly dismissed this Estes tale, although the grand jury Estes addressed on the matter, along with a judge hearing the old case, ordered that the Marshall death be changed in the records from a suicide to a homicide.

THE DRAGON LADY'S SCAM/1920s-1960s

Before her 1964 conviction on charges of bank embezzlement, Chang Hor-gee (whose Americanized name was Dorothy "Dolly" Gee, 1897-1978), was one of the most respected business figures in San Francisco's Chinatown. She was regarded as a shrewd executive who had gained control of the Bank of America's Chinatown branch. It was later estimated that she had embezzled $300,000 over five decades.

The eldest of nine children, Gee was the daughter of Charlie Gee, who had immigrated to San Francisco in 1901. Gee opened a shoe store in Chinatown, where he saved thousands of dollars sent to him by relatives overseas, who dreamed of coming to the U.S. In 1906, an earthquake destroyed the shoe store and forced Charlie Gee to move his business across the Bay into Oakland. Overcoming their prejudice against the Chinese, Charlie Gee convinced executives of the French-American Bank to allow him to deposit $1 million. He was given a job at the bank and hundreds of Chinese, unable to deal with the bank directly, gave him their money and he deposited the money at the bank in his account.

Only Gee could understand the calculations entered into his logbook in Chinese characters. With the workload becoming too much to handle, Gee brought his daughter into the business in 1914 and she recruited new depositors. By 1919, Dolly Gee, who embezzled funds from the branch of the Bank of America she managed in San Francisco's Chinatown.

in control of nearly $2 million in accounts, Charlie Gee sailed to Hong Kong, where he opened the China Specie Bank, with branches in Canton and Shanghai. Returning to the U.S., he convinced many of his countrymen to allow him to deposit their money in his foreign banks.

In 1923, Charlie Gee's empire crumbled when the Hong Kong branch in China failed, a fact he did not know for three weeks since news traveled by steamship. During the interim, Gee sent an additional $80,000 in client money to the failed bank, money that was permanently lost. To avoid embarrassment, Charlie Gee began altering the books. He set up a fake account in San Francisco and embezzled money over a period of time to allay suspicions (or, at least, this is the story his daughter later promoted).

In 1927, the Bank of America absorbed the Chinatown Bank and two years later Dorothy Gee became its manager. Only then did she discover her father's crimes, or this is what she later claimed. "We talked all night," Dorothy Gee said. "The question for me was whether I would betray my father. But I couldn't go down and betray him. And once I made that decision I just stuck with him for more than thirty years."

Under her inspired leadership the Bank of America branch flourished. She lived ostentatiously, gambling at clubs and consuming large amounts of Scotch, which scandalized the traditionalists in the Chinese-American community. In 1962, six years after her father died, she remodeled the bank to resemble a Chinese pagoda, and during the dedication ceremonies she became a U.S. citizen.

Ready to retire in 1963, Dolly decided to confess. She told Bank of America president Rudolph Peterson the startling news of her fifty-year deception. On Christmas Eve, FBI agents arrested her. She was sentenced to five years at Terminal Island, but her sentence was later reduced to sixteen months. Following her brief incarceration Gee returned to Chinatown to live until her death in 1978.

Speculation continued long after her death about her hidden wealth. Some alleged that the Gees used the embezzled funds to finance a smuggling operation that brought Chinese immigrants into the U.S. Others maintained that the money was spent at the gaming tables in Las Vegas.

THE $10 MILLION COMPUTER BANK SCAM/ 1978

When Stanley Mark Rifkin (b.1946) arrived at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in San Diego, Calif., to await a decision on bail, many of the inmates who had eagerly anticipated his arrival were disappointed with the pudgy, balding, 32-year-old man who appeared. He did not suit the image of the criminal mastermind who stole $10.2 million from a major bank without being detected. But it was Rifkin, self-employed computer expert, who, in October 1978, convinced the wire transfer room of the Security Pacific National Bank of Los Angeles to transfer $10.2 million first to the Irving Trust Company in New York and from there to a Swiss bank.

Rifkin began planning his crime early in 1978, when he was first hired to work on Security Pacific's computers. While he was becoming a familiar face around the bank, Rifkin was also laying the groundwork for the theft. He approached Lou Stein, a reputable diamond dealer in Los Angeles, California, and claimed to represent a legitimate company named Coast Diamond Distributors. Stein placed Rifkin's order for millions of dollars in diamonds with Russalmaz, a Soviet diamond trading company with offices in Geneva. On October 14, a man calling himself Mr. Nelson contacted Russalmaz's office and confirmed that Stein was a representative of Coast Diamond and that the company had the financial resources to close the deal. A few days later, Nelson called to say that Stein would arrive in Geneva on October 26, to inspect the diamonds.

Stanley Mark Rifkin, who swindled millions in bank funds by computer.

The key to Rifkin's scheme was a small, but important flaw in the bank's operation. Security National, like most banks, used a nationwide electronic wire network operated by the Federal Reserve Board to transfer funds to other banks in the U.S. and abroad. These transfers, which for Security Pacific averaged about $20 billion per week, were made from a special room on Level D of the bank, and required a special code that was changed daily. The limited access to the wire transfer room and the authorization code were, however, the only security measures protecting the vast sums of money. Trading on the fact that he was recognizable to bank employees, Rifkin gained access to the wire transfer room. Once inside, he simply memorized the code for the day which was, surprisingly, posted on the wall. Later that day, Rifkin called the transfer room and, using the fictitious name of Mike Hansen, whom he identified as being an employee of the bank's international division, requested that $10.2 million be transferred to an account at the Irving Trust Company of New York. The order, one of many that day, went through without question.

On October 26, as scheduled, a man who identified himself as Lou Stein showed up at Russalmaz in Geneva and spent the day selecting diamonds. The next day he returned with a man who has not been identified and agreed to pay $8.1 million for the 43,200 carats of diamonds. After these funds were paid, Rifkin either smuggled the diamonds back into the U.S. himself or had them brought in by courier. Five days after the robbery, Rifkin sold twelve diamonds to a Beverly Hills jeweler for $12,000. He next flew to Rochester, New York, to negotiate the sale of more of the diamonds. His intended buyer, however, tipped off the FBI, who trailed Rifkin to a friend's home. Agents arrested him on November 5, 1978. Rifkin surrendered easily, and gave the federal agents a suitcase containing $12,000 in cash and about forty packets of diamonds.

While Rifkin was waiting in jail for his attorneys to negotiate a bail somewhat lower than the $4 million originally ordered, one of the inmates encouraged him to pull off another robbery only this time to "do it right." The prisoner, who offered to help Rifkin convert the $50 million they intended to steal into drugs, was actually an informant working for the federal Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA). It seems the DEA wanted to get the informant released so he could infiltrate organized crime for them.

When the San Diego County district attorney's office refused to cooperate in his release, the DEA conceived of the plan to have the informant implicate Rifkin again, hoping the district attorney's office would be convinced of the informant's usefulness and willingness to cooperate by his work with Rifkin. The prisoner-informant succeeded in gaining Rifkin's ear. Once Rifkin was free on bail, the informant continued to advise Rifkin via phone calls and letters from prison as the Rifkin went about setting up the Union Bank of Los Angeles for a theft of $50 million using exactly the same method he used at Security Pacific.

On February 13, 1979, the FBI arrested Rifkin again. This time they also arrested an accomplice, Patricia Ferguson. Rifkin pleaded guilty to two counts of wire fraud. He was convicted and sentenced to eight years in prison, two years less than the maximum sentence. The judge declined Rifkin's request to be placed on probation, so he could teach bank officials how to prevent computer fraud. Ferguson was convicted of three conspiracy charges in June 1979. The only winner in the whole matter was the Security Pacific Bank. Although the theft had gone unnoticed by the bank until the FBI informed them of it, they recouped some $2 million in cash and were able to sell the diamonds for $13 million, resulting in a $5 million profit.

LEONA HELMSLEY: "WE DON'T PAY TAXES"/1980s

For much of the summer of 1989, Americans were fascinated by a rare glimpse inside the opulent lifestyle of hotel magnates Leona (b.1920) and Harry Helmsley (1910-1997) as the wealthy couple stood trial on fraud and tax evasion charges. Following their marriage in 1972, the Helmsleys, owners of thirty-three Manhattan properties and hundreds of other buildings spread across the five boroughs, bought a twenty-eight-room $11 million mansion in Greenwich, Connecticut, which they turned into a showplace. Leona also entertained lavishly at her Park Lane duplex.

Beside her ostentatious lifestyle, Leona Helmsley developed a reputation as an unbending taskmaster. To her former housekeeper, Elizabeth Baum, Helmsley once remarked, "We don't pay taxes; the little people pay taxes." On another occasion she complained to an employee that the telephone in her bedroom was ringing "ding-dick" instead of "ding dong." When he entered the bedroom to try to fix it, Leona flew into an uncontrollable rage and fired him for entering her private quarters.

In 1982, Helmsley's only child, Jay Panzirer, died of a heart attack in Florida at the age of 40. Helmsley had the coffin flown back to New York and then billed her daughter-in-law, Mimi, for shipping expenses. When Helmsley noticed the obituary in the New York Times, she became enraged with the paper for listing her son's age in the account, thus making her appear "old." New York mayor Edward Koch described her as the "wicked witch" of New York. Real estate mogul Donald Trump called Helmsley a "sick woman."

In 1989 the government filed federal tax fraud charges against the Helmsleys, charging them with evading $1.2 million in taxes between 1983 and 1985. The Helmsleys were big-time cheats, according to Internal Revenue Service agent John Dennehy, who exhibited a seven-by-ten foot chart in the courtroom of District Court Judge John M. Walker, Jr., depicting the extent of their deceptions. Virtually every household expense incurred at the luxurious Dunnellen Hall estate was charged to the nineteen separate companies that comprised the Helmsley hotel and real estate conglomerate.

A jade water buffalo valued at $210,000 was listed as a "rare and important Federal carved mahogany card table" to be placed in the Park Lane Hotel. The $130,000 indoor-outdoor stereo system installed at the Connecticut mansion became a security system for the Helmsley Building in Manhattan. In return, the companies received false tax deductions through their vice president and business manager Frank J. Turco (b.1943), of Lutz, Florida, who was fired by Helmsley in 1986. Turco agreed to a plea-bargaining arrangement with State Attorney General Robert Abrams, who promised him a sentence concurrent with a pending federal sentence. In return, he admitted on the witness stand that he helped his employers file false personal and corporate tax returns between 1982 and 1985.

The dominating, arrogant hotel tycoon, Leona Helmsley, who went to prison for tax fraud in 1989.

Attorney Gerald A. Feffer countered the prosecution's arguments by claiming that the Helmsleys were actually owed $681,000 in tax refunds for the period in question. His contention was based on two outside audits that reviewed the Helmsley partnership from 1983 to 1985, concluding that they had actually overpaid their taxes. U.S. Attorney James R. DeVita summoned forty-four witnesses, who testified to Helmsley's vindictiveness. Two liquor salesmen told how they were required to pay back $16,200 in their personal commissions or risk losing their account with the Harley-Helmsley hotel chain.

At one point during the trial, Judge Walker scolded Helmsley for her "arrogant belief that she was above the law." On August 30, 1989, a largely blue-collar jury found her guilty on thirty-three counts of tax and mail fraud and conspiracy to defraud the government. Also convicted were Frank Turco and another former executive, Joseph V. Licari (b.1936), chief financial officer of Helmsley Enterprises, Inc.

Helmsley was acquitted on one count of conspiracy to commit extortion and seven counts of mail fraud in connection with a scheme to defraud the stockholders in her Realesco Equities Corp. The verdict was announced in a packed, but quiet courtroom at the federal courthouse in Foley Square. Earlier, Harry Helmsley was declared unfit to stand trial by Judge Walker, who cited the defendant's frequent memory lapses and inability to reason.

Leona Helmsley was sentenced to serve four years in a federal prison and was assessed a $7.1 million fine by Judge Walker on December 12, 1989. In addition, Helmsley was required to complete 750 hours of community service at the Hale House in Harlem, a facility for infants born with a drug addiction. Before the judge passed sentence, Helmsley tearfully pleaded for mercy. Judge Walker was unmoved. He described her crimes as a product of "naked greed."

Joseph Licari was sentenced to thirty months in prison, three years of probation, and was fined $75,000. Frank Turco was ordered to serve twenty-four months in prison, three years of probation, and was fined $50,000. The message for would-be tax cheats, according to Judge Walker was clear, "If you do it and you're caught, you will go to prison."

Leona Helmsley suffered little from her tax transgressions. She served only eighteen months of her four-year prison sentence, and, when released, retreated back into her luxury and enormous wealth. Her real estate tycoon husband, Harry Helmsley, who was ruled mentally unfit to be tried along with his wife for tax fraud, died of pneumonia at age eighty-seven on January 4, 1997. Leona ordered the floodlights on the Empire State Building, then the crown jewel in the Helmsley holdings, dimmed in honor of her deceased spouse. She and her husband had been the landlords of more than 50,000 apartments and twenty-seven hotels across the country.

THE JUNK BOND KING/1980s

The 1980s, typified by Leona Helmsley, have been labeled an age of greed, an era in which colossal financial swindles occurred, although this period of time may have been no more greedy in nature than any other decade, particularly the 1990s, when greed became a virtue on Wall Street and at the stock market. It was just that more corporate and stock manipulating con artists were caught during the 1980s.

One of the biggest frauds of that era was Michael R. Milken (b.1947), a crafty financial operator who is credited with inventing the junk bond. Milken was a bond trader at Drexel Burnham Lambert, a New York securities house. His specialty was leveraging buyouts of financially solid companies and then quickly gutting them of their assets to glean a personal fortune. Invariably, stockholders and employees were left with the ruins.

The "junk bond" was a securities issue made by an industry giant with financial woes. If enough of these bonds were sold, it was thought, the firm could improve its financial standing with the new influx of money. Milken seized upon this shaky remedy to inflate the importance of small to mid-sized companies that, he argued, would become much more profitable if they received large amounts of cash through junk bond sales, money these firms could not otherwise borrow.

Michael Milken, the brazen millionaire inventor of the junk bond, is shown in 1989, when he was indicted for stock fraud; thousands lost their jobs in the foul dust of his wake.

By aiding small companies to sell off their debts to creditors, Milken ushered in the age of corporate raiding. Super-rich traders could buy a firm's debts, then use the stock leverage they gained to take over the firm. In some rare cases, this system actually led to newly-invigorated business. For the most part, the firms were abused, their profits scooped up, and no new financing provided. The firms died and thousands of workers were either laid off or fired.

Milken's personal fortune grew by enormous leaps. In one transaction alone, he was able to add $500 million to his coffers. In 1989, however, the Milken gravy train was derailed. In that year he was indicted on ninety-eight counts of securities violations and brought into federal court. Milken was implicated in the national Savings and Loan scandal. His records were subpoenaed by the Congressional House Banking Committee and he was linked to land deals involving the Lincoln Savings and Loan Association in Irvine, California, headed by Charles Keating, Jr., another high-flying financier, who later went to prison for fraud.

Though he denied any deliberate swindle, Milken, in 1990, pleaded guilty to six counts of "technical" violations. He was sentenced by Judge Kimba M. Wood to ten years in prison. Judge Wood later stated that she intended to have Milken's jail term to be less than half his sentenceC-five yearsC-with the assumption that he would qualify for parole much earlier than the sentence normally required. Judge Wood recommended Milken for just such a parole.

In early March 1991, Milken reported to the minimum-security Federal Correctional Institution at Pleasanton, California, becoming prisoner 16126-054. He was appointed camp tutor for inmates seeking high school equivalency diplomas. He busied himself by creating educational puzzles for the children of inmates, reorganizing the library, and laboring over legal briefs in which he sought to settle hundreds of millions of dollars in civil suits brought against him by irate investors who had lost everything in his leveraged buyout schemes.

The settlements and penalties were staggering. Milken reportedly repaid, or attempted to repay, approximately $900 million with Drexel Burnham Lambert adding another $300 million, and insurers another $100 million. Throughout this period, the federal government aggressively pursued other financial flimflammers such as Keating.

One of those brought to trial was Alan E. Rosenthal, a former colleague of Milken's. In June 1992, Milken was asked to testify against Rosenthal, who was charged with federal conspiracy in New York. He did, although Securities and Exchange Commission officials believed that Milken's testimony did not strongly help the prosecution's case against Rosenthal. Two months later, on the strength of that testimony, Judge Wood commuted Milken's sentence.

Milken is shown upon his release from prison in January 1993, free to enjoy millions he looted.

In early January 1993, Milken was released from the Correctional Institution in Pleasanton and sent to a halfway house in Los Angeles. He had served less than two years in prison. A final portion of Milken's sentence was still to be served—1,800 hours of unspecified community service. The disbarred trader opted to teach mathematical skills to children in impoverished districts of Los Angeles, California.

To many of Milken's friends, the federal government had simply made the junk bond king a scapegoat. They pointed to Milken's "honor," in that part of his plea bargain with the government was that all charges against his brother, who also worked at Drexel Burnham Lambert, be dropped. Drexel itself was no more by the time Milken was released from prison, having gone out of business after paying out settlements.

Milken's lawyers also touted the swindler's generosity, stating that during his heyday in the 1980s he had lavished more than $360 million on various charities. Charity for Michael Milken, however, began at home. Though he was barred from securities trading for life, he left prison with a personal fortune of a half billion dollars. His probation ended on March 1, 1998. In spite of the fact that Milken was a convicted felon, some firms found his inflated reputation as a financial wizard appealing and hired him as a consultant. He appeared on network TV to talk about his prostate cancer and a career more cancerous than the illness that plagued him.

THE LINCOLN SAVINGS & LOAN SCANDAL/ 1980s

In the late 1980s, no one better symbolized the snatch-and-grab attitude of finance than Charles H. Keating, Jr. (b.1924). He came under immediate federal scrutiny when his financial institution, the Lincoln Savings and Loan of Irvine, California, utterly collapsed, leaving thousands of depositors destitute. Keating was the target of a federal civil suit involving violations of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO). Keating, along with several of his top executives of American Continental Corp. was charged with purchasing the troubled savings and loan operation in Irvine so that he and his associates could channel its funds to themselves through "illegal, fraudulent and imprudent acts." Federal regulators who filed the suit charged that, in addition to the original charges, Keating and others had concealed illegal cash payments, forged documents and had made false and misleading statements to U.S. authorities.

Almost immediately after the suit was filed, it was revealed that Keating had made substantial contributions to the campaigns of five U.S. senators and that these men had apparently lobbied federal regulators not to pursue a close investigation of Lincoln Savings and Loan. The politicians included Dennis DeConcini and John McCain of Arizona, John Glenn of Ohio, Donald Riegle of Michigan, and Alan Cranston of California. Although all five would be cleared of any collusion, their association with the S&L scandal in which they were dubbed by the press as the "Keating Five," clouded their political futures.

In November 1989, Keating's woes escalated when dozens of federal agents swarmed into two luxury hotels he owned in Phoenix, ArizonaC-the centerpieces of his financial empireC-and seized them. Agents more or less told the world that Keating was through as a financial power in America, when they padlocked his offices and announced that he could no longer function as the president of the hotel management firm.

A week later a congressional committee looking into Lincoln's collapse, subpoenaed Keating to testify, but his response was less than rewarding. Taciturn and uncooperative, Keating took the Fifth Amendment, stating, "On the advice of counsel I respectfully exercise my constitutional prerogative and privilege and decline to answer questions here today." The ten-hour House Banking Committee session came to a dead-end.

Also testifying that day was Danny Wall, director of the federal Office of Thrift Supervision. He admitted that he and other federal regulators had made mistakes in not having pinpointed illegal activities at Lincoln earlier, but he blamed the institution's officers for having misled them with false statements. Wall then went on the attack, naming the "Keating Five" and stating that political pressure from these senators had not deterred the federal investigation of Lincoln. The hearing, however, had backfired somewhat against Wall and his colleagues, who became the investigative subject of the hearing rather than Keating and company, a twist of the screw turned by Keating himself.

Congressman Jim Leach of Iowa, an astute member of the Banking Committee, reviewed the labyrinthine case and concluded that "Keating is at fault because he is a bank robber, but we in Washington made it, in part, a legal bank robbery." His reference was to the deregulation of savings and loans that allowed Keating and friends to play fast and loose with depositor monies.

Swindler Charles Keating, who went to prison in 1992 for his illegal operations in the Lincoln Savings and Loan.

Such apologia did not help Keating, who was indicted on charges of criminal fraud in Los Angeles on September 18, 1990. The magnitude of his fraud was emphasized by the amount of bail set for himC-$5 million. Indicted along with Keating were Judy Wischer, 42, one-time president of American Continental; Charles Ray Fidel, 32, former president of Lincoln; and Robin Scott Symes, 37, formerly chief executive officer of Lincoln. Reporters pointed out that all of Keating's co-defendants were a generation younger than he was, a symbol of the era of greed that permeated younger executives.

In November 1990, Keating's group seemed encouraged, when twenty-two of the forty-two charges against them were dropped as being "too vague." The trial nevertheless went forward in 1991 and it became evident that Keating and his henchmen were still struggling against serious charges. In addition to other violations, Keating was also charged with selling "junk bonds," high risk but potentially high yield securities, suggesting the possibility of enormous profits for investors, but keeping the profits himself.

Fireworks accompanied the first day of the trial on August 2, 1991. A Lincoln investor well over the age of 90 and standing under five feet, completely lost her control and began screaming at the six-foot-five-inch Keating. She grabbed the lapels of his imported suit and tugged at them, demanding he return her money. Bailiffs rushed forward to restrain the little woman, but before they did so, she punched Wischer's attorney, Abe Lowell, in the stomach.

Superior Court Judge Lance A. Ito, who was to preside at the notorious O.J. Simpson trial in 1994, stated that he was considering an order that everyone in the court from that point on be searched. Demonstrators outside the courtroom marched up and down with placards condemning Keating and shouting, "Mr. Cheating, where's our money?" and "pay it back, Charlie!"

Keating did not respond to the hecklers, maintaining his usual aloof posture. He also did not take the witness stand and the defense called no witnesses. The defense, quite simply, had little or no case and Keating was convicted on seventeen counts of fraud. In December 1991, Keating was again indicted and charged with conspiracy to operate an illegal financial scheme. Indicted with Keating were his son, Charles H. Keating III, 36; Wischer; Robert M. Wurzelbacher, 37; and Andrew F. Liggett, 34, all being former American Continental officers.

The second trial went to court in Tucson, Ariz. in March 1992. Again, Keating took the Fifth Amendment and again he was convicted. Before he was sentenced, the judge in this trial received 120 letters from people asking that the financial swindler receive clemency. One of those letters came from Mother Teresa, who praised Keating's generosity in supporting her charitable works in Calcutta, India.

Judge Ito was having none of it. On April 10, 1992, he sentenced the 68-year-old Keating to ten years in prison and fined him a quarter of a million dollars. Ito explained that he had meted out the maximum sentence to the colossal swindler because of the great number of victims involved in his gigantic frauds, pointing out that more than 17,000 persons had been left almost penniless after losing an estimated $250 million.

Keating went back to court one more time the following winter, when a federal jury in Los Angeles convicted him of seventy-three counts of racketeering, conspiracy, fraud, and transporting stolen property. His son was convicted of sixty-four counts. Keating spoke little to the press throughout his three trials and had less to say about his convictions. He consistently denied any wrongdoing. As far as he was concerned, federal regulators were all to blame in pursuing a personal vendetta against him, his family, and his associates.

One juror responded to this by saying, "I don't want to hurt his feelings, but we all felt that we would have liked to have one of those fake expanding noses that grows longer and longer. We just didn't think any of it [Keating's arguments] was valid."

THE ELUSIVE ROBERT LEE VESCO/1970s-1990s

The top financial swindler of modern times, Robert Lee Vesco (b.1935) masterminded insider trading and established a Wall Street stock empire in the 1970s, fleeing the U.S. after he was charged with embezzling more than $224 million from stockholders in November 1972. Vesco's ties extended from the board rooms of corporate America to the Nixon White House. Even while in exile, this former "boy wonder" of international finance seemed to enjoy the protection of the government at the very highest level.

The son of a Detroit auto worker, Vesco dropped out of high school at sixteen to work as an apprentice in an auto body shop. Later in his career, while working as an automotive engineer, Vesco designed the one-piece aluminum grille, an innovation roundly criticized by consumers and insurance adjusters, because, according to its inventor: "You had to pull the whole damn thing out to put in a whole new one and it ran you three times as much money!"

In 1957, Vesco left Detroit to accept a position as an administrative assistant to a New York-based engineering and chemical company. Vesco gained a toehold in the investment world when he bought up two New Jersey manufacturing companies in the 1960s. By the middle of the decade, he had merged them into a major consortium known as International Controls Corporation (ICC). Vesco's October 1967 buy out of Fairfield Aviation was the first of many mergers and acquisitions that established ICC as a major player in world markets. Within three years, company profits climbed from $1.3 million to more than $100 million.

Robert Lee Vesco, who embezzled $224 million from investors in companies he managed; he fled from one country to another, until imprisoned for a scam in Cuba in 1996.

In 1971, Vesco assumed control of Investor's Overseas Services Ltd (IOSLtd), a Geneva-based international mutual fund empire headed up by the enigmatic Bernard Cornfield, himself a target of a Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) probe. Vesco's tactics also left him open to the scrutiny of the SEC. As early as 1971, White House counsel John Dean warned President Richard Nixon about the "potential embarrassment" it might cause the administration if the press were to make an issue about the fact that the president's nephew was employed by Vesco. Dean's concerns were not unfounded.

Vesco and two associates were jailed in Switzerland in 1971 on charges of misusing an IOS Ltd. shareholder's stock. At that time, Vesco's people contacted attorney Harry Sears, who was the New Jersey State Senate majority leader, and chairman of the local committee to reelect Richard Nixon. Sears then contacted Attorney General John Mitchell, who placed a discreet call to the U.S. Embassy in Berne, Switzerland. Further, Richard Vine of the diplomatic corps worked through a CIA operative in Berne, who negotiated with Swiss intelligence officers to do something on Vesco's behalf.

Vesco was released on a $125,000 bail and left Geneva the next day. The grateful Vesco paid Sears a $10,000 "legal fee," and then offered $500,000 in up-front money to Maurice H. Stans, the chief fundraiser for Nixon's 1972 reelection campaign. Stans accepted only $250,000, part of which went to the Watergate "plumbers" as payment for their covert raid on Democratic campaign headquarters in June 1972. Stans and Mitchell were indicted for their roles in the affair, but were acquitted in 1974.

Meanwhile, Vesco was facing more legal problems. In November 1972, the SEC charged him with embezzling $224 million in cash from the overseas mutual funds belonging to investors of IOS Ltd. On the heels of the SEC investigation, the U.S. Department of Justice indicted Vesco for making illegal campaign contributions to Stans and the Committee to Re-Elect Richard Nixon, on a charge of bribery in order to influence a favorable outcome of the government probe into his financial affairs. Facing the possibility of a lengthy jail sentence, Vesco fled the country. He settled in San Jose, Costa Rica, where he remained a fugitive from justice for the next five years, despite persistent State Department efforts to have him extradited.

A month before Vesco was scheduled to become eligible for citizenship, a Costa Rican national named Gerardo Wenceslao Villalobos positioned himself in front of the millionaire's posh suburban home and randomly fired a clip of bullets through the windows. "You do not pay taxes!" Villalobos screamed. "You are corrupting my country!" Vesco survived the attack, but a week later, on June 9, 1977, President Daniel Oduber Quiros ordered him to leave Costa Rica.

The fugitive financier headed for the Bahamas, where he was reportedly reunited with a vast, secret fortune estimated at $50 million he had secreted in Bahamian banks. Vesco remained in the Bahamas for five years, secretly traveling abroad to pursue other lucrative ventures, accruing another fortune through the illegal sale of international arms to third-world countries, especially Libya, a terrorist-sponsored nation headed by Muammar Qaddafi.

The pressure from U.S. officials against Bahamian authorities caused Vesco to move to Cuba, where, in 1982, he was protected by the Communist dictatorship of Fidel Castro, reportedly paying off Castro with millions for the state-sponsored sanctuary. Vesco continued to live in splendor, even in poverty-ridden Cuba. He and his Cuban-born wife, Lidia Alfonsa Lauger, lived in an elegantly furnished villa, maintaining a lavish yacht and a private airplane. Instead of living out his life in comfort, however, the fugitive could not resist the urge to swindle. With the help of some Cuban lab researchers, Vesco developed a drug called TX. He attempted to market the drug abroad, claiming that it would eliminate AIDS.

In May 1995, Vesco and his wife were arrested and charged with crimes against the Cuban state, specifically fraud and illicit economic activities. At his August 1996 trial, Vesco gave a long and rambling account of his marketing activities involving TX, denying any guilt, as did his wife. Both were convicted on August 26, 1996. Vesco was sentenced to thirteen years in prison and his wife Lidia received a nine-year sentence.

THE ADM SCANDAL/1990s

In June 1995, Mark Whitacre, an executive at Archer Daniels Midland (ADM), became one of the most celebrated whistle-blowers in the U.S. by serving as an FBI mole, providing evidence that the agri-business giant firm practiced wholesale price-fixing. Whitacre later described Terrance Wilson, ADM's president of its corn-processing division, as saying: "The competitor is our friend, and the customer is our enemy."

The FBI was initially called by ADM CEO Dwayne Andreas to investigate the company on suspicion that a saboteur was contaminating batches of lysine, which was used in ADM's fermenting process. Lysine, a biochemical feed additive that saw enormous sales through Whitacre's management, took over more than half the world market. Whitacre, believing that the FBI might think he was part of that price-fixing, went to a Bureau agent and offered his services as an informer. He wore a wire and taped countless meetings in which price-fixing was a hallmark of conversation.

On June 27, 1995, the FBI raided ADM's Decatur, Illinois corporate offices and began to interview its top executives, including Whitacre, to make it appear that its mole was no different from the other executives and was also under investigation. Whitacre, against FBI advice, used an ADM attorney who reportedly discovered his undercover activities and exposed him to the ADM hierarchy two days later on June 29.

By 1996, the FBI had built a solid case against ADM, which had the previous year enjoyed $12.7 billion in sales. In a plea-bargaining agreement, ADM, on October 15, 1996, agreed to pay a $100 million fine, the largest ever on record, and an additional $90 million to settle civil suits. As part of the bargain and in exchange for immunity, ADM executives agreed to become witnesses against other firms under investigation for conspiring to rig prices with ADM in the $1.3 billion citric-acid market.

ADM had no problem in paying the fines from on-hand funds of $1.3 billion. Joel Klein, the acting Assistant Attorney General for antitrust, characterized ADM's flagrant price-fixing as "greed, simple greed [which] replaced any sense of corporate decency or integrity." Wall Street wallowed in that greed. At the news of the penalty, ADM's stock rose $1.13 per share to $21.75C-investors had anticipated a much greater fine and upon hearing that ADM would lose only $190 million, the avaricious bolted to buy and buy.

Still, the government was not done with ADM. On January 15, 1997, criminal conspiracy charges were brought against Michael Andreas, the heir-apparent to the CEO throne of ADM, and executives Terrance Wilson and the FBI's own informant, Mark Whitacre. James Griffin, heading the Chicago office of the Department of Justice's antitrust division, described the defendants and their competitors as "people who are supposed to be competing with each other ... They're sitting there divvying up the market. They're sitting there fixing prices. It happens so matter-of-factly."

Michael Andreas leaves a Chicago courtroom on September 17, 1998, after he was convicted of price fixing, along with two other executives of ADM (Archer Daniels Midland).

By the time of this trial, Whitacre had been convicted of embezzling millions of dollars from ADM, and was already serving a nine-year prison sentence. Whitacre, who had at one time after being exposed as an FBI mole attempted to commit suicide, also claimed that $2.5 million of the $9 million his former employer accused him of stealing had been given to him as a secret bonus. He nevertheless pleaded guilty to thirty-seven counts of fraud, money laundering and tax evasion and went to prison.

Other ADM executives also fell from grace. ADM official Reinhard Richter pleaded guilty to conspiring with Whitacre to defraud the company on October 28, 1997, helping to send Whitacre back to prison on March 4, 1998, with an additional sentence. Sidney Hulse, another ADM executive, who had been indicted in 1997 with Whitacre, was sentenced to ten months in prison for fraud and income tax evasion.

After the seven-week 1998 trial, a jury sifted through the complex evidence, tapes and testimony for five days. Jurors had apparently been impressed with the testimony of Kanji Mimoto of Anjinomoto Co., who stated how he fixed prices with ADM executives. They listened to the many tapes secretly recorded by Whitacre. Then, on September 17, 1998, the jury returned a guilty verdict against the 49-year-old Andreas, the 60-year-old Wilson and the 41-year-old Whitacre. Oddly, Andreas and Wilson received slap-on-the-wrist prison sentences, which amounted to only a few months behind bars. Whitacre, however, the cooperative FBI informant, was sentenced to nine years in prison. The ADM scandal was but the forerunner of devastating corporate corruption found in the rotting infrastructures of Enron and Arthur Anderson in 2001-2003.

CHAPTER SEVEN:
GANGS, GANGSTERS AND ORGANIZED CRIME

Criminal gangs existed throughout the world from the time of recorded history, but, other than murder cults such as the Thugs of India, these gangs consisted of small, isolated bands of robbers. In the United States, the origins of organized crime can be found in the 19th Century gangs that controlled the city of New York, from the fearsome Dead Rabbits to the dreaded Whyos (inaccurately depicted in Martin Scorsese's senseless bloodbath film, Gangs of New York, 2002). These gangs instituted the first techniques and operations of organized crime, from extortion to bribery, from control of territorial domains through murder and purchasing government sanctions through political influence, to the national distribution of illegal liquor in the 1920s and the insidious, explosive drug trade of the present day (see Chapter Six, Drugs).

Not until the 1920s, when city gangs across America became all-powerful through millions of dollars gleaned from bootlegging, did the concept of a national crime cartel or syndicate come into existence. This occurred in 1929, when all important city gang bosses were called to a gangster enclave in Atlantic City by Johnny Torrio and Al Capone, then the boss of Chicago. The initial aim of this cartel was to organize a national wire service running through every major city, connecting all bookie parlors and operations with racetrack results. This information was subsequently funneled by wire through the National News Service, owned by Moses L. Annenberg and funded by Capone.

By the early 1930s, a national crime board had been established, which was headed by New York gangsters Charles "Lucky" Luciano, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Meyer Lansky, Joe Adonis, Frank Costello and other young gangsters who shared Torrio's concept of a well-organized crime syndicate. This organization, Torrio said prophetically, would control all rackets and produce not millions but billions of dollars, an organization that would even have its own secret police force to keep peace between the city gangs and enforce the edicts of the syndicate's board of directors.

This lethal police force would be known as Murder, Inc., created by Buchalter and led by Albert Anastasia. This group of syndicate killers received "contracts" (murder assignments) for "hits" (killings), which were cold-bloodedly performed against those who challenged the syndicate's authority. Among the many thousands of such killings was the 1935 syndicate execution of New York gangster Dutch Schultz, who had insisted upon killing New York District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey, defying a syndicate edict to the contrary.

Initially, profits from bootlegging, gambling and prostitution were shared by members of the syndicate, but greater profits emerged when the crime cartel expanded its gambling operations following World War II. It established lavish gambling casinos in Havana, Cuba, a "foreign" investment created by the crafty Meyer Lansky and with the approval of Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista, who received enormous payoffs for allowing these gambling spas to flourish in Havana.

Lansky's protege, the unpredictable Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel, next created America's gambling center in Las Vegas, Nevada, when he established the first lavish casino, The Flamingo, calling the place after the nickname of his mistress and syndicate bag-girl, Virginia Hill. Prostitution was handled in a similar manner, with thousands of women transported across state lines to fill syndicate brothels in dozens of cities, an operation initially overlorded by Luciano.

The old city gangsters either conformed to syndicate rules and worked their territories and rackets as instructed, kicking back as much as fifty percent of the spoils to the syndicate, or they were simply executed, or run out of business. Thus was the fate of New York gangsters Jack "Legs" Diamond, Owney "The Killer" Madden and Chicago mob boss George "Bugs" Moran, who led the last significant rival gang against Capone. Through subsequent decades, the syndicate purged its ranks of its truculent and recalcitrant members, or those suspected of informing against the organization.

Protection for the syndicate came from politicians bribed with millions on the local, state and federal level, and from many instances from crooked police on the syndicate payroll. Worse, the normally "untouchable" Federal Bureau of Investigation was controlled for more than forty years (1924-1972) by Director J. Edgar Hoover, who consistently denied—despite overwhelming evidence to the contrary—that a national crime syndicate in the U.S. ever existed.

It can be safely assumed that Hoover refused to admit to the cartel's presence simply because he knew that his agency was limited in manpower and funds in closing down syndicate operations. By recognizing the national crime syndicate, Hoover would have to wage an all-out war against the cartel, a war he knew he could not completely win, especially since the cartel was supported and abetted by countless powerful politicians. Because of Hoover's truculent, wrong-headed stand throughout his four decades of dictatorial authority, the syndicate was, for the most part, allowed to grow unmolested.

By the late 1980s, the syndicate was no longer dominated by the old Mafia leaders and became a polyglot organization into whose ranks any nationality or race was admitted (although the hierarchy today has remained white and chiefly of Italian-Sicilian background). Blacks, for instance, began to retake rackets they had originated in New York's Harlem in the 1920s, such as policy (numbers).

Mexican and South American crime lords, with the expansion of drug trafficking from those areas from the 1960s onward (see Chapter Five: Drugs), came into great power, so that the U.S. syndicate was forced to share in the supply and distribution of drugs and their huge profits with such foreign syndicate operations as the Medellin drug cartel and other foreign organizations in France, Sicily (the mother country of the Mafia), China (the Triads) and Japan (Yakuza).

NEW YORK'S FIRST MODERN-DAY BOSS/ 1900s-1920s

Paul Kelly (Paulo Antonio Vaccarelli, 1876-1936) became the first modern-day underworld boss in New York, taking over the Five Points Gang at the turn of the 20th Century, a gang which was to spawn Johnny Torrio, Al Capone and a host of other lethal and later celebrated gangster bosses. Kelly, with his close political ties to the corrupt Tammany Hall political machine, controlled with absolute power the Five Points and neighboring districts, exacting tribute on all illegal activities.

This clever criminal became a bantam prizefighter at an early age in the 1890s, changing his name from Vaccarelli to Paul Kelly. Assuming an Irish name for the ring was then the custom. With his prize money, Kelly invested in several whorehouses east of the Bowery in the squalid Italian District. From his bordello proceeds, he then set up various "athletic clubs" which were fronts for youthful gangs, which came under his direct control. Having this army of thugs at his disposal, Kelly approached Tammany sachem Big Tim Sullivan to offer his political services in the frantic 1901 campaign for the Second Assembly District.

The hotly contested primary race was between Paddy Divver, an old-time saloon keeper and incumbent Tammany leader, and Tom Foley, who had Sullivan's undivided support. The issue was simple. Divver's banners stretched across all the streets of his area. They read: "Don't let the Red Lights into the old Fourth Ward." Paul Kelly knew all about the Red Lights, and they meant money. He went to Sullivan and told him that his hordes of "repeaters" could put the primary into Foley's pocket. Sullivan enlisted Kelly and his minions on the spot, thus establishing the first powerhouse connection between organized crime and politics in America.

On September 17, 1901, the primary proved to be the most savage in the history of the city, and the Second Assembly District was turned into a madhouse of mayhem and brutality. Kelly's thugs, numbering more than 1,500 men, swarmed into the area. Divver men were blackjacked openly in the street, held off from the polls by gun-wielding gangsters, driven down the streets by crowds of club smashing Five Pointers. Kelly's men filed into the polling places repeating their votes time and again. "I got in fifty-three votes," one thug smilingly exclaimed to a Kelly lieutenant.

Kelly was thoughtful enough to provide mobile commissaries at the polling places, where his hard-working repeaters were given breakfast and luncheon, whiskey and cigars, and even benches to sit on while awaiting their next turn to vote. Dozens of police squads stood by while the travesty went on and did nothing. Foley won the primary, three to one, and subsequently the election. The Red Lights moved into the district, and most of them belonged to Paul Kelly. The prostitution concession for the area was given over wholly to Kelly by Sullivan and Foley. The always enterprising Kelly instituted a cheaper way for men to enjoy quick pleasure. He imported more than 1,000 women, most of them destitute Italian girls in their teens from the Five Points and elsewhere and peopled the Second Assembly District with streetwalkers. None of these girls worked in Kelly's regular brothels, but stood in the doorways of rickety residences and sold their bodies for fifty cents a trick; half of this income went directly to Kelly.

Five Points gang leader Paul Kelly, New York's first big boss, shown in a 1905 sketch.

His fortunes rising and his position of power in the underworld unchallenged, it was a wonder to everyone when Paul Kelly was suddenly arrested for assaulting and robbing a man in the street. Not until years later was it learned that Kelly's act was not for self-gain, but that he was merely exercising his leadership in that he periodically had to perform a criminal act to prove his worthiness as gang chieftain, a ritual Kelly himself instituted.

The police, working under Big Tim's orders, so changed the charges of the arrest, that Kelly received, instead of the expected ten to twenty years in jail, a mere nine-month term. An enraged New York judge, John Goff, who sentenced him, exploded: "The conduct of the police in this case was shameful. They discharged the defendant in the face of all the facts. It shows an absence of honesty and good faith on the part of the police. It was not until you [Kelly] had committed another assault that they were shamed into making an arrest. You should have been convicted of highway robbery. Instead, you were convicted of assault only."

Kelly did his nine-month stint, and upon his release Big Tim and Kelly's phalanxes of gangsters welcomed him with open arms. Kelly immediately launched his Paul Kelly Association, his old athletic clubs gimmick, to enlist apprentice hoodlums, pimps, pickpockets, strong-arm thugs, and, chiefly, repeaters for hire on election day. The price for the latter was prostitution and gambling monopolies in the districts his men delivered.

Headquartering in his sprawling cafe and dance hall, the New Brighton, termed "a vile saloon" by authorities and squatting just west of the Bowery on Great Jones Street, Kelly ruled his criminal fiefdom adorned in a tuxedo and black tie, greeting socialites who loved to go slumming in his dive. By 1905, this slight, well-groomed gangster practiced all the graces of good company. He spoke Italian, French, and Spanish fluently. His manners were seemingly faultless, and his conversation reflected education and sophistication. All the while, his killer legions spread throughout Manhattan and even into New Jersey.

Kelly's lieutenants aped their boss in dress and conduct, but they were awkward imitations. There was Richie Fitzpatrick, Max "Kid Twist" Zwerbach, Johnny Spanish (Joseph Wyler), Razor Riley, and the hulking James T. "Biff" Ellison. Many of Kelly's men had been recruited from other gangs and some of them, like Ellison and Riley, later became disenchanted with their subservient roles.

A 1903 police photo of Lower East Side gang leader Edward "Monk" Eastman, Kelly's nemesis.

Eastman (Edward Osterman), shown in a 1902 sketch, commanded more than 1,200 thugs.

Kelly's top enforcer, Maxwell "Kid Twist" Zwerbach, who took over Eastman's rackets in 1904.

Kid Twist was killed on Kelly's orders after he defied the crime boss, shot in 1908.

Kid Twist Zwerbach and Johnny Spanish worked only briefly in the Kelly ranks. Zwerbach soon joined Kelly's arch rival, Edward Monk Eastman, who controlled the vast Lower East Side of New York. Kid Twist was an expert shot and killed on orders, which pleased Eastman no end, so that soon Zwerbach was Eastman's chief lieutenant. Following Eastman's imprisonment in 1904, Zwerbach would battle for control of the Eastman empire with Richie Fitzpatrick, who also left Kelly's employ to join the Eastman gang. Spanish also left Kelly's forces to operate as a lone wolf holdup man and extortionist, preying on the gangsters themselves, a tactic that brought about his death at the hands of Nathan "Kid Dropper" Kaplan, a rising gangster of the 1920s.

It was Monk Eastman who caused most of Kelly's headaches. The wild ex-bouncer turned mob boss controlled for twenty years the sprawling Lower East Side and a gangster force estimated at one time to be more than 2,000 gun-carrying killers. Kelly's Five Pointers, fierce as they were, could not match such overwhelming numbers. Moreover, Kelly found it impossible to reason with Monk, a man who would rather club a person on the head rather than say hello. Eastman was an old-fashioned crime boss, a thug through-and-through, and he had no use for the cultured Kelly, sneering at the fact that Kelly spoke four languages, read books, and appreciated fine art and classical music.

Eastman proved to be his own undoing. He ignored the dictates of Tammany, which controlled both the Eastman and Kelly forces, and raided indiscriminately into Five Points territory. Unlike the modern crime boss, who gave orders and remained aloof from criminal activities, Eastman felt compelled, except for an occasional job, to prove his mettle. He was forever joining his men in the street to help them in committing the crimes he orchestrated. No caper was beneath him, even though he was close to being a millionaire. (All of his lieutenants, Zwerbach, Spanish, Fitzpatrick, left considerable estates following their bloody deaths. Zwerbach's estimated to be almost $250,000.) It was Eastman's proclivity for committing common thievery that ended his career as a crime boss. He robbed a wealthy young man one night and was caught. Monk was surprised to learn that his normal Tammany protection had disappeared. The politicians warned Eastman to keep a low profile. He ignored that caution and his bosses allowed him to be convicted and sent to Sing Sing.

With the imprisonment of Eastman, Paul Kelly's criminal empire went unmolested for several years. Then, in November 1908, Biff Ellison and Razor Riley made their move to unseat their boss. Ellison, an expert with a blackjack who had, years before with Chuck Connors, built up the protection rackets from terrified shopkeepers around Chatham Square, was angry with Kelly for not having made him the bouncer of the New Brighton Cafe after Kelly's chief bouncer "Eat 'Em-Up" Jack McManus had been killed. Razor Riley was incensed when Kelly personally threw him out of his cafe for creating a disturbance.

Both Ellison and Riley decided to simply walk into the gang chief's headquarters and shoot him. Kelly was seated near the dance floor on that fatal night and was deep in conversation with his bodyguards, Bill Harrington and Rough House Hogan. Harrington's girlfriend, Goldie the Blonde, was just serving the trio drinks, when Ellison and Riley ran into the cafe. When both killers were not more than ten feet away, Harrington spotted them and shouted: "Look out, boss!" He dumped Kelly from his chair. Riley then sent a bullet at Harrington, which crashed through his brain and killed him. Hogan fired off a shot that made Riley dive for cover.

Paul Kelly emerged from beneath the table with a revolver in either hand. He blazed away at Ellison, who returned his fire. Then the lights went out as screaming foxtrotters scrambled for the exits. Gunfire flashed through the New Brighton for five minutes until a squad of police crept inside. Ellison and Riley, both slightly wounded, ran out exit doors and disappeared. Kelly was found with three bullets in him and, before police could arrest him, was spirited to a private hospital. He turned himself in a month later to police, but, thanks to his political connections, no charges were pressed.

Ellison was finally captured in 1911, sent to prison and, after going insane, died in an asylum some years later. Razor Riley, holed up in a Chinatown basement and died before police could find him. He had contracted pneumonia in his dank hideout. The raid on the New Brighton, which was ordered closed by Police Commissioner William McAdoo, mostly for the protection of slumming socialites, marked the beginning of the end of Paul Kelly's hold on the underworld of New York. Kelly moved into an Italian community in Harlem and opened another night spot called Little Naples, but his power waned and he was reduced to operating strike-breaking squads in labor squabbles. He soon retired and lived to see the last of the roaring gangsters spend their quick lives in bloody battles for the bootleg control of the city. Paul Kelly died in bed on April 3, 1936.

"I WANT ROSENTHAL CROAKED!"/1910s

Of the myriad bribe-taking cops in New York during the late 1890s and early 1900s, none was more venal and corrupt than Charles Becker (1870-1915), who was, at one time or another, on Paul Kelly's payroll. Unlike Kelly, Becker operated on both sides of the law to serve his avaricious ends. The image of the crooked cop without conscience, compassion, or remorse for his ruthless acts was devastatingly summed up in the character of Charles Becker, a lieutenant of the New York Police Department. Becker made a fortune by protecting New York City gamblers, until he decided that one of these sharpers should be killed, and he ordered the murder of Herman Rosenthal.

This blatant slaying by hired killers under Becker's command eventually led Becker to the electric chair, but long before that, a decade before, Becker ruled the gambling empire of New York City. His word was law and to break his law was to face unendurable punishment, ruination, and early death. Becker's dark career began in the heart of New York City, or, to be exact, in its Tenderloin, the most exciting, dramatic and vice-ridden area of America at the time. This land of payoff and kickback was far from the green, comfortable hills where Charles Becker was born on July 26, 1870.

NYPD Lieutenant Charles Becker, the crooked cop who ran gambling in New York.

The sixth child of ten, Becker was born in Callicoon Center, New York, a hamlet in the foothills of the Catskills in Sullivan County. He was a large boy and did not shirk fights. At home he was truculent and slow to obey his parents. At school he was even slower to complete assignments. Yet, his honesty was never questioned and he excelled in athletics and manual labor. By the time he was eighteen, he had developed a tall, powerful body with broad shoulders, massive arms, and enormous hands that, when doubled into fists, were like the flat sides of two stonemason hammers.

Becker in uniform, after being promoted to the rank of lieutenant in the NYPD.

At this time Becker bid farewell to his family and rural life, and traveled to New York City to see a German baker, who was a friend of his father's. The baker gave him a job and a room above the bakery, which was in the German section of the city in the old Seventh Ward. To the south was the Bowery and to the north was the wealth of Manhattan which beckoned like a beacon fire to the ambitious Becker. After a brief affair with the baker's daughter, which found Becker confronting the baker and being ordered from his establishment.

Becker, at nineteen, then went to work as a waiter at The Atlantic Gardens, a sprawling beer spa that had once been the pride of the German community, where nickel beer and free lunches were offered. With the ending of the Civil War, this great gathering area was no longer patronized by hard-working middleclass customers, but was overrun with criminals of all types. By 1889, when Becker went to work there, the place was populated at night by gamblers, thugs from the Bowery, and prostitutes plying their trade. The well-built, no-nonsense Becker found himself knocking the heads of thugs, who created disturbances. He soon built a reputation as a man who could best almost any plug-ugly with a mind to starting trouble.

The job of bouncer was offered to Becker, and the 21-year-old accepted, working in another beer garden. Here he became known as a brutal overseer no thug would think to anger. Even the most fierce of the early day New York gangsters such as Edward "Monk" Eastman gave Becker a wide berth. Eastman not only grew to respect the quick-fisted Becker, but he befriended him, taking him to his political sponsor, Timothy "Big Tim" Sullivan, the powerful head of Tammany for the entire East Side of Manhattan. Sullivan used Eastman and his fearsome gang as strikebreakers and political strong-arm thugs, who made sure that every election was a Tammany triumph. Tammany also dictated the politics for the entire city at that time and Sullivan lived like a czar, making appointments to political and police posts at his will and whim. Sullivan sized up Becker as someone above the status of an ordinary thug, a young man with intelligence and street savvy, one, who not only would be loyal to Tammany, but to Sullivan himself.

The police force, Sullivan concluded, was the right spot for Charles Becker. In 1893 Becker paid a $250 fee to Tammany for his appointment to the police force. This was customary and was publicly known and excused, at least by the political sachems who ran things, as a way of assuring the fact that men known to the organization, who were screened as good candidates by Tammany and were not strangers with criminal records, were thus brought onto the force. The screening process cost Tammany money and the applicant was merely paying back the organization's investment. Such money was no small investment. At the time, $250 was one-third the yearly pay of an average cop on the NYPD. The force at that time had more than 5,000 men on the streets, all of them white and most of them, like Becker, Catholic.

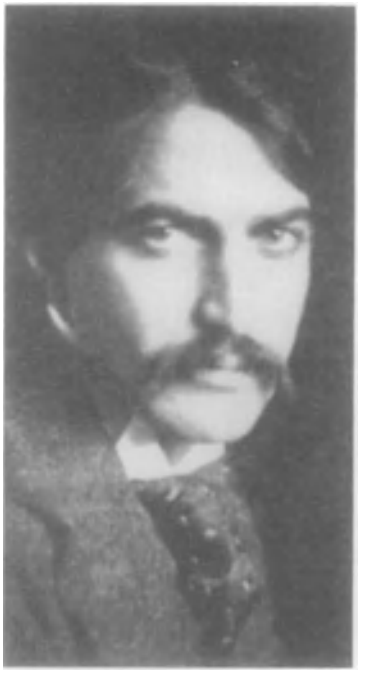
The type of police officer the NYPD then hired and kept on the force was not very much different than the type of thug, who worked for Monk Eastman, except that they wore uniforms and never openly committed theft. Patrolmen were burly, big men who used their long nightsticks to club anyone getting in their way, either innocent citizen or hooligan. To ask a question of the beat cop in those days was to risk being poked in the chest with his stick and hustled down the street for bothering an officer of the law. The man who established and maintained this hardboiled attitude was Inspector Alexander "Clubber" Williams, who was infamous for his brutality and ruthless manner.

It was the grafting Williams who gave the wide-open vice district its name. He had been serving in a West Side precinct in the 1870s and when he was transferred to the choice area, he remarked to a newsman: "I've been living on chuck steak for a long time. Now I'm gonna get me some of the tenderloin." Williams supervised an area that stretched approximately between Twenty-third and Forty-fourth streets and between Third and Seventh Avenues, this being the old Twenty-ninth Precinct. Here could be found the best hotels, the finest theaters and restaurants, as well as hundreds of posh gambling dens, lavish bordellos, and vice dens of all sorts, a plum for grafting policemen such as Williams.

During the Lexow Committee Hearings, which began just about the time Becker joined the force, Inspector Williams was the focal point of an investigation into police graft. Prosecuting counsel John Goff, who, ironically, was to preside over Becker's own first murder trial almost twenty years later, revealed that Williams had more than $250,000 in the bank, owned a mansion and a yacht, and lived like a king. Williams boldly admitted that he took what he liked in the district he controlled and he was later dismissed from the force, though never prosecuted. His was the enduring image that etched itself into the mind of the ambitious Charles Becker. He, too, would someday preside over the Tenderloin and make his own fortune.

Tammany boss Timothy "Big Tim" Sullivan, who protected Becker's extortion rackets.

Long before that time, however, Becker found himself in continuous trouble, so much trouble that he gleaned more press coverage in that day than any other common cop on the force. At first Becker was assigned to the Fulton Street area and later, due to the strings of his mentor, Inspector Williams, moved to the Tenderloin. It was here that he ran headlong into the famous writer, Stephen Crane, who had seen him years earlier on a dark street pounding the face of a helpless prostitute who had failed to pay him off that night.



Writer Stephen Crane (1871-1900) encountered Becker in a beer garden, where he defended a prostitute against the crooked cop's bullying tactics.

Crane had established himself as one of America's finest authors the previous year, in 1895, with the publication of The Red Badge of Courage, and was the toast of New York at the age of twenty-four. He disdained the literary parties and salons, preferring the company of Bowery lowlifes, bums, and apprentice hoodlums and their women, mostly prostitutes. He had long taken the view that the beat cop in New York was nothing more than a thug in uniform and had been writing a series of articles exposing their grafting, brutal ways, communicating with the new police commissioner, Theodore Roosevelt. On the night of September 15, 1896, Crane found himself at the Broadway Gardens, assigned by the editors of the New York Journal to write about the underworld types who crowded the tables there. With him were two streetwalkers of his acquaintance and they were joined by another prostitute named Dora Clark. At 3 a.m., Crane put one of the girls on a streetcar, and when he returned to the sidewalk, he found the large, lumbering Becker arresting his other two friends for soliciting. Crane stepped forth and said one woman was his wife. Becker, who was later described by Crane as "picturesque as a wolf," then reached out and grabbed the other girl, Dora Clark, arresting only her on charges of prostitution. As he dragged the girl off, Crane protested and Becker smirked, snarling: "You ain't married to both of 'em, are you?"

Rushing to the Tenderloin station house, Crane obtained Becker's name and badge number, then told newsmen that "whatever her character [that of Dora Clark], the arrest was an outrage. The policeman flatly lied!" Crane appeared as a witness for Clark later in court, where Becker insisted that he had seen the woman solicit two men within five minutes. Crane told the presiding magistrate that this was a boldfaced lie, that he had been with the woman for several hours and nothing of the kind had happened.

Towering gang leader Big Jack Zelig (William Alberts), who enforced Becker's extortion demands on New York's gamblers and was later murdered before he could testify on Becker's behalf.

Dora Clark then testified that she had been persecuted for several months by Becker and other policemen in the area because she had resisted the advances of a cop named Rosenberg. This officer had solicited sex from Dora and she, thinking he was black because of his swarthy complexion, had replied: "How dare you speak to a decent white woman!" Calling the officer black when he was not was thought by fellow officers to be the worst insult their ranks could receive and Dora Clark had been marked for vengeance, or so she said.

After listening to the statements, the magistrate, who had recently received a favorable profile by Crane, shocked Becker and dozens of other officers, who had lent him support, by siding with Crane and accepting his version of the events. Dora Clark was released. Becker had received his first minor setback, but this incident was nothing compared to his next ill-fated news notice. Becker was working the graveyard shift on September 20, 1896, with another officer named Carey when, close to dawn, the two patrolmen saw three men flee from a tobacco shop carrying sacks of loot. They gave chase, shouting for the burglars to halt. Though heavyset, Becker was fast on his feet and he caught up with one of the burglars, bringing him down with one blow from his nightstick. A second burglar outdistanced the officers. Then one of the officers, it was never determined which one, shot the third from some distance. This escapade was played up in the press and Becker was hailed as a hero.

The dead man, Becker insisted, was a notorious second-story man named John O'Brien. There was talk of giving Becker a commendation and an important promotion until, three days later, the relatives of the slain man identified him as 19-year-old John Fay, a plumber's assistant. Fay had accidentally stepped in the line of fire which both Becker and Carey knew, Fay's family claimed, but they assumed no one would inquire about a dead young man they were passing off as a notorious thief. John Fay's reputation had been tarnished, his relatives said, so that a pair of "gun-happy killers" could make the police force look good in the press. Becker and Carey were suspended for a month and were privately warned by their superiors to make sure of their targets in the future.

By the time Becker returned to his post in the Tenderloin, he was surprised to see Commissioner Roosevelt come into the precinct station to review the men there. He singled out Becker, shook his hand, and commended him for his considerable bravery in taking on thieves face to face, but then he turned and told the entire group that they should all be more careful in their treatment of "unfortunate women," that even these fallen angels had the same rights as law-abiding citizens. In this way, without singling Becker out, Roosevelt had subtly upbraided him.

Becker, however, was not a man of subtleties. He proved that when he sought out Dora Clark in October 1896 and beat her until he blackened both her eyes and broke her nose. He was stopped by fellow officers from choking her to death. He left her on the sidewalk, warning her that she would "wind up in the river" if she ever again accused a New York cop of anything. But Dora was stubborn and brought charges against Becker. A police hearing was held, the longest on record up to that time, and Becker got off with a casual reprimand.

It appeared to Becker that his political influence through Big Tim Sullivan was not only intact, but would protect him against any pesky citizen daring to challenge his authority. On one occasion Becker arrested a society woman whom he accused of soliciting. She turned out to be perfectly innocent, having said goodbye to one of her lawyers on the street after a meeting in his office. Becker, confronted with the testimony of the lawyer, gave the man his usual sneer, refusing to back down and stating: "I know a whore when I see one!" He was reprimanded and sent back to the street where, a short time later, he arrested another woman who approached him and asked directions to the subway. He mumbled something to her she did not understand and she questioned him again. Annoyed, Becker grabbed the poor woman and ran her into the station house, booking her as a common drunk.

The woman, however, was the wife of a New Jersey manufacturer. This incident caused Becker's superiors to slavishly apologize to both the woman and her influential husband, and even Becker's political sponsor, Big Tim Sullivan, had to step in and persuade the couple not to sue. Sullivan had a quiet talk with his protege, telling him that he had to be more cautious in the future when arresting women. He had plans for Becker, Sullivan told him, big plans, so it was important that he maintain an unblemished record.

Some time later, however, the easy-to-anger Becker, while on a raid against a gambling house, was shoved by a gambler, who boasted of his political influence. Becker, who was alone in the room with the man at the time, pulled a pistol and shot the gambler dead, later claiming that the man pulled a gun. No witnesses were present to contradict him, but Becker's superiors again had a quiet talk with him, warning him severely to keep his hand off his gun unless it was absolutely necessary to use it. To make sure that he got the point, Becker was suspended for a month. The hamhock-fisted officer took this time to marry Vivian Atteridge. He had been married briefly in 1905 to a pretty young girl named Mary Mahoney, but she had died nine months later of tuberculosis. The marriage to Atteridge would last only a few months, ending when Becker divorced her. Atteridge would remarry in 1907, wedding Becker's brother John, who was also a member of the NYPD.

Before his excursion into matrimony, Becker came under the direct command of Captain Max Schmittberger in 1901. Schmittberger had been the very man who had exposed the corrupt practices of Inspector Alexander Williams. Though Clubber Williams was no longer on the force, he acted as an adviser to Becker, who had long ago embraced the Clubber's philosophy of brute force. Becker, by then a roundsman (one status above patrolman, similar to the rank of corporal), was known by Schmittberger to be a Williams partisan and, as such, was treated coldly and suspiciously by his superior. Schmittberger was thought of as a squealer and a turncoat, who had exposed his own people to the Lexow Committee and, as such, many high-rankers on the force wanted to see this man disgraced and deposed. It was with this in mind that Commissioner Theodore Bingham and later Commissioner Rhinelander Waldo, who had been told by angry police officials that Schmittberger was corrupt, secretly ordered Becker to dig up evidence that would expose Schmittberger. The police captain knew this, of course, and moved to get rid of Becker by having him transferred to another precinct. After meeting with Williams, Becker filed malfeasance charges against Schmittberger. The enraged captain filed countercharges, but all of these charges were dropped after Commissioner Bingham brought the aggrieved parties together and told them to forget their differences for the sake of the department.

For some time, little was heard of Charles Becker. He may have concluded that the ways of Clubber Williams could do little to advance his career and he maintained a low profile for several years, keeping his record clean. Then, in 1904, Becker suddenly received the department's highest award for heroism, which put his name back into the headlines. He had seen a young man in the Hudson River struggling to stay afloat. Fully clothed and without a moment's hesitation, Becker jumped into the river and pulled the man to safety. He turned out to be an unemployed clerk named James Butler, who blubbered his thanks to a grinning Becker before newsmen who had conveniently been called to the scene.

Butler praised Becker to the newsmen as one of the bravest fellows he had ever seen, explaining that a plank he was walking on gave way and he fell into the River near 10th Street. But it was only a week later that Butler called up the same newsmen and complained that Becker had reneged on his promise. What promise was that, he was asked. Becker, Butler explained, had offered him $15 to jump into the Hudson so that he could jump in after him and appear to be the great hero. But Becker had never paid him the $15 and now Butler was angry at having ruined his only suit for nothing. Becker denied the whole story, laughing at the idea, which he called preposterous. By then he had his medal and a promotion to sergeant.

New York gambler Herman "Beansie" Rosenthal, who refused to pay Becker protection money and was marked for murder by the crooked cop.

A short time later, through his Tammany contacts, Becker was promoted to lieutenant and he began to make his moves against the posh gambling and vice dens of the Tenderloin. One story held that about 1907, Becker made the rounds of all the largest gambling dens and demanded $15 payment a week for himself even though the gamblers explained that they had already paid their "protection" money. After collecting $150, Becker was called into Schmittberger's office and the captain told him to put the money down on his desk, explaining that he knew exactly how much he had collected. Becker tossed the money on the desk and Schmittberger handed him back $15, telling him that that amount was his end, ten per cent, and from that day forward he would be Schmittberger's personal bagman and receive ten percent of everything he collected.

Becker the bagman went to work with a vengeance, becoming rich in the course of the next few years. But in 1911, Police Commissioner Rhinelander Waldo decided to crack down on the Tenderloin gamblers after being goaded by scores of enraged reformers objecting to the blatant vice district. Waldo felt that Schmittberger was at the core of the rotten apple in the Tenderloin. Years earlier he had, as a Deputy Police Commissioner, met with Becker secretly, ordering him to get evidence against Schmittberger, not knowing, of course, that Becker was Schmittberger's bagman and heir apparent to wholesale graft in the precinct. Becker, quite naturally, agreed to the secret investigation, sitting as he was in the catbird's seat, able to provide snippets of information on his captain without ever giving Waldo enough evidence to bring about Schmittberger's removal.

Gambler Arnold Rothstein warned Rosenthal to pay off Becker; Rothstein "fixed" the 1919 World Series and was killed in 1928.

At the same time Becker made himself look good to downtown superiors by appearing to energetically attack the gambling and vice dens by conducting incessant raids against these places. Yet he went on making enormous illicit profits from the gamblers he was protecting, satisfying both Waldo and his protection-paying gambling dens. In 1911 Becker organized and led 203 raids into the Tenderloin, where he and his men made 898 arrests which resulted in 103 convictions, a staggering record that outwardly made Becker look like a law enforcement crusader. But what the record also showed, if one dug deeper, were sentences that amounted to next to nothing.

Most of the convictions ended in suspended sentences or small fines seldom exceeding $50. Waldo blamed the court system and corrupt judges for such leniency, and to some extent he was correct, since many judges were then, as before and after this golden age of kickbacks and payoffs, on the take. Becker, however, was the man who manipulated these judicial decisions. He simply ordered his men, when appearing in court, to have loss of memory as to the particulars of the raids they conducted. They conveniently misplaced or lost vital evidence that would have assured strong sentences. Faced with this type of shallow prosecution, judges were compelled to issue light sentences. The whole system worked both ways for Charles Becker.

"Bald Jack" Rose, a Becker henchman who monitored Rosenthal's gambling profits, and helped to set up the gambler's murder.

Reporter and gambler Herbert Bayard Swope exposed Becker and his gang.

By late 1910, Becker operated autonomously as the head of the gambling squad. Because of the violent manner in which the squad often tore apart gambling dens (those who had been slow to make payoffs), the group was known as "the strong-arm squad." Becker's word was law in the Tenderloin by then and he paid nothing to Schmittberger, who had been neutralized and later ousted by Big Tim Sullivan. Becker, after minor payoffs to his own officers, split his payoffs only with Big Tim and this further enriched his own coffers by tens of thousands of dollars. To keep the gamblers and vice lords in line, Becker, through Big Tim, employed the worst gang of thugs in New York to perform beatings and even murder, chores too messy for his own corrupt policemen.

Gangster Monk Eastman had been sent to prison by then, abandoned by Tammany as uncontrollable and had been replaced by Jacob "Big Jack" Zelig (William Alberts), a towering, fierce thug who had been Eastman's right-hand man, a gangster more cunning than Eastman, one who knew how to keep his organization in line. Zelig and his host of killers worked directly under Becker's orders, going on his payroll, but being directed in their nefarious activities by gamblers who took their orders from Becker.

If any of these gangsters ever disobeyed Becker's dictates, he merely had them arrested for violating the Sullivan Law, a law ironically put on the books by none other than Big Tim when, in 1909, he decided to return to the state senate. A disloyal or disobedient gangster would be dragged into court and charged by Becker's minions with carrying concealed firearms, thus violating the Sullivan Law. This carried with it a mandatory eight-year prison sentence. Of course, when this law went into record, the gangsters never carried firearms, unless on the job. Becker got around this by simply having his men provide "throw-away" guns or spare pistols and automatics which were supplied by police officers in quickly convicting a gangster, who did not cooperate with the system. Herbert Bayard Swope, later the chief journalist covering the Becker-Rosenthal murder, would later write that "Becker was the System. Like Caesar, all things were rendered unto Becker in the underworld. Like Briareus, he had a hundred arms...and more power in the Department than the Commissioner."

But Becker was not without competition. A number of other lieutenants under his command lusted for his powerful position and they would do just about anything to come within the good graces of Big Tim Sullivan, the Tammany sachem and real czar of influence and power in New York. Big Tim was many times a millionaire with villas, mansions, yachts, and endless sources of cash. Big Tim had been on the take since Boss Richard Croker abandoned his leadership at Tammany in 1901, retiring to the French Riviera with his own millions hustled from the city. Yet Big Tim had no ambitions to retire. His greed rooted him to this post, knowing that the Alexandrian philosophy of dividing and controlling his henchmen, Becker included, was the key to the flowing cornucopia of graft. Becker knew this, too, and that Big Tim would quickly replace him at any time if convenient.

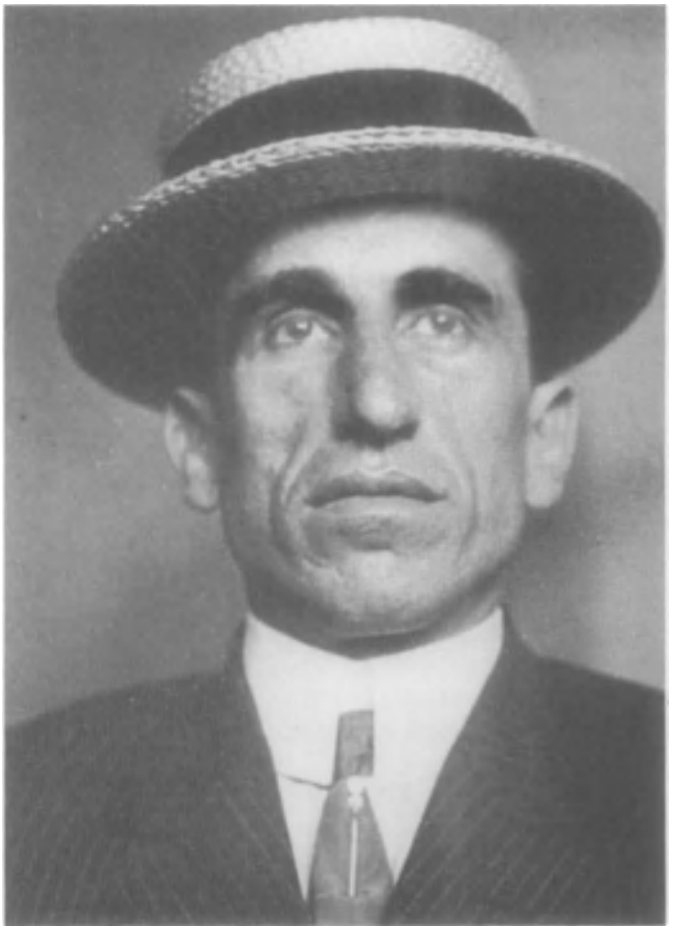
To strengthen his own position, Becker shrewdly began to cultivate certain members of the press as early as 1910, giving crime reporters inside tips on raids and making sure that he and only he received glorification in print. He even went so far as to hire Charles Plitt as his press agent, who made sure that the newspapers were informed of Becker's daily activities, or those that made him look like a police hero to the public.

Thus, for two years up to the Rosenthal killing, Becker overshadowed almost every policeman in the department, except for the commissioner. This caused Becker to undoubtedly become the most disliked member of the department, but he was also the most dangerous. As such, no officer dared to openly criticize or confront him. The specter of Big Tim cast a shadow across every precinct and towering inside that shadow was Charles Becker.

Becker's alliances with the press would later backfire on him, although he reaped numerous benefits for a short time from his liaisons with crime beat reporters. In late 1911, a reporter warned Becker that there was a conspiracy within the department to have him framed as a bagman, and Becker, fearing this report was real, went straight to Commissioner Waldo, asking that he be assigned to another position other than heading the "strong-arm" squad. Perhaps by then he had amassed what he considered to be the fortune that would take him comfortably through retirement. Perhaps his meeting with Waldo was nothing more than a fishing expedition. Waldo assured him that he was not being investigated, that he was doing an excellent job, and that he should keep up the good work. Becker went back to being the czar of the Tenderloin. There was, however, some truth to the reporter's tip. Waldo had been receiving letters from an informant using an alias. One of these letters, received in March 1912, stated: "I would like to have you investigate quietly Lieutenant Becker. He is now collecting more money than Devery [Big Bill Devery, New York's thoroughly corrupt chief of police during the 1890s], and it is well-known to everyone at Police Headquarters. Please do this and you will be surprised at the result."

This letter, incredibly, was sent by Waldo straight to Becker. It was the commissioner's policy, as sort of a naive procedure of fair play, to send such blind accusations to the officers being accused so that they could respond directly. In reality, the officer accused of misconduct was expected to investigate himself and dutifully report on his own wrongdoings. Of course, such officers never found credence in any of these accusations, all of them to the last letter being the work of cranks and malcontents.

Becker shrewdly went one step further and returned this letter to Waldo, saying prudently that he was not in a position to react to such a document and that perhaps it would be better if the commissioner were to send this letter on to another person in the department. He knew that such a straightforward response would all the more readily confirm in Waldo's mind that he, Charles Becker, was beyond reproach and nothing more would come of the accusation, which is exactly what happened. Waldo's decision to simply file this and other letters concerning Becker's wholesale graft as crank mail later caused him much embarrassment.



Harry Vallon, one of Becker's thugs, remained in contact with the murder gang ordered to kill Rosenthal and was present at the Metropole Hotel on the night of the murder.

Becker, unlike the high-living Sullivan and former police bigwigs who had taken payoffs with both hands for years, kept a low profile outside of his police duties. He was a conservative and cautious crook, secreting his illegal loot in so many banks that most of his fortune was never fully tracked down, even years after he was executed. He continued to live in a modest apartment at 159th and Edgecomb Avenue with his third wife, Helen, whom he had married in 1905 after his divorce from Vivian Atteridge. Helen was a schoolteacher, born in 1874 and a dedicated educator who went on teaching slow high school learners at P.S. 90 for $1,820 a year, even in 1912, when her husband had amassed a reported $1 to $2 million. As a couple, they enjoyed simple pleasures such as horseback riding and gardening. They planned to build a modest house in the near future. Helen would later defend her husband with a fierce loyalty that saw her pleading for his life right up to the last second, abandoning her pride to prostrate herself before Governor Charles Seymour Whitman, the very man who had convicted her husband when he was New York's District Attorney. No matter what evidence was later put before her, Helen Becker refused to believe that her husband, whom she called Charlie-Lover (he called her My Queen), ever committed a single illegal act. Charles Becker was an honest man, Helen insisted, a simple man from a large family; she never tired of saying how she, like her husband, came from a family with ten children.

The one self-indulgence practiced by Becker was taking his grateful wife to the best restaurants in town. They dined with political dynamos and business tycoons, who curried Becker's favor. They feasted upon sumptuous meals at Rector's, Sharkey's, Sherry's, Luchow's, and never picked up a check. When going to dinner or an occasional show, the Beckers rode in chauffeur-driven limousines owned by such people as millionaire broker Henry Sternberger. Although Helen Becker did not know them by profession, scores of other men would table-hop to sit with the Beckers and whisper in her husband's ear before moving away, men glittering with diamonds and mouthing conspiratorial conversations. These were the top Tenderloin gamblers, not the least of whom were young sharpers, who had come under the protective arms of Big Tim Sullivan, chiefly Arnold Rothstein and Herman "Beansie" Rosenthal. Sullivan had mentioned these two gamblers by name to Becker, telling him that he felt "paternal" toward both these two young Jewish sharpers and would like to see their careers blossom.

Gambler and Broadway roustabout Louis "Bridgie" Webber (front, left), who kept track of Rosenthal's whereabouts to mark him for murder.

It was not surprising therefore that Becker went out of his way to befriend the more social of the pair, Rosenthal, when meeting him at an Elks' Club Ball on New Year's Eve 1911. At the time, Becker sent Helen home and stayed to get drunk with the pudgy young gambler, or pretended to be drunk, displaying an inordinate amount of affection toward a man he had just met, throwing his bear-like arms around Rosenthal, kissing him on the cheeks several times and then lumbering onto a table and shouting to all his cronies: "Boys, Herman Rosenthal is my best friend and anything he wants, he gets!" He got down and hugged the gambler once more. "Anything in the world for you, Herman. I'll get up at three o'clock in the morning to do you a favor! You can have anything I've got!" Becker then called three of his top officers over and told them: "This is my best pal and you do anything he wants you to do."

Becker continued to cultivate this strange new friendship by meeting with Rosenthal at the Lafayette Turkish baths, at the Elks' Club, and various restaurants. In the Turkish baths the hulking Becker would sit, towel-wrapped, next to the chubby, flabby Rosenthal and pump him subtly about the strength of Big Tim's support. Rosenthal told him that Big Tim had authorized a new, posh club, which Rosenthal intended to call The Hesper Club, that would be opened shortly. Becker not only promised him protection for this club, but went on to tell the gambler that he was "getting hold of a lot of money" through the easy efforts of his strong-arm squad, and that he might be interested in investing in The Hesper Club. Of course, Becker was making a bid to short-cut Big Tim's own investment in the club, so that he would be on an equal footing with Sullivan at the interest level of many clubs. Becker's ambition was still white-hot and he undoubtedly was thinking of somehow supplanting Big Tim as he had Schmittberger.

Thanks to Providence, Becker did exactly that. In the spring of 1912, Big Tim's dissolute lifestyle caught up with him. He was seized by paresis of the brain, generally caused by long-standing syphilis, and became bedridden, half-conscious most of the time. He was no longer an effective force in New York's system of graft. Becker, without waiting for approval from Tammany, took over Sullivan's role as soon as he heard his political mentor had fallen ill. Becker immediately leveled an enormous duty on all gambling dens and bordellos, sending his men around to obtain the weekly increase. Some of Becker's police goons arrived at the newly opened Hesper Club, where the strong-arm cops were told: "No payoffs here. This is Big Tim's house."

True, Sullivan had fronted a good deal of the money Rosenthal had used to establish this lavish gambling den in a three-story brownstone at 104 West 45th Street, just off Sixth Avenue. The place sported thick carpets and heavy, dark drapes, massive furniture, which were the vogue of the era, and the latest gambling wheels, tables, and devices. But, ironically, Becker himself had also invested in the club, giving Rosenthal $1,500 for twenty percent of the profits, and holding a mortgage on all the furniture for his small investment. It was his thinking that, despite the profits Rosenthal paid him, he could still enjoy an additional $500-a-week payoff from The Hesper. Rosenthal, however, balked at this double payoff and refused to give Becker's boys any payoffs.

When Becker heard of this refusal, he met with Big Jack Zelig and ordered the thugmaster to see Rosenthal personally. Zelig went to Rosenthal and told him: "You better pay. Sullivan's out and Becker's the boss now." Rosenthal told Zelig that he was crazy and that he would see Sullivan about it. But Sullivan was dying in bed and Rosenthal found only the boss' politically inept brother Florrie, his nephew Jim, and Frank Farrell lounging in Big Tim's sumptuous office. They had no idea about what he should do. They were trying to figure out Big Tim's secretly organized empire themselves and were getting nowhere. The obstinate Rosenthal left, later telling Zelig that he had no intention of giving Becker anything, including the twenty per cent on the investment.

When Becker heard this, he exploded. He roared at Zelig: "Make him pay!" Zelig and some of his goons, Harry "Gyp the Blood" Horowitz, Whitey Lewis (Jacob Seidenschmer), "Dago Frank" Cirofici and Lefty Louie (Louis Rosenberg), the four men who were to take Rosenthal's life in full view of dozens of stunned witnesses. At first, these thugs grabbed the gambler as he was stepping out of his club one night and beat him unconscious. Still the stubborn Rosenthal refused to pay off. He went back to Big Tim's relatives, who told him: "Make a deal with Becker, that's all we can tell you." Rosenthal was beaten. He called Becker and the two men met. Rosenthal complained that his club was new and not doing as well as he had hoped. He needed more time to pay the additional money Becker was demanding. Becker told him he had a month and to make sure that he got his percentage, installed one of his cronies in Rosenthal's club.

This man was Jack Rose, better known along the Main Stem as "Billiard Ball Jack" because he did not have a human hair on his shining bald head. Rosenthal had always hated the pugnacious Rose and he found the gambler's permanent presence in his club offensive. He brooded about this until his pent-up rage broke loose in diatribes against New York Police Lieutenant Charles Becker. He began to speak to anyone, everyone, about this "crooked cop," until his incessant carping was heard by the crusading district attorney, Charles Seymour Whitman.

Before Whitman acted on the Rosenthal rumors, Commissioner Waldo received another letter which complained about the blatant operations of a gambling den at 104 West 45th Street, Rosenthal's Hesper Club. This was in Becker's Tenderloin and Waldo called the lieutenant into his office. Here he confronted Becker with the letter, his usual custom, informing him: "I can't understand how this could have escaped your attention." Waldo gave Becker a direct order to close The Hesper and keep it closed.

This was one letter Becker did not return to the Commissioner. He had no alternative except to comply with orders. He informed Rosenthal that he had to "close you up for a while." Rosenthal protested, but Becker was firm. Not only was the Hesper Club closed but, to make sure it remained closed, Becker placed a police guard around the clock in the front room on the main floor. The presence of these cops drove Rosenthal nearly crazy since he lived on the premises and he bitterly complained to any and all who would listen that it made him and his poor wife feel like prisoners. It was intolerable. He wouldn't stand for it. He would do something to show Becker that he could not treat Herman Rosenthal "like a dog."

Zelig's murder gang at a picnic: The four killers of Rosenthal are shown (top, left to right), Harry "Gyp the Blood" Horowitz, Louis "Lefty Louie" Rosenberg, "Dago Frank" Cirofici, and (seated, left) Jacob "Whitey Lewis" Seidenschmer.

The presence of the police in his home so enraged the beefy gambler that he began to war with the department. He announced that he would lock out these interlopers and, on one occasion, he slammed the doors and bolted them during a changing of shifts. He stood outside and dared the police to break into his place. The answer came in hours when a crew showed up on West 45th Street with a new hydraulic lift which could tear out the entire door frame. Before permanent damage was done Rosenthal capitulated, running across the street and unlocking the door.

As the late Spring brought hot weather, Rosenthal threatened to stoke up the furnaces in his building and "roast those cops out of there," but this proved to be an idle boast. Rosenthal's wife, Dora, a buxom and demonstrative woman, nagged her husband incessantly about policemen roaming her home, and every time the shift would change, she would lean out of her third-story bedroom window and shake her fist at the officers changing the guard, shouting that they were violating her home.

When Rosenthal could no longer bear this continuing indignity, he filed harassment charges against several high-ranking policemen in the department, but oddly never mentioned Becker. Although local judges scoffed at the complaints Rosenthal made, the gambler persistently filed new complaints. All of this got back to Becker. Now the crooked cop felt the kind of pressure only he had administered in the past. He became enraged. How dare this gambler create problems for the police and for him? He would not tolerate such defiance. He had Zelig's goons threaten Rosenthal again, but the gambler refused to back down. Becker decided then and there that only one course of action was left to him.

According to the sensational thirty-eight-page confession later made by Jack Rose, Becker came to him and ordered him to organize the death of Herman "Beansie" Rosenthal. Rose was to employ his fellow gamblers, Harry Vallon (Harry Vallinsky) and Louis "Bridgie" Webber in organizing Rosenthal's death with Zelig's gunsels. Becker was specific in his command to Rose, telling him: "I want Rosenthal croaked! I want him murdered, shot, his throat cut, any way that will take him off the earth!"

Rose told Becker that Zelig and his men might be hesitant to kill a man, who was so much in the public eye, a man whose vendetta against the NYPD had put him on the front pages of the daily newspapers. Becker replied: "If those rats don't go along, I will find out where they hang out and frame every one of them and send them up the river for carrying concealed weapons!" Becker emphasized that nothing would happen to anyone who killed the man he had marked for murder. "All that's necessary," Becker told Rose, "is to walk right up to where he is and blaze away at him and leave the rest to me. Nothing will happen to anybody that does it. Walk up to him and shoot him before a policeman if you want to and nothing will happen!"

Rose reluctantly set about organizing the murder of Rosenthal, but he dragged his feet, as did Webber and Vallon. Becker pursued them like a terrier, at one point shouting that he would frame the gamblers unless they got the job done quickly. "Why isn't he croaked?" Becker would say in his daily phone call to Rose. "Why isn't that man dead yet? You're all a bunch of damned cowards!" He literally hounded the gamblers with threats up to the night when Rosenthal was finally murdered. Only hours before this happened, Becker was on the phone to Rose, saying: "If only that s.o.b. is croaked tonight, how happy I will be, how lovely it will be!"

The problem in getting Becker's gruesome job done lay within the ranks of the gamblers, who worked at cross-purposes. All of them owned interests in various gambling joints and competed with each other, distrusting each other's motives. All of them would have just as readily put each other on the spot if Becker had asked for their deaths. None of them, however, had any love for Rosenthal.

Only a few years earlier Rosenthal and Webber had fought over gambling territories that brought out their respective gunmen in open warfare. Rosenthal had actually arranged for Webber's murder in 1909, hiring a notorious thug named Spanish Louie (or Louis) to beat Webber to death. Rosenthal had actually watched from a shadowy doorway while this goon nearly beat Webber to death, but was interrupted by a patrolman who gave chase to the fleeing Louie. With that, Rosenthal sauntered across the street, pretending to be a passerby, and helped Webber to his feet, wiping away the blood pouring from his broken nose with his own handkerchief and telling Webber how awful it was that the streets were no longer safe.

New York Times drama critic Alexander Woollcott, who was present at the Metropole on the night of Rosenthal's killing and later gave a grim report of the murder scene.

The next year Spanish Louie was shot to death from a speeding auto by four gangsters in Webber's employ, these being Christian "Boob" Walker, Harry "Gyp the Blood" Horowitz, Lefty Louie and Whitey Lewis. These were Zelig's boys, but the same gunmen were for hire by anyone with money and they often free-lanced for Rosenthal. Still, the gamblers found dozens of excuses for not killing Rosenthal, hoping that Becker would change his mind. Rosenthal didn't aid his own cause by loudly accusing the police of wholesale graft. Not having any success with the local magistrates, who refused to indict anyone on his accusations, Rosenthal went to the press, badgering newsmen to print his story of wholesale corruption in the police force.

Everyone turned a deaf ear, except a reporter for the World, Herbert Bayard Swope. Swope had known Rosenthal for some years. A habitue of Tenderloin casinos, he and Rosenthal had been on more than speaking terms, the gambler steering the reporter to the best gambling action in town, often feeding him "inside" tips on various horse races. Swope not only listened to Rosenthal, but decided to print his affidavit in the World. The story that Rosenthal gave Swope was nothing like the tale he had brought to the city magistrates. To Swope the gambler described in detail his relationship with Police Lieutenant Charles Becker, from the very first moment they had met at the Elks' Club on New Year's Eve to the many payoffs he had made to the crooked cop, along with all the other payoffs Becker was receiving throughout the Tenderloin.

Rosenthal named every gambler in on the payoffs, all the police collectors and bagmen, all the backup thugs, who did the dirty work for the cops. After the Swope story ran, the most important of his life and the story that would make him into a newspaper magnate, the newsman went after Whitman to make sure the district attorney did his duty. He persuaded Whitman to take Rosenthal's direct statement and bring a grand jury indictment against Becker.

Before Whitman took Rosenthal's deposition, Becker heard of the affidavit in the World office and marched to the newspaper with his lawyer. He inspected the document and snarled: "This is a pack of lies!" He turned on his heels and went back to badgering Rose to have Rosenthal killed immediately. Meanwhile, Rosenthal was oddly blase about the lethal peril he had created for himself. "I know I'm a marked man," he told a newsman, "and I've probably signed my own death warrant, but I don't care." Despite these words of bravado, Herman Rosenthal cared very much, and he took pains to stay out of his usual haunts, holing up on the third floor of his brownstone. He ventured forth to seek the advice of the rising young gambler, Arnold Rothstein, who offered him money to leave town.

Harry "Gyp the Blood" Horowitz, leader of the murder gang that brazenly killed Rosenthal; it was Horowitz who lured Rosenthal from the entrance of the Metropole.

Rosenthal said he would never let himself be run out of New York, but he later returned to Rothstein, asking for the money. Rothstein turned a cold shoulder to his one-time friend Rosenthal and told him it was "too late to do anything." This meeting with Rothstein occurred on the afternoon of July 15, 1912. Rosenthal thought about Rothstein's remark and decided that there was something more to do. He had earlier stated that "this is a fight to the finish. I know that the whole police department will be against me and that all the gamblers, big and little, will fight me, too, because this means a big investigation that will clean up the city."

Late that day and into the evening, Herman Rosenthal talked for five hours to District Attorney Whitman and key staff members, reiterating everything he had revealed to Swope and promising to reveal even more when brought before a grand jury, if he lived that long. Whitman promised that if he stayed in his home, he would be all right. The district attorney was the only key official in New York who had no strings to Tammany, having gotten elected without that organization's help. He was the mortal foe of Tammany Mayor William Jay Gaynor (who had disavowed his Tammany connection once he was in office) and especially eschewed the friendships of such sachems as Big Tim Sullivan. A crusader and a tireless reformer, Whitman vowed to use Rosenthal's accusations to clean up the city. Before leaving Whitman's offices that night, however, Rosenthal gave himself little chance of ever appearing before a grand jury, telling Whitman: "I may not live to do it. You may never see me again alive." His words, undoubtedly couched for dramatic effect, could not have been more prophetic.

That night, at about 10 p.m., Rosenthal received a phone call from someone he considered important enough to meet later. He told his wife that he would be going out to keep an important rendezvous, but he refused to reveal the identity of the man who had called. Dora Rosenthal begged her husband not to go out, reminding him that he was in great danger, but Herman Rosenthal somehow felt confident that no one would dare harm him; that he had become too public, too well-known. Why, he was on every front page of every newspaper in New York. He had attacked the New York Police Department and the police of the city would never dare let anything happen to him now. His indictment against the NYPD was his insurance policy, Rosenthal reasoned. But, he had not reckoned on the ruthless indifference Charles Becker had to such logic.

So confident was Rosenthal that he walked all the way to his meeting place, his favorite hangout, The Metropole Hotel, on 43rd Street, just east of Broadway. The hotel was owned by the Considine Brothers and Big Tim Sullivan, Rosenthal's mentor. The gambler believed that nothing could happen to him there. The place was a favorite after-hours haunt for actors, newsmen, gamblers, racetrack touts, and Broadway characters of every stripe. Its bar and restaurant teemed with the most colorful (and often dangerous) people in town, the kind of place Herman Rosenthal loved.

As Rosenthal neared the hotel he ran into some gamblers he knew. One of them reached out and said: "Herman, it's not safe for you to be out tonight. Go home. Turn around and go home right now." Rosenthal pulled away and laughed off the warning. He intended to keep his appointment at the Metropole. He turned into the hotel lobby shortly before 1 a.m., July 16, 1912, and as he passed the bustling, jam-packed bar, there was a moment of silence, a strange hush as the scores of drinkers paused for a moment as if to acknowledge the passing of a ghost.

Rosenthal sauntered into the dining room and sat down at his favorite table, and here, too, the crowd stared momentarily at him in a strange awe, not expecting him to be there in the flesh, to be alive at all. From the scores of statements made later and over the years it was evident that everyone in the Metropole, everyone "in the know" in Manhattan, knew that Herman "Beansie" Rosenthal was going to die that night, "go on the spot," as Damon Runyon later put it and he later intimated that he was present in the bar that night. The Metropole was teeming with Runyon characters, the very prototypes who would later people his Guys and Dolls and other Broadway tales.

Oddly, Rosenthal sat down next to Christian "Boob" Walker, one of the goons who worked for his arch nemesis, Bridgie Webber. Other Webber cronies, Fat Moe Brown and Butch Kitte sat down with the gambler as Rosenthal ordered a steak and a horse's neck (ginger ale and a lemon twist). The Metropole had a number of unique drinks created by its gambler patrons. Billiard Ball Jack Rose, hated by Rosenthal, had created his own drink, which was forever after known as a "Jack Rose," this being a cocktail containing a jigger of applejack, juice of half a lemon, and a half ounce of grenadine, which was all shaken with cracked ice and strained.

When the steak came, Rosenthal wolfed it down, keeping his eye on the door, as if expecting someone to come in at any moment. Boob Walker later stated that "Herman ate as if he could take it with him." Finishing his supper, the gambler excused himself, got up, and shuffled into the lobby, where he

GAMBLER WHO DEFIED POLICE IS SHOT DEAD
BECKER HELD ON MURDER
'DAGO FRANK,' CONFESSING, SAYS VALLON
'GYP' AND 'LOUIE' MURDERED ROSENTHAL
JURY FINDS LIEUT. BECKER GUILTY
GUNMEN DIE
BECKER TELLS HIS OWN STO
ROSE REVEALS BECKER SECRET
BECKER WINS NEW TRIAL
BECKER, ABOUT TO DIE

A newspaper montage and contemporary sketch shows the brutal murder of Herman "Beansie" Rosenthal outside New York's Metropole Hotel in the early hours of July 22, 1912.

bought the latest newspapers. He was on the front pages bigger than ever. He bought a copy of the World which blared the headline: "GAMBLER CHARGES POLICE LIEUTENANT WAS HIS PARTNER." He tucked this under his arm and ambled back to his table in the restaurant, which was near one of the large windows that faced the street and still gave Rosenthal a clear view of the front door. He spread the newspaper out in front of him and the other gamblers at his table took one look at the headline and quickly excused themselves. A group of gamblers at the next table stared at him incredulously.

Rosenthal stretched his arms to show his French cuffs blazoned with huge gold links, then shoved his chair back so that his stomach bloated forward over a huge gold belt buckle which featured his initials in large letters reading HR, and smirked at his friends sitting at the next table. "What do you think of the papers lately?" he said in a conspiratorial voice. "You boys aren't sore at me, are you?" Rosenthal asked this question without really expecting an answer. One of the gamblers shook his head and said: "Herman, you're a damned fool." Ignoring this remark, Rosenthal ordered a cup of coffee and began to read the newspaper, dwelling on every word that dealt with his accusations.

Some of the gamblers sitting nearby, who had been whispering among themselves looked up at the entranceway to the dining room and suddenly fell silent. At the doorway was a police detective named William J. File. He glanced about the room and then disappeared into the crowded lobby which, instead of emptying out at that time of the morning, was actually filling up so that standing room was getting scarce. It seemed as if everyone in the know on the Main Stem wanted to be there at the kill, or, at least, that was the image of the thronged Metropole that many writers later created. Other plainclothes NYPD detectives were also on hand that night, and out on the street, no less than six, some eyewitnesses later said, and more than a dozen patrolmen strolled the sidewalk on both sides of the street on the block where the Metropole was located, the bright electric bulbs from its marquee flooding light up and down the street.

The public killing of Herman Rosenthal was undoubtedly an event no one wanted to miss. Someone in front of the Metropole, a man in a dark suit and a straw boater, his voice full of authority, began to order the taxicabs parked there to move on and he continued to have the cabs pull away from the entranceway for twenty minutes, until the front of the hotel was completely clear of parked vehicles right up to the moment Herman Rosenthal stepped outside to meet his terrible fate.

Oblivious to his own impending execution, only a half hour away, Rosenthal went on bathing in his notoriety. He was the talk of the town and he knew it, reveled in it, gloried in the danger he had brought to his own door. He feared nothing, his expression told everyone; he alone would clean up New York. Even when his arch enemy, Bridgie Webber sauntered into the hotel dining room a little after 1:30 a.m., Rosenthal gave him a slight smile. Webber walked casually up to Rosenthal and placed his hand on the pudgy gambler's shoulder, saying affa-bly: "Hello, Herman, how's everything?" Rosenthal nodded and said: "Fine, everything is just fine. How is it by you?" Webber did not reply, merely stood there for a moment, then he patted Rosenthal's shoulder several times, turned around, and walked quickly out of the hotel. This was the signal to waiting gangsters outside, who could see through the dining room window, and the way in which their victim was identified.

Months later, at Becker's prolonged trial, Webber sat calmly in the witness stand and was asked: "When you went to the Metropole, for what purpose did you look for him [Rosenthal]? Was it for the purpose of having him murdered?" Webber's answer was, quiet and unperturbed: "Yes, sir." Webber's pat on the shoulder was his kiss of death. After making sure that Rosenthal was at the Metropole, Webber went outside to inform the eight men waiting there, four of them gangsters with guns bulging in their pockets, that their victim was almost ready for the slaughter.

It was almost 2 a.m. when a waiter carrying a tray of dishes stopped at Rosenthal's table and told him that "there is a man in the lobby who wants to see you." Rosenthal looked through the dining room door to see Harry Vallon, a Webber henchman with the face of a bloody hatchet. Vallon stood staring at him, impassive, his hands jammed into his coat pockets. Rosenthal got up and slowly walked up to Vallon in the lobby. "Can you come outside for a minute, Herman? There's someone outside who wants to see you." Vallon asked him. The utterly unsuspecting Rosenthal shrugged and followed Vallon outside into the sultry, clammy night. The heavyset gambler followed Vallon outside to the sidewalk, standing under the bright lights of the Metropole, a perfect target.

Vallon suddenly stepped back, out of the light and into the shadows. Several gamblers Rosenthal knew stood nearby, including Dave Mendelsohn, Sigmund Rosenfeld, and Chick Beebe. They stood off in the distance and in the shadows, twenty feet or so from the hotel entrance. Also standing in the shadows talking with cronies was Billiard Ball Jack Rose, talking with another gambling intimate, Sam Schepps. Down the block several uniformed policemen could be seen milling about.

The street was crowded, but no one seemed to take any notice of a huge 1909 Packard that was idling almost in the middle of the street. A dark, swarthy man sat at the wheel. Four other dark, swarthy men (some reports said five men), all described later as short in stature and dressed in dark suits and wearing soft felt hats, stood in front of the car, forming an arc before the hotel entrance.

One of the men shouted: "Over here, Herman!" Rosenthal, who had lit a cigar, when crossing the lobby, squinted into the darkness, unable to identify the man who called out to him with an unfamiliar voice. Rosenthal took a hesitant step forward, saying: "Who's that?" The killers closed in on him, just barely entering the glaring lights from the marquee, and five shots rang out, striking Rosenthal at close range (powder burns were to blacken his face). The bullets struck him in the neck, the nose and two in the head. One wild shot struck the door frame of the hotel. Rosenthal, spouting blood, fell dead in the street, the newspapers he had been carrying flying upward and then settling over his crumpled, prostrate body.

Eyewitnesses later claimed that the chief killer, the fierce Gyp the Blood Horowitz, had stepped forward before the fusillade erupted and hailed his victim with the words "Hello, Herman." After Rosenthal collapsed from his lethal wounds, Horowitz leaned over to make sure the gambler was dead, then stood up, and said, "Goodbye, Herman." He then casually stepped over the body and joined his fellow gangsters, getting into the Packard, which quickly roared down the street. (One witness swore that Gyp the Blood had sneered at his fallen victim and snorted the word "Gotcha!")

Rosenthal's body lay in the street for some minutes, the many witnesses on the sidewalks frozen in a murder scene motif. In a doorway down the street, some later insisted, mob leader Jack Zelig lit a cigar and walked away from the scene. Then the street exploded with shouts and panic. Police came running from everywhere and witnesses raced to patrolmen to give varied descriptions of the killers and several versions of the license plate on the Packard.

One unlikely witness to this gory murder was none other than the esteemed drama critic for the New York Times, Alexander Woollcott, who would later become a best-selling author and be well remembered for his radio appearances as the Town Crier. Recalling the Rosenthal murder twenty-two years later, when writing in While Rome Burns, Woollcott summed up the livid scene: "I shall always remember the picture of that soft, fat body wilting on the sidewalk with a beer-stained tablecloth serving as its pall. I shall always remember the fish-belly faces of the sibilant crowd which sprung in a twinkling from nowhere, formed like a clot around those clamorous wounds. Just behind me an old timer whispered a comment which I have had more than one occasion to repeat. `From where I stand,' he said, `I can see eight murderers.'"

As evidence and the testimony of several gamblers scrambling to save their necks would later prove, there were four murderers, plus the man who ordered the killing, all of whom would later sit down in the electric chair for the blatant killing. The killers and their driver fled down 43rd Street in the large Packard sedan. As the car turned onto Broadway with a squeal of tires, Detective File raced from the hotel, his .38-caliber revolver in his hand. He took a look at Rosenthal's body, the left side of the face blown away, and ordered two patrolmen nearby to follow him.

Gyp the Blood Horowitz (left) and Lefty Louie Rosenberg shown at their trial; both were sentenced to death, going to the electric chair on April 14, 1913.

The officers ran along 43rd Street to Broadway, where Police Lieutenant Edward Frye met them. The four officers jumped into a cab and ordered the taxi driver to follow the Packard, which was fast disappearing down Broadway. It soon outdistanced the taxi and disappeared. Fortunately, a young, unemployed cabaret singer, Charles Gallagher, had been walking toward the Metropole, when the shooting occurred and had the presence of mind to write down the license plate of the car as it sped past him. He later had to argue with policemen to give them the number: "NY-41313."

District Attorney Whitman was awakened at home by the indefatigable Swope, who told him that his star witness had just been murdered. Whitman climbed out of his pajamas and into street clothes, going immediately to the 47th Street Precinct Station, where the body of Rosenthal lay on a slab in the back room. Some minutes after the bleary-eyed Whitman arrived at the station, he turned to see Charles Becker enter. Becker later claimed that he, too, had been awakened by a newsman giving him the news of the killing and rushed to his own precinct station to verify the slaying.

Becker took one look at the body and then he met the eyes of Charles Whitman glaring at him. For a moment the hardboiled crooked cop tried to stare down the district attorney but Whitman's eyes narrowed to slits of contempt and Becker, without a word, lowered his eyes and turned around, leaving the station quickly. He later met with Rose, Webber, and Vallon to congratulate them on the killing, telling the gamblers that he had just gone to the station house and how "it was a pleasing sight to me to see the squealing Jew lying there, and, if it had not been for the presence of Whitman, I would have cut out his tongue and hung it on the Times Building as a warning to future squealers." (Becker's anti-Semitic remark was pointedly intended for his listeners, who were all Jews, as a warning.)

An hour later, Whitman returned home, beside himself with anger over the killing of Rosenthal, telling his wife that "I'm going to get Becker if it's the only thing I ever do. New York is supposed to be the greatest city in the world ... But as long as Becker and all those like him are allowed to defy and corrupt every law by which decent people live, New York will never be anything but a human sewer!" He vowed to send the killers, including Becker, to the electric chair. Whitman was greatly aided in his goal by soon receiving word that the license plate of the murder car had been traced to a rental garage.

The killers could not have selected a more conspicuous auto to use in New York's most sensational murder of the decade. The Packard had once belonged to the great fighter, John L. Sullivan, and was easily traced. It had been rented by a number of gamblers and these—Vallon, Rose, and Webber—were soon under arrest. They were housed in the Tombs but refused to admit to anything, until it appeared quite obvious to them that they, not the actual triggermen, would be charged with the killings.

Rose was the first to crack, giving Whitman his famous thirty-eight-page statement in which he liberally quoted Becker's "Croak Rosenthal" decree. Realizing that Rose was saving his own skin, Webber and Vallon soon joined the chorus, corroborating every damning word Rose said, all, of course, with the promise of immunity extended to them. Through the cooperation of the gamblers, the killers, Harry "Gyp the Blood" Horowitz, Lefty Louie (Louis Rosenberg), Whitey Lewis (Jacob Seidenschmer) and "Dago Frank" Cirofici, were all convicted by a jury that took twenty minutes to make up its collective mind on November 19, 1912. All four young killers were electrocuted in Sing Sing on April 14, 1913, a Monday.

The previous day, the three Jewish men, Horowitz, Rosenberg, and Seidenschmer, were fed a Passover Dinner prepared in an Ossining hotel, which consisted of stuffed Hudson River bass, chicken soup and macaroons, roast chicken, mashed turnips, matzos, hardboiled eggs, and peaches. All claimed to be innocent, saying that Vallon was the real killer. Dago Frank Cirofici called for a Catholic priest, then later "confessed" to warders, saying that Vallon and Gyp the Blood had done the killing. He was innocent, he claimed, being at home that night. The men swaggered to their deaths, heroes to the underworld in their own weird code, dying without begging for mercy. Their end came long before that of the man, who had ordered them on District Attorney Charles Seymour Whitman; Becker's conviction assured his governorship.

Key witness Sam Schepps provided corroboration that Becker ordered Rosenthal murdered.

Judge John W. Goff presided at Becker's trial, washing down his in-chambers lunch with whiskey.

The jury in Becker's second trial was isolated in a guarded hotel, brought to court every day in this open-air omnibus; the swastika on the hood was a company logo long before Hitler appropriated the symbol a decade later in Germany.

their murderous mission. It took three years for the law to run Charles Becker to ground.

Once the gamblers made their confession, District Attorney Whitman allowed them their freedom, provided they would testify against Becker at his trial which was scheduled for October 7, 1912. Whitman took no chances. Knowing that he must have corroboration for all the damning statements made chiefly by Rose, he brought another gambler named Sam Schepps into the picture. Schepps was assured immunity and confessed his part in the Rosenthal killing, which he too claimed was ordered by Lieutenant Becker.

The once-powerful Becker was by then suspended from the NYPD and had been locked in the Tombs to await trial. His attorney, John F. McIntyre, was able and quick-witted, but he was up against an almost predetermined case since the shocking, brutal statements by Rose, which revealed Becker to be nothing more than a bestial and inhuman creature, had been broadly printed in the press. Moreover, Whitman was an eloquent and formidable opponent, who was by now imbued with a messianic crusade to rid the world of police corruption and that particular venality was personified by Charles Becker. To Whitman, Becker was evil incarnate and he had taken it upon himself to personally eradicate this scourge. He was no less inspired in seeking this legal goal than was the mythical Perceval, who had explored the bogs of hell in his search for the Holy Grail.

For his part, Becker exuded confidence from his prison cell. It was all a frame-up, he said. The gamblers had lied to save their own skins, he insisted, and Whitman was using him as a scapegoat in winning the governorship. He told his wife the trial would come to nothing and he would be back on the job before Christmas. What reasonable jury would take the word of such Broadway trash as Vallon, Rose, Webber, and Schepps over that of an upstanding police officer who had received his department's highest commendation for valor? He expected aid from Mayor Gaynor and, of course, his tolerant superior, Commissioner Waldo. Yet, curiously, support from these totemic government officials was absent. Also, no one in the department, other than Becker's brother John, by then a lieutenant on the force, had come forward to lend strong support. There was a silence that befell Becker, ominous and knowing. And all but Becker, his blindly loyal wife, and some close relatives, accepted this man's doom.

A quicker death awaited Becker's gangster chieftain, Big Jack Zelig. One day before Becker's trial began, Zelig, the most feared thug in New York, was murdered by an obscure goon whose motives were as absurd as the manner he chose to rid the city of a crime czar. Zelig was to testify at Becker's trial; he was listed as a defense witness, but Whitman, as he later stated, intended to have the gangster speak on behalf of the prosecution. If this was known by members of the underworld at the time, the conduct of Zelig's killer was not the lone act of an unthinking thug, but a planned killing ordained by the leaders of the system.

The milling crowd awaiting word outside the courtroom during Becker's second trial; he was convicted (in both trials) and sentenced to death.

Zelig acted in the last moments of his life as if he hadn't a care in the world. On the night of October 5, 1912, Zelig had dropped into Siegel's Coffee House on Second Avenue and there enjoyed the company of a half dozen gangsters under his command. He drank heavily, downing several glasses of gin. He decided to get some air and stepped outside, lit a cigar, and looked about for the two detectives whom he knew had been assigned to watch him since he was now an important witness in the Becker trial and also to gather information on his ongoing illegal activities. Zelig had been off-handedly grateful for this police surveillance since he knew he had been marked for death by a fierce new rival for his underworld territory, Jack Sirocco.

Although he had been expected to return to his men at Siegel's, Zelig inexplicably strolled a block or so and then, seeing a streetcar going uptown, jumped on board, walked to the back of the car, and squeezed his large frame between an old man and a young woman. As the car moved away from the Fifth Street stop, Zelig noticed from his bench seat a young, tall man racing after the car. He took the cigar out of his mouth and encouraged the passenger to catch up with the car, saying, "C'mon, you can make it, old boy!"

The young man reached out, caught the outside handle bar, and swung himself onto the running board of the streetcar. Instead of entering the car, the slightly breathless passenger worked himself behind the last bench on the outside of the car so that he hung from the rear, standing behind Zelig. He reached into his pocket and withdrew a .38-caliber revolver. Zelig and other passengers in the car were facing forward and no one saw the killer place the muzzle of the gun behind Zelig's left ear. He fired one shot. Zelig leaped forward with the impact, his face a mask of blood, crashing to the streetcar floor, where his dying body gave one shuddering spasm and then went limp. Screaming women and shouting men in the car pointed frantically to the sour-faced killer hanging at the end of the trolley.

The killer wasted no time in leaping from the car as it moved on. His jump was ill-chosen for he landed almost at the foot of a startled patrolman, banging into him, the killer's revolver still in hand. The cop raised his nightstick and instinctively began clubbing the killer, until he lay senseless on the sidewalk. He was identified a short time later as 30-year-old Philip "Red Phil" Davidson, who had occasionally worked as a fruit peddler, but had a long criminal record as a narcotics pusher, gambler, and white slaver.

Davidson laconically told police that he had killed Zelig because the gangster had stolen $400 from him earlier that day. Later Davidson changed his story, saying that he had misstated the amount. Zelig had cheated him out of $18 and that is the reason why he felt compelled to murder the man. Of course, it was all nonsense. Zelig was a wealthy man who gave $20 to bootblacks for a mere shine and would not have spent a second bruising his knuckles over such a paltry amount. Davidson, after a brief trial, was given twenty years in prison and was released in twelve.

Whitman made much of Zelig's killing, claiming that the gangster would prove that Rose and the other gamblers had been telling the truth and that Becker was guilty. McIntyre, for the defense, said that such statements were ridiculous, that Zelig would have proved that Rose, Vallon, and Webber, all sworn enemies of Zelig's, had planned the killing of their worst competitor on their own and had used Zelig's best killers to do it and that Becker had no connection with the Rosenthal murder. It was, however, with Big Jack dead on a morgue slab, a moot issue. Becker's trial went ahead as planned and was over in twelve days.

Judge John Goff, a no-nonsense law-and-order magistrate, argued throughout the trial with defense counsel McIntyre and seemed to show a decided interest in having Becker found guilty. He allowed Whitman every opportunity, and made McIntyre battle himself into illness to make the meagerest point. Goff had long been a conservative foe of political graft and police corruption in New York, challenging the powers of Tammany as early as the 1890s during the Lexow and Mazet hearings. (Goff, during this trial, as was his habit with any other, took his lunch inside his chambers; this consisted exclusively of milk and crackers, which he always washed down with a long swig of Irish whiskey.)

Judge Goff's conduct was much in question and it drove Becker, outwardly calm during the entire course of the trial, to near rage when talking with his attorney in his Tombs cell. At one conference with McIntyre, Becker shouted at his beleaguered attorney: "Between that judge and your inability to stop the DA, I'm going to fry! I could have done better by myself." He insisted on taking the witness stand to clear himself, but McIntyre persuaded him against this, assuring Becker that Goff's high-handed ways would prejudice the case and assure a victory for the defense in the Appeals Court. "It doesn't matter what the jury does," McIntyre told his client "No conviction will ever survive an appeal."

Becker came to believe that the prosecution's case would not hold up, that the jury would reason that a bunch of murderous gamblers were obviously trying to frame a police officer who had justly persecuted them. He became so confident that he would be acquitted that he told his wife to wear her best dress on the last day of the trial. They would go to one of the best restaurants in town to celebrate his release. No one was more shocked when he was found guilty and later sentenced by Goff to reside in Sing Sing, where he would later be executed. McIntyre, however, was proved correct. The Appeals Court overruled the conviction, citing Goff's conduct and other discrepancies in the trial. Becker was tried again, and brought back from Death Row to the Tombs.

Judge Samuel Seabury, who was as famous as Goff in combating New York corruption, presided over Becker's second trial which began on May 2, 1914, Whitman's choice in that he was more even-handed and careful in his supervision of the trial. Whitman did not want another reversal. Becker had to die in the electric chair and that meant that the second trial must end in a conviction that would be upheld at any judicial level.

W. Bourke Cochran, an ex-judge, served as Becker's attorney in the second trial, but he was no match for Whitman, who once more paraded his gamblers before the jury with their inflammatory but utterly damning testimony. Seabury avoided the pitfalls of Judge Goff and was extremely cautious in his instructions to the jury. On May 22, 1914, the jury took one hour and fifty minutes to convict Charles Becker of the murder of Herman Rosenthal. Becker was later sentenced to die in Sing Sing's electric chair on July 6, 1914. But one appeal after another postponed that date with death.

While Becker and his lawyers fought for his life, Whitman ran for the governor's office and, with the Becker conviction as the single most important achievement in his career to bolster support, he was swept into the Albany mansion with a tremendous Republican landslide on November 3, 1914. Now Becker and his attorneys were faced with seeking Whitman's mercy after all other appeals failed. This Becker found intolerable, saying: "My life has been sacrificed on the altar of Whitman." But, as Becker's final date for execution approached, July 30, 1915, the condemned man found himself writing a pleading letter to the very man who convicted him, begging Whitman to commute his sentence. Whitman, through an aide, stated: "The Governor cannot pardon a man he convicted." Whitman himself, just before the execution, after denying Becker's plea for clemency, said: "As far as Becker's conviction is concerned, there was never a criminal case more perfectly proven in the annals of crime. I have never had any doubt about Becker's guilt. If I had any now I would pardon him."

In a dramatic last minute effort, Mrs. Helen Becker went personally to Governor Whitman and begged for an interview. Whitman, through an aide, agreed to see her, but when she appeared at the Governor's mansion in Albany only twelve hours before her husband was to die, she found the governor gone. She learned he was in Peekskill reviewing a military event. She trailed him there only to learn he had gone to Poughkeepsie. She found him at the Nelson House. Here the governor, cornered, as it were, by the desperate wife, who had never given up on her husband or lost a second of belief in his innocence, was forced to face Helen Becker. She implored Whitman to consider her husband's last plea for a review of his case. Whitman only stood in the center of the governor's suite, arms clasped behind his back, saying nothing. Mrs. Becker, understanding his silence to be a final refusal, broke down.

Nothing stopped Becker's execution on July 30, 1915. He entered the death room at Sing Sing and stoically, some reporters later stated "arrogantly," approached the electric chair, sitting down while staring ahead, his chin up, his eyes glaring at the twenty-odd witnesses in the death room. He repeated the litany being said by the prison chaplain, Father James Curry. The convicted killer looked massive and powerful as he sat in the chair, thick, muscular legs that were exposed at the calf where the trousers had been slit for the electrodes, an expanding chest that breathed evenly.

Helen Becker vainly sought to get her husband's death sentence commuted.

Charles Becker as he entered Sing Sing; he was executed on July 30, 1915.

Charles Becker insisted upon his innocence to the end and decided to show himself unafraid. He held a crucifix and when the first jolt of electricity was thrown into him, 1,850 volts of current, his large body of 215 pounds lurched against the straps with such force that the leather creaked and groaned, almost bursting their anchors. In ten seconds the current was shut off, but an examining physician, Dr. Charles Farr, reported that Becker was still alive. Another ten-second jolt was thrown into him. Again his body strained against the straps. The doctor listened again to Becker's heart with his stethoscope and announced that the man was still alive. For a third time the body was given another jolt and this time Dr. Farr, after listening closely for a heartbeat, turned and said: "I pronounce this man dead."

By then the witnesses were exhausted with the shock of Becker's awful death, one that had taken nine minutes and was later considered one of the most "botched" executions in Sing Sing history. The nine minutes had seemed like an eternity to the witnesses, one of whom was a World reporter, later writing: "To those who had sat in the gray-walled room and watched and listened to the rasping sound of the wooden switch lever being thrown backward and forward and had seen the greenish-blue blaze at the victim's head and feet, and the grayish smoke curling away from the scorched flesh, it had seemed an hour." To phalanxes of gamblers, police officers and members of the underworld, the news that the "Crookedest Cop in the World" was dead came as a great relief.

BIG JIM OF CHICAGO/1900s-1910s

At about the same time Paul Kelly began consolidating his underworld forces to create New York's first super gang, a burly, towering Italian immigrant named James Colosimo (1877-1920; AKA: Big Jim) organized the Chicago underworld. In 1895, the 17-year-old Colosimo migrated with his family from Consenza, Italy. His father, Luigi Colosimo, had been a farmer and he became a laborer after arriving in Chicago. His son sought honest work, too, at first. James Colosimo worked as a bootblack, sold newspapers, and even slaved as a water boy for the railroad section workers. Through a political contact, Colosimo, at eighteen, wangled a patronage job with the sanitation department, working as a street sweeper in the vice-ridden First Ward, Chicago's notorious red light district which was called The Levee.

Here Colosimo learned the art of pickpocketing and soon became so adept at stealing the wallets of drunks that he was able to quit his broom-pushing job and set himself up as a pimp, offering a string of girls who worked out of cheap cribs in the First Ward. His political sponsors were the most powerful men in Chicago at that time, two colorful, utterly corrupt aldermen, Michael "Hinky Dink" Kenna and John "Bathhouse John" Coughlin. Both represented the First Ward and protected the myriad brothels and gambling dens in that area, deriving enormous kickbacks and percentages of the nightly take from hundreds of vice spots.

The affable, easy-going Colosimo ingratiated himself with the two aldermen and they, in turn, rewarded him with management of first a poolroom, then a saloon. In 1902, Kenna and Coughlin gave "Big Jim" the important post of bagman for all their First Ward rackets. It was his job to make the daily collections from the bordellos, saloons, gambling dens, and opium houses in the district. One of the most successful whorehouses in the area at that time was operated by Victoria Moresco, an obese, decidedly ugly madam in her middle years, whose brothel was located on Armour Avenue.

When Big Jim first appeared at her doorstep to collect the cut of her take for Kenna and Coughlin, Moresco was immediately attracted to the swarthy Colosimo, a man she later described as having "animal magnetism." Colosimo's virility notwithstanding, he was also a street-smart crook who would go places in Madam Moresco's calculations. The brothel keeper meant only one thing to Colosimo, money, and for that reason he married her. Victoria Moresco had made a fortune in her twenty-some years of flesh peddling in The Levee and she would finance, Big Jim knew, his future bordello and gambling operations.

To that end, Colosimo began opening cheap cribs throughout the Levee, one-room affairs where his girls charged $1 and $2 per customer, performing dozens of "tricks" each night. By 1903 Colosimo owned more than 100 of these inexpensive whoring operations, as well as two swanky and celebrated bordellos, the Saratoga and the Victoria, the latter brothel named after his wife. Big Jim received $1.20 from every $2 trick performed by his girls, with twenty percent of these revenues going to Kenna and Coughlin for police and political protection.

Big Jim Colosimo, who bossed the Chicago rackets for two decades, but was murdered by his own lieutenant when refusing to go into bootlegging.

Next, Colosimo branched out, opening dozens of saloons next to his cheaper bordellos. These were connected to his whorehouses by enclosed passageways so that customers could drink themselves silly, then stagger through a passageway into the next-door brothel without being inconvenienced by inclement weather. Big Jim next established gambling houses, and his profits soared. The gambling houses were also connected by underground tunnels to saloons and brothels he owned so that customers could easily escape occasional police raids. In these instances, Big Jim would be warned by Kenna or Coughlin that the police would be making a "show raid" just to pacify reformers, who were constantly campaigning to have The Levee closed.

The problems connected with Colosimo's prostitution business had nothing to do with the law. He, and scores like him, operated with impunity, as long as they paid off Chicago's crooked politicians. Whores were generally "used up" within five years. The young girls entering this unsavory trade, either willfully or by force through the white slave racket, aged quickly and were usually sent down from the better bordellos to the cheaper ones until they found themselves in the worst whorehouses in the Levee, along Bed Bug Row, or had to take to the streets.

Disease, alcoholism, and drugs usually finished off a working prostitute in about ten years, so that they were nothing more than incoherent, physical hulks, shunned by the seediest customers and their peers. To replenish his always-dwindling supply of attractive young girls, Colosimo joined forces with Maurice Van Bever, a foppish whoremaster, who ran two bordellos on Armour Avenue with his wife, Julia. Van Bever, from 1903 to 1909, imported hundreds of young girls for Colosimo's whorehouses, obtaining these gullible girls, ages sixteen to twenty, from white slavers in New York, Milwaukee, and St. Louis.

These girls usually responded to advertisements offering good-paying, respectable positions. Once they were in the clutches of the white slavers, they were locked in rooms and attacked by "professional" rapists who "broke them in" for the trade. These girls were often held captive for months, forced to sexually serve near-inhuman clients, until they felt that they had been morally compromised and that there was no turning back to a respectable life. They were, in their self-estimation and in the terms of that rigidly moralistic era, "fallen women," and were not worthy of a family or home.

The first notorious practitioner of the white slave racket in Chicago was Mary Hastings, a Chicago brothel-keeper. Like Hastings, Van Bever and his wife forced young girls into prostitution and then sold them to Colosimo or others for as much as $500. Truculent girls or those who were ill, frail, or uncooperative were sold for as little as $50 to the cheaper bordellos. Colosimo and other big-time bordello operators ceased working with the likes of Van Bever in 1910, when Congress passed the Mann Act or White Slavery Act, which made it a federal offense to transport women across a state line for immoral purposes, chiefly prostitution. This law was so vigorously enforced that, within a decade, white slavery was all but stamped out.

Powerful Chicago alderman Michael "Hinky-Dink" Kenna (shown in retirement), who protected Big Jim's gambling and prostitution rackets and grew rich from payoffs.

By then, Colosimo had an enormous payroll, with hundreds of prostitutes, gamblers, and saloon keepers in his employ. To keep younger, upcoming gangsters in Chicago from cutting into his rackets, Colosimo also hired scores of thugs and gunmen. He had also moved into union racketeering by then, controlling dozens of the most important unions in Chicago and taking a goodly portion of their monthly membership dues. This lucrative racket attracted many independent gangsters, who began to threaten Big Jim with death and destruction, most of these threats coming from such accomplished Black Handers as James "Sunny Jim" Cosmano. To combat the nocturnal, lethal creatures, who busied themselves with planting bombs in Colosimo's better saloons and gambling dens, Big Jim sent for his nephew in New York, John Torrio, one of the bosses of the notorious Five Points Gang, and a protege of New York's first modern-day crime boss, Paul Kelly.

Chicago alderman John "Bathhouse John" Coughlin, who worked with Kenna to protect Colosimo's rackets; he conducted his underworld business in public bath houses.

At age thirty-one, Johnny Torrio arrived in Chicago in 1909. He was a crafty, brainy gangster, who immediately hired informers to pinpoint the Black Hand operators preying upon his powerful uncle. Three of these men were shot to death after meeting with Torrio and his men near Archer Avenue beneath the Rock Island Railroad overpass. Other Black Handers like Cosmano, quickly ceased their extortion of Chicago's top crime boss, Colosimo. With Torrio now managing his vast criminal empire, Colosimo, in 1910, decided to enjoy life. He opened the most fashionable dining spot in Chicago, Colosimo's Café, at 2126 South Wabash Avenue.

Colosimo's Café was the most lavish nightspot in Chicago, offering a full orchestra, a huge dance floor, and the best cuisine and chefs money could buy. Its talented entertainers were the most expensive headliners of the day, and the place drew the social elite to its tables. Here the Marshall Fields and Potter Palmers dined next to famous actors and actresses. Colosimo was an opera lover, and visiting prima donnas and great tenors were welcomed by him with open arms. It was not uncommon to see the great Italian tenor, Enrico Caruso, dining in Colosimo's Café. One could also see Mary Garden, Luisa Tetrazzini, Titta Ruffo, John McCormack, and Amelita Galli-Curci at the cafe. Broadway entertainers such as Al Jolson, Sophie Tucker, George M. Cohan, and Gallagher and Shean also flocked to Colosimo's Café, when playing the Chicago theaters, as did the hard-drinking John Barrymore and Tyrone Power, Sr.

Seated next to these luminaries would be such reporters as Ring Lardner, Ben Hecht, Charles MacArthur, and Carl Sandburg, when they could afford to eat at Colosimo's. And at other tables dined the most notorious gangsters and riffraff of the city such as gamblers Mont Tennes and Julius "Lovin Putty" Annixter, whoremasters Jake and Harry Guzik, Michael "Ike de Pike" Heitler, Charlie "Monkey Face" Genker, Dennis "The Duke" Cooney, and notorious gunmen such as Charles Dion O'Bannion (or O'Banion), Mac Fitzpatrick, Billy Leathers, "Chicken Harry" Gullet, and Joseph "Jew Kid" Grabiner. Most of the gunmen worked for Torrio as Colosimo's strong-arm enforcers, controlling Big Jim's many rackets. Of course, a special table was always reserved for the politicians, who had helped Colosimo make his fortune, Kenna and Coughlin.

In 1912, religious reformers began to swarm into the Levee, demanding that the local administration clean up the red light district, which was now internationally notorious. Politicians, statesmen, aristocrats, and tycoons of business and industry came from around the world to visit the most elegant bordellos in America, most of these being in Chicago, especially the lavish and sprawling bordello operated by the high-minded Everleigh Sisters. Chicago's reputation as a wide-open city rankled reformers such as Gypsy Smith, who railed against the wholesale corruption, leading massive torchlight parades into the district at night and delivering hortatory speeches against the bordello owners and gambling house operators. Pressure began to mount against the administration of Harrison Carter, who finally, in 1913, relented and ordered most of the bordellos and gambling halls in The Levee closed.

Colosimo, through Torrio's clever manipulations, opened up new brothels and gambling halls in suburbs like Burnham without losing a dime. William Hale "Big Bill" Thompson, a Republican and one of the most corrupt officials to hold office in the U.S. at any time, announced his candidacy for mayor in 1915 and he was backed by Colosimo and the other crime bosses. He was swept into office and The Levee resumed operations. The district, however, never again approached its former days of open wickedness and sinful opulence.

Big Jim was nevertheless content to enjoy his illicit millions. He purchased a mansion and moved in with his whorehouse wife. He bought a fleet of chauffeur-driven cars, and adorned himself with diamonds, emulating his friend, Diamond Joe Esposito, crime boss of Chicago's West Side. Colosimo glittered and sparkled like a Christmas tree, when receiving famous guests for dinner at his café, with diamond cufflinks, diamond studs, diamond rings, and diamond clasps on his suspenders. He reveled in his success and spent most of his time finding ways in which to spend his money, while allowing Torrio to run his crime empire.

Colosimo (left) sits with his father (center) and his new enforcer, a plump Johnny Torrio, who arrived in Chicago from New York in 1909 to kill off the Blackhanders plaguing Big Jim.

The methodical Torrio enlarged Colosimo's territory, opening bordellos, gambling houses, and saloons throughout the South and West sides of Chicago. He enforced Big Jim's rules and even directed gun battles against the police, when they dared to interfere with Colosimo's operations. Then, in 1918, Big Jim met the love of his life, Dale Winter, a young singer appearing in a successful musical, Madame Sherry. He showered expensive gifts upon her and then went to his wife, Victoria, demanding a divorce. The overweight harridan had little choice but to do as she was asked, accepting a $50,000 settlement not to contest the divorce action. "I raised one husband for another woman and there's nothing to it," she told the press.

Privately, Victoria Moresco vowed revenge, or, at least that was the rumor Johnny Torrio and Al Capone later told to cover up their own assassination of Big Jim Colosimo. Almost as soon as he was divorced, Big Jim married Dale Winter and spent his waking hours seeing to her needs. He hired voice coaches to help improve her singing voice and financially backed shows in which she appeared. He evicted Victoria Moresco from his mansion at 3156 Vernon Avenue and refurbished the place before taking his new bride home. He even asked Dale Winter's mother to live with them, which she did.

While Big Jim played, Johnny Torrio made plans for the future. He had repeatedly beseeched his old-fashioned uncle for approval in putting together an organization that would handle bootlegging since the Volstead Act would go into effect on January 17, 1920. "This will mean millions for us, Uncle Jim," he told Colosimo. "People will have nothing to drink. We'll provide the beer, the liquor. What we can't get from Canada, we'll make ourselves." But Colosimo wanted

Dale Winter became the love of Big Jim's life; he divorced his first wife to marry the young singer.

Big Jim is shown with Dale Winter Colosimo as they inspect the new mansion he built for her.

Big Jim happily poses with his new bride, Dale Winter.

One of the earliest photos taken of Al Capone in Chicago, 1919, when he was imported from New York by Torrio as an enforcer, but with the eventual purpose of murdering Big Jim; the two livid scars on his left cheek can be seen in this photo, one the future crime boss hated, preferring to be photographed full face or at a right-side profile.

The interior of Colosimo's sprawling café, where Big Jim dined with opera stars, politicians, judges, journalists and underworld associates.

nothing to do with this new, unproven racket. He considered it "small potatoes," and "chicken feed," not for the likes of a crime czar. (Within five years bootlegging would provide more than $50 million a year to Torrio and his protege, Capone.)

Big Jim also gave Torrio a tongue-lashing for being so presumptuous as to tell him how to run his rackets. Torrio said nothing. He made a phone call to New York and sent for a strong-arm killer whom he had known since childhood, Al Capone. The beefy Capone arrived in Chicago in 1919, his face mutilated in a gang fight for which he was dubbed "Scarface" by those reckless enough to call him that. Torrio put Capone to work as a bouncer, a saloon manager, and an operator of a lowly whorehouse. Capone's real purpose in Chicago was to kill Big Jim Colosimo, a man whose era was over, or so Johnny Torrio had decided.

On May 11, 1920, Torrio called Big Jim and informed his boss that two truckloads of whiskey, intended for the deep cellars of Colosimo's Café, would be delivered at precisely 4 p.m. Torrio stressed this time and that his uncle should be there to pay more than $50,000 for this important shipment. Colosimo promised that he would be on hand to take delivery at the cafe. Big Jim arrived a few hours early and chatted with some of his employees. Colosimo repeatedly walked through the restaurant from his office to the vestibule where he made several calls in a telephone booth. Inside the restaurant, Frank Camilla, Big Jim's secretary, and Chef Caesarino, were discussing the menu for the evening. The porter went into the vestibule at one point and noticed a heavyset, swarthy stranger there, but when the porter returned, the man had apparently left. This man was Al Capone, who had never met Big Jim Colosimo, and, while working for Torrio had kept out of sight (as it were) for several months, using the alias A. Costa. After entering the vestibule with a gun in his pocket, Capone had stepped into the cloak room and closed the door to a crack, waiting for Colosimo.

Big Jim reentered the vestibule and looked through the glass doors leading to the street, waiting for the liquor delivery. As he did so, Capone stepped from the cloakroom and fired a single bullet into the back of the crime boss' head, which entered the skull behind the right ear. He fired a second shot, but by then Colosimo had dropped to the floor, dead, and the second bullet slammed into a vestibule wall. Capone tore open Big Jim's shirtfront and ripped off Colosimo's money belt, which reportedly contained more than $250,000. This, and the post of second-in-command to Torrio, would be Capone's payoff for executing Colosimo. He then stepped outside and calmly walked down the street to Torrio's Four Deuces, a seedy saloon and brothel, where Capone occasionally worked.

Police arrived a short time later and a rash of arrests followed. Apprehended at one of Chicago's train stations was New York gangster Frankie Yale (Uale, 1893-1928). He was brought in for questioning, as were dozens of others. Yale proved that, at the exact time Colosimo was being shot to death, he was addressing a meeting of the Unione Siciliane. Yale was the president of that organization in New York. He was also present to confer with Torrio following Big Jim's assassination as to the best methods of setting up a New York-to-Chicago liquor distribution chain. Some uninformed crime reporters have claimed that Yale was Colosimo's killer, but they have never bothered to research this killing, as well as Yale's whereabouts, nor read the statement given by Colosimo's porter who first "recognized" Capone as the man in the vestibule and later withdrew this claim.

The end of Big Jim: Two Chicago policemen stare down at Colosimo's body, prone on the vestibule floor of his café, shot to death on May 11, 1920, reportedly by Capone.

Yale was released and returned to New York. Torrio, a few days later, moved into Big Jim's offices at Colosimo's Café, and next to his desk was placed a smaller desk, one which would be occupied by Al Capone. The day of the old-fashioned gangster in Chicago, one that employed brass knuckles and a club instead of a submachine gun, was over. The Torrio-Capone era began that day with a murder that would eventually lead to a city-wide bloodbath that would last a decade.

TORRIO THE MASTERMIND/1920s-1950s

Born in Osara, Italy, in February 1882, John Torrio (1882-1957; AKA: Johnny; Frank Langley; J. T. McCarthy) immigrated to New York with his mother in 1884. Torrio's father, Thomas Torrio, was a common laborer, who slaved in Italian vineyards for twenty years and saved his earnings so he could some day take his family to the U.S. He died only a short time before his wife and little boy sailed for the U.S. The 2-year-old son Thomas Torrio sent to the U.S. grew to be one of the craftiest killers in organized crime, and a crime lord, who more than anyone else, laid the foundation of the national crime syndicate formed by Charles "Lucky" Luciano and others in the early 1930s.

The five-foot-six-inch, brown-eyed, stocky Torrio began his career in U.S. crime as a street thug and, thanks to his organizational genius, rose to gang boss in New York, then crime overlord in Chicago, and, eventually, to the position of elder statesman of organized crime in the U.S. Torrio was responsible for establishing billion-dollar rackets and, over a fifty-year period, caused the deaths of hundreds of rival gangsters and gamblers. To his nefarious credit, Torrio could take sinister pride in never having been arrested for any major offense.

Secrecy was at the core of the cunning Torrio's character. From the time Torrio was a boy, he kept out of the limelight and the police showups by convincing others to commit the crimes he masterminded. As a teenager, Torrio established his credo among the youths and later the adult gangsters, who obeyed his orders: "No one is ever to mention my name. No one!" Others took the risks and received the prison sentences, if caught. Torrio provided the police and legal protection and counted the money.

